

Digitized by the Internet Archive
in 2013

<http://archive.org/details/friendreligiousl56smit>

✓

GENEALOGY
929.102
F91FRI
1882-1883

THE FRIEND.

A

RELIGIOUS AND LITERARY JOURNAL.

VOLUME LVI.

Vol. LVI.

PHILADELPHIA:

PRINTED BY WILLIAM H. PILE.

1883.

INDEX.

- abstinence from alcoholic drinks. Reasons for total, 309.
- Acadians. Account of the removal of, in 1755, 282.
- Affliction. Encouragement addressed to those under, 258.
- Afluence. Remarks on the obligation of those living in, to be examples of self-denial, 364.
- Africa. Observations on the malaria of, 35.
- Observations on recent explorations in Central, 372, 398.
- African trading. Description of, 106.
- agate polishing in Germany. Notice of, 142.
- Agassiz. Incident connected with the early life of, as a naturalist, 77.
- Agriculture. On the part which bacteria may perform in, 22.
- Notice of recent experiments on seed corn and potatoes, 398.
- Albert Prince. Anecdote of the parental faithfulness of, 62.
- Albion paper. Notice of the production of, in the United States, 351.
- Alcohol. On the physiological effects of, 14.
- Alpo Christine M. Observations of, on being, rather than doing, in religion, 214.
- Amber. Notice of the deposits of, in Northern Germany, 415.
- America. Sundry observations on, by George Pitt, 66, 73.
- On a cause of geographical inaccuracy in early descriptions of, 209.
- Ancient testimonies and advices of Friends, 57, 68, 77, 81, 98, 105, 121, 129, 139, 147.
- Anecdote of Agassiz, 77; of John Wesley, 77; Duke of Wellington, 124; Persigny, 166; Queen Victoria, 210; Lydia Maria Child, 218.
- Antiseptics. Conclusions of Prof. Le Bon respecting the efficacy of, 78.
- Animals. Remarks on killing, by the sportsmen, 278.
- Notice of proposed observations on the diseases of domestic, 286.
- Archæological researches in Asia Minor, &c. Notices of recent, 318.
- Arctic regions. On the large proportion of the plants native in, suitable for food, 119.
- Art. Remarks on the debasing effects of, 185, 267.
- Art indecency. Observations of, 238.
- Artificial fruit, 215.
- Asteroids. Notice of the number of, 415.
- Atmosphere. Observations on the constant presence of organic germs in the, 137, 145.
- Aurora borealis. Notice of the production of an artificial, 335.
- Australia. Notice of the destruction caused by rabbits in, 150.
- Austria. Account of foot-washing by the Emperor and Empress of, 308.
- Awake—Turn to the Lord—Labor in His vineyard, 13.
- Babylon. Remarks on the remarkable fulfilment of a prediction respecting ancient, 156.
- Notice of the discovery of an ancient door-step in, with inscriptions relating to Nebuchadnezzar, 228.
- Abby's victory. Extract entitled, The, 492.
- Backbiting. A seasonable remark on, 252.
- Ballast. On the necessity of carrying, 242.
- Baluchistan. On the origin of certain shrines in, 166.
- Bank of England. Brief account of the, 222.
- The practice of, in regard to its paid notes, 405.
- Baptism. On the nature of true, 138.
- Comments on the outward character of water, 130.
- Baptists. Notice of change of organization of, in Georgia, 175.
- Liturgical exercises adopted by, in New York, 239.
- Barclay John. Remarks of, on the true standard of simplicity, 42.
- Letter of, 146.
- Remarks of, on that sweet retirement of mind, which is the element and atmosphere of a true Friend, 405.
- "Battering ram." Extract entitled, "The, 133.
- Bedouins. The hospitality of the, 219.
- On the execution of justice among the, 357.
- Beer drinking. Observations on the deceitful and destructive effects of, upon health, 246.
- Bees. On the usefulness of, in the fertilization of clover, 366.
- On the hunting of, in Timor, 382.
- Being let go, they went unto their own company. Extract entitled, 237.
- Beware of being stumbling blocks, 34.
- Bettle Samuel, Sr. Notice of religious exercises of, 347.
- Bevan Joseph Gurney. On the Christian conduct of in business, 317.
- Bible Association of Friends in America. Circular of, 85.
- Society. Notice of the American, 198.
- "Billy Bray," of Cornwall, England. Anecdote of, and comments, 394.
- Bilsdale meeting-house of Friends. Notice of the recent unwarrantable confiscation of the, 270.
- Birdsall William. Extract from a testimony of New York Monthly Meeting concerning the late, 2.
- Birds. Anecdotes of the teasing propensity of, 86.
- On the usefulness of, to mariners, 191.
- Bishop. How the kitchen-boy became a, 245.
- Blasting operation. A large, 247.
- Blind. Notice of a free circulating library for the, 191.
- Boat and ball clubs of college students reprobated, 230.
- Boles Abigail. The necessity of watchfulness illustrated by the case of, 381.
- Bonjean. The death of, in Paris, revenged by the benevolent instruction of the masses by his sons, 404.
- Book notices, &c. New edition of the Memoirs of Mary Capper, 15.
- Wayward and Obedient, by A. L. Washburn, 30.
- Passages from the Life and Writings of William Penn, 75, 79.
- An Appeal to the American people on education and temperance, by Elizabeth Thompson, 103.
- "Tract for Teachers," 104.
- Memoir of Enoch Lewis, 110.
- "Our Ancestors," 159.
- "Sidereal Messenger," 160.
- Vick's Floral Guide, 167.
- "Penn's Treaty," by Chas. S. Keyser, 176.
- "Kindergarten Homes," by E. Thompson, 176.
- Report of the Penna. Society to protect children from cruelty, 183.
- Annual Report of the Managers of the Reading Rooms for Friends, 184.
- "The Evelyns in America," 209.
- Annual Report of the Trustees of the Astor Library of New York, 223.
- Wayside Thoughts, by Phebe Haines, 223.
- The Sidereal Messenger, 231.
- Report of the Managers of the Adelphi School, 240.
- 28th Report of the Howard Institution, 240.
- Memoir of Rebecca Hubbs, 255.
- The Hebrew Christian, 263.
- The Primitive Friend, 263.
- Address on the 200th anniversary of the landing of William Penn, 272.
- The Gospel Expositor, 295.
- "The Early Friends and their services in America," by Dr. J. J. Leveck, 311.
- "The Biographer," 320.
- "The Quaker invasion of Massachusetts," by R. P. Hallowell, 327.
- "On the Desert," by Henry M. Field, 330.
- "The Christian Worker," 338.
- Report of the Children's Week Association, 367.
- Address to its members issued by Philadelphia Yearly Meeting, 398.
- Books. Advice on using, 36, 86.
- Boys. Account of the industry and financial success of four, 204.
- Brandy. On a large falsification of, in France, 255.
- Bread. Observations on the digestibility of fresh, 69.
- Brick. Notice of baking walls of, in ancient times, 235.
- Bright John. Approval of the resignation of, from the British ministry, 46.
- Brighton Patience. Letter of a clergyman to, expressing his unity with, 114.
- Business. Good maxims of, 93.
- Maxims of, bad and good, 322.
- Ancient advices of Friends respecting the conducting of, 98.
- Business. On integrity in, 236.
- Remarks to young men on preparing to enter into, 316.
- On the Christian concern and course of Joseph Gurney Bevan in relation to, 317.
- not allowed to interfere with the attendance of week-day meetings by a lad, 379.
- Remarks on the wide-spread influence of a man of integrity in, 395.
- Brown John, of Sheffield, Eng. Anecdote of, 362.
- California. Observations on the sea coast in Southern, 106.
- Notice of the conflict between the mining and farming interests in, 118.
- Camden, N. J. Account of the early settlement of Friends near, 306.
- Canes. On the manufacture of, 390.
- Capper Mary. Extract from, on the true principles and practices of Friends, 19.
- Extract from on true denial of self, 270.
- Remarks of, on the unspeakable privilege of meeting to wait upon the Lord, 404.
- Capri. Account of a recent visit to the isle of, 298.
- Captain. Anecdote of a kindhearted, 395.
- Comments on the above, 415.
- Card-playing at home. Earnest remonstrance against, 314.
- leads to gambling, 354.
- Catechism. Remarks on a palpable error contained in the, of the Episcopal church, 93.
- Caton William. On the favors of the Lord to, in his ministry, 300.
- Caves. Notice of sepulchral, in Palestine, 307.
- Celestial photography. On the advances of, 410.
- Charitable gifts. On the wisdom is disposing of an estate in, during the life time of the donor, 190.
- Child. A wise choice made by a, 350.
- Children. Ancient testimonies of Friends respecting the care and training of, 57, 105.
- Anecdote of a cheerful trust in Divine protection by, 170.
- It is a credit to a man to show kindness to, 221.
- An Epistle of London Yearly Meeting of 1723, to parents on the training and care of, 221.
- Words of an exercised mother on behalf of her, 258.
- Incident on showing sympathy to, 260.
- Remarks on instructing, at home and on the maintenance of the doctrines and testimonies of Friends, 260.
- Incident connected with unselfish training in, 278.
- On the hopefulness of, who are of a tender conscience, 301.
- Remarks of Richard Shackleton on the association of his, with the wise and good, 334.
- Tender religious yearning for the spiritual welfare of, 375.
- Incident affording encouragement to parents to discharge their duty towards, 386.
- The proper training of, a work of faith, 406.
- The education of, in good morals and character, more important than in school learning, 412.
- China. Observations on natives of, in the tea-districts, 33.
- Chinese Christians in New York. Notice of the Christian conduct of, 142.
- as scholars in New York, 150.
- Account of a school for, in Boston, 187.
- Observations on the demand for, as laborers in California, 254.
- Observations on the poverty and kindness of, to strangers in China, 260.
- and Americans. On the contrary practices among, 261.
- language. On the difficulty of printing the, 310.
- Noble conduct of a, in reference to the use of opium, 414.
- Christian. On the cost of being a, 43.
- Christian simplicity carried into practice. Remarks on, 42.
- character. A test of, 50.
- character. Faith and love, patience and perseverance, the cardinal points of a, 250.
- life. A, not a sombre thing, 213.

Christian life one of mingled joys and sorrows, 279.
 Christians. On the duty of, in reference to voting, 109.
 The life of professing, the test of their Christianity, 116.
 On the injury done by false, 258.
 Consolation to, 258.
 Animating promises to true, 334.
 Animating instances of youthful, 387.
 Christ Jesus, the propitiation for our sins, 87.
 Obedience to the will of God, the way to know the doctrine of, 91.
 On the happy effects of walking in the Light of, 103.
 Notice of the testimony of a recently convinced person on the sufficiency of the light of, 119.
 On the baptism of, 138.
 On the dialect used by, when personally on earth, 165.
 The voice of, must be known to perform worship acceptably, 199.
 Every true believer, an ambassador for, 390.
 "Christmas." Remarks on the customary celebration of, 165, 190.
 Christendom. On international duties of, 317.
 Church. The Lord will continue with the, 198.
 On the damaging effect of wealth and aristocracy in the professing, 326.
 Church of Humanity." Notice of "The, 198.
 Churchman John. Account by, of a tendering visitation of Divine grace, in his youth, 387.
 concerned to caution a Friend against sleeping in meetings, 394.
 Cider and cider drunkards. Remarks on, 238.
 Circle of fire." Account of a providential deliverance entitled, "The, 117.
 Claridge Richard. The experience of, that conversion is not instantaneous, 369.
 Clock. Description of a water, 239.
 Coal. Canstic lime successfully used in blasting, 6.
 Statistics of the product of, in the U. States, 165.
 Coal-dust. On the successful utilization of, 398.
 Coggeshall Elizabeth. Anecdote of, 331.
 Coins. Notice of discovery of Roman, in England, 366.
 Comet of 1883. Observations on the, 215.
 Commit thy ways to God, 164.
 Complaints of others are often confessions of our own weaknesses, 84.
 Congo. On the opening of the, to the commerce of the world, 372.
 Consideration of the feelings of others. On, 263.
 Contentment essential to happiness, 391.
 Convent of St. Catharine. Notice of the, 357, 364.
 Conversation. Remarks on carefully avoiding unguarded expressions in, 362.
 Conversation. Remarks on, unseasoned with the fruits of the Spirit, 52, 234.
 Contentment. On the nature of, 76.
 Contrast. Essay entitled, A, 213.
 Conversion. Remarks on, 114.
 Convict. Account of a converted, 238.
 Cooper Lydia. Testimonial in reference to the character of, 294.
 Cope Alfred. Remarks of, on music, 3.
 Notice of valuable contributions to this journal by the late, 193.
 David. Notice of the late, 331.
 Coral. On the product of, during the past year in the Mediterranean, 286.
 Cozens Ellen. Heavenly opening vouchsafed to, 379.
 Criticism. Remarks on the so-called, higher, 46.
 Cross-bearing. Remarks on, 21.
 Crystals of sulphur containing water. Notice of, 102.
 Combustion without flame. Observations on, 102.
 Cuttle-fish. On the ink-bag of the, 102.
 Darling Grace. Biographical account of, 51.
 Deaths.—Rebecca F. Abbott, 32; Amy E. Alsop, 80; Mary B. Ashbridge, 168; Ann H. Bacon, 40; S. Mason Bines, 104; Joshua Billinger, 208; Joseph Bailey, 360; Jordan Ballard, 400; Ellwood Burgess, 400; Mary M. Bishop, 400; Emlen Craft, 16; Susan M. Cook, 208; James C. Comfort, 264; Benjamin D. Cooper, 264; Lydia Cooper, 280; Truman Cooper, 280; Susanna J. Cooper, 280; Sarah Ann Cox, 328; Elizabeth H. De Cou, 168; Maria Dewees, 200; Elizabeth Dugdale, 208; Joseph Embree, 200; Elizabeth D. Edge, 280; Joshua Fulton, 112; Phebe Foster, 168; Hannah Gilbert, 168; Sarah E. Griffin, 216; Sidney Hibberd, 80; Cassandra R. Harvey, 144; Deborah C. Howell, 192; Martin B. Holloway, 208; Wm. G. Hoskins, 208; Nathan Harvey, 296; Elizabeth S. Haines, 312; Naomi B. Haines, 328; Nathaniel B. Hillman, 328; Deborah Hunt, 328; Marmaduke Jay, 72; Joshua Jacob, 208; William Jessup, 264; George I. Kashner, 8; Anne King, 232; Joseph Kaighn, 264; Lavina King, 272; Susanna Kaighn, 360; Dr. James Kersey, 288; David F. Knowles, 328; Lois Lossing, 8; Charlotte Lundey, 8; Isaac Lightfoot, 16; Jane Lovett, 56; Charles Lippincott, 61; Sarah Lewis, 80; William H. Llewellyn, 200; Joseph J. Lewis, 296; John Mendenhall, 21; John N. Miller, 56; Benjamin V. Marsh, 144; John T. Moorman, 184; Sarah H. Mailly, 184; Charity Maxwell, 208; Amos E. Middleton, 264; Thomas Mendenhall, 280; Samuel Mason, 296; Sarah L. Mickle, 328; Margaret Maule, 328; Martha W. Moore, 352; Sarah R. Matlack, 352; Rachel Negus, 176; Eunice Nichols, 240; Anne Pim, 16; Hannah G. Pusey, 141; Mary Pike, 160; Susan Powell, 176; Hannah Pyle, 224; T. Chalkley Palmer, 264; William S. Perot, 264; William M. Phillips, 288; Deborah Parvin, 296; Richard Penrose, 360; Margaret Plowman, 400; Maria Pusey, 408; Rebecca Roberts, 176; Nathan D. Roberts, 280; Jane Roberts, 280; Letitia Reeve, 352; Harriet J. Smalley, 8; Martha B. Stokes, 152; Ann Stewardson, 256; James Smedley, 288; Daniel B. Smith, 288; Joseph D. Satterthwaite, 360; Mary Taylor, 256; Joseph Taylor, 256; John Thorp, 264; Phebe Tomlinson, 416; Abigail Velotte, 168; Abigail Wood, 32; Abigail Way, 400; Presbury Wing, 120; Hannah B. Williams, 168; Mary Ann Wood, 280; Sidney Wilson, 280; Lydia H. Yarnall, 208.

 Deats Mary A. Account of the character and happy death of, 141.
 Decision of character. Remarks on and illustrations of, 299.
 Deist. Account of the conviction of a, 205.
 Desultory Selections and Pencillings. Essays entitled, 2, 10, 18, 26, 34.
 Deacons and deaconesses in the primitive church. On the office of, 246.
 Deepest waters stillest run." Remarks on humility, entitled "The, 283.
 Denmark. Notice of the establishment of a journal in, to advocate peace, 255.
 Dewees Rebecca. A letter of, to a son, 219.
 Detraction. Notice of a society formed against, 332.
 Divine blessing. Nothing is permanent without the, 118.
 Divine grace. On the secret operation of, in the soul, 27.
 Illustration of the power of, 93.
 Ancient advice of Friends to follow the leadings of, 147.
 love. Incidents showing the softening effects of, 373.
 Divine visitations. On the great happiness of heeding, 165.
 Disciples of Christ." Notice of the religious body called "The, 286.
 "Do your best." Extract entitled, 44.
 Docks. Remarks on eradicating the evils of the heart entitled, 35.
 Dodge William E. Consistent conduct of, in opposing First-day travelling, 226.
 Remarks on the character of, 239.
 Dog. Anecdotes of the sympathy of a, 38, 69, 358, 391.
 Dogs. Anecdotes of sagacity in, 6, 14, 54, 78, 102, 166, 398.
 Dream of heaven. A, 162.
 or vision of Hester Moxie, concerning heaven, 235.
 Dreams. Anecdotes of Divine manifestations through, 50, 348.
 Dress. Comments on the lapsed testimony of many Friends and Methodists in reference to plainness of, &c., 5.
 On the importance of the testimony of Friends to plainness of, 34.
 Experience of Thomas Ellwood in assuming a plain, 180.
 Remarks on the waste of time consumed on fashionable, 268.
 Dress parade at West Point. Remarks on the evils of war, entitled "The, 389.
 Dublin Meeting House. On the site of the former, 44.
 Comments on the above, 89.
 Dunkards. An account of the, 302.
 Dynamite. On the restricted area of damage possible by explosions of, 335.
 On the preparation of, 342.
 Earthquakes in America in 1882. Statistics of, 351.
 Earthquake waves at sea. Description of, 185.
 shocks in Celebes. Description of, 375.
 East wind in the East. Notice of the effects of, 390.
 Easter. Notice of wasteful extravagance in a late celebration of, 350.

Editorial.—Remarks on the sanctioning of the Home Mission movement by London Yearly Meeting, 6; Notice of the proceedings of Canada Yearly Meeting (smaller body), 7; Comments on allowing Catharine Booth the use of the Devonshire Meeting House in London to deliver an address to Friends on the Salvation Army and the influence of certain periodicals in undermining the principles and practices of Friends, 14; Notice of a new edition of the Memoirs of Mary Capper, 15; Remarks on English publications on the anti-Christian nature, and evils of war, including the present Egyptian war, 23; Comments on the practical experience of religion, 30; Remarks on the separation among Friends in Canada, 38; Notice of a proposed amendment to the Constitution of Pennsylvania prohibiting the manufacture or sale of intoxicating liquors, 39; Remarks to a correspondent, 39; On cheerfully performing the humble daily duties of life as in the Divine sight, 47; On raising tobacco, as an occupation inconsistent with Christian profession, 47; Notice of the proceedings of North Carolina Yearly Meeting, 54; Encouragement to the faithful members of the militant church, 63; Account of the proceedings of Ohio Yearly Meeting, 70; Remarks on the religious character of the meetings for discipline among Friends, and the right qualification for conducting them 79; Remarks on the proposed Bi-centennial celebration of the landing of William Penn in America and the manifest incongruity of some of its features with his character, 79, 103; Observations on Unitarian views, and the true method of becoming acquainted with spiritual truths, 87; On erroneous statements recently promulgated respecting the exercise of the ministry by the early Friends, 94; Observations on walking in the Light of Christ, 103; Remarks on an appeal by Elizabeth Thompson to the American people on education and temperance, 103; Notice of an appeal on behalf of the Penna. Retreat for blind mutes and aged and infirm blind persons, 103; Notice of "Tract for Teachers," 104; Notice of a memoir of Enoch Lewis, 110; Notice of a late presentment of the Grand Jury of Phila. on intoxicating drinks and pernicious papers, 110; Notice of the testimony of a recently convinced person on the sufficiency of the light of Christ, 119; On the necessity of seeking the assistance of the Holy Spirit to understand the Scriptures, 143; Comments on a declaration of the President of the United States favoring arbitration in the settlement of international disputes, 143; Remarks on a proposition to have a salaried pastor in a meeting of Friends, 151, 207, 223; Encouragement to the true hearted, 151; Notice of proceedings of Kansas Yearly Meeting (larger body), 159; Notice of the formation in Philadelphia of the "Indian Rights Association," 159; Notice of "Our Ancestors," 159; Notice of the "Sideral Messenger," 160; On the necessity of experiencing repentance, 135; Reflections on the close of the year, 167; Notice of Vick's Floral Guide, 167; Observations on the doctrine of the resurrection, 175; Notice of "Penn's Treaty," by Charles S. Keyser, 176; Notice of "Kindergarten Homes" by E. Thompson, 176; Encouragement to the members of Philadelphia Yearly Meeting, 183; Notice of the Report of the Penna. Society to protect children from cruelty, 183; Notice of the Annual Report of the Managers of the reading rooms for Friends, 184; Notice of the proceedings of Kansas Yearly Meeting (smaller body), 191; Notice of a free circulating library for the blind, 191; Remarks on "family worship," 199; Comments on Chas. Shieldstream's communications on will-worship, 199; Remarks on civil service reform, 199; Remark to an inquirer, 207; On a pretended letter of Cotton Mather, 215; Remarks on promptly forwarding obituary notices, 216; Remarks on a "Women's Foreign Missionary Association of Friends," 223; Notice of the Annual Report of the Trustees of the Astor Library, 223; Notice of "Wayside Thoughts," by Phebe Haines, 223; Remarks on the disintegration going on in the Society of Friends arising from innovations in doctrines, 231; Remarks on the destruction caused by recent floods in the Ohio Valley, 231; Notice of The Sideral Messenger, 231; Remarks on the character of William E. Dodge, 239; Notice of the Report of the Managers of the Adelphi School, 240; Notice of the Report of the Howard Association, 240; Remarks on the desolating effects of a ministry which has not the Divine sanction, 247; Comments on a letter to the editor respecting a communication from Joseph Morris, 255; Notice of the publication by the Meeting for Sufferings of a Memoir of Rebecca Hubbs, 255, 264; The daily reading of the Holy Scriptures recommended, 263; On a proposition respecting the support of the poor by Monthly

- Meetings, 263; Notice of The Hebrew Christian, 263; Notice of The Primitive Friend, 264; Observations on the consequences said to have followed an increase of trained ministers among Methodists, 271; Notice of an Address on the 200th anniversary of the landing of William Penn, by Howard M. Jenkins, 272; The Christian's pathway one of mingled joy and sorrow, 279; Remark on the authorship of a poetical contribution, 279; On the death of Daniel B. Smith, 287; On the approach of the Yearly Meeting, 287; Notice of the proceedings of Phila. Yearly Meeting, 294, 303; Notice of The Gospel Expositor, and the discordancy of the doctrines advocated by it, with those of Friends, 295; On the blessedness of walking in the Light of Christ, 310; Notice of a publication by Dr. J. J. Leveck on "The Early Friends and their services in America," 311; Notice of a legal decision in reference to Friends of Canada Yearly Meeting, 319; Notice of "The Biographer," 320; Notice of The Quaker Invasion of Massachusetts, by R. P. Hallowell, 327; On the need of watchfulness over themselves in those who undertake to promote the Lord's cause, 327; Remarks on a statement of Dougan Clark on receiving pay for preaching, 335; The preparation of the hearts of the people for the reception of the gospel at the rise of the Society of Friends by the Lord's power, the cause of the results attending the ministry of George Fox and others, 343; Remarks approving a veto message of Governor Pattison upon a divorce bill, 343; Comments on charges made by The Gospel Expositor against Philadelphia Yearly Meeting, 351; Remarks on The Christian Worker, and the character of the religious activity advocated in "revival" meetings among Friends, 358; Remarks on the inseparable nature of sanctification and justification as believed in by Friends, 366; Notice of the Report of the Children's Week Association, 367; Christ is to be known as the author of salvation to all true Christians of whatever denomination, 375; Remarks on incorrect statements respecting the testimony of Friends against a hireling ministry, 383; Remarks on the benefit likely to result from the civil reform service, 383; Remarks upon resorting to law, for the recovery of damages by Friends, 391; Notice of the proceedings of London Yearly Meeting, 399; Notice of the proceedings of Dublin Yearly Meeting, 399; Remark to correspondents, 399; Notice of the proceedings of New York Yearly Meeting, 407; Notice of the proceedings of Canada Yearly Meeting, (smaller body,) 407; The cross of Christ to be taken up in the use of the plain language, 415; Remark on an inaccuracy pointed out by a correspondent, 415; Notice of a change in the subscription price, 415. Editors of newspapers in Chicago requested to exclude everything of an immoral tendency, 351.
- dom. Experience of a recent traveller with the children of, 101.
- Education of the children of Friends. Remarks of John Fothergill on the, 157.
- Comments on the above, 199.
- Statistics of the expenditure by different Governments for, and for war, 357.
- of character. Remarks on, 412.
- gypt. Remarks on the present war in, 23.
- Observations on the effects of the war in, upon missionaries, 47.
- lectricity. Travellers on the Alps charged with, 37. used in trimming seal-skins, 150.
- men James. Extract from a letter of, 334.
- men Sarah. Remarks on the influence of the Holy Spirit as illustrated by, 267.
- Account of remarkable religious exercises of, at Westtown Boarding School, 307.
- empty coat." Remarks on the disappointing pleasures of this world, entitled "The, 255.
- ngland. Notice of the rise in gin-drinking in, and its momentous effects, 141.
- Notice of the efforts of the United Kingdom Alliance against intemperance in, 142.
- On the political influence of mechanical inventions in, 163.
- The established Church of, hurtful in its effects, 206.
- encouragement to the faithful, 314.
- Episcopal church in England denounced as a great patron of intemperance, 78.
- catechism. Remarks on a palpable error in, 93.
- On the hurtful effects of the Establishment in England, 206.
- A system of lay preachers in the, proposed, 230.
- The disestablishment of the, agitated, 239.
- Notice of a persistent defiance of the law against ritualism by a clergyman of the, 251.
- Episcopal church. Remarks on the election of an archbishop in the, 278.
- Remarks of the "London Times" on the inefficiency of the, 293.
- Statistics of the, in London, 318.
- Episcopal church. Reformed. The strict observance of the First-day of the week recommended by, 214.
- Notice of the ninth General Council of, 365.
- Epistle of London Yearly Meeting of 1723 to parents, recommending a godly care for the educating their children in a Christian conversation, 221.
- Epitaphs. Notice of early Christian, in Rome, 405.
- Evans Grace. A testimony concerning the exemplary Christian walk of, 43.
- Joseph. A tribute to the memory of, 50.
- Thomas. Notice of a remarkable communication by, in 1867, 301.
- Letter of, 315.
- Every day duties. On the right performance of, 283.
- Evil speaking and harsh judgment. On avoiding, 332.
- Excursion to Brown's Mills, N. J. Account of an, 19.
- Face to the light. On turning the, 52.
- Faith of an aged man. Incident showing the, 261.
- Faith the basis of knowledge, 205.
- Faith-cure camp meeting. Remarks on a, 46.
- Faithfulness to religious convictions rewarded, 333.
- Fall of man. On the, and way of recovery therefrom, 4.
- Falling from righteousness. Remarks on, 357.
- Farnum Moses. On the happy dying hours of, 174.
- Faults. Advice on recognizing and remedying "little," 132.
- Fansit Walter. Some of the last words and religious counsel of, 386.
- "Fear not." Encouragement to the true Christian entitled, 334.
- Fenwick John. Notice of the efforts of, to found a colony in New Jersey, 202.
- Fiji Islands. Account of a recent visit to the, 1.
- Files. On a method of sharpening, 271.
- Finger-marks. Remarks on indulging in sin, entitled, 53.
- Fir seed. Notice of a large business in, in Washington Territory, 119.
- Fire unintentionally caused by a lens, 351, 358.
- First-day of the week. The Bessemer steel works at Pittsburg, discontinue working on the, 118.
- The strict observance of, recommended by Reformed Episcopalians, 214.
- On the running of rail-road trains, and travelling on the, 226.
- Faithfulness to religious convictions against working on the, rewarded, 333.
- to be observed by the Louisville, New Albany and Chicago Railway, 365.
- First-day afternoons. On the proper employment of time on, 108.
- Fish. Plan for transporting live, 415.
- Floods in the Ohio Valley. Notice of destruction caused by recent, 231.
- Florence, Italy. Account of a recent visit to, and reflections on, 185.
- Food. On the preparation of mescal, as, 135.
- Fresh water mollusks used as, 366.
- On the use of insects as, in Africa, 375.
- On the use of snails as, in Spain, 398.
- Forbearance. On the need of, 203.
- Forbes Barbara. Brief notice of the religious character of, 218.
- Forgiveness. Observations on the necessity of, 162.
- Fothergill John. Letter of, in reference to the appointment and services of a Committee appointed by London Yearly Meeting in 1776, 60.
- Fox George. A prayer of, 116.
- Declaration of, respecting his gospel mission, 186.
- Account of a trial of, and refusal to swear, 194.
- Remarks on C. H. Spurgeon's lecture on, 228, 237, 243.
- On prayer, 317.
- Advice of, to Friends travelling as ministers, 327.
- in prayer. Remarks of William Penn on, 332.
- Declarations of, on man in relation to woman in the gospel, 404.
- Fox Maria. Letter of, to a young convinced person, 306.
- France. Notice of a modification of judicial oaths in, 37.
- Account of Friends in the south of, written in 1783, 108.
- Freedmen. Notice of the gloomy outlook for the, in Alabama, 292.
- Free Methodists. Rules on temperance &c., adopted by, 131.
- Freedom. On the serious aspect of, 259.
- Friend" "The. List of Agents of, 63.
- Agent appointed for, 375.
- Remarks on encouraging the circulation of, 156.
- Funerals. Notice of a society in England to reform customs of, 309.
- Friends. Religious communications addressed to, 2, 4, 12, 13, 67, 74, 106, 155, 157, 181, 196, 211, 245, 258, 364.
- Testimony of William Birdsall, that none had attained to eminent usefulness in the Society of, who had not faithfully maintained their testimony to plainness of speech, behavior and apparel, 2.
- Testimony of Ann Jones and Sarah [L.] Grubb respecting the departure from the principles and practices of, in England, and comments, 18.
- Ancient testimonies of, and advice respecting the training of youth, &c., 57.
- Encouragement to faithful, 63.
- Ancient testimonies and advices of, respecting marriage, 68.
- Ancient testimonies and advices of, respecting tale bearing and detraction, 77.
- Brief declaration of the faith of, by William Penn, 75.
- Ancient testimonies and advices of, on the attendance of all their religious meetings and the right exercise of mind in them, 81.
- Ancient testimonies and advices of, respecting over-trading and the punctual payment of debts, 98.
- On the state of the Society of, 2, 42, 61, 67, 131, 138, 212, 231, 398, 402.
- Ancient testimonies of, on the necessity of faithfulness and watchfulness, 139.
- Ancient testimonies and advices of, on a reverent waiting upon God in religious meetings, 129.
- On the testimony of, against music, 2, 10, 82, 83.
- On the testimony of, to plainness of dress, 31, 84.
- Observations of John Woolman on luxury among, 34.
- Remarks on gratifying an inclination for sight-seeing, &c., by, 34.
- A testimony respecting, in America during last century, 34.
- Declaration of John Barclay respecting, 35.
- A recent testimony concerning, 42.
- On the true qualifications for ordering the affairs of the Society of, 42.
- On the sad consequences of parental deficiency to the Society of, 42.
- A call to, for greater faithfulness, 42.
- On the efforts of Satan in this day to destroy the Society of, 42, 67.
- Remarks on some of the dangers to, in the present day, 67.
- On the religious nature of meetings for discipline among, and the proper qualification for conducting them, 79.
- Remarks in reference to the continued existence of Unitarian doctrines in those who separated from, in 1827, 87.
- On the error of certain statements recently made respecting the exercise of the ministry by Geo. Fox and the early, 94.
- Ancient testimonies and advices of, on the education and training of children, 105.
- Advice to, in 1759 on the proper observance of First-day afternoons by the youth, 108.
- in the South of France. Account of, written in 1788, 108.
- Remarks on the danger of riches to the Society of, 113.
- The daily reverent reading of the Holy Scriptures recommended to, 116, 134.
- On the remedy for the present divisions in the Society of, 117.
- Ancient advices of, and encouragement to the young, 121.
- The joining of secret societies by members of the Society of, reprehensible, 142.
- Ancient advices of, to follow the leadings of Divine grace, 147.
- On the doctrines of, respecting ministry, 151, 207, 371.
- On the duty of, to maintain their characteristic principles and testimonies, 155.
- Remarks of John Fothergill on the education of the children of, in the nurture and admonition of the Lord, 157.
- Comments on the above, 199.
- Testimony of Thomas C. Upham and others to the principles and testimonies of, 129.

- Friends. Tender advice to, 161.
On the importance of the counsel to, on making their wills, &c., while in health, 167.
On the necessity of the maintenance by, of the reality of immediate revelation, 170.
On the testimony of, against war, 178.
The "secret power" in the assemblies of, needed now to refresh and strengthen the soul, 186.
On the way of salvation as believed in by, 186.
On an improper way of observing "Christmas" and New Year's day by some members among, 190.
Counsel to, in reference to worldly-mindedness and riches, 196.
On the doctrine of, respecting acceptable worship, 199.
On a false ministry among, 212.
Letter of a former member of the Binns' Meeting respecting, 220.
On the disintegration going on in the Society of, arising from innovations in doctrine, 231.
Remarks of an experienced elder on the administration of the discipline by, 245.
Encouragement to, to be faithful in the present day, 245.
Encouragement addressed to some of the junior members among, 252.
Encouragement to, to maintain the true spirit of judgment, 257.
Statistics of longevity among, 270.
On the rise and effects of a spurious ministry among, 276.
Remarks to, on showing the beauty of holiness in our daily lives, 278.
Extracts from the early minutes of meetings of ministering, in Penna., 284.
Notice of the expression of feeling in a recent Monthly Meeting in London, respecting the ministry among, 286.
Extracts from old minutes of Concord Quarterly Meeting of Ministers and Elders, 292.
Account of the early settlement of, near Camden, N. J., 306.
Remarks on separation among, 313.
Children of, when not distinguished from the world by their garb and deportment, often cease to be, in morals and rectitude of conduct, 317.
Instance of the conviction by a person of the principles of, without instrumental means, 324.
Remarks on the cruel treatment of, by the early settlers in Massachusetts, &c., 327.
On the testimony of, against paying for preaching, 335.
The hearts of the people prepared by the Lord's power for the reception of the gospel, at the rise of the Society of, 343.
On the evanescent character of the "revival" movement among, 358.
Remarks on the evil resulting from discussions, &c., in "institutes" for, 363.
Remarks on the doctrines of, respecting the inseparable nature of sanctification and justification, 366.
On the testimony of, against hat-honor, 374.
On the testimony of, against a hireling ministry, 383.
Remarks on resorting to law for the recovery of damages by, 391.
Notice of the efforts of, to discourage the use of ardent spirits among, 395.
On the belief of, in reference to the Divine ordering in marriage, 402.
On the sweet retirement of mind which is the element and atmosphere of true, 405.
The exercise of mind of Mary Capper that, might become a more spiritual and simple hearted people, 413.
- Gambling. The taste for, often fostered by card playing at home, 354.
Gardiner Prince. Anecdote of, 362.
"Gather the fragments." Essays entitled, 331. 338. 347. 362. 372. 379. 386. 395.
"Gather up the fragments that nothing be lost." Contribution entitled, 182.
"Gather up the fragments." Essays entitled, 301. 307. 315. 324.
Germany. On the religious condition of, 214.
Notice of the labors of Von Scheumbach, a Methodist, in, 358.
Gibbons Hannah. Remarks of, on days of tribulation and sorrow, 61.
Giving his life for his friend. Extract entitled, 413.
Glass shingles. Notice of the manufacture of, 310.
Gleanings from Quaker Annals. Essays entitled, 170. 180. 186. 194. 203. 210. 218. 226. 233. 242. 250.
"Good Friday," a chronological mistake. Notice of an attempt to show, 285.
"Good-by." Remarks on the origin of the term, and scruples of Friends in regard to its use, 116.
Gospel. The, preached to every creature under heaven, 140.
The inward testimony of the truth of the, the most effectual, 404.
Graffiti or wall scribblings in Pompeii, &c., 178.
Gravitation. On the mystery of, 230.
Greenland. Notice of proposed explorations in, 286.
Greek church. Notice of the discontinuance of a branch of the, in New York City, 175.
Grellet Stephen. Observations of, on the Society of Friends, 403.
Griffith Abraham. Anecdote of, 386.
Growth in the Truth." Essay entitled, "A, 157.
Gulf stream. Observations on the, 191.
Gypsies. Notice of a religious organization among, in England, 118.
- Hall Richard, of Waverton, England. Brief account of the life and religious concern of, 355.
Extracts from letters of, 363.
Haste and hurry. A distinction between, 53.
Hat-honor. Experience of William Penn in reference to, 302.
On the testimony of Friends against, 374.
Haydock Roger. Brief account of the conviction and marriage of, 402.
"He leadeth me." Essay entitled, 153.
Health. On the cause and cure of corns on the feet, 30.
On the effects of African Malaria on the, 35.
On the importance of proper mastication of food to the, 69.
Inoculation by human saliva poisonous, 69.
Observations on putrefaction, &c., upon, 78.
On the effect of narcotics upon the blood, 87.
On the injury done to, by modern civilization, 92.
Observations on the injury done to, by tobacco, 87. 94.
Impure well water often an unsuspected cause of injury to, 102. 110. 150.
Consumption said to be transmissible by milk, 118.
Carbolic acid used to prevent blood poisoning in surgical cases, 118.
On the importance to, of wearing flannel next to the skin, 119.
Alphabet. The, 124.
On the agency of minute germs in spreading disease, 137. 145.
Malarial districts believed to be rendered more healthy by the movement of locomotives, 159.
Hints for the sick room, 130.
A partial loss of memory resulting from exhaustion, 135.
A solution of baking soda a valuable application to burns, 135.
Precautions recommended against diphtheria, 167.
Notice of Samaritan societies for helping injured persons, 190.
Breathing cold air through the mouth injurious to, 198.
Remedy for chapped hands, 198.
On the danger to, by infection at funerals, 215.
The reserve force of the body destroyed by intoxicants and tobacco, 215.
Observations on the destructive effects of beer-drinking on the, 246.
The danger to, by infection probably affected by diet, 247.
On the probability of life of moderate drinkers and total abstinents, 278.
The poisonous effects of sumac, &c., attributed to bacteria, 279.
Grant of money by the French Government to promote a knowledge of contagious diseases, 279.
On the exercise conducive to health of young children, 309.
On the advantages of sun-light on all sides of dwelling houses, 318.
The foot disease of India believed to be due to a fungus, 335.
Black slates believed to be injurious to the eyes of children, 342.
On the malaria of Italy, 342.
Notice of hallucinations in women, 342.
On the defective vision of weavers, 390.
Notice of the fatal effect of imagination, 406.
- Healy Christopher and Ruth Ely. Account of the last interview between, 113.
Testimony of the father of, against war, 372.
Incidents connected with the ministry of, 386.
Heart. On a new, 382.
Heaven. Nothing unrighteous or impure can enter the kingdom of, 29.
On the way to the kingdom of, 396.
Helbrides. Notice of life in a lighthouse on the, 380.
Heine. Remarks of, on his death bed, 275.
Heretic. On the supposed derivation of the German name for, 326.
"High places" mentioned in the Bible. Observations on the, 331.
Hodson Robert W. Testimony of Plainfield Monthly Meeting of Friends, Ind., concerning, 64.
Holiness. Without, we shall not enter into the secrets of the Most High, 276.
Remarks on showing the beauty of, in our daily life, 278.
is calm, thoughtful, deliberate, immutable, 317.
Holy Scriptures. Advice of Isaac Penington upon reading the, 5.
Approval of the, by a Hindu writer, 37.
A caviller at the, answered, 46.
Notice of customs in oriental countries illustrating the truths of the, 61. 62. 101. 149. 277. 346. 390.
Remarkable incidents connected with a translation of the, in Burmah, 68.
Friends encouraged to the daily, reverent reading of the, 116. 134.
Notice of the Anglo-Saxon translators of the, 138.
A fragment of the, blessed to a countryman, 138.
The, distinguished from the Word of God, 140.
Confession of an Unitarian to the evangelical doctrine of the, 166.
A passage of the, helpful to a native of Syria, 182.
Notice of the translation of the, by Anthony Purver, 195.
On the translation of the, in Japan, 262.
Notice of the distribution of extracts from the, in Paris, 263.
The daily reading of the, recommended, 263.
The, without the Spirit, not truly profitable, 268.
The, profitable in proportion to our own religious experience, 372.
- Holy Spirit. On the indwelling of Christ by the, in the heart, 170.
The neglect of the teaching of the, a cause of great weakness in the church, 362.
Home culture. An Address by the Executive Committee of the Society for, 21.
training. Observations of Gertrude W. Cartland on, 82.
Home. On the blessing of a cheerful, 317.
Horse. Anecdotes of sagacity in a, 14. 30. 110. 159. 191.
Horse-racing often the main feature of agricultural fairs, 124.
Household employments. Notice of recent efforts to teach, to young women, 67.
Houses. Notice of a business in portable ready made, 255.
How deceit may get up. Extract from Stephen Crisp, entitled, 257.
Howard John. On the decision and energy of character of, 299.
Humility the only safe dwelling place, 107.
Humility and faith." Essay entitled "In, 269.
Humility ranks among the prominent graces of the Christian character, 283.
Hyacinthe. Observations on, in France, 29.
- "I restore him four-fold." Essay entitled, 107.
"I was going to." Remarks on the evils of procreation, entitled, 334.
Iceland. Notice of a remarkable sand storm in, 54.
Idol. Account of a stone found in New Jersey resembling an, 109.
Immediate Divine revelation. On the reality of, 170.
Immoral theologians. Remarks on, 230.
Incidents and reflections. Essays entitled, 333. 341. 348. 373. 380. 387. 394.
Indian. Definition of religion by an, 2.
Notice of Alexy, an Alaskan, 63.
Remarks on the treatment of the, by the United States, 356.
Reservation. Recent just action of the President of the U. S. respecting the Zuni, 373.
school at Tunesassa. Account of the, 174. policy. Resolutions of the Councils of Phila. on a humane, 270.
"Indian Rights Association." Notice of the formation of the, in Phila., 159.

- Indian Territory. On the persistent and threatening schemes of white men to occupy the, 405.
- India. Remarks on the periodical literature of, 43.
- Remark in reference to native converts in, 53.
- Notice of efforts of natives of, to propagate Paganism by printing, 101.
- On the degraded and disconsolate condition of women in, 123.
- On the loss of life caused by snakes in, 246. 374.
- Notice of a course of lectures lately delivered by a learned native woman in, 254. 292.
- On the number of professed Christians in, 286.
- On Chunder Sen and the theistic societies of, 290.
- Idel. A judicious remark to an, 85.
- Idel club in Paris. Notice of an interview of E. le Pressensé with, 263.
- Idelity rebuked, 237.
- An experimental perception of the truth, a proof against the sophistry of, 267.
- Insects. Ants used to destroy, in China, 5.
- Instinctive actions of a petrel, 246.
- Intemperance. Incident showing a mother's influence in preventing, 13.
- Comments on the appalling results of, in Philadelphia, 13.
- On the physiological effects of alcohol, 14.
- Declarations of Neal Dow that prohibition of, is not a failure, 28.
- Legal decision on the responsibility for, 29.
- Manufacture and sale of intoxicating liquors prohibited by a Conference of Methodists, 37.
- Notice of a proposed amendment to the Constitution of Penna. prohibiting the manufacture or sale of intoxicating liquors, 39.
- Statistics in reference to the use of intoxicants and tobacco in the United States, 47.
- Remarks on a recent convention of liquor dealers, 52.
- Incident showing the importance of parental example in reference to, 61.
- Testimony of a traveller against the use of alcoholic drinks, 75.
- The Church of England denounced as a great patron of, in England, 78.
- Notice of an appeal by Elizabeth Thompson to the American people against, 103.
- Notice of a late presentment of the Grand Jury in Philadelphia on intoxicating drinks, 110.
- Anecdote respecting a "Taylor" jug, 114.
- The Presbyterian synod at Harrisburg in sympathy with prohibitory legislation against, 118.
- Observations on the efforts of Wm. Penn and others to discourage the use of intoxicating drinks among the Indians of Penna., 125.
- Observations on the rise of gin-drinking in England and its momentous effects, 141.
- Notice of the efforts of the United Kingdom Alliance against, in England, 142.
- Statistics of alcoholism, 150.
- Exclusion of a member among Baptists on account of, 150.
- Conclusive argument of a father in favor of prohibition, 131.
- Statement of value of liquor drunk in Virginia and Louisiana, 132.
- On praiseworthy efforts to discourage social wine drinking, 173.
- Gratitude shown by a man reformed from, 174.
- Notice of efforts used for the help of victims of, 190.
- Where does the sin of, commence? 212.
- destroys the reserved forces of the body, 215.
- caused by drinking cider. Striking illustrations of, 238.
- Oatmeal water recommended as a drink to prevent, 255.
- Experience of life insurance companies in regard to, 278.
- Statistics of the relative number of drinking places in different States, 293.
- Notice of the progress of prohibition in the Southern States, 293.
- Remark on the temperance feeling in Germany and Britain, 309.
- Reasons for total abstinence from alcoholic drinks, 309.
- Notice of Pullman, a temperance suburb of Chicago, 334.
- Notice of a resolution of an African Methodist Conference against, 357.
- Remarkable instance of the recovery of a woman from, and happy effects of Divine grace, 374.
- Consistency of example in Bishop Janes, respecting, 379.
- Intemperance. On the destructive effects of beer drinking on the health, 246.
- Prohibition in Kansas, followed by a decrease of inmates of the penitentiary, 406.
- The sale or manufacture of spirits deleterious to the public health, prohibited in Siam, 406.
- Notice of a movement against, by Roman Catholics in Chicago, 414.
- Inundation of St. Petersburg in 1824. Account of, from Thos. Shilitoe's Journal, 250.
- Irish character. Notice of the evil effect of English penal laws of the 18th century, on the, 122.
- Iron. Notice of the annual production of, 382.
- The rusting of, at times proceeds from unlooked for causes, 390.
- Iron cement. Production of a dangerous gas from, 382.
- Japan. Observations on the frequency of earth-tremors in, 5.
- On a growing desire for the elevation of woman in, 116.
- Notice of the use of the electric light in Government establishments in, 206.
- Opposition of Buddhists in, to a French missionary, 230.
- Instruction given to students in a college in, on the physiological effects of alcohol, 286.
- Jeannette expedition. Account of Alexy, the hero of the, 63.
- Jeffers Edith. Brief notice of, 29.
- Martha. Christian humility illustrated by an incident in the life of, 338.
- Jews. Account of the observance of the day of atonement by, 100.
- Notice of the customs of modern, in regard to words of the law, 315.
- Jones George and Ann. Brief notice of, 353.
- Ann. Letter of, 361. 377.
- Jordan Richard. Anecdote of, 331.
- Incident of the ministry of, 387.
- Joy unspeakable. Extract entitled, 348.
- Judgment. Remarks on a qualification for sound, 357.
- Jury trials. An experience of, 169.
- Justification inseparable from sanctification, 366.
- Keith George. Historical notes relating to, 89.
- Kennard William. Religious counsel of, on his death-bed, 378.
- Kidnapping in Scotland in the 18th century. Notice of, 245.
- Kindness. Incident showing the power of, 251. 362.
- Kite Mary. Incident connected with the ministry of, 338.
- Thomas. Brief notice of some religious engagements of, 362.
- Lake-dwellers in Scotland. On the animals used as food by the, 286.
- Land-slides. Notice of recent destructive, in the White Mountains, 406.
- Language. Remarks of Thos. Ellwood on being required to use the plain, 180.
- Laver bread. Notice of, 271.
- Law. The practice of the, declined by Thomas Story, from religious convictions, 333.
- Left-handed? Were the ancient Hebrews, 389.
- Let brotherly love continue. Remarks on the former unity existing between Friends, entitled, 378.
- Let your light shine, 84.
- Let your light shine. Essay entitled, 364.
- Letter of religious counsel. A, 182.
- Letter of John Fothergill, 60.
- James B. Cotton, 90. 97.
- John Barelay, 146.
- Oliver Sanson from Reading gaol to Friends, 149.
- Jacob Grave. (Extract from), 205.
- Rebecca Dewees, 219.
- Joseph Morris and comments, 220. 255.
- Asenath Clark and comments, 242.
- Robert Jordan and comments, 247.
- Sarah Grubb, 254.
- Maria Fox to a young convinced person, 306.
- Thomas Evans, 315.
- Ann Jones, 361. 377.
- Sarah Hillman, 369. 385. 402.
- E. Allinson, 369.
- Eli K. Price, and comments, 267.
- Lucy Caroline Cavendish, and comments, 267.
- Letter from Florence, Italy, 185.
- Letter imputed to Cotton Mather, 193.
- Observations on the above fabrication, 215.
- Letters and memoranda of Wm. Scattergood, and comments, 274. 281. 289. 297. 305. 316. 321. 329. 337. 345. 353. 361. 369. 377. 385. 393. 409.
- Lewis Enoch. Notice of a memoir of, 110.
- Liberty. Trust essential to the enjoyment of, 238.
- Licentious literature. Remarks on, 342.
- Lie. A child's remark upon a, 170.
- Life's difficulties. Observations on overcoming, 244.
- Light of Christ. Declarations of Geo. Fox respecting the, 186. 237.
- On the blessedness of walking in the, 310.
- Light. Children of the, know each other though widely separated, 269.
- Lightning. Observations on sheet, 414.
- Lime Caustic, successfully used in blasting coal, 6.
- "Look to your influence." Remarks on the injury done to cause of religion by its professed advocates, entitled, 389.
- Lord will have a people." Extract entitled "The, 35.
- Lovett Mahlon L. Incident in the life of, 106.
- Maine. Observations on the prosperity of, under prohibitory liquor laws, 28.
- Making a show falsely. On, 211.
- Malaria believed to be dissipated by the movements of locomotives, 159.
- Malay. Notice of the jungles of, 286.
- Marriage. Ancient testimonies and advices of Friends respecting, 68.
- Incident showing the importance of observing Divine intimations in reference to, 386.
- Veto message of Governor Pattison in relation to a divorce bill, and comments, 343.
- certificate of a colored couple in 1765, 371.
- of Roger Haydock and Eleanor Lowe, and the belief of Friends in regard to the Divine appointment in, 402.
- Marriage in Stamboul. Remarks on Turkish character entitled, 46.
- Marriages.—Elisha Llewelyn to Abigail Stratton, 8; Joseph J. Walton to Mary Sheppard, 72; William Penn Evans to Mary Tatum, 72; John W. Mott to Sina A. Hall, 96; John N. Haines to Rebecca T. DeCou, 104; Henry Hall to Ann Eliza Branson, 112; J. Murray Bacon to Anna C. Bailey, 112; John Bell to Hannah B. Cooper, 376.
- Mastodon. Notice of the discovery of the remains of a, in New Jersey, 150.
- Massacres. Account of the escape of a Syrian Christian from two, 194.
- Materialism. Remarks on the folly of, 148.
- Matilda, countess von der Recke Volmerstein. Account of the life and labors of, and her husband, 249.
- Meals. On the advantage of observing a short pause before, 53.
- Meats. Successful transportation of fresh, from Australia to London, when frozen, 94.
- Mennonites. Difficulties experienced by Russian, in finding a home, 109.
- Notice of the, in Pennsylvania, 142.
- Notice of an emigration of, from Russia to Khiva, 254.
- Notice of the, in Manitoba, and their village life, 314.
- Methodists. Notice of the progress of, in Rome, 37.
- Prohibition of the manufacture and sale of intoxicating liquors by a Conference of, 37.
- Notice of annual appropriations by, for 1883, 150.
- Women not recognized as preachers by a General Conference of, 134.
- Observations on the consequences following an increase of trained ministers among, 271.
- The question of itinerancy discussed by, 414.
- Memory. A partial loss of, due to physical exhaustion, 135.
- Mechanical inventions. On the political influence of, 163.
- Mexico. Observations on the present condition of, 33.
- Millin Lloyd. Precious Divine visitation extended to, 379.
- Mice. On the method of destroying field, 183.
- Milk. Ropiness in, believed to be due to microscopic organisms, 366.
- Microphone used for the detecting of subterranean springs. The, 175.
- Mineral veins. Notice of the rapid formation of, 326.
- Ministers. Advice to, not to judge too highly of their services, 250.
- Extracts from early minutes of meetings of, in Penna., 284.
- Ministry. Observations of George Fox on the qualifications for the, 21.
- Remarks on the distinction between a man-made and gospel, 74.
- True gospel, can not be exercised at the will of man, 85.

Ministry. Observations on a temptation of those engaged in the, 93.
 Making a trade of preaching to get money by, to disappear, 119.
 On the doctrines of Friends in regard to, 151. 207. 335. 371.
 Hint in regard to undue length of public testimonies in the, 180.
 Thoughts on a hireling, 188. 201.
 On the nature of true gospel, 189. 201.
 Incident illustrating true, 205.
 On a false, among Friends, 212.
 On the desolating effects of a false, 247.
 On a true, and a counterfeit, 269.
 On avoiding unnecessary repetitions in the, 269.
 Observations on the rise and effects of a spurious, 276.
 Testimony of an Episcopal bishop on the true power of the, 293.
 William Caton furnished with mouth and wisdom in the, 300.
 Observations on the true business of the, 315.
 On the qualification for, 337.
 Experience of Job Scott on the necessity of waiting for the qualification for the, 341.
 Caution upon criticizing the, 349.
 Misers. Observations on, 247.
 Misunderstanding. Description of, 222.
 Miracles. On the apostolical, 273.
 Mohammedan publications in Constantinople. Notice of proposed, 309.
 Moon John. Observations of, 180.
 Money. On the love of, in connection with preaching, 188.
 Mother. The religious concern of a, for her son, 219.
 Mothers. On the blessing which may attend the daily performance of humble duties by faithful, 47.
 Remarks on the above, 83.
 Moxie Hester. A dream or vision of, 235.
 Mosquito. Observations on the poison of the, 358.
 Mud springs in Celebes. Account of, 231.
 Music. An indulgence in, by members among Friends, a fruit of the adulterated Quakerism of the present day, 2.
 John Thorp instructed in reference to, 4.
 The cultivation of, prejudicial to a growth in grace, 10.
 Notice of a petition and action of Presbyterians in Scotland against, 77. 406.
 in schools. Remarks on the waste of time devoted to, 82.
 The example of the Society of Friends in reference to, approved by a minister of another denomination, 83.
 in places of worship stirs up the religious passions and draws off from the true Life, 275.
 "My Father is the husbandman." Essay entitled, 234.
 Natural History.—Ants used to destroy insects in China, 5; Sagacity of dogs, 6. 14. 38. 54. 69. 78. 102. 166. 351. 398; Sagacity of a horse, 14. 30. 110. 159. 191; The Tussock moth, 22; Sagacity of a crow, 23; Insects on the surface of oranges, 30; Sagacity of the elephant, 62. 94. 102; Cheating in Animals, 78. 94; Teasing propensity of birds, 86; On the food of shad, 102; Parasites of the chinch-bug, 102; Phosphorescent centipede, 102; Minute crustacea, 110; Curious parasites upon puffins, 110; How the lion kills his prey, 119; The crocodile in Florida, 142; Consciousness of wrong doing in animals, 143; Jealousy in animals, 151; Sense of responsibility in animals, 159. 167; Playfulness in animals, 155; Large rats' nests in trees, 167; Spider showers, 172; The nesting of the Mole, 175; Conjugal affection in a teal, 175; The water-spider, 182; A tame wasp, 182; Gigantic cuttle fish, 191; On the usefulness of birds to mariners, 191; White-water of the Arabian Sea, 198; Monkeys, 198; Spider-webs, 206; A kind robin, 206; Language in wasps, 215; Submarine life in Amboyna, 215; The ocelot, 223; An owl cave, 223; Fleas, 230; On the sense by which the vulture discerns its prey, 234; A Lignified "snake," 239; A tame hawk, 239; Dancing of gnats, 239; Instinct as manifested in a Petrel, 246; The flying lemur, 255; Swallows, 255; The polar bear, 261; The beaver, 262; The mongoose as a rat catcher, 271; Leaf-like butterfly, 271; Pride in animals, 271; Tame robin, 279; The raven, 287; On capturing birds of paradise, 294; Curious habit of the hornbill, 310; The archer fish, 318; The fondness of cats for valerian put to practical account, 319; Insects as food, 319; Tame mole, 319; Friendship between animals, 319; The Fly's foot, 325; The Paradise fish, 326; Communication of ideas between animals, 326; The Loon, 335; Swallows, 335; A tame rat, 343; Holothurians, 351; Charity in a dog, 358; Intelligence of crows, 365; Masking of crabs, 374; Minute organisms as destroyers of buildings, 382; Coal Fossils, 390; Intelligence in fishes, 406; Fresh water sponges, 407; Bees at the Cape of Good Hope, 415.

 Naturalist. Enthusiasm of a, 206.
 Nea e Samuel. An account of some of the early religious experiences of, 226. 233.
 Nebula in Orion as seen by the new Russian telescope, 326.
 Neglect of proper care. On the effects of, physically and spiritually, 390.
 New Hebrides Islands. Notice of a recent visit to, 17.
 Notice of great wrongs done to the natives of, by Europeans, 293.
 Newton John. Remarkable Divine visitation to, through a dream, 50.
 New Jersey. On the influence of William Penn in the early history of West, 201.
 New Year's day. On the improper observance of, 190.
 New York City. Denominational statistics of, 134.
 On the benevolent efforts of the Children's Aid Society in, 263.
 New Zealand. A tree used as a burial place in, 150.
 Notice of the injury done by rabbits in, 202.
 Nightingale Florence. A true story of, 387.
 Newspapers in Chicago requested to exclude all advertisements or news of an immoral tendency, 351.
 Nobleman's offer: or the door was shut." Extract entitled, "The, 27.
 Oaths. Notice of a recent modification of judicial, in France, 37.
 Remarks on the injurious nature of judicial, 54. 169.
 Account of a refusal of Geo. Fox to take, 194.
 The abolition of official, considered in different European countries, 263. 393.
 The law in reference to, in England proposed to be modified to extend the liberty of affirming, 270.
 Remarks on the uselessness of, 308. 357.
 Ocean. On the surf of the, on the Gold coast in Africa, 206.
 Operas. On the unchaste character of the, in Cincinnati, 309.
 Opium trade. Notice of the movement in England against the, 43.
 Proposed communication from the Emperor of China to the Queen of England in reference to the, 102.
 Statements made before an annual meeting of the Society for the suppression of the, 414.
 Orientals. On the habits of, in reading or speaking, 346.
 Orion. Observations on the nebula of, 30.
 Orphan's protection. Extract entitled, The, 123.
 Pacific Grove retreat, Cal. Notice of, 41.
 Palestine. Notice of a colony of the Temple Society in, 318.
 Panics. Remarks on, 271.
 Paper. Ancient moss a material for, in Sweden, 198.
 Notice of doors made of, 310.
 Notice of incombustible, 415.
 Parable on the root of evil. A, 109.
 Parents. On the responsibility of, in training children for eternity, 27.
 On the sad consequences of deficiency in the performance of duty by, 42.
 On the powerful incentives to, properly to example their children, 317.
 Paris. A father's death revenged by the patient instruction of the ignorant classes in, 404.
 Pastor and pastoral committees among "Friends." Remarks on, 115.
 Patent Office. Reflections on a sale of condemned models from the, 405.
 Pathway in the sky." Extract entitled, "The, 182.
 Pearls. On the origin of, &c., 358.
 Notice of large, found in the Gulf of California, 366.
 Penn William. Extracts from, on will-worship, 199.
 The religion of, the basis of Pennsylvania's early prosperity, 201.
 Advice of, to the young convinced, 239.
 Comments of in reference to hat-honor, 302.
 Observations of, on true religion, 334.
 On being saved from sin, and thus from the wages of it, 350.
 Remarks on the proposed celebration of the landing of, in America, 79. 103.
 Remarks on a request made to certain persons to preach on the character of, and the belief of, in regard to true gospel ministry, 85.
 Vindication of the character of, from the charge of encouraging the use of intoxicating drinks among the Indians, 125.
 Remarks of Judge Black on the charges of Macaulay against, 156.
 Extract from, on the great business of man's life, 187.
 Penington Isaac. Advice of, to Friends to be faithful to the gift of G. d. in the heart, 31.
 On judging harshly of each other, 53.
 On resisting temptation, 59.
 On walking in the Light of Christ, 103.

Penington Isaac. On the ministry of early Friends, 20.
 Pennsylvania. On the meaning of certain geographic names in, 46.
 Pennsylvania History and the projected palatinate Sir E. Plowden, 193. 201. 209. 217. 225.
 Notice of valuable manuscript records relating the early history of, 194.
 Peru. Observations on the present condition of, compared with its state under the Incas, 33.
 Philadelphia. Observations on the religious and moral condition of, 323.
 Comments on the above, 342.
 Photography. On the advances of celestial, 410.
 Physician. On the power of influence for good of the, 244.
 Pitt George. Observations on America, during a recent visit to, by, 66. 73.
 Plainness of speech, behavior, and apparel. None ever attained to eminent usefulness among Friends who were unfaithful in supporting their testimony to, 2.
 Comments on the testimonies of Friends to, 83.
 Ancient testimonies and advices of Friends concerning, 105.
 Plants of North America. Notice of works upon the, 16.
 Plants used as food. On, 119.
 On the origin of cultivated, 293.
 Plants.—An excursion for, in the Jersey sand barren 19; The cranberry, 19; The white cedar, 20; Pe moss, 20; The sundew, 20; The arrow head, 20; Colossal fern, 38; Mischievous plants in Australia, &c., 38; A Ceylon jungle, 54; On certain poisonous leaves, 62; Observations on the genera Aster and Solidago, 110; The Indian reed, 110; The banan, 119; The "Spanish" chestnut, 119; The Mexican chia, 119; On the creeping willow of the Alas Islands, 142; Experiments on the vitality of seed 158; The Russian mulberry, 175; Indigenous potatoes in Arizona, 206; Sunflowers changing position with the sun, 214; Fig trees with aerial roots, 215; The sago palm, 222; The "stinging tree" of Queensland, 223; The pear tree, 230; A vegetable rennet, 247; Blight on wheat caused by a blight on the barberry, 293; Native potatoes found in Arizona, 310; The bread fruit, 310; The ice plant, 318; Mexican "jumping" seed, 326; Remarkable fall of pine pollen, 358; The fertilization of red clover largely due to bees, 360; Tuckahoe, 398.
 Pleasants Robert, of Virginia. Notice of the character of, and memorial of, 154.
 Testimony of Friends concerning, 220.
 Plowden Edmund. Notice of a projected palatinate in America under, 193. 201. 209. 217. 225.
 Poetry.—Original.—Go forth and sow, 13; Morning worship in the Rocky Mountains 28; Be Still, 116; Saver, 132; Retrospect, 164; "Be still, and know that I am God," 172; Our meeting, 188; Lines to a Friend under affliction, 197; In memoriam, 236; E. B. L., 236; Thoughts suggested on the death of a sister's child, 244; The Inner Light, 284; A memory, 308; Pansie, 321.
 Poetry.—Selected.—Anise and cummin, 156; "As thou day, so shall thy strength be," 181; At the beautiful gate, 204; Always a river to cross, 220; The age of innocence, 229; Answered, 364; Angels' wings, 406; Behold your King, 84; Bryant after the death of his wife, 253; The Border Land, 404; Blue Flowers, 358; Can't thou by searching find out God? 52; The corn stalk's lesson, 93; The clear vision, 260; The cure of Sorrow, 276; Calling the Spring flowers, 356; Christway of blessing, 358; Day by day, 69; Daily strength, 220; The Dreamer, 229; Dear hands, 253; The Dandelion, 276; Drawing nearer, 332; Discipline, 332; "Doubt not," 348; Endurance, 93; Evening Hymn, 124; To an Early Primrose, 324; Every cloud has of silver a lining, 380; Farewell to Music, 52; Fallo, 101; Fringed Gentians, 108; A Foggy morning, 215; Flowers, 300; The First Flower, 308; The Farm, 317; Forgiving Jenny, 380; The Gathering of the church, 101; Good-By, 116; God omnipresent, 108; Girdle elms, 292; Health alphabet, 124; He leadeth us, 204; Hitherto and henceforth, 260; The Hills, 276; Home, 317; How the women went from Dover, 340; He leadeth me, 396; Indian Summer, 140; Jesus on the sea, 28; The Loom of Life, 28; The Little Comforter, 44; Lines, 44. 317. 324. 356. 380; Lines on a skeleton, 60; Lead them home, 69; Life's heaviest loss, 93; The Lighthouse, 124; For Love's sake, 132; A Little boat, 140; The Lighthouse, 364; Little pattering feet, 388; Mirage, 156; My little laborer, 156; Mad River, 213; My Home, 253. 279; The Mother heart, 300; "No I lay me down to sleep," and comments, 21; The Night-blooming Cereus, 60; Never mind what "they say, 131; Our Birthright, 76; Opportunity, 260; On wait, 396; The Pilgrim's wants, 69; Paul Denton reply, 76; Pilgrim of earth, &c., 101; Resolution, 28; Released, 308; Sins cast into the depths of the sea, 36; Spiritual worship, 148; On Silent worship, 17; The Safe refuge, 229; Sleep, 236; Song, 268; Shadow, 268; The Sugar maples, 348; To a Swallow building under our eaves, 356; The Streamlet, 364; The Sea, 41; Take my hand, 4; The Two gates, 21; Time's taking and leavings, 84; Take care, 148; Trip lightly, 22.

- This is life," 284; The Two Glasses, 284; Trust in providence, 300; Three pairs and one, 332; The Unnoticed bound, 181; Under the leaves, 268; Vanished trees, 52; What is best? 4; To Which Kingdom, 36; The Way side well, 116; Weaving the web, 140; Where there's a will, there's a way, 276; A Wish, 292; Washed ashore, 343; Where we were born, 396; What the traveller said at sunset, 412; The Year of release, 397.
- Ampeii. Notice of a representation of the judgment of Solomon found in, 188.
- Amplifier life savers. Description of, 366.
- Ames. Notice of a recent legal process against the, 158.atoes found wild in Arizona, 310.
- Ameyer. Remarkable incident connected with, 124. 134. Remarks on, 140.
- Answers to, 333.
- On the efficacy of silent, earnest, 250.
- Observations of George Fox on, 317.
- aying always. On, 53.
- aching. A definition of, by Horace Bushnell, 74.
- aching what and when we list. Essay entitled, 85.
- Absterians. Notice of the action of certain, in Scotland against music in times of worship, 77. 406.
- Secret societies disapproved of by, 142.
- Deaconesses appointed by, 158.
- A place of worship built by, in Salonica, Greece, 206.
- Notice of proposed modification of the Confession of faith of, 334.
- Notice of a "threatened famine in the ministry" among, 300.
- Notice of friendly relations between Northern and Southern, of the United States, 365.
- ane swearing improved. Comments on, 36.
- and Robert. Biographical account of, 49. 58. 65.
- vidential deliverances, 50. 117. 124.
- historic remains in N. Carolina. Notice of, 366.
- uman, a temperance town. Notice of, 334.
- ctuality. Incident illustrating the value of, 362.
- ver Anthony. Biographical account of, and notice of his translation of the Bible, 195.
- eyism. Observations on, 101.
- st for entertainment and sports. On the, 370.
- inc. Notice of the consumption and manufacture of, 271.
- bits in New Zealand. Account of, 202.
- e course. The proceeds of a, refused by a Roman Catholic bishop, 78.
- roal. Account of the St. Gotthard, 171. 177.
- Hours of the day numbered from 1 to 24, on an Ohio, 398.
- On the annual fall of, in various places, 239.
- Salt observed to be contained in, near the sea, 286.
- s. The presence of, in a well built city house a probable danger, 310.
- ding. On the abuse of, by reading too much, 86.
- Notice of a presentment of the Grand Jury of Phila. on perjurious, 110.
- On the prevalence and demand for fictitious, 206.
- uke. Anecdotes of, administered under religious belief, 394.
- Cloud. Remarks on the announcement by, of the discovery of a gold mine, 356.
- Sea. On the excessive heat on the, 265.
- emption. On the necessity of, 181.
- lt Ferdinand. of Vienna. Account of the benevolence towards orphans, 59.
- gion. Definition of, by an Indian, 2.
- Reasons assigned why so few become thoroughly dedicated to the cause of, 26.
- A safe dwelling place for the professor of, 28.
- On the practical experience of, 30. 63.
- On the spiritual nature of true, 74.
- must stand firmly against the fashions of the world, 103.
- Comparison between the outward, of the present day, and that of the Jews at the coming of our Saviour, 130.
- On the constant need of watchfulness to retain the life of, 190.
- On the necessity of stillness in, 269.
- A self active spirit to be guarded against in, 270. 342.
- Injury often done in conversing upon, 275.
- Reports of an increased interest in, in parts of the old world, 309.
- On the true attitude of a sincere inquirer in, 315.
- Observations of William Penn on dangerous apprehensions in, 334.
- Extract on the jocund, of the present day, 398.
- gious views and tenets. Essays entitled, 4. 74. 131. 5. 155. 181. 189. 212. 229. 253. 268. 270. 291. 350. 371. 7.
- gious persecution. On the disastrous political effects of, 174.
- gious prudence. Remarks on, 260.
- gious items, &c., 5. 29. 37. 46. 53. 77. 101. 109. 118. 134. 2. 150. 158. 168. 175. 190. 198. 206. 214. 230. 239. 246. 4. 262. 278. 285. 293. 302. 309. 317. 326. 334. 350. 357. 5. 406. 414.
- Repentance. On the necessity of experiencing, 135.
- "Rest and be thankful." Extract entitled, 109.
- Regeneration necessary for an entrance to the kingdom of heaven, 253.
- Restitution to those we have wronged. Remarks on the necessity of, 107.
- Resurrection. On the doctrine of the, 175.
- Resignation to the Divine will. Remarks on the difficult lesson of, 259.
- Returning good for evil. Instances of, 168.
- Rice. Notice of the damage resulting from the expansion of, when wet, 79.
- Riches. Counsel in reference to the dangers of, to religious growth, 196. 266.
- Remarks on the evils of the pursuit of, for their own sake, 277.
- Richmond Leigh. Advice of, to his children against yielding to the influence of the "half-religious," and comments, 370.
- Ritualism. Notice of the release from imprisonment in England of S. F. Green, 158.
- The restoration of the mass the object of, 286.
- condemned publicly by a bishop, 326.
- Roads. On the amount of power required to draw carriages over different kinds of, 142.
- Roberts Samuel. Brief account of the life and happy death of, in his 16th year, 12.
- Roman Catholics. The proceeds of a race-course refused by a Bishop of, 78.
- On the source of influence of the priest among, 149.
- Action of, in reference to relics, 355.
- Legal dispute over masses said by, 350.
- Independent. Notice of, 350.
- Notice of a temperance movement by, in Chicago, 414.
- Rum. Notice of a remarkable death following the use of, 262.
- Running a muck, 221.
- Russia. Notice of intolerance in relation to religious belief in, 166.
- Sago. On the production of, 222.
- Sahara. Project of turning the, into a sea, 415.
- Saliva. Inoculation with human, poisonous, 69.
- Salvation. On our dependence for, 43.
- On the true method of experiencing, 75. 85.
- must be experienced from our sins in this life, 171.
- is not to be attained but by forsaking our sins, 250.
- The Holy Spirit the great agent in the work of, 302.
- "Salvation Army." On certain of the distinguishing principles of, repugnant to those of Friends, 14.
- The proceedings of, restricted in India, 142.
- Salt mine two thousand years old. A. 22.
- Samaritan societies. Notice of the objects and organization of, in Germany, 190.
- Sandwich Islands. Account of a recent visit to the, 9.
- Sanitary science. Notice of a movement to promote researches in, 358.
- Sansom Oliver. Letter of, from Reading gaol to Friends, 149.
- Santa Cruz Islands. Notice of a recent visit to, 17.
- Scott Job. Remarks of, on waiting for the renewed qualification to preach the gospel, 341.
- Savonarola. Observations on the character and labors of, 185.
- Scattergood Thomas. Remarks of, on the bed of death, on "trampling under foot the testimonies and judgment of our worthy predecessors," and comments, 2.
- Observation of an aged man, upon the impressions produced by the ministry of, 123.
- William. Letters and memoranda of and comments, 274. 281. 289. 297. 305. 316. 321. 329. 337. 345. 353. 361. 369. 377. 385. 393. 409.
- Notice of an incident connected with the last hours of, 379.
- Science. A knowledge of, not necessary to religion, 219.
- Scientific notes, &c., 5. 14. 22. 30. 37. 54. 62. 69. 78. 86. 94. 102. 109. 118. 134. 142. 150. 158. 167. 175. 182. 191. 198. 206. 214. 222. 230. 239. 246. 255. 261. 271. 278. 286. 293. 309. 318. 326. 335. 342. 351. 358. 365. 374. 382. 390. 398. 406. 414.
- Scrofula. On curing, by the royal touch, 98.
- School of the Saviour. The, 27. 42.
- School for happiness. Remarks on a, 42.
- Schools First-day. Remarks on the wrong of delegating to teachers of, the work of parents, 42. 82.
- Schools. Remarks on the injurious character of competitive athletic sports among students of many, 370.
- Scott Job. Remarks of, on the blessed visitations of Divine grace to children, 387.
- Sea-side. Essay entitled, 412.
- Secret societies disapproved of by Presbyterians, 142.
- Selections. Essays entitled, 42.
- Selections and reflections. Essays entitled, 113. 161. 266.
- Selling by the candle, 221.
- Self. Remarks on the reduction of, 234.
- Self denial. The practice of, a healthy and necessary discipline, 77.
- The necessity of, to obtain the crown of life, 242.
- Self-examination. Remarks on honest, 212.
- Seaton Alexander. Account of the life and religious character of, 210.
- Seeds. Experiments on the vitality of, 158.
- Seeking out inventions. Essay entitled, 211.
- Sen Chunder. Account of, and his religious teachings in India, 290.
- Sensational literature excluded from a public library, 365.
- "Separation." Essay entitled, 313.
- Serving God in our daily duties. On, 302.
- Settlers. Remarks on the more ready reception of the gospel among the early, in a new country, 274.
- Shellac. On the animal origin of, 134.
- Shipton Anna. Anecdote related by, of the powerful effects of Divine grace in a child, 388.
- Rebuke administered by, and comments, 394.
- Simplicity. On, 275.
- Simpson James. Anecdote of, 331.
- Sin. The deliverance from, in this life possible and commanded, 75. 85.
- Sins. On the danger of committing so called little, 270.
- Sinners are saved by the grace of God, 229.
- Sinai. Account of a recent visit to the peninsula of 330. 339. 346. 356. 364.
- Singing. Remarks on, as connected with Divine worship, 155. 245.
- Skene Alexander. Notice of the conviction and religious character of, 218.
- Slaves. Provisions made by George Washington for the manumission of his, 60.
- Memorial of Robert Pleasants to the Governor and Council of Virginia respecting liberality to his, 154.
- Manumission of, by George Bell, of Virginia, 155.
- Testimony of Friends in reference to the labors of Robert Pleasants in Virginia on behalf of, 220.
- Slave trade. Account of the continuance of the, in Soudan, 257.
- Notice of a, in the New Hebrides and other South Sea islands, 293.
- Smith Daniel B. On the death of, 287.
- Snow. Sand found in, 286.
- Solomon Islands. Notice of a recent visit to the, 25.
- South Sea Islands. Notice of a system of slavery in the, 26.
- Spices, and the adulteration of them, 391.
- Spider showers. Account of, 172.
- On the webs of, 206.
- Spiritual gifts. On the right occupation of, 37.
- Spontaneous combustion often due to oily waste, 332.
- Sports. Remarks on the quest for entertainment and, 370.
- Sportsmen. Remarks on the character of the pleasures sought by, 278.
- Statistics of British benevolent societies. 5.
- Steamship Oregon. Account of the, 398.
- Steel. Theory of R. S. Marsden to account for the hardness of, 150.
- Stillness. On, as a preparation for religious service, 269.
- Stiles George. Brief notice of, 339.
- Stick to one thing. Extract entitled, 84.
- Stokes N. N. Anecdotes related by the late, 387.
- Stone. Observations on the greater strength of sawed, as compared with hammered building, 150.
- On the effects of the weather on building, 247.
- Storms. On dry thunder, in S. Africa, 134.
- Stories. The reading of moral, injurious, 86.
- Story Thomas. declines the practice of the law from religious convictions, 333.
- "Such a man has no judgments against him." Remarks on the pursuit of wealth, entitled, 277.
- Sufferers. Appeal for liberality on behalf of, 230.
- Sulphur deposits in Utah. Notice of, 239.
- Summary of Events.—7. 15. 23. 31. 39. 47. 55. 63. 71. 79. 87. 95. 104. 112. 120. 128. 135. 144. 152. 160. 168. 176. 184. 191. 199. 207. 216. 223. 232. 240. 247. 256. 264. 272. 279. 287. 296. 304. 312. 320. 327. 336. 344. 351. 359. 367. 376. 384. 392. 400. 407. 416.
- Sun. Notice of preparations for observing the eclipse of, in 1883, 262.
- Tale-bearing and detraction. Ancient advices of Friends to avoid, 77.
- Talent of property. Remarks on accountability for the, 46.
- Talk over what you read. Extract entitled, 3.
- Tally-sticks. Notice of the use of, by the English Government as lately as 1824, 354.
- Tatum John. Anecdote of, 386.
- Taylor Jeremy. Extract from, 140.
- Teacher. The discerning, 315.
- Telescopes. Notice of the five largest, in the world, 326.
- Telephone renders sounds 1000 miles away audible. A. 6.
- On improvements in the, 309.
- Telegraph poles. On the average duration of, 142.
- Tellurium in copper. Observations on the effect of, 278.
- "Temple Society." Notice of the, in Palestine, 318.
- Temperature. Remarks on changes in the dimensions of standards for measuring, 398.
- Temptation. Remarks on resisting, 59.
- Ten Tribes of Israel. Theories respecting the, 338.
- Tetanus. Notice of the frequency of, in Bengal, 118.

- Theatre-going Christian an absurdity. A, 206.
Theatres closed by authority in Cambridge, Eng., during term-time, 286.
Observations on the corrupting character of operas in Cincinnati, 309.
Thoughts about the eternal gospel and the falling Babylon, 92 99. 130. 171. 188. 202. 228. 237, 243.
Comments on the above, 103. 199.
"Thy will be done." Remarks on resignation to the Divine will, entitled, 259.
Tithes of fish still claimed in Cornwall, 270.
Timber. Large tracts of sunken, found in Ireland, 406.
Tin. Notice of the occurrence of, in Alabama, 278.
Tobacco. Statistics in reference to the use of, in the U. States, 47.
The raising of, an occupation inconsistent with high Christian profession, 47.
Observations of the effect of, upon the blood, 87.
Observations on the injury done by, to the heart, 94.
Remarks on economy in abstaining from, 149.
The raising of, eventually unprofitable, 175.
Earnest remonstrance to the young against smoking, 252.
Statement in reference to the use of, by different nations, 293.
Provisions against the use of, in a public bequest, 406.
The vapor of the juice of, used as an insecticide, 406.
Torres Islands. Notice of a recent visit to, 17.
Trade. Ancient advices to Friends respecting, 98.
Travel. Remarks on the insidious dangers of foreign, 122.
Trembath Margaret. Account of the life and conviction of, 396. 403. 411.
Trepanning in prehistoric times. Notice of, 255.
Trees. The rings of, not a correct criterion of their age, 94.
On fossil, found in Arizona, 142.
Tunnel. A trip through St Gotthard, 171. 177.
Notice of the Mont Cenis, 171.
Turks. Remarks on the present character of the, 46.

Undisciplined tempers. Remarks on the injury done by, 141.
United Christian Army." Brief notice of "The, 29.

Vaccination. On the value of, as a protection against small pox, 135.
Victoria. Anecdote of Queen, 210.
Vine and the branches." Essay on the necessity of an union with Christ entitled "The, 100.
Volcano of Kilauea. Description of a recent visit to the, 9.
Mt. Etna. Notice of the observatory on, 174.
Voting. On the duty of Christians in reference to, 109.

Waiting on the Lord in silence. Observations on the blessed effects of, 235.
Waldenses. Notice of the increased influence of, in Rome, 177.
Waldensian missionary. A trial of faithfulness of a, 334.
Walm Nicholas. Anecdote of, 331.
Walter William. Incident related by, and comments, 338.
Wanderings South and East, (continued from vol. LV., p. 412). Extracts entitled, 1. 9. 17. 25. 33.
War. Decision of a Court in Germany in reference to military pomp and show, 5.
Notice of effects of military discipline upon character, 6.
War. Notice of English publications on the anti-Christian nature and impolicy of, 23.
Statement of the cause of the Crimean, 37.
Noble sentiments of Garibaldi in reference to, and upon a general disarmament, 41.
Notice of the effects of the, in Egypt upon missionaries, 47.
The after-thought of a soldier upon, 77.
Remarks on the late Egyptian, 102.
Testimony of General Warren against, 107.
Observations on the commendation given by English bishops, &c., to, 109.
Preaching up, to disappear, 119.
Christian conduct of a Chinese, under provocation, 142.
Declaration of the President of the United States favoring arbitration instead of, 143.
The inconsistency of, with the Christian dispensation, 178.
Remark of a former soldier on, 245.
Observations of Bismarck and Wellington on, and comments, 251.
Notice of the establishment of a journal in Denmark to advocate peace, 255.
Observations of T. L. Cuyler on the condition of Europe in regard to preparations for, 259.
Extracts from an Address of Henry Richard, M. P., on the cost and folly of modern, 255.
Comments on a remark of Napoleon, 298.
Jacob Ritter convicted of the unlawfulness of, 325.
Statutes of the comparative expenditure by different Governments for, and for education, 357.
Incidents connected with testimony against, of Christopher Henly's father, 372.
On the scourge of, 382.
Remarks on, entitled "The Dress Parade at West Point," 389.
Notice of an effort of Mohammedans to avoid conscription for, 406.
More than half of British taxes paid for, 414.
Nihilism, &c., a reaction of the people against, 414.
Washington George. Directions of, by will, for the manumission of his slaves, 60.
Watchfulness. On the constant need of, to retain the life of religion, 180. 351.
Water. Experience of the value of, to the traveller on a desert, 183.
is life in the desert. Extract entitled, 75.
obtained from green wood in Australia, 142.
On the oriental custom of buying, in the desert, 149.
mills on the Danube. Account of, 230. of streams. Legal decision against contaminating the, 271.
of wells often unfit for drinking purposes, 102 110. 150. 159.
Wealth. On the dangers of the accumulation of, to the spiritual life, 268.
Weavers. On the injurious effect of the business of, upon vision, 390.
Westtown Boarding School. On the early establishment and subsequent history of, (continued from vol. LV.) 3. 11. 23. 29. 45. 59. 83. 107. 122. 129. 145. 153. 186. 197. 227. 255.
Observations on the beneficial effect of impressions received at, 122.
Account of remarkable religious exercises of Sarah Emelen, in 1844, 307.
Wesley Susanna. Account of the life and character of, 241.
Wet season. Curious result of the, in England, 309.
"When art thou quiet?" Incident and observations entitled, 274.
Wheat. On the blight of, as connected with the barberry, 233.
Wheeler Daniel. Comments on the example of self-denial set by, 24.
The conviction and early religious experience of, 203.
Wife. A heroic sailor's, 45.
Will. A strange history of a, 197.
Wills. On the necessity of surrendering our own, to the Divine, 153.
"Without me ye can do nothing." Essay entitled, 12.
White man. Terror caused by the appearance of a, in Celebes, 262.
White stone. On the use and significance of the, in ancient times, 277.
Whittier John G. Sentiments of, respecting certain points of doctrine, 93.
Wine drinking. On efforts to discourage, 173.
vaults of London. On the, 415.
Winter. On nature's preparation for, 147.
Wilson Rachel. Anecdote narrated of, 324.
Comments on the above, 349.
Wire cables. On the duration of, 142.
Wind. Observations on the force of the, 366.
Wishing and willing. On the difference between, 114.
Wood. Observations on the strength of spruce, 154.
Notice of a forest of petrified, in Arizona, 374.
Woolman John. Remarks of, on luxury among Friends, 34. 113.
Woman. On the growing disposition in Japan for the elevation of, 116.
On the degraded and disconsolate condition of, in India, 122.
Women allowed to preach among the Free Methodists, 118.
Notice of successful efforts to instruct working, in evening, classes in Philadelphia, 199.
Notice of a sect in Finland, granting extreme rights to, 198.
Word. On the ultimate triumph of The, 231.
Word in season. A, 36.
Worms for fishing bait. Notice of a business in, 318.
"Work it you would rise." Anecdote of Edmund Burke entitled, 179.
Worldly-mindedness and riches. On, 196.
Worth the diamonds. Incident in the life of a princess of Sweden, entitled, 41.
Worship. Remarks on ritualistic, 53.
Remarks on the deadening effect on the soul of liturgical form in, 54.
Advices of Friends in reference to the proper attendance of at their meetings for, and the right exercise of mind in them, 81. 129.
On silent, 172.
On a disgraceful way of raising money for building a house for, 175.
Extracts from William Penn on the right qualification for, 199.
Remarks on intrinsic singing in meetings for, 245.
On the substantial enjoyment often experienced in silent meetings for, 341.
An exercise of mind must be maintained in meetings for, 375.
Incident of faithful attendance by a lad of week-day meetings for, against opposition, 379.
Wright Mary. Anecdote narrated of, 324.

Yearly Meeting, Canada, 1882, (smaller body.) Notice of the proceedings of, 7.
Remarks on the organization of, 38.
Remarks in reference to a change of discipline among the members of, 115. 319.
Notice of a legal decision in reference to Friends of, 319.
Canada, 1883, (smaller body.) Notice of proceedings of, 497.
Dublin. Notice of the proceedings of, 399.
Kansas, 1882, (larger body.) Notice of proceedings of, 159.
(smaller body.) 1882. Notice of proceedings of, 191.
London, 1875. On the abandonment of the principles and testimonies of Friends witnessed in, 383.
1882. Remarks on the departure from the principles and practices of Friends in sanctioning the Home Mission movement by, 6. 18.
1723. Epistle of, to parents on training and care of children, 221.
Ancient advices of, respecting the maintenance of our testimony to plainness of dress, language, &c., 57.
Ancient advices of, on maintaining the testimonies of Friends, 63. 77. 91. 98. 105. 121. 129. 139. 147.
1505. Epistle of, to Philadelphia Yearly Meeting, 378.
1883. Notice of the proceedings of, 399.
New York, 1883. Notice of the proceedings of, 407.
North Carolina, 1882. Notice of the proceedings of, 54.
Ohio, 1882. Account of the proceedings of, 70.
Philadelphia. Thoughts respecting, 25.
A Testimony borne in, by Mildred Radcliff, 27.
Encouragement to the members of, 183.
1867. Notice of a remarkable communication of Thomas Evans in, 301.
Communication addressed to some of the junior members of, 252.
1863. Remarks on the approach of, 287.
1883. Notice of the proceedings of, 294. 303.
1883. Remarks on the, 301.
Comments on charges made against, 351.
1825. Epistle of, to London Yearly Meeting, 378.
Western, (smaller body,) 1882. Notice of the proceedings of, 133.

Young. Encouragement to the, entitled "I can and I will," 117.
Caution to the, 204.
Tender counsel and encouragement to the, 121.
Young housekeepers. Advice to, 63.
Youthful Christians. Account of the blessed visitations of Divine grace to, 357.

Zeal. Remarks on a well directed, 292.
Zuni Indians. Recent just action of the President of the United States respecting the, 373.

THE FRIEND.

A RELIGIOUS AND LITERARY JOURNAL.

VOL. LVI.

SEVENTH-DAY, EIGHTH MONTH 12, 1882.

NO. 1.

PUBLISHED WEEKLY.

Price, if paid in advance, $2.00 per annum; if not paid in advance $2.50; 10 cents extra is charged for Postage on those sent by mail.

Articles designed for insertion to be addressed to
JOSEPH WALTON,
MOORESTOWN, BURLINGTON CO., N. J.

Subscriptions, payments and business communications, received by
JOHN S. STOKES,
T. NO. 116 NORTH FOURTH STREET, UP STAIRS,
PHILADELPHIA.

For "The Friend."

Wanderings South and East.

(Continued from page 412, vol. LV.)

FII ISLANDS.

The Fiji Islands are now under the government of Great Britain. They form one of the most valuable of the groups of the Pacific. Of the 300 islands not more than 70 are inhabited. The natives were formerly among the most cruel and fierce of savages, and inexterminate cannibals; but through the labors of the Wesleyan missionaries they were induced to lay aside their savage customs, and embrace the Christian religion.

Walter Coote was much pleased with these islands, which he describes as beautiful and fertile. In a walk which he took over a part of the delta of the River Rewa on Viti Levu, he says: "I was pleased to find it entirely native land, owned and farmed by the villagers themselves. It seemed to be very rich soil, and was certainly made the most of by the natives."

"We passed little patches of maize, tobacco, kumars, taro, sugar, then again more open pieces where would be growing bread-fruit trees and cocoa-nuts and lemons and bananas. All these things seemed to be in a flourishing condition, and at every hundred yards or so was a small cottage or group of cottages."

"Our path was a mere foot-track winding in and out among the little plots of land, in many ways as like the paths in the agricultural districts of China as could be. I liked the look of this quiet, peaceful, homely district; the people seemed contented and prosperous, and it was indeed hard to realize that a few years ago this was one of the most dreaded cannibal islands of the South Seas."

"There are two or three sugar mills on the upper part of the Rewa, but they are of a most primitive order and will be shortly entirely eclipsed by the grand new mills of the Colonial Sugar Company, who are spending £100,000 on the Rewa; they are prepared to give ten shillings a ton for all cane landed at their river frontage, and expect to crush about a hundred and fifty thousand tons of cane from an area of three thousand five hundred acres. The labor employed upon these sugar estates is almost entirely imported. The natives are brought from the New Hebrides and Solomon groups and hired by the planters for a three years' term. I was told that they worked on the whole fairly well, and as I saw them during my few days upon the Rewa they seemed cheerful and well content. Of the labor system I shall have more to say, however, when I come to the islands whence these natives are collected."

"When walking among these plantations in the great Rewa valley, I could not but feel astonished at what had already been done to make a civilized country of a few savage islands, the most striking evidence of all perhaps being the fact that two Saxon children were paddling their canoe along the river for mere exercise and pleasure, with not a white man even near them, but native villages upon the banks, and naked savages walking along the paths, or paddling home with canoe-loads of yams or other food. This very generation have been cannibals, and those same men who call perhaps 'Saiaandra' or some other salutation to the English children, had but a year or two ago been praying to their heathen gods such prayers as this: 'Let us live, and let those who speak evil of us perish. Let the enemy be clubbed, swept away, utterly destroyed, piled in heaps. Let their teeth be broken. May they fall headlong into a pit. Let us live, let our enemies perish.'"

"To the Wesleyan missionaries one must in great measure give the credit of this great change, and it would not be just to close this chapter on Fiji without a word in praise of their great work. No one can deny them the highest admiration. Their work was amongst a very fierce and cruel race, but has been carried on with the greatest courage and perseverance, and to show what terrible things have happened upon the little island of Mbau, and to illustrate one aspect at least of missionary life in the old days, I may perhaps be permitted to introduce the following lines from William's 'Fiji and the Fijians':"

"The report soon crossed over to Viwa and reached the mission house. Fourteen women are to be brought to Mbau to-morrow to be killed and cooked for the Mbutoni people. Mrs. Calvert and Mrs. Lyth were alone with the children. Their husbands were many miles away on another island. The thought of the horrid fate that awaited the poor captives aroused the pity of those poor lone women. But what could be done? Amidst such fiendish excitement it would be a desperate thing for any one to venture into Mbau for the purpose of thwarting the bloodthirsty people. Those two noble women determined to go. A canoe was procured, and as they went poling over the flat they heard with trembling the wild din of the cannibals grow louder as they approached. The death-drum sounded terrible, and muskets were fired in triumph. Then, as they came nearer, shriek after shriek pierced through every other noise, and told that murder was begun. . . . Surrounded by an unseen guard that none might break through, the women of God passed among the blood-maddened cannibals unhurt. They pressed forward to the house of the old king Tanoa, the entrance to which was strictly forbidden to all women. It was no time for ceremony now. With a whale's tooth in each hand, and still accompanied by a Christian chief, they thrust themselves into the grim presence of the king, and prayed the prayer of mercy. The old man was startled at the audacity of the intruders. His hearing was dull, and they raised their voices higher to plead for their dark sisters' lives. The king said, "Those who are dead are dead, but those who are still alive shall live only." At that word a man ran to stop the butchery, and returned to say that five still lived; the rest of the fourteen had been killed."

The coming of European colonists among the Fijians is too recent to develop those deleterious effects which have generally followed the introduction of foreign customs among uncivilized people. But when we reflect on the fate of the natives elsewhere, where such settlements have been made; the destructive agency of using tobacco, and of foreign vices, which almost inevitably follow; and the gradual wasting away of the original owners of the land; we naturally think of the future of these islanders with anxiety and fear. As the English colonists increase in numbers, they will gradually absorb more and more of the fertile soil by purchase or otherwise, and the probability is that the native Fijians, unable to compete with them in the struggle of life, will finally succumb, or exist only as a minor element in the race that will occupy these islands in the future.

At present many of the old customs and habits of the people are still in existence. While in the Fiji group in company with a native chief, W. Coote visited the little island of Mbau only about half a mile long, and a quarter wide, but in former years one of the most aristocratic of all, and still the residence of Thakombau, formerly "King of all the Fijis, greatest of known cannibals, most dreaded of savage potentates." His glory is in these days departed and his title of king cannot be said to be more than complimentary; he has, however, a large pension from the government. The visit is thus described:

"We were taken on landing to a very clean and comfortable house where the greatest hospitality was shown us. Our chief was not in his own territory here, being lord of Suva, but he was treated, and I also for his sake, with great consideration and kindness."

"There was soon prepared for us a most luxurious evening meal in entirely native fashion, and amongst other dishes were some turtles sent by Thakombau, and a banana leaf full of a delicious compound of plantain, cocoa-nut, maize, &c. Everything we had was served to us cleanly upon the matted floor, wide banana leaves being used as plates and plaited palm leaves as dishes. The house was, as usual, an oblong building with thickly-thatched roof and sides; the rafters and roof were crusted over with soot from the wood fire which in Fijian houses burns unceasingly in one corner; the floor was very soft and springy, being made of layers upon layers of mats, commencing with coarse palm-leaf ones at the bottom and having for final covering the beautifully-made white ones for which the South Sea Islands are celebrated. At one end of the room is a sort of dais, raised about a foot from the rest of the floor, and upon this the principal members of the establishment sleep. There are two small holes or windows at this end of the room through which the pleasant cool trade wind blows refreshingly.

"The houses of the well-to-do natives are always well-kept, clean, and comfortable; at the doorway there is frequently a hollowed log with water in which to wash the feet before entering, a rough mat being placed beside the log to wipe them upon."

"After our evening meal the inevitable ceremony of 'Kava' drinking had to be gone through. Some very clean and fairly pretty girls were brought in having as little clothes on as well could be, and seated themselves in a row on one side of the hut. Sundry friends of the family also assembled, and in a few minutes we were quite a large, and a very merry party. An enormous bowl was taken from its peg upon the wall, and placed between us and the pretty girls. It was a splendid piece of furniture, and had been in the family for many generations; its diameter was over four feet, and a cream-colored enamel covered the greater part of its shallow surface. It had four short legs, and was carved from one solid piece of hard black wood.

"The Kava, or as it is generally called in the Fiji group, the 'Yangona' root, is in appearance not unlike a large horse-radish; this is scraped of its soiled outer skin and cut into little lumps which are handed over to the girls, who put them into their mouths and commence solemnly and methodically to—chew."

When any one of the girls deems her individual mouthful of the needful consistency, she places it in the great bowl, rinses her mouth with water and begins again. When enough of these masses of chewed Kava had accumulated in the bowl, water was poured on to them until they were well covered. The liquid was then filtered through cocoa-nut fibre, and was ready for use. "The drinking of the Kava is no mere convivial pastime; it is almost a ceremony. A beautifully polished cocoa-nut bowl was given to me, and into it one of the maidens poured from another bowl the soapy-looking beverage. I winced as I realized that my bowl held a pint and a half, for I knew it was etiquette to swallow every drop. I drained it off however, at one fell gulp, and, as previously instructed, flung the empty cocoa-nut shell upon the mat with a spinning motion amidst clapping of hands and deep-toned cries of 'ah mata.' It is a most unpleasant beverage to a stranger, tasting as I imagine diluted earth and Gregory's powder would taste."

"After breakfast I went to see the native school; this is held in a large, low building in the middle of the island; it is built exactly like the other houses, but is much larger. There were about a hundred scholars ranging from four or five years to grown men and women even with babies. They seemed very happy and bright, boys and girls, men and women all mingling amicably together. The noise they made would, I think, have somewhat astonished an English schoolmaster, but their evident enjoyment of their work, and the entire absence of that feeling of school which is inseparable from the mind of English youth, fully made up for seeming lack of discipline. There were native teachers only, of course, and these took charge of the scholars in what I suppose were classes. Some were dividing and multiplying by 3, 5, 7, 9, and the like; others were slowly spelling out little Fiji words, but all were happy and cheerful, and very evidently thought it capital fun."

(To be continued.)

For "The Friend."

Desultory Selections and Pencillings.

AN INDIAN'S DEFINITION OF RELIGION.

Could the skilled logician or the master of learning give a more comprehensive, practical, and, withal, a more simple definition of religion, than is the following from an illiterate Indian?

"When I* once enquired of a pious Indian, who labored to bring his country people to a sense of good, what he meant by the religion he wanted to promote, he said:—

'My brother; I was made sensible that my heart was hard and bad. Under this sense, I cried to God who made the heart. The water ran long (some years) from my eyes; till, at last, I felt my heart was changed; that it had become soft and good. I thought myself raised as it were above the world. I was in such a disposition, that I loved every man; and could bear without anger any thing from any of my fellow creatures, from a sense that what was wrong in them proceeded only from that same badness of heart, I had too long groaned under.' This the Indian said, was what he called Religion; and what he was concerned to exhort his brethren to seek the experience of."

PLAINNESS OF SPEECH, BEHAVIOR AND APPAREL.

From a testimony concerning William Birdsall, a member of New York Monthly Meeting, who died on the 30th of Seventh month, 1859, in the 62d year of his age.

"At the late Quarterly Meeting held at Flushing on Long Island, about three days before his death, and which was the last meeting he attended, William Birdsall's friends were comforted by the firmness and Christian zeal which he displayed in reviving in the meeting for discipline some of our religious testimonies, particularly that in relation to plainness of speech, behavior, and apparel; when he expressed it as his belief, that there never had been an instance of a member of our Society having attained to eminent usefulness therein, who had not been faithful in maintaining this, as well as all our other doctrines and testimonies in daily life and conversation. Indeed, he would repeat, that it might be stated to be an undeniable fact; and he hoped this would be distinctly remembered, as a testimony he felt constrained to bear for the Truth."

WATCHMAN, WHAT OF THE NIGHT?

What a day is this for pride of discovery! Of thirst for liberality and change! For removing landmarks! For assaults upon long established usages, and settled principles! "For," as writes Thomas Scattergood, from the bed of death, "trampling under foot the testimonies and judgment of our worthy predecessors!" What rapid advances the spirit of the world or the enemy of our souls, "with all deceivableness of unrighteousness," seem to be making upon our Christian profession particularly in some places! How lamentably the standard of primitive Quakerism is being lowered to suit the religious taste of the times! How lukewarmness and self-confidence, with the form of godliness—too much it is to be feared, without its living power—are having place! and this coupled with the desire, if not determination, to live too exclusively for the present, irrespective of the great hereafter! How strongly in contrast is this with what used to characterize this people—"low self-denial and watchful restraint," with that liberty which William Penn testified "stood but in the liberty of the Spirit of truth."

* Supposed to be George Dillwyn.

Would it not be well before entering upon untried ways and novel enterprises, not only to retrospect calmly the past, with a profound view and sense of the ground of our religious principles and testimonies, but, it may be, with the fervent desire and prayerful purpose of heart to make a new start on the original foundation? At such seasons, as above alluded to, it is well, especially for young persons, to have such encouraging testimonies and Christian reminders as the subjoined from "John Barclay's Letters," &c.

"1818. Third month 3d.—I believe if young persons were more fully open, and implicitly given up to acts of dedication apparently small, and were willing to go, to stay, to do, or to forbear in minor matters, as seemed best, that they would thrive more vigorously in religious stature and strength. One thing after another came gradually before the view of my mind; all that I had to do, or believed was required at my hands, came not upon me at once; for there was no hard task-master to obey, but one who knew my weakness, and my inability to give up even to the least matter of duty, without his special aid. As I was concerned to keep my eye open, to see whatever He might show me was to be given up to,—and as my desire from day to day (was) unto Him, and the accomplishment of his will respecting me,—first one thing, then another, at seasons opened before me with sufficient clearness: sometimes these apprehended duties were very little matters, at other times they were of fearfully great importance; and often were they of a nature and complexion, which the worldly-wise part in myself and in others, could not bear or understand. Yet after having gone through and been favored to stand faithful in the performance of these things, I have often seen the propriety of them; and I have felt it a precious thing to be 'led about and instructed' so suitably, so seasonably, so safely."

THOUGHTS ON MUSIC.

The introduction and study of music either "sacred" or secular, by our members, which now in some places is not only excused, but pleaded for and much indulged in, we have no doubt have their root and spring in the adulterated Quakerism of the present day; being one of the degenerate plants of a strange vine unto the Lord of hosts.

A tree is to be known by its fruits. And is not the tendency of music to lead the mind away from the simplicity of the Truth, and to expose, especially young persons, to inreased temptations and dangers? For music is a siren that excites and fascinates, while it enfeebles and injures us. However specious the reasoning in favor of this sensuous art and idol, the same line of argument as is used for it, would lead by gradual but easy steps to dancing and the ball room; to theatrical exhibitions, with other well nigh fatal indulgences of the appetites and passions. Oh, the danger of the first steps in error, or from safe beaten tracks—from a right, though straight and narrow way! Shortsighted and fallible creatures as we are, we never know where such diverging paths, small as they may seem at first, may lead and land us! Self-pleasing avenues in the direction of worldly compliances, should especially be guarded against; because the enemy of our souls is ever on the alert, under some specious guise or other, to tempt, to mislead, and to destroy us.

While it is easy for the fleshly mind to find arguments for indulgence on the side of its natural propensities, we, nevertheless, believe that but few if any of our members enter upon this forbidden amusement without some misgivings as to its being right for them—without some conflict with that swift Witness for truth, which, in the form of a scruple or gentle proof, forewarns of danger, and prompts to obedience to a still small voice within, which is in the line of peace and duty faithfully to recognize and obey. Oh! that these heavenly admonitions revealed through the Holy Spirit—our guide into all truth—might be heeded; thereby much sorrow and remorse might be spared. Parents herein, and especially at seasons of precious visitation, have a very reasonable duty resting upon them toward their susceptible offspring. How should they, delegated under-shepherds—having themselves experienced of the all-sufficiency of the grace of God—commend their dear children to its safe guidance, and encourage to filial obedience to all its openings and requisitions, the alone refuge—the olive-branch of peace and preservation in times of temptation and danger. This is instructively set forth in the following testimony from the pen of Ann Rowley:—"A fondness for dress and music, as one of my greatest foibles; and I am bound in gratitude to acknowledge, that had not been for parental care, advice, and prudent restraint, I might have gone great lengths in these gratifications. Then, in the love of the gospel, I would most earnestly and affectionately recommend all religious parents to be faithful in the discharge of their important duties, remembering they are delegated as care-takers over a very important trust; and happy will it be for those parents who, in the day of righteous inquisition, may stand acquitted in the Divine sight, having one all they could to preserve their offspring in true simplicity, and in the fear of the Lord."

The annexed is a portion of a letter of our friend Alfred Cope, on the subject of music:—

"We can easily understand that the pleasing concord of sweet sounds may quiet the inner man, who have neither reason nor conscience to which to appeal; or that a cross baby may be soothed to sleep by a tender lullaby; and even that a set of unreasoning, irritated school children may be put into a good humor for awhile by melodious tones

'Untwisting all the cords that tie
The hidden soul of harmony.'

"But what is the educational value of these processes? The insane are soon raving again. The troubled spirit of Saul was often quieted by David's harp, but he was not reformed thereby, and came to bitter grief at last. So the irritated children, when the next cross occurrence takes place, will be turbulent as ever. Education ought to implant in the mind of these, principles of obedience to authority, deference to seniors, good-will to all. Music has no power to do this. If music made men virtuous, we ought to see the proof in those communities where music, and especially what is called sacred music, is most cultivated. The two cities in the world in which this art is carried to the highest perfection, are said to be Munich and Rome, and the moral corruption of those cities is deplorable. It is not in the power of music to implant a principle. It operates upon the senses, and through them upon the emotions, so long as the sound lasts, and mayhap a little longer. But the effect is transient. It imparts no strength to resist temptation. It does nothing to eradicate selfishness. It does not truly soften the heart. I have just been reading a notice of one of the most cruel of the Russian Czars, Ivan Vasilivitch, who was so fond of church-music as to perform sometimes himself on the instrument, and in the pauses between these 'sacred' performances, had been known to issue his cruel decrees against individuals whom he hated.

"It is the power of the Gospel, and that only which can regenerate the heart. Music is a kind of intoxication, and all intoxication is followed by weakness."

For "The Friend."

Westtown Boarding School.

At a meeting of the committee held 6th mo. 10th, 1836. "The committee to encourage among the boys a more general use of the plain language reported further attention to the subject, and was released.

The watering committee proposing that the present washhouse be dispensed with, and that the cellar now used as a wood-cellar be fitted up as a wash-room for the boys, and that the contemplated cistern at the east end of the house be placed in said wash-room instead of under the boys' shed, as heretofore concluded on,"—the proposals were adopted and the committee authorized to carry them into effect.

The committee on Superintendent and Matron reported a communication, signed by Nathan Sharpless and Martha Jefferis, offering themselves for those respective stations; and on deliberate consideration the committee united in the appointment of those Friends.

The committee on supplies were requested to purchase 18 reference Bibles, to be placed in the different rooms of the institution; also a suitable number of Scripture Lessons, to be used as a text book in religious instruction. The committee charged with the subjects of the consumption of fuel, warming the school building and the general accommodation of the boys, report: "That they have agreed to propose that a collecting room be made at the boys' end, similar in size and furniture to the one at the girls' end, and that a room be taken off the north end of it similar to that on the girls' side in size and situation, to be occupied as a boys' parlor. To accommodate the schools displaced by the above change it is proposed that the mathematical school be put in the present collecting room, the writing school in the present boys' parlor, and the reading school in the philosophical apparatus room; that the partition between the present reading and writing school rooms be taken down, so as to make one room of them to be used for the arithmetical school. It is further proposed that the above arrangements be carried into effect as soon as funds for the purpose can be procured by voluntary contribution. It is also recommended that no change be made at present in the mode of warming the house. The subject of the dress of the children at the school claiming the attention of the committee, it was desired the superintendent and matron may be encouraged affectionately and steadily to endeavor to maintain amongst the scholars a due regard to consistency and plainness becoming our religious profession."

9th mo. 7th, 1836. "As a practice now prevails in the school to a considerable extent of combining to conceal from the teachers such information as is frequently essential to the proper government of the institution, by which a system of prevarication and falsehood has been introduced and promoted, on deliberate consideration of the affecting statements made to the committee on this subject, it was concluded to separate a few friends to unite with the teachers and superintendent in prompt endeavors to eradicate the practice; and it was the united judgment of the committee that if, after suitable labor and admonition, any scholars should persevere in a course of conduct so opposed to the religious concern under which the institution was established, they should be expelled from the school. To which service Samuel Bettle, Philip Garrett, Geo. Williams, Enoch Lewis, Thos. Evans, Josiah Tatum, Hannah Rhoads, Hannah Paul, Jane Johnson, Hannah Gibbons and Elizabeth C. Mason, were appointed."

12th mo. 9th, 1836. The committee on a better supply of water, &c., made the following report: "That they have caused a tank to be constructed on the south front of the boys' side, about 130 feet long by 6 wide, and 4½ feet high—sufficient to contain nearly 28,000 gallons. They have also had two cisterns built, one in the girls' wash-house and the other in the basement story at the east end of the house, where a room has been fitted up as a wash-house for the boys. Each of these is about 7½ feet clear in diameter and 11 feet deep. The forcing pump has also been put in order, and by a trial recently made it appears that about 30 hours' pumping is sufficient to supply a week's consumption of water. The quantity contained in the tank and cistern is so large that it will afford ample time for it to settle and become cool in the summer season, and the committee believe the important desideratum of an abundant supply of wholesome water for drinking, culinary and other purposes, will now be attained. The forcing pump appears to answer the purpose at present, but the time necessary for throwing up a supply of water might be greatly diminished and the mill power saved, by a pump geared with a double stroke." The cost of these improvements appears to have been about $1267.50.

4th mo. 25th, 1837. "The committee appointed in the 9th month last to endeavor, in conjunction with the superintendent and teachers, to promote a reform among the scholars, report "That they have given considerable attention to the subject, and that they have now the satisfaction to state their belief, that the causes of uneasiness which induced their appointment appear to have been entirely removed, and that subordination and good feeling prevail among the scholars generally." The committee were continued to render any advice or assistance that may be requisite in future for the preservation of good government in the school."

The farm tenement and infirmary have been rented for another year, and a written agreement executed with the tenant of the infirmary, providing for the occupancy of the west end of that building for the sick, whenever it may become needful to do so, and the agreement was left with the superintendent. To examine and settle the accounts of the school for the past year, Thos. Evans, Henry Cope and Thos. Kimber are appointed, who were also desired to prepare an essay of a report to the Yearly Meeting.

Talk Over What You Read.—Nearly forty years' experience has shown me how little I truly know of a subject until I begin to explain it or teach it. Let any young person try the experiment of giving in conversation, briefly and connectedly, and in the simplest language, the chief points of any book or article he has read, and he will at once see what I mean. The gaps that are likely to appear in the knowledge that he felt was his own will no doubt be very surprising. I know of no training superior to this in utilizing one's reading, in strengthening the memory, and in forming habits of clear, connected statement. It will doubtless teach other things than those I have mentioned, which the persons who honestly make the experiment will find out for themselves. Children who read can be encouraged to give, in a familiar way, the interesting parts of the books they have read, with great advantage to all concerned. More than one youth, I know, has laid the foundation of intellectual tastes in a New England family, where hearty encouragement was given to children and adults in their attempts to sketch the lectures they had heard the evening previous. The same thing was done with books.—Christian Union.

Extract from a Memoir of John Thorp.—The evening preceding his decease, he related to his family the following circumstance:

"When a boy, about fourteen years of age, my attachment to music and singing was such, that when walking alone in the lanes and fields on an evening, I frequently gratified myself by singing aloud; and indulged therein, even after my mind became uneasy with the practice, until, in one of my solitary evening walks, and when in the act of singing, I heard, as it were, a voice distinctly say, "If thou wilt discontinue that gratification, thou shalt be made partaker of a much more perfect harmony."

Such was the powerful and convincing effect of this solemn and awful communication, that, he added, he never afterwards indulged in the practice. After a short suspense of conversation, he related the circumstance of Luke Cock having been a great singer, prior to joining the Society of Friends: and that John Richardson said of him, "he was the greatest singer in that part of the country where he resided, and that he sung then the songs of Babylon, by the muddy waters thereof; but having drunk deep of the brooks of Shiloh, which run softly into the newly converted soul, he could sing and rejoice in the Lord Jesus Christ."

TAKE MY HAND.

Selected.

She slept within her little crib,
Beside her mother's bed;
The good-night kiss long since was given,
The evening prayer was said.
Why start thus? does some frightful dream
I can not understand,
Trouble my child? she only said,
"Please, mamma, take my hand."

And with her little hand in mine,
Feeling that I was near,
She sweetly slept again in peace,
Without a thought of fear.
Oh, with such childlike faith as hers,
Ready at my command,
When fears distress, how soon I'd cry,
My Father, take my hand.

And even though I may not see
Thy presence by my side,
Yet, if I feel my hand in thine,
I would be satisfied.
And, though the way be cold and dark,
If by my side thou'lt stand,
I'll trust in thee and onward go,
O Father, take my hand.

Thou who hast trod life's pathway through Must know the way to lead,
And, if I follow such a Guide,
I am secure indeed;
And when, life's journey safely o'er,
I reach that "happy land,"
I'll praise thee, Father, evermore,
That thou didst take my hand.
—M. E. L. in National Baptist.

WHAT IS BEST.

Selected.

BY MARIANNE FARNINGHAM.

We do not know! Thou knowest!
As children in the dark
We lift our hearts, our hands to thee,
And find a rest, an ark;
We trust thee in our ignorance,
O Wise, O Good, O Strong;
And though the shades encompass us
We find thee with our song.

We think we know. Thou knowest.
We dream, and hope, and plan,
And make mistakes, and sigh to know
How frail and weak is man;
But thou, from the beginning,
Canst see the end of all;
We rest upon thy knowledge,
Father, on whom we call.

We do not know the best for us,
And so we strive in vain;
And for our sowing often reap
A harvest dire of pain;
We fail and fall, and then at last
We cry to thee for aid,
And only rest when thou dost say,
"Tis I, be not afraid."

O God, we would be wiser yet,
And only pray, "Choose thou."
Lead as one leads the little ones,
We are thy children now;
And day by day, and step by step,
We need the guiding hand;
O let us cling to thee, until
We reach the safe home-land.

And then let days be fair or dark,
The journey short or long,
Our hearts will rest in comfort,
And we will sing our song;
Since thou dost know, our ignorance
And weakness matter not,
We trust in thy great love, O God,
And thou dost choose our lot.

Religious Views and Tenets.

I am of the belief that it is the privilege of all, and that it is in the reach of all, to attain, by the assisting grace of God, to that happy and sinless condition that Adam and Eve were in before they fell. But I do not believe that we shall be freed from the infirmities of life till this mortal shall put on immortality. For this body which was made of the earth, is, of course, earthy. But God breathed into Adam the breath of life, and he became a living soul; and had the Divine image given him, spiritually. In this innocent and happy condition he held immediate intercourse with his Maker. He had also laws and commandments given him, with power to obey or to disobey. But a countermmanding spirit of evil soon presented himself with his enticing snares. He taught them a contradictory doctrine. They, or, rather, the woman, listened to it, and believed a lying spirit instead of the plain commandment of God; and so completed her sin. She gave to her husband of that which was forbidden, and he partook also. Thus sin entered into the world, and death by sin. The life of innocency and purity was lost. They became blind and dead to good, but their eyes were opened to evil. And this their sin, through disobedience, has passed on all, for all have sinned. Shame came upon them. They covered themselves with a covering, but not of God's spirit. They had now forfeited their right to the tree of life, and were driven from the Garden of Eden, and paradise of God. They were sent forth into the world, which had now become cursed for man's sake. They were to eat of the herb of the field, instead of the Garden of Eden. And in sorrow were they to eat of it all the days of their life because of their transgression. The enemy that deceived them was also cursed above all that God had made. And the Almighty said to him, "I will put enmity between thee and the woman, and between thy seed and her seed; it shall bruise thy head, and thou shalt bruise his heel." Here the enmity which still exists between the two seeds of good and evil, first took its rise. And they are still contrary, the one to the other. It was by man's own voluntary choice that he partook of the fruit of the tree of knowledge of good and evil; and that these two discordant elements first entered the heart of man. Good and evil are discordant in their nature, and can never harmonize. "For what fellowship hath righteousness with unrighteousness?" The seed of the woman, which is Christ the Word, has a bruising power which is exerted by the Holy Spirit, over the evil in man, in order to destroy the works of the devil within. So the seed of the serpent—the subtle foe of God and man—has a bruising and deceitful power, in order to destroy, if possible, the silent, purifying works of the Holy Spirit in the heart. Hence the strife. Hence the warfare between the two powers; and we become servants to whichever power we yield ourselves servants to obey; "whether of sin unto death, or of obedience unto righteousness." "For of whom a man is overcome, of the same is he brought in bondage." So choose ye, while time is in mercy lengthened out, which of the two ruling powers ye will serve; as the power of choice is left to man. And we may, if we will, choose the universal remedy which God has provided, and be restored from the uni-ersal evil which has come upon us in the world. For as in Adam all are dead spiritually, so in Christ all may be made alive. For as by one man's offence judgment came upon all unto condemnation, so by the righteousness of one, the free gift might come upon all unto justification of life. For where sin, through disobedience, has abounded unto death, grace might much more abound through obedience unto eternal life through Jesus Christ our Lord. For life and immortality are brought to light by the gospel, and as a free gift are offered to all, in order to raise up from darkness to light and from the power of Satan to God, that we might receive forgiveness of sins, and be established in Christ Jesus, who never fell. For if the law of the Spirit of life in Christ Jesus could set Paul free from the law of sin and death, so it can and will us, if we obey and follow it; and they will have no more dominion over us. Spiritual death having been slain as the last enemy, by and through Him who came to destroy the works of the devil, and to make an end of sins, and to make reconciliation for iniquity, and to bring in an everlasting righteousness unto every individual soul. Yes, everlasting! Not fitful righteousness, which is "as a morning cloud, or as the early dew that goeth away," until another revival breeze shall blow upon it, and fan anew the slumbering flame. We need his abiding presence as a refiner and purifier, till the works of the devil are destroyed. But as his works first entered the world by disobedience to the commandments of God, and receiving the temptation of Satan, so everlasting righteousness is brought in by assisting him, and receiving and believing and obeying Christ the second Adam, the quickening Spirit who never fell, and who manifests Himself in the heart to take away the in of the world, and who has, by his one offering, forever perfected all them who are thus sanctified. But as He who knew no sin died for us, we must, through Him, die to sin; for it was sin that separated man from God at the first place, and it must be slain by Him who tasted death for every man, that He might restore us to God through newness of life.

And now, what is our great business, as we are passing along through this probationary world, but to seek, by the assisting grace of God, to regain that heavenly image which was lost in the fall?

As the spirit of anti-Christ is continually striving to draw the heart away from the Creator to the creature, or to the visible things of the world, so the Spirit of Christ is striving to draw the heart back again to the Creator, and from the world, as seeing Him who is invisible. Let us not be content with a religion that does not destroy the works of the devil; that does not redeem us from all iniquity. Let us not take part for the whole, or think the work is done, when it is only begun, and thus stop short of a full salvation, and finally miss the crown immortal. The living God dwells only in living temples. To revive the spirit of the humble, and to revive the heart of the contrite ones."

D. H.

Dublin, Ind., 7th mo. 21st, 1882.

The deepest trust leads to the most powerful action. It is the silencing oil that makes the machine obey the motive power with greatest readiness and result.

Advice on Reading the Scriptures.

Friend,—Hearken to a word of advice, which is in my heart to thee; it may be of great use to thee, if the Lord open thy spirit, and cause it to sink in. It is this:

Wait on the Lord, that thou mayest from Him feel the right limit to thy mind in reading the Scriptures. For the mind of man is busy and active, willing to be running beyond its bounds, guessing at the meaning of God's Spirit, and imagining of itself, unless the Lord limit it. Therefore, read in fear, and wait understandingly, to distinguish between God's opening to thee words concerning the kingdom and the things of the kingdom, and thy own apprehensions about them, that the one may be always cast by, and the other always embraced by thee. And always wait God's season; do not presume to understand a thing before He give thee the understanding of it; and know, also, that He alone is able to preserve the true sense and knowledge in thee, that thou mayest live dependently upon Him for thy knowledge, and never "lean to thy own understanding." Little dost thou know what it hath cost us to have our own understanding and wisdom broken down, and how demonstratively by this Spirit the Lord opens Scriptures to us, (yea, and the things themselves, which the Scriptures speak of,) ever since He hath taught us to deny our own understanding, and to lean upon his Spirit and wisdom.

The Lord guide thee by his certain, infallible Spirit, into the certain, infallible, everlasting way of life, that by the shinings of light, Spirit and power in thee, thou mayest see light and enjoy life. For, if thou didst certainly and infallibly understand all the words, descriptions and testimonies concerning the thing in the Scriptures; yet it is one thing to understand words, testimonies and descriptions, and it is another matter to understand, know, enjoy, possess, and live in that which the words relate to, describe, and bear witness of.

And, friend, if thou wilt be an inward Jew, and know and understand the laws of life, the laws of the new covenant, thou must read them in those tables, where God writes them in and by the new covenant. Indeed, by reading in the letter, thou mayest read testimonies concerning the Spirit and his ministration; but thou must read in the Spirit, if ever thou come rightly to understand the letter. And the end of words is to bring man to the knowledge of things beyond what words can utter. So learn of the Lord to make a right use of the Scriptures, which is, by esteeming them in their place, and prizing that above them, which is above them.

The eternal life, the Spirit, the power, the fountain of living waters, the everlasting pure well, is above the words concerning it. This the believer is to witness in himself, and to draw water with joy out of it.—Isaac Penington.

German Military Law.—A German captain of artillery, named Von Ehrenberg, having written a pamphlet in which he endeavored to show how millions of marks might be saved upon the German war budget annually by the abolition of useless pomp and show, has been tried by a military court at Cassel and sentenced to three months' imprisonment, to pay the expenses of the trial, and to be dismissed from the service. The court found that the prisoner had insulted the Minister of War as well as the Imperial Body Guard, of which he had contested the utility.

For "The Friend."

Religious Items, &c.

Fashion and Christianity.—A writer in the Earnest Christian (Free Methodist), comments on the gradual conformity to the world in dress, style and manner of living, manifested by many of the "Methodists and Quakers;" and regards it as evincing a low state of spiritual life. He says, pride, extravagance and worldly conformity in dress are as clearly and emphatically condemned in the Bible as idolatry, swearing, lying and stealing. Fashion, he asserts, leads, to a hollow-hearted, vain and godless life; squanders the means of its devotees; and improperly engrosses the thoughts, especially of the women.

British Benevolent Societies.—The London Methodist Recorder of 6th month 9th says:—"Within the past six weeks upward of two hundred of the principal religious and philanthropic societies in Great Britain have held their annual meetings in the metropolis, and the reports presented at those meetings exhibit, for the most part, a gratifying increase on the receipts of the previous year. The following particulars of the present financial position of the principal societies will doubtless be of interest to a large circle of our readers: Church Missionary Society, income, £212,910; expenditure, £193,515. British and Foreign Bible Society, income, £199,785; expenditure, £190,783. Religious Tract Society, income, £198,934; expenditure, £196,426. Wesleyan Missionary Society, income, £151,797; expenditure, £146,754. Society for Propagation of Gospel in Foreign Parts, income, £134,978. London Missionary Society, income, £116,012; expenditure, £111,703."

For "The Friend."

Natural History, Science, &c.

Earth-Tremors in Japan.—In a series of investigations in Japan on Earth-Tremors, the apparatus used was so sensitive that if a pebble were dropped on the grass within six feet of the pit in which it was placed, a distinct sound was heard in the telephone, and a swing was produced in the galvanometer, connected with it.

The general result obtained was, that after eliminating all motions which could have been caused by any local influence, there were movements to be detected every day, and sometimes many times per day. Japan is a country where earthquakes are of very frequent occurrence; and it has been supposed that these earth-tremors are connected with the other more formidable phenomenon.

Utilizing Ants in Horticulture.—Dr. C. J. Macgowan has sent me from Han Chow, Province of Hainan, China, a little paper on the "Utilization of Ants as Insect Destroyers in China." It seems that in many parts of the province of Canton the orange trees are injured by certain worms, and to rid themselves from these pests, the inhabitants import ants from the neighboring hills. The hill-people throughout the summer and winter find the nests of two species of ants, red and yellow, suspended from the branches of various trees. The "orange ant breeders" are provided with pig or goat bladders, baited inside with lard. The orifices of these they apply to the entrance of the bag-like nests, where the ants enter the bladders, and, as Dr. Macgowan expresses it, "become a marketable commodity at the orangeries." The trees are colonized by placing the ants on their upper branches, and bamboo rods are stretched between the different trees, so as to give the ants easy access to the whole orchard. This remedy has been in constant use at least since 1640, and probably dates from a much earlier period.—C. F. Riley in Nature.

Telephone.—During the bombardment of the forts at Alexandria, a telephone was attached to the Alexandria cable at Malta, and the firing was distinctly heard—a distance of more than 1000 miles.

New Method of Coal Blasting.—Blasting with gun-powder is liable to the serious objection that the attendant flame may set on fire the inflammable gas which is often present in coal mines. At the Shipley collieries in Derbyshire, England, a cartridge has been introduced charged with caustic lime packed under a pressure of forty tons to the square inch. When properly placed, these cartridges are discharged by water forced through a flexible tube in connection with them. The action of water is to cause the lime to heat and expand, and this, in connection with the expansive force of the steam generated, is sufficient to loosen the coal, without producing any violent explosion or raising clouds of coal dust, which are in themselves a source of danger. To show the power exerted by this cartridge, two iron pipes were exhibited at a scientific meeting, which had been shattered by them, though one of them had previously borne a test of 953 lbs. on the square inch.—Chambers Journal.

Illustration of Reason in Dogs.—J. G. Wood relates the following anecdotes:

"A colley-dog named 'Moss,' belonging to a farmer, had excited the admiration of a drover who was helping the shepherd to bring home cattle to the farm. The drover asked to be allowed to borrow Moss for a few days, to help him in getting some cattle from another market to Burntisland.

"The dog, being on friendly terms with the drover, went willingly, and gave his help in bringing the cattle on their journey. On their return, they had to pass the spot where the road to Burntisland branches off from that which led to his own farm; Moss refused to go any further on the Burntisland road. Not only this, but he would not allow the drover to take the cattle any further, and the man was at last obliged to let the dog deliver the cattle at his master's farm."

The process of reasoning is quite evident here. The dog had always known that any property of which he had been placed in charge belonged to his master, and consequently brought the cattle to his master's farm. His reasoning was correct enough, but one of his premises was false.

Several successive litters of puppies had been taken from their mother, a little terrier. When the next litter was expected, she left the house, and was not seen again for some time.

At last she returned, bringing with her in great pomp a whole retinue of fine healthy puppies. It appeared that she had hidden herself in a rabbit-burrow, evidently knowing that, if she could only conceal her puppies till they were able to shift for themselves, no harm would come to them. The result proved that she had been perfectly correct in her interpretation of her master's character.

Effect of Military Discipline.—When James Backhouse sailed from England on his visit to Van Diemen's Land, there were among the passengers in the vessel 46 Chelsea pensioners. He says, that from having long been accustomed to act in obedience to military discipline, instead of upon principle, these men were generally as incapable of taking care of themselves when temptation was in the way, as children; and the state of confusion they were in was often appalling. From the time they sailed from the Downs till they reached the Cape of Good Hope, few days passed without some of them being intoxicated and quarrelling.

THE FRIEND.

EIGHTH MONTH 12, 1882.

The action of the late London Yearly Meeting in extending an official sanction to the Home Mission movement, does not seem to settle comfortably on the minds of many who were opposed to the measure. The British Friend for the 7th month contains articles on the subject from three contributors, and an editorial notice, all concurring in the sentiment, that there was not in the Yearly Meeting the degree of unity that ought to have attended the making of such an important change. The editor says, "If there was one thing more objectionable than another to the decision minuted respecting the proposal of the Conference, it was the great want of unanimity in the Meeting. That decision, therefore, may be considered a forced one; and while unsatisfactory to a large minority, it cannot yield solid comfort to a right-minded, calmly-reflecting majority."

One of the writers referred to, says: "I feel it a matter deeply to be regretted that a very general feeling of dissatisfaction prevails with the conduct of the discussion, in the minds of those who dissented from the recorded judgment of the meeting. * * What price, I ask, has been paid for forcing the measure forward against the conscientious objections of a large number of our members? Have its promoters gone away with easy minds themselves, under the unavoidable impression that the conclusion they sought has been obtained apart from the unity essential for any greatly increased success in that work? for I very much doubt if any of the objectors to the measure are in anywise more reconciled to it. They have again and again solemnly asserted their belief that 'Mission Work,' as carried on and advocated by many members of our Society, is at variance with, and subversive of, those simple and comprehensive views of the Gospel which have distinguished this from other religious bodies, and especially committed to us, as we believe, by the Head of the Church, and the adoption of which from conviction has yielded them a large measure of peace and comfort. Those making this protest against innovation include a large number of our members who have the confidence of their respective meetings, and many of them occupy the most important stations which the Society can accord to them. * * It becomes a vital question how far these just claims to consideration can be safely and peremptorily ignored."

Another writer, under the signature of veritas, states: "We are reluctantly obliged to state our deliberate conviction that the matter was too hastily decided, and that without sufficient unanimity." "A little wedge has been dexterously introduced, which will, if it be not withdrawn in time, shiver our beloved Society to pieces." He thinks those Friends who believe that a serious error has been made in appointing the Committee, should clearly show that they are not in unity with what has been done; and adds, "It appears to some of us as though we could not, at present, cordially join in any of our meetings, except in those for worship."

L. R. writes on the same subject as follows: "Many of those who were designated by some of the speakers as 'Friends of tender minds, or tender spirits,' felt grieved that a subject involving such important issues, and fraught with what may yet prove very serious results to the Society, should have been pressed through the meeting as this was, against the deliberate and expressed judgment of many Friends of weight and character."

We make these quotations from the British Friend, that our readers may see that notwithstanding the discouraging action of London Yearly Meeting, there is still a considerable body of its members who are endeavoring to stay the progress of that departure from the true principles of Friends which has been steadily progressing for years past. The testimony of our Society to the nature of true gospel ministry, as a Divine gift; to its right exercise, as being only under a fresh call and anointing on every occasion; to the necessity of waiting to feel this call and anointing before entering upon ministerial services; and to the importance of having the mind brought under a somewhat similar religious concern before engaging in other duties of a religious nature; in other words, its testimony to the living headship of Christ over his church, is being laid waste in many parts of our Society. While most under our name, it is probable, would hesitate to admit that they no longer believed on these subjects with Friends in the beginning, yet many have had their minds so filled with the desirableness of various kinds of so-called religious work, such as First-day schools, Bible schools, missionary meetings, &c., that they have practically rejected what they theoretically approve. The religious labors of such are performed in their own will and strength, and they cannot truthfully adopt the language of George Fox, "I saw that all was to be done in and by Christ."

There is reason to believe that in many cases this creaturely zeal and activity has led those possessed with it away from a dependence upon Christ, the Head of the Church, in the first place; and then they have endeavored to find Scriptural reasons and arguments to justify their course; so that doctrinal error has followed in the footsteps of practical.

How often have we seen the command of our Saviour to his disciples, "Go ye into all the world and preach the gospel to every creature," referred to as authority for any religious labor of a ministerial character that any one feels inclined to undertake! But this command is no authority to any one living, unless it is renewedly given to him or her by the same Divine Power that then assigned to the apostles their place and service in the Church.

We would be sorry indeed to discourage one from laboring in the Lord's cause; it is as it is his works alone that praise Him, and have little confidence in permanent good results from any services that are not really required by Him. He knows how to promote the spread of his kingdom in the earth farther than we do; and if we are watchful, willing and obedient, we need not fear but that He will make such use of us as best suits his own gracious purposes. Very simple and apparently trivial duties performed under a sense of Divine requisition, and on which blessing from heaven rests, may ultimately be found to have been more effectual in promoting the Lord's cause than far more conspicuous labors which may have attracted much attention and elicited much applause from our fellow-men.

The abundant labors of the early members of our Society, and the large degree of success that attended their efforts to turn men from darkness to light and from the power of Satan to God, had their root in their renunciation of their own will and wisdom, even in religious things, and in their diligent waiting and watching to know the will of the Lord concerning them. Hence their labors were in harmony with the Divine will, and were greatly blessed of Him, without whose help every labor in vain that build. They felt, as expressed by that wise man and skillful laborer in the Gospel, John Churchman, "Our strength, preservation, health and peace stand on our entire subjection to the will of the Lord, whether in silence or speaking, suffering or reigning, still dwelling with the Seed, Christ, in our own hearts; humbly waiting and feeling after his power, who is the resurrection and the life, and when He is pleased to appear, his children partake in measure his glory."

We have received a copy of the printed minutes of a Yearly Meeting for Canada, held at Pickering from the 23rd to 27th of the 6th month. It is one of those sometimes called a distinction, the Smaller Bodies. Adam Spencer acted as Clerk. Epistles were received from Western, Iowa and Kansas Yearly Meetings, and replies sent thereto—these four bodies being officially in correspondence. A proposition from the Meeting for Sufferings of the Western Yearly Meeting that the four meetings should act in harmony in the admission of other bodies into their circle, was voted with. It was concluded to grant returning certificates only to those strangers present who came from meetings with which they were in correspondence; we understand the ground that in respect to other bodies the Meeting was not in a situation to act officially.

The Minute of Advice contains the following paragraph on plainness, which shows that these Friends are disposed to maintain the testimony of the Society on this subject, which has been much set aside by many under our name: "The injunctions in our discipline to plainness of speech, behavior and apparel, as they have been heeded, have proved to be a salutary hedge to the young and inexperienced, and served as a protection to tender plants, to profess to be Friends. We make such profession openly. The dress and address which is known to belong to the Friend, is becoming such a profession. When any devotee in these respects, the thought is presented to beholders that such are not faithful to their profession, or have left their first principles. May it be our abiding concern to present an example before the world and our children, representing the beauty of holiness,—to 'abstain from all appearance of evil.'"

From private sources we learn that those in attendance were comforted in a belief that the Lord's presence was to be felt among them.

SUMMARY OF EVENTS.

UNITED STATES.—The President having vetoed the River and Harbor bill, both Houses of Congress passed the bill over the veto, and it is now a law.

Congress, on Seventh-day, passed all the remaining regular appropriation bills. The Knit Goods bill was taken up in the Senate and passed as it came from the House. In the House, the Senate amendments to the bill for the inspection of foreign steamers carrying passengers from United States ports were concurred in. The joint resolutions for an investigation of the loss of the Jennette and for a joint select committee to investigate the condition and needs of the American shipping interest were passed.

The President has nominated General U. S. Grant and William Henry Trescott to negotiate a commercial treaty with Mexico. The nominations have been confirmed by the Senate.

Secretary Folger estimates that the amount of the offers for the exchange of bonds for the new three per cents, received at the Treasury Department will exceed $200,000,000.

The total amount of sugar duties refunded by the Treasury Department under the recent decision of the Supreme Court, up to 8th mo. 1st, has been $1,461,525.

The total value of the foreign commerce of the United States during the fiscal year ending 6th mo. 30th last, including both imports and exports of merchandise and specie, amounted to $1,566,859,456, against $1,675,024,318 during the preceding fiscal year—showing a decrease of $108,164,862. During the last fiscal year there was an excess of exports over imports of gold and silver coin and bullion, amounting to $6,940,186, against an excess of imports over exports during the preceding year of $91,168,650.

The number of immigrants who arrived in the United States during the year ending 6th month 30th last, was 789,003, an increase of 119,572 on the number for the preceding fiscal year.

Indian Agent Miles telegraphed to the Commissioner of Indian Affairs from Reno, in the Indian Territory, under date of the 5th inst., that Indians from that and the Kiowa Agency "had bought breech-loading guns of the best patterns from traders at Caldwell, Kansas," and he asks "what course shall be pursued to prevent such dangerous practice?" The Commissioner says that every effort will be made to correct such abuses.

Two factions of the Creek nation, in the Indian Territory, are in active hostility. Several men have been killed, and the trouble has almost assumed the dimensions of a civil strife.

The forest fires in Michigan have been nearly all extinguished by the rain. Since the previous report two farmers were burned out near East Tawas, and considerable cedar and pine timber was destroyed.

The steamship Vandalia, which arrived at New York on Second-day from Hamburg, reports having passed seven icebergs during her voyage, "the smallest of which must have been 100 feet in height."

Several cases of "suspicious sickness" on the schooner Henrietta, from Matamoras, in quarantine at Galveston, have developed into yellow fever, and one of the sick men has died. Eighteen new cases of yellow fever and one death were reported in Brownsville, Texas, during the twenty-four hours ending First-day. The mayor has been sick of the disease. In Matamoras, Mexico, the number of deaths has reached 7. There is an increase in the number of cases, but no figures are given.

There were 540 deaths in Philadelphia for the week ending 8th mo. 5th; 398 was the number for the corresponding week of last year. The number of males was 261, females 279; 255 were two years old or younger; 151 died of cholera infantum, 37 of consumption, 37 of marasmus, 19 of inflammation of stomach and bowels, 16 of cholera morbus, 10 of sunstroke, and 10 of diphtheria.

Markets, &c.—U. S. 3½'s, 101½ a 101¾; 4½'s, registered, 113¾; coupon, 114¾; 4's, 120¾; currency 6's, 133.

Cotton remains about the same as last quoted. Sales of middlings are reported at 13½ a 13¾ cts. per lb. for uplands and New Orleans.

Petroleum.—Standard white, 6¾ cts. for export, and 7¾ cts. per gallon for home use.

Flour is in limited request at former rates. Sales of 2500 barrels, including Minnesota extras, at $4 25 a $5 for sour; $5.50 a $6 for clear, and $6.25 a $6.75 for straight; Pennsylvania extra family at $5.15 a $5.50; western do. do. at $6 a $6.35, and patents at $7 a $8.

Grain.—Wheat was a fraction higher. Sales of 7600 bushels new Southern at $1.10 a $1.16, the latter for long berry amber; $1.14½ was bid for the present month. Rye is nominal. Corn is in fair demand and steady. Sales of 8500 bushels, including yellow, at 91 cts.; mixed, at 90 a 90½ cts.; steamer at 89 cts.; No. 3 at 88 a 88½ cts. Oats.—Local lots are higher, while options rule steady. Sales of 9500 bushels, including new at 61 a 66 cts.; old white, at 70 a 71 cts., and do. rejected mixed at 66 a 67 cts.

Hay and Straw Market, for week ending 8th mo. 5th, 1882.—Loads of hay, 223; loads of straw, 42. Average price during the week—Prime timothy, 95 cts. to $1.10 per 100 pounds; mixed, 85 cts. to 95 cts. per 100 pounds; straw, 55 to 65 cts. per 100 pounds.

Beef cattle were in good demand at an advance: 3700 head arrived and sold at the different yards at 4½ a 8½ cts. per pound, as to quality.

Sheep were firmly held and in demand: 12,000 head arrived and sold at the different yards at 3½ a 5½ cts. per lb. as to condition.

Hogs were in fair demand: 3000 head arrived and sold at the different yards at 11½ a 12½ cts. per lb., as to quality.

FOREIGN.—The steamer Arab with Cetewayo, the captured South African King, on board has arrived in the Thames.

The Times, in a forecast of the English harvest, says: "Wheat will not nearly amount to a fair average crop, that is, it will be no better than for the last five years. Barley promises rather less than an average yield. Oats are good."

In the House of Commons, Gladstone, replying to W. E. Courley, said that the Government had ascertained that De Lesseps, in protesting against the landing of British troops on the property of the Suez Canal Company, acted solely as a private individual. It was not thought necessary, therefore, to take any steps regarding his so-called protest. The only matter to be considered with advantage in regard to the Canal, he said, is the condition that it shall remain open, which it does.

On the 1st inst. in the House of Lords, on report of the Arrears bill from Committee of the Whole, various amendments of minor importance were proposed, some of which were adopted. The bill then passed its third reading, and will be returned to the House of Commons.

One of the amendments—that introduced by the Duke of Abercorn—makes it compulsory for the Land Commission, under the circumstances set forth in the first clause of the bill, to order the payment of half the antecedent arrears.

After attacking the House of Lords as being an unrepresentative Chamber, the London Daily News says it hopes the Lords will give way in their opposition to the Arrears of Rent bill and shrink from the responsibilities of obstinacy.

The Daily News declares that the country will do well to ask itself how far the existence of the House of Lords in its present shape is consistent with the interests of the realm.

The fears in regard to the failure of the water supply in Alexandria have subsided.

On the afternoon of the 4th inst. a reconnoissance in force was made from Alexandria to the Mabella Junction. An engagement took place with the forces of Arabi Pasha, who were driven to a point on the Mahmoudieh Canal and suffered considerable loss. The English loss is reported at 4 who were killed and 29 wounded.

The rebels are retrenching between Aboukir and Ramleh on the western bank of Mahmoudieh Canal, close to the point to which they were driven last week.

The town of Suez has been occupied by the British. The telegraph office has been reopened.

A despatch from Port Said to Reuter's Telegraph Company says: British men-of-war strongly occupy the Suez Canal here, at Ismailia and at Suez. All Europeans have left Suez. Only four French men-of-war remain in Egyptian waters.

In consequence of a telegram received from de Lesseps, at Ismailia, the Suez Canal Company has passed a special resolution declaring that, as the Khedive could not authorize the making of the Suez Canal without the sanction of the Sultan, he has no power to interfere with it.

The Khedive has written to Ragheb Pasha that he considered it incumbent upon his Government to give notice, without delay, of its intention to indemnify the sufferers from the disorders at Alexandria, without distinction of nationality, in some manner compatible with the resources of the country.

The Turkish delegates to the Conference accepted the conditions proposed by the Powers in their invitations to the Porte to intervene in Egypt.

The London Times says it believes it represents the matured opinion of the nation in protesting against the Turks being permitted to come to Egypt, no matter what the restrictions to which they may ultimately consent.

Dervisch Pasha and Server Pasha have sailed for Egypt. The Council of Ministers have given instructions to Server Pasha.

El Jawaib states that Arabi's troops will submit to Dervisch Pasha immediately upon the arrival of the Turkish troops in Egypt.

Cairo, 8th mo. 3rd.—The official rebel journal has published the decision of the great national meeting held on Seventh-day. After considering the different decrees emanating from the Khedive, including the order dismissing Arabi Pasha from the office of Minister of War, the meeting declared that, in consequence of the occupation of Alexandria by foreign troops, the presence of the English squadron in Egyptian waters, and the attitude of Arabi Pasha in repulsing the enemy, Arabi Pasha must be upheld as Minister of War, and that the orders of the Khedive and his Ministers in Alexandria were null and void, as the Khedive acted contrary to religious and civil laws.

The Under-Secretaries of State were intrusted to submit this decision to the Sultan. The decision is signed by the Princes Ibrahim, Asmed and Kamil, seven princes of the Yeghen family, the Sheikh of El Azhar Mosque, the mnfts of the four Sunnite rites, the Grand Cadi of Egypt, the Coptic Patriarch, nine various vicars and sheikhs, thirty judges, eight under-secretaries, twenty-eight civil pashas, including Beni, twelve mudirs and one hundred notabilities of various religious denominations.

The new French Cabinet is officially announced as follows:

Duclerc, President of the Council and Minister of Foreign Affairs; Fallieres, Minister of the Interior; Develle, Under-Secretary of the Interior; Deves, Minister of Justice; Davaur, Minister of Public Instruction; Tirard, Minister of Finance; General Billot, Minister of War; Admiral Jaureguiberry, Minister of Marine; Cochery, Minister of Posts and Telegraphs; De Mahy, Minister of Agriculture; Pierre Legrand, Minister of Commerce and ad interim of Public Works.

De Freycinet has countersigned the appointment of Senator Duclerc as President of the Council and Minister of Foreign Affairs. The new Ministers will assemble at the Elysée.

Paris, 8th mo. 7th.—Duclerc will read a declaration in both Chambers on Third-day regarding foreign affairs. He will state that the new Ministry do not wish to revert to the past; that they accept the vote of the Chamber of Deputies on the Egyptian credit, and desire the maintenance of peace; and should any incident occur compromising the dignity of France they will forthwith convolve the Legislature to concert with it upon measures necessary under the circumstances. Regarding home affairs, he will state that the new Cabinet take the vote of the Chamber as the basis of their policy.

Fifty houses and a wooden bridge have been burned on the Krestovsky Island, in the Neva, one of the islands on which St. Petersburg is built.

The Novoe Vremya says that Engineer Melville and seamen Noros and Ninderman, of the Jeanette's crew, have arrived at Tobolsk. They believe that Lieutenant Chipp and his companions perished in a snow storm.

An official despatch from Manilla reports that cholera is increasing in Japan.

The Mexican revenues for the last fiscal year amounted to $27,500,000—an increase of $4,500,000 compared with those of the preceding year.

There were 34 deaths from yellow fever in Havana up to Fifth-day evening during the past week. The Secretary of the Government, Senor Diaz Quintana, is now sick with the fever. It is reported that drought has destroyed nearly the whole corn crop in the jurisdiction of Remedios.

Another large establishment for counterfeiting silver coin has been discovered and suppressed. It was located in Remedios and had a branch in a neighboring village. There are indications that the counterfeiters operated jointly with those lately arrested in Havana. The authorities believe that a large amount of spurious coin has already been sent from the island.

A telegram from Montreal says that Dennis Dinceen, a farmer, near that city, "is about to sue the Society for the Prevention of Cruelty to Animals, for having imported sparrows. He declares that they have already eaten up thirty acres of barley, destroyed his potatoes, and, in general, made havoc with his early vegetables. He estimates the number of sparrows on his land at 5000."

The army worm is reported to be doing great damage in New Brunswick, at Mangerville and in its vicinity.

A telegram from Victoria, British Columbia, says that a large influx of Chinese is feared there, in consequence of the anti-Chinese law going into force in the United States. Several vessels have sailed from Hong Kong for American ports, but their destinations have been changed to Victoria.

RECEIPTS.

Received from Jno. M. Saunders, N. J. $2.10, vol. 56; from Benjamin H. Lightfoot, Pa., $2.10, vol. 56, and for Daniel Koll, O., $2.10, vol. 56; for Joshua Warrington, Ark., Louise Thorp, N. C., and Anne Eyre, N. J., $3.15 each, to No. 52, vol. 56; for Phebe S. Gavthrop, Pa., $1.05, to No. 52, vol. 55; for Judith Mendenhall, N. C., $2.62, to No. 52, vol. 56; and for Benajah Carter, Aaron Shaw, Susannah Carter, Eleazer Carter, Hannah Frazier, John Bales, William Bales, Sanford Frazier, Evan Hadley, Jonathan Newman and Abel Stanley, Ind., 42 cents each, to No. 52, vol. 55; from David J. Brown, Gtn., $2.10, vol. 56; from Samuel P. Leeds, N. J., $2.10, vol. 56; from Martha Mickle, N. J., $2.10, vol. 56, and for Sarah L. Mickle, $2.10, vol. 56; from Phebe C. Parker, Pa., $2.10, vol. 56; from John Carey, O., $2.10, vol. 56, and for Lewis Johnson, Jordan Ballard, Cornelius Douglass, Joseph Stanton, David H. Miller and Joseph Hare, $2.10 each, vol. 56; from Phebe J. Stedman, Kansas, per Thomas Lamborn, $2.10, vol. 56; from George Brinton, Pa., $2.10, vol. 56; from Benjamin Bowerman, Mich., $2.10, vol. 56; from Rebecca Kaighn, for Amos Evens, Joseph K. Evens, and J. Trimble Zook, N. J., and William T. Zook, Pa., $2.10 each, vol. 56; from Samuel F. Troth, City, $2, vol. 56; from Edward Bailey, Pa., $2.10, vol. 56; from Beulah Garrigues, Pa., $2.10, vol. 56; from Joseph Bailey, Joseph L. Bailey, Sarah Whitacre and Comly B. Shoemaker, Pa., $2.10 each, vol. 56; from George W. Brown, City, $2, vol. 56; from Hannah Eastlack, N. J., $2.10, vol. 56; from Ann W. Fry, City, $2, vol. 56, and for Deborah Woolman, City, $1.05, to No. 27, vol. 56, George Wright, City, $2, vol. 56, and Susanna R. Leeds, N. J., and William B. Hartz, Pa., $2.10 each, vol. 56; from Alice M. Fowler, N. J., $2.10, vol. 56; from Lydia Lee and Margaret E. Lee, Pa., $2.10 each, vol. 56; from Thomas Llewellyn, O., $2.10, vol. 56; from Isaac P. Wilbur, Mass., $2.10, vol. 56, and for Mary Booth, Elizabeth H. Eddy, and Mary A. Gardner, $2.10 each, vol. 56; from Emma A. Stapler, Del., $2.10, vol. 56; from Charles L. Willits, N. J., $2.10, vol. 56; from Jane B. Smith, Pa., $2.10, vol. 56; from Jonathan Chace, R. I., $2.10, vol. 56; from Rebecca Hornor, City, $2.05, vol. 56, and for Jane P. Cox, N. J., and Lydia M. Tucker, Pa., $2.10 each, vol. 56; from John Warner and Matilda W. Warner, Pa., $2.10 each, vol. 56; from Anna Thomas and Howard A. Mickle, N. J., per Richard Mott, $2.10 each, vol. 56; from Lewis Passmore, Pa., $2.10, vol. 56, and for Mary Ann Sharpless, $2.10, vol. 56; from Edith Sharpless, City, $2, vol. 56; from David Darnell, N. J., $2.10, vol. 56; from Isaiah Kirk, Pa., $2.10, vol. 56; from Joseph J. Hopkins, Pa., $2.10, vol. 56; from William Windle, Pa., $2.10, vol. 56; from Elizabeth Marriott, N. Y., $2.10, vol. 56; from Elizabeth D. Meredith, Pa., $2.10, vol. 56, and for Sallie T. Hoopes, $2.10, vol. 56; from Israel Morris, City, $2, vol. 56; from Samuel A. Bacon, Pa., $2.10, vol. 56; from Anna W. Hooton, N. J., $2.10, vol. 56; from William J. Evans, N. J., $2.10, vol. 56; from Lettice Evans, N. J., $2.10, vol. 56; from Isaac Moore, Pa., $2.10, vol. 56; from E. S. Deats, N. J., $2.10, vol. 56; from David J. Scott, Pa., $2.10, vol. 56, and for Ann Scott, $2.10, vol. 56; from Mary Ann Bacon, Gtn., $2.10, vol. 56; from Emeline E. Hilyard, N. J., $2.10, vol. 56; from Thomas Woolman, City, $2, vol. 56, and for Eliza W. Reeves, $2, vol. 56; from John W. Biddle, City, $2, vol. 56, and for William Biddle, Samuel Biddle, George Jones and Samuel Mason, $2 each, vol. 56, and for Clarkson Sheppard, Pa., Joshua C. Smith, Md., and Jonas Edge, Kansas, $2.10 each, vol. 56; from Mahlon Moon, Pa., $2.10, vol. 56, and for William H. Moon, Charles Moon and James E. Tatnall, Pa., and William Tatnall, Del., $2.10 each, vol. 56; from Alfred King, Agent, N. Y., $2.10, vol.

56, and for Gilbert Weaver, William R. Hazard, Persi E. Hallock, Samuel G. Cook, Lydia C. Hoag, Georg Hoag, Nicholas D. Tripp, Hepsibeth C. Hussey, William R. Taber and Mary Ann Simpkin, N. Y., and Nathan Cook, Pa., $2.10 each, vol. 56; from Joshua Brantingham, Agent, O., for Charles Cope, Benjamin Kite, John Hoyle, Christiana Kirk, and Barton Dean, $2.10 each, vol. 56; for Charles W. Warrington, City, $2, vol. 56; from Rachel F. Parker, Pa., $2.10, vol. 56; from Clayton Hancock, N. J., $2.10, vol. 56; from Charles Stokes, Agent, N. J., for Henry W. Wills, Joshua S. Wills, Joseph H. Haines, Clayton Haines, Joseph Evans, George Lippincott, M. S. & E. P. Allen, Levi Troth, Esther S. Prickett, and Rachel L. Atkinson, $2.10 each, vol. 56, and for N. Reece Whitacre, $3.15 to No. 52, vol. 56; from Anna Pickering, City, $2, vol. 56; from Mary E. Dickinson, Pa., $2.10, vol. 56; from Thomas Wilbur, N. Y., $2.10, vol. 56; from James Mulsby, Agent, Ind., for William T. Hadley, Jesse Osborn, John Bales, Joel Hodson, James Kersey and Mary Ann Osborn, $2.10 each, vol. 56; from Dr. Stephen Wood, L. L., $2, vol. 56; from Joshua T. Ballinger, Agent, Pa., for Rebecca Austin, Gilbert Cope, Marshall Fell, Jane Gibbons, S. D. Gray, Ralston R. Hoopes, Mary A. Newlin, Rachel McClain, Dr. George Martin, Esther H. Mendenhall, George E. Pim, Mary H. Parke, Sarah Pennell, Ann M. Pratt, Rachel N. Phillips, Sarah C. Passmore, Charles W. Roberts, James C. Roberts, Martha Sankey, S. Emlen Sharpless, Joseph Scattergood, Eusebius H. Townsend, Jesse P. Thatcher, Enos E. Thatcher, Elizabeth S. Thomas, Susanna S. Thomas, Charles L. Warner, Anna A. Warner, Thomas R. Warner, Philena S. Yarnall, $2.10 each, vol. 56; from Amy Borton, N. J., $2.10, vol. 56, and for Ezra H. Brown, Clayton H. Haines, Naomi B. Haines and John G. Haines, $2.10 each, vol. 56; from Mary J. Stokes, N. J., $2.10, vol. 56.

Remittances received after Fourth-day morning will not appear in the Receipts until the following week.

NOTICE.

A Friends' Meeting is arranged to be held at Beach Haven, N. J., on every First-day in the Eighth and Ninth months of this year, under the care of Burlington Quarterly Meeting.

NOTICE TO TEACHERS, PARENTS AND OTHERS.

The Yearly Meeting's Committee on Education have placed a book at Friends' Book Store, No. 304 Arch St. Philadelphia, where applications from teachers wishing situations, and committees who desire to employ teachers among Friends, may be recorded.

Please give address, and full particulars.
ELLISTON P. MORRIS, Clerk.

MARRIED, at Friends' Meeting-house, Winona, Col. Co., Ohio, 5th mo. 26th, 1882, ELLISHA, son of Thomas Llewellyn, of Penusville, Morgan county, Ohio, and ABIGAIL, daughter of the late Benjamin D., and Ellen Stratton of the former place.

DIED, Fourth mo. 2nd, 1882, at the residence of her son-in-law, Elias Thorne, Skaneateles, Onondago Co. N. Y., LOIS LOSSING, in the 74th year of her age, widow of Benson Lossing, of Norwich, Canada. She bore her severe sickness of two weeks with great patience, and spoke of her Heavenly Father's presence with her, and that He had promised to go with her through the valley and shadow of death.

—, at the residence of her son-in-law, John Carey Clinton Co., Ohio, on the 25th day of 5th month, 1882 CHARLOTTE LUNDEY, in the 80th year of her age, member of Wilmington Monthly Meeting of Friends. She was concerned for the upholding of the precious doctrines and testimonies of our Society, and bore a faithful protest against the innovations that of latter years have been introduced.

—, 5th mo. 27th, 1882, at his residence, Columbus N. J., GEORGE I. KASHNER, in the 69th year of his age, a member of Mansfield Monthly Meeting of Friends. He bore his protracted sufferings with Christian patience and resignation, and his friends have the comforting belief that his end was peace.

—, at her residence in Media, Pa., 6th mo. 9th 1882, HARRIET J. SMEDLEY, widow of the late Wm Smedley, in the 86th year of her age, a member of Media Preparative and Chester Monthly Meeting, Pa. The closing years of her long and useful life were marked by a quiet peaceful trust and confidence in being admitted into the Heavenly Kingdom through the merits of the Redeemer.

THE FRIEND.

A RELIGIOUS AND LITERARY JOURNAL.

VOL. LVI.

SEVENTH-DAY, EIGHTH MONTH 19, 1882.

NO. 2.

PUBLISHED WEEKLY.

Price, if paid in advance, $2.00 per annum; if not paid in advance $2.50; 10 cents extra is charged for Postage on those sent by mail.

Articles designed for insertion to be addressed to

JOSEPH WALTON,
MOORESTOWN, BURLINGTON CO., N. J.

Subscriptions, payments and business communications, received by
JOHN S. STOKES,

AT NO. 116 NORTH FOURTH STREET, UP STAIRS,
PHILADELPHIA.

For "The Friend."

Wanderings South and East.

(Continued from page 2.)

SANDWICH ISLANDS.

The most interesting natural features of these islands are the volcanoes. On the Island of Maui, at the height of 10,000 feet, is situated the extinct volcano of Haleakala, which has been quiescent since the Hawaiian story began. The crater is 2000 feet deep, 10 miles across and 4 miles wide. As W. Wootte and his company stood on the crater's edge, they threw great boulders of the hardened lava down the chasm, and saw them break into dusty fragments below. He says: "It was a cold, cheerless, uncanny place—can you conceive what a hole 28 square miles in area, and 2000 feet in depth, looks like? It is not earthly, but an utterly fearful and awful sight."

The crater of Kilanea always shows some signs of activity. It lies on the side of the great volcano of Mauna Loa. "The mountain itself is 13,600 feet high, and its summit is sixty miles from the sea; the main vent, however, of its inward fires is at the crater of Kilanea thirty miles from Hilo on the mountain slope.

"The crater at the summit is smaller than its vent-hole in the side, and is only active on grand occasions, such as during the eruption of 1868, when, as always on the occurrence of an eruption, it discharged the volumes of lava, there being no greater disturbance at Kilanea than the sinking of the floor of that crater some eight hundred to a thousand feet. "There is a bridle trail across the thirty miles that separated us from the object of our visit, and along this we made the best of our way in the early morning. Our track lay for some miles through a sort of scanty jungle, then into a piece of dense and lonely forest, then out upon an almost barren wilderness of lava. The wealth of vegetation in the forest is simply wonderful. We rode under great ferns, not tree ferns, thirty feet high, and every turn of the trail disclosed fresh glories, lovely creepers, and great glowing flowers, and broad green leaves."

"After a day's rest, in which we wandered round the crater's edge, and visited great sulphur beds, and steamed ourselves, Russian bath-wise, over little vent-holes, and gazed across the terrible abyss, we prepared for a descent.

"After descending the pathway down the crater's side, which is steep and dangerous, we commenced the weary trudge across the lava plain. This plain resembles more nearly than anything else I can think of, a short chop sea solidified; the lava is exactly like hard pitch, but the surface is not as level as a sea, bearing traces of fearful squeezes, and being in one place bent up into a great ridge.

"As we advanced the lava became slightly warm, and hot sulphurous air arose from the crevices. Here and there were places where molten streams had forced their way through from beneath, and were rolling slowly across the surface; and now and then we would pass a cone or vent-hole covered with a brilliant yellow crust of sulphur. At last, after some two to three miles of hard walking, we commenced a slight ascent of a hundred feet, and found ourselves upon the edge of the lake of fire.

"I hope my description conveys clearly the nature of this crater. First the great hole or 'crater' proper, say twelve or thirteen square miles in area, and eight hundred feet in depth. The floor of this, a cracked and broken lava sea, covering as a crust, the liquid fire below. Then in the centre of this, an open cauldron upon the edge of which we now were standing.

"The lake of fire was at the time of our visit divided by a lava ridge, and only one of the divisions was accessible, but upon the very edge of this, and within say fifty feet of its seething surface we could stand.

"I cannot describe to any satisfaction this spectacle. It is, I think, the most impressive of the world's sights. There lay the lake below us, Hale-mau-man it is called, 'the House of Everlasting Fire'—a burning lake more than five hundred by two hundred feet. Beyond, a ridge, and then another lake somewhat larger, but hidden in fiery spray and smoke.

"The surface as we first found it was covered with an ash-colored scum, and the whole cauldron was heaving intermittently as though threatening an outburst.

"In a short time an active panting begins and the scum parts and the pure liquid fire is hurled high into the air, and falls a golden shower. To this succeeds a beautiful geyser, and to that again six or eight others, until the whole lake is spouting and roaring fearfully. From these fountains waves extend and meeting other waves they rage and toss across the lake, now flinging themselves against the rock-like lava sides, now hurling their whole force into the caverns opposite, and tearing themselves ruthlessly into a thousand jets and sprays, with a weird lashing sound, staining the lake's wall blood-red, and lighting the whole sky with crimson spray. Then for a time succeeds a lull, the ash-like scum begins to form again, and we advance nearer, and wait for what shall come next. The whole soft-heaving scum begins in a few minutes to move slowly from east to west. Then great seams form across the surface, which breaking in, give place to molten waves, and the western end towards which these waves are moving, seeming to resent the onslaught, lashes itself fiercely against the lava rocks. And now to right and left, and here and everywhere the golden geysers play again, and we, quite awe-stricken, shrink back a yard or two.

"We stood for many hours on the thin crust-like edge and watched, unable to take our eyes away lest we should miss some grander spectacle. The sun fell down behind the high crater walls, and a dull, threatening darkness enveloped the whole place. If the sight had been weird and wonderful in the broad daylight, what of it in the black night some hours later? Let us try and picture that scene unequalled, I maintain, amongst the world's wonders.

"From the high storm-tossed lava crags above the lake streamed a sulphurous cloud of steam and smoke. Let us picture this as it holds the changing shades of orange, red and gold reflected from the cauldron at our feet. Let us remember it as with a thousand-fold iridescence of reflected light it curls and wreathes itself across the sky. On every glittering spangle of the sulphurous stream there shines the soft and ever-varying light, now brilliant as the sunshine as some more than ever high-reaching geyser flings its fires aloft, now softly luminous as the great source of light grows slowly more dim; that smoke curling across the sky contains, alone, beauties worth all the labors of our journey. What then of the fire itself? what of the gently-breathing crust, the slowly-moving blood-red waves? what, still more, of the angry caverns by the lake's edge, and the mighty storm-tossed waves—waves of fire from whose jagged crests were blown far-reaching streams of fiery spray? What of the strange noises that issued from that subterranean sea? How weird in the still night? How wild and unutterably fearful when no other light was there, but of that very sea itself!

"The lake beyond the ridge added to all these terrors. It seemed, I think, even more fearful to us than the one we saw. The strangest of noises came from there, boomings as of cannon, and shrill loud cracks, and now, as from some distant gala scene, a jet of spray like rockets was hurled high into the air with unspeakable magnificence, against the coal-black sky.

"After many hours we turned our backs upon the furious and infernal lake. The return journey across the lava was intensely tedious and nervous work. From all those cracks that we had crossed, there now shone a dull light, and any false step almost would have been attended with severe burning. Our guide led us cautiously along with utmost skill, we stumbling and struggling in his footsteps.

"Soon we passed by a lava stream, and watched it creeping slowly across the cooler crust. It felt soft and spongy as we thrust in our sticks. At times we would pass some wider crevice, and peering down would see the molten stream below running harmlessly. On again over the broken lava-crust with its blood-red cracks, and strange, unearthly fires shooting from curiously-shaped holes. The distance seemed endless, and we were almost exhausted when our guide pointed upwards to a small speck of light looking like a single star in the dark sky. It was a lantern on the rim of the crater above, showing us where the path lay. So with infinite fatigue we reached the lava's edge, and clambered up the steep ascent to the comfortable inn, most thankful for our safety."

The Sandwich Island people were generally converted to Christianity under the teaching of American missionaries, but there as elsewhere, the foreign influence is predominant, and the natives are being supplanted by Europeans and Americans. Our author speaks highly of the zeal and courage shown by the pioneers of Christianity in these islands, but he queries, "Can the natives now live honest and prosperous lives? Can they bring up their children to maturity, and start their sons in life, and so increase both the wealth and numbers of their community? Can they, in short, advance, not only as individuals, but as a nation?" As an answer to these questions, he says, "But a century ago there were 400,000 souls to reclaim; now there are barely 40,000; and in another half-century there will be in such great proportion the fewer. It is the old, old tale; the savage race not being reclaimed to civilization, but being surely and rapidly civilized off the face of the earth. The natives will lessen in numbers every year, the Americans and Europeans will increase. Our children will probably see the Hawaiian group a mere outlying state or territory of the Union, peopled by a sugar-growing and store-keeping community." "We sailed away from Honolulu, with no too cheerful thoughts concerning the future of these poor people."

The love of flowers is a national trait. "In the streets of Honolulu, or in the smallest villages of Hawaii, you see neither girls nor men without their wreaths of flowers." "Poi" is the universal food, and is prepared from the root of the 'taru,' a sort of sweet potato. After the vegetable is baked it is pounded by a heavy stone pestle, then mixed with water until a thick paste is made, after which it is left to ferment a little, thereby acquiring a bitter taste. The most curious sight connected with 'poi' is that of the mothers feeding their children. It is really not disgusting, although it may sound so. The mother takes a finger full of poi, and perhaps a bit of fish, screwing them together round in her mouth. The little urchin holds up its face as though for a kiss, the mother stoops down, both their mouths wide open and close together, the mother's tongue is thrust quickly out, and the urchin, smilingly satisfied, swallows the dose—all done with a neatness and cleanliness quite marvellous."

(To be continued.)

"People must have entertainment," they urge. I do not find that must in the Bible, but I do find, "We must all stand before the judgment seat of Christ."

For "The Friend."

Desultory Selections and Pencillings.

THE CULTIVATION OF MUSIC.

It has been well put forth, that the sin of habitually yielding, or the grace of habitually resisting, in comparatively small points—in the smaller virtues or the lesser sins—tends in no inconsiderable degree to produce that vigor or that debility of mind, on which hangs victory or defeat. We would apply this to the cultivation of music; believing its indulgence to be one of those things accounted small, but whereby the natural mind may be gratified, while at the same time the quick perception of spiritual instruction may be weakened. That it is a merely sensual, and not an intellectual amusement, much less a profitable or spiritual entertainment, who can doubt? While no Christian musician is recorded in the whole of the New Testament, some of the prophets, under a less perfect dispensation, unmistakably censure and condemn indulgence therein as wantonness. Thus, says one, "They chant to the sound of the viol, and invent to themselves instruments of music, like David; but they are not grieved for the affliction of Joseph." And another denounces a woe in the language:—"The harp, and the viol, the tabret, and pipe, and wine, are in their feasts; but they regard not the work of the Lord, neither consider the operation of his hands."

The writer is abundantly persuaded, that the indulgence in music now pleaded for, practised and taught by our members in some places, is but an associated out-growth with many others, of the novel doctrines, the lowered practices, the relaxed Quaker principles now so painfully prevalent. He is assured that, had inward and reverent waiting upon God for the influences of his Holy Spirit, to teach and guide in the good old ways of filial dependence, of simplicity and self-denial, of truth and holiness, been kept to, we should have been preserved from sacrificing to this bewitching idol and "lust of the flesh;" and thence walking by the same rule and minding the same thing as did our early Friends, we should, instead of compromising with the spirit of the world, have been enabled to manifest that we "are not of the world," even as our holy Leader declared of his immediate disciples. Oh! the care that is necessary in this day of ease and liberty, lest the testimony of "The Amen, the faithful and true Witness," to the angel of the church of Laodicea be forthcoming. For is it not through lukewarmness, and the neglect of a diligent waiting upon the Lord and a watching unto prayer with all perseverance, that declensions from the life and power of godliness gradually creep in, as in the case of the fleshly soothing beguilement now under consideration?

It was in view of the general strong current of innovation so setting in upon our time-and-Truth-honored testimonies, that allusion was made to Laodicea. Nevertheless, even to that lapsed or apostate church was the encouraging language held out: "To him that overcometh will I grant to sit with me on my throne, even as I also overcame, and am set down with my Father in his throne."

Under the head of "Gaming and Diversions," the Discipline of Philadelphia Yearly Meeting thus bears its testimony against music: "We would renewedly caution all our members against indulging in music, or having instruments of music in their houses, believing that the practice tends to promote a light and vain mind, and to disqualify for the serious thoughtfulness, which becomes an accountable being, hastening to his final reckoning. When we consider that our days pass swiftly away, and that our time is one of the talents committed to our trust, for the employment of which we shall have to render an account in the day of judgment, it becomes us to be living as strangers and pilgrims upon earth, seeking a better country, and to be diligently using it for the great end for which it is lent to us, even in working out the soul's salvation in fear and trembling, and not in vain amusements or corrupting pleasures, but striving that 'whether we eat or drink, or whatsoever we do, we may do all to the glory of God;' that 'God in all things may be glorified by us, through Jesus Christ our Lord.'"

"The spirit and language of the discipline forbid the use of music by Friends, without any exception in favor of that called sacred, and in order to produce harmonious action on this subject throughout the subordinate meetings, the Yearly Meeting instructs them, that those members who indulge in the use of music, or who have musical instruments in their houses, * * and are not prevailed with, by private labor to decline them, the Monthly Meetings to which the offenders belong should be informed thereof, and if they be not reclaimed by further labor, so as to condemn their misconduct to the satisfaction of the meeting, it should proceed to testify our disunity with them."

An anonymous writer, on what is called sacred music, thus writes: "Surely no one of ordinary understanding in the present enlightened age, can seriously believe that the sweet sounds proceeding from the inanimate organ, will be appreciated as acceptable worship by Him, who delights in the sacrifices of broken hearts and contrite spirits, even though uttered in the homely language of the poor Publican. Then why is it introduced? Is it not to please the itching ears of degenerated Christian professors? There is nothing in the New Testament, which indicates its use during the time of the apostles, nor indeed, does it appear to have been introduced, until nearly midnight darkness had overspread the church. And it may be useful for Protestants at least to be reminded that the organ was, according to history, first used in public worship, (may we not say, to supply the lack of divinely attuned hearts) by Vitalian, a bishop or pope of Rome, about the year 660. It then became a component part of that half-Jewish, half-heathen robe of gorgeous and imposing ceremonies, with which the Church sought to adorn herself, when she had nearly lost the beautiful garments of purity, simplicity and spirituality, in which she was originally arrayed by her divine Founder.

"There are not wanting, however, those in the present day, who conceive (no doubt sincerely,) that the sublime strains of instrumental music really assist them in their devotions;—that they tend to raise the soul in something like rapturous adoration. But, if these feelings be carefully and candidly analyzed, they will be found to be, at least of very doubtful character. The effect of music on the passions is confessedly great; and this effect may be produced—perhaps in a pre-inent degree—on those who are most under the influence of their passions, or who are the thickest from worshipping or serving God in their lives and conversation. It is therefore quite possible that the feelings alluded to, far from being those of the true worship of the Almighty, may prove on close investigation, to be but a self-gratifying exercise,—a worshipping and serving of the creature, more than of the Creator.* Thus it may even prove to be one of the devices of the grand adversary, to receive the mind of man, and divert it from the performance of true, spiritual, heart-felt worship. Now should this effect be produced, the practice in question becomes a positive evil.

The Bishop of Cambray thus writes on the subject of music: "As for music, it is well known, that the ancients believed nothing more pernicious to a well regulated state, than to suffer an effeminate melody to be introduced into it. It enervates men, and renders their souls soft and voluptuous; languishing strains are only pleasant, because the soul is itself up to the charms of the senses." The gifted Hannah More pleads: "Dare I speak to Christian parents, whether music, which fills up no trifling portion of their daughters' time, does not fill it without any real end, or even without any specific object? Yes, whether some of the favorite songs of dissipated societies are not amatory, are not mere acroatic, more than quite becomes the dearest lips of innocent youth?"

The testimony of one who had delighted in music is, "What then is the tendency of music? To raise those emotions which should be subdued—to weaken our moral sense—to encourage our sinful propensities—and to retard our growth in religion."

Thomas Clarkson in his "Portraiture of Quakerism," represents, "Music does not appear to the Quakers to be productive of elevated thoughts; that is of such thoughts as raise the mind to sublime and spiritual things, untraced from the inclinations, the temper, and the prejudices of the world. It may give raptures for the moment, as strong liquor does; when the effect of the liquor is over, the raptures flag, and the mind is again torpid. It gives no solid encouragement, nor hope, nor prospects. It can afford no anchorage, and which shall hold the mind in a storm. The most melodious sounds, that human instruments can make, are from the earth, and thence they come. But nothing can rise higher than its origin. All true elevation, therefore, can only come, in the opinion of the Quakers, from the Divine source."

The following estimate may give some idea of the cost of music, so far as the piano is concerned: "There are at the present time (1874) according to authentic statistics, 700,000 pianos in use in the United States. The average cost at three hundred dollars each, would amount to over 200,000,000 dollars. This sum would build 200,000 school houses, at an expense of one thousand dollars each—or it would construct the Pacific railroad—or it would provide fine libraries, of about one thousand volumes each, for 200,000 neighborhoods—or it would provide every human being in the world with a cheap Bible or good Testament. Is it not a wise prohibition which has been adopted, of the practice which has led to this enormous extravagance, for a less, not to say worse than useless gratification; while so many are suffering for the necessaries of life, and are growing up in ignorance and darkness, for want of suitable provision to enlighten them? It is now common to find families provided with costly pianos, who when called upon to assist charitable objects, 'cannot afford to;' and the parents 'cannot' buy for their children useful books for intellectual and religious instruction."

For "The Friend."

Westtown Boarding School.

The report made to the Yearly Meeting in 1837, informs that the average number of pupils who have partaken of the benefits of the Institution during the past year, is 231; of whom 102 were boys and 129 girls. "Endeavors are used to impart to the children a knowledge of the principles and testimonies of the Christian religion, as held by our Society; and we believe the introduction of these exercises into the school has been attended with benefit. At the opening of the schools on Second-day morning of every week the pupils recite portions of the Holy Scriptures, which they have committed to memory, and they are also examined on Fifth-days in Barclay's Catechism and Scripture Questions." The teachers frequently read to them from the sacred volume, the approved writings of our Society, or other suitable works; and when collected in the evening, there is generally some appropriate religious reading before they retire to bed."*

While the committee are sensible that difficulties and discouragements have at times attended the management of this interesting concern, they believe there is cause for gratitude to the Author of all good for the degree of success which has attended it, and the benefits which it has been the means of conferring on many of the members of our Society. And they are encouraged in the persuasion that as it is cherished by the Yearly Meeting in a spirit of liberality commensurate with its importance, and conducted with a humble reliance on the Divine blessing and a constant reference to the religious concern for the welfare of the youth, in which it originated, it will continue to be productive of essential advantages.

The fund for the education of the children of those needing assistance in this way, being large, it was suggested that "Friends who may be disposed to encourage this valuable seminary by pecuniary aid, should give their money for general purposes, by which the cause of instruction may be further improved, while the charge for board and tuition may be kept at a moderate price."

In 1830 the great difficulty in most parts of the country to which Friends were subjected in procuring suitable school learning for their children, engaged "the serious consideration and sympathy of the Yearly Meeting." A committee of five Friends out of each Quarterly Meeting was appointed to consider this important subject in all its parts, and if any way should present, to alleviate or lessen the existing difficulties; and to promote this interesting concern, they were desired to report "their views thereon." In the report of this committee, which they state to be their united judgment, after some other suggestions and advice, the following proposition is made: "On considering the present situation of the Boarding School at Westtown, we have agreed to recommend, that in order more widely to spread its usefulness, the price for the board and tuition of children, members of this Yearly Meeting at that seminary, be reduced to $60 per annum." Which report was fully united with by the Yearly Meeting, with the expectation that the diminished charge would not meet the expenditure, and that the deficiency must be supplied by contributions in the Yearly Meeting. The expectation of a loss proved to be correct, amounting in six years to about $18,175.82, which, it is stated, "may properly be said to have been distributed throughout the Yearly Meeting by the Boarding School in furtherance of the important work of education." "The committee have endeavored to conduct the concerns of the Institution with a strict regard to economy, and they believe the sum* agreed to be raised by the Yearly Meeting will be sufficient to relieve the funds from embarrassment."

At a meeting of the committee held Sixth month 9th, 1837, Saml. Bettle, Enoch Lewis, Saml. Hilles, Thomas Evans and Geo. Williams, were appointed to advise with and assist the superintendent and teachers, as occasion may require, in the preservation of order and good government in the school.

At this time several salutary rules were adopted, referring principally to the change proposed to take place in the Tenth month following, of dividing the school year into two sessions, by having vacations in fall and spring, that in the fall to continue two weeks and in the spring three weeks. One of the rules then adopted, and which yet remains to be of importance, is that the "Treasurer and Superintendent be requested to impress upon parents who are about to send children to the school, the necessity of introducing them punctually at the time the session is to commence, as a want of punctuality will materially derange the classification of the pupils, and thus defeat one of the great objects of the change." "That it be recommended to the teachers to meet once in two weeks in company with the Superintendent for mutual improvement, and to confer together on the state of the schools, the course of instruction and the amendments of which it is susceptible; that they communicate in writing to the committee on teachers such views as may from time to time present, relative to the progress of the pupils and the improvement of the system."

"That the duty of attending to the moral and orderly conduct of the pupils during the intervals of school be impressed on the teachers as well as on the governor and governess."

9th mo. 6th. The committee on the boys wash-room, grounds, &c., were authorized "to introduce into the wash-room a suitable fixture for warming the collecting-room and meeting-room with heated air, if on due investigation they should be satisfied of the expediency of doing so."

He who indulges in enmity is like one who throws ashes to windward, which come back to the same place and cover him all over.

Your "few things" may be very few, and very small things, but He expects you to be faithful over them.

* The reading in collection before retiring for night is now confined to portions of the Holy Scriptures.

* Believed to be $10,000.

For "The Friend."

"Without Me ye can do nothing." John xv. 5.

How true these words spoken by our Saviour, formerly, and even to every one that is brought by Him to the light—the inward light. How utterly incapable we are even to have our minds to dwell on any thing that is good, without his help. We are dependent on Him for all our supplies, both in temporal and spiritual things. But we read in the Scriptures of truth, "Seek, and ye shall find; knock, and it shall be opened unto you." So that when desires are raised in us to be in this seeking state, then He will, in his own time, dispense his favors unto us; but we must be willing to wait his time, to be as one sitting at his footstool.

What a blessed favor it is when we are permitted to have these desires for good raised in us, and feel humbled under a sense of our own littleness and nothingness, and refreshed even by a few tears; knowing that it is the Master himself that permits it, and gives this evidence to our poor seeking souls, that we are not forsaken by Him! "For as the mountains are round about Jerusalem, so the Lord is round about his people from henceforth even forever." He has never yet said to his trusting seed, "seek ye my face in vain."

How beautiful the language, through the prophet Isaiah, "Come now, let us reason together, saith the Lord: though your sins be as scarlet, they shall be as white as snow; though they be red like crimson, they shall be as wool." How inviting the language, and in what familiar terms it is used: "Come now, let us reason together!" Who can withstand the affectionate pleadings, "though our sins be as scarlet, they shall be as white as snow?" Is this not enough for any that are of doubtful mind, or think that it is of no use for them even to try to be Christians? Is not this sufficient to convince any that through the help of their Saviour, their Redeemer, their sins may be washed away; and by faithfully abiding in Him, they may become purified, and fitted for his use? And then, further on in the same chapter, he goes on to say: "And I will restore thy judges as at the first, and thy counsellors as at the beginning." Is there not great cause to believe that if this was an individual work, there would still be a people raised up here and there, and instead of a decrease there would be an increase?

The Lord will have a chosen people for Himself; it has always been so, and I believe will still continue to be. If those that are within the enclosure will not serve Him, He will bring in those that are without, and cause them to be his willing and obedient people. "God hath chosen the foolish things of this world to confound the wise; and the weak things of the world—yea, and things that are not, to bring to naught things that are." So, will it not be well for some of us to look well to our steppings, and hold fast to that which we have, lest others be brought in to take our places, and we, like one formerly, sell our birthright; and when we would inherit the blessing, as was his case, find no place of repentance, though we may seek it carefully with tears?" This would be an awful state to be in; and if such should be the case with any of us, the fault would be our own; for "He has never yet said to the wrestling seed of Jacob, seek ye my face in vain."

If there are any who read these few lines, and feel in their own breast that they do not know their Saviour as they would like, to these I would say, are there not desires raised in your hearts to know more of Him? Then seek "Him while He may be found, call upon Him while He is near," and He will give you to know of his good things: "Come, taste and see that the Lord is good," and know for yourselves that your Redeemer liveth,—and because "He lives you shall live also." And you will find you will have a place of safety to flee to, when storms and trials arise, where you may abide until they be overpast.

When the prophet Jeremiah was called to go before the people of his day, he said, "I am a child;" but the Lord told him to say not he was a child, "for thou shalt go to all that I shall send thee, and I am with thee to deliver thee." And furthermore, the Lord put forth his hand and touched his mouth, and said, "Behold I have put my words in thy mouth." So that he was bound to go forth and proclaim the word, although he no doubt felt that he was but a child,—the state so much to be desired—the humble, childlike state. And Gideon, also, when he was called to save Israel from the hands of the Midianites, said, "Behold my family are poor in Manassah, and I am the least in my father's house." But the Lord said, "Surely I will be with thee," so that he, too, felt his great inability for the work. Is there not much encouragement to be derived for poor, weak, little ones, from these instances left on record, that we, too, in this present day, when feeling called, will be enabled, through his holy help, to perform what is given us to do; although some of us, with Jeremiah, may exclaim, "I am a child?"

While I feel my own unfitness to offer these lines for the readers of "The Friend," yet, as the words arise, I can but pen them for their perusal. At the same time knowing that "I am nothing, Christ is all." E. C. C.

For "The Friend."

Samuel Roberts.

Samuel Roberts, who lived near Waterford in the South of Ireland, was born on the 20th of 4th month, 1853, and during the early part of his childhood was a fine healthy boy, very lively, and peculiarly loving and amiable. In his 13th year he had a severe attack of scarlatina which brought him very low, and there seemed but very little hope of his recovery; but it pleased his heavenly Father to restore him for a while longer and he appeared to regain his health, though never his natural buoyant spirits; he became a quiet gentle boy, fragile-looking and very sweet and affectionate. Soon after his recovery he went to Newtown School, and though he did not make very brilliant progress in his studies, it was remarked that he was diligent and attentive to his duties, and of very orderly habits. One who knew him there, when speaking of him said, "Samuel was a hard working, conscientious, quiet lad, who never had to be punished or reprov'd; always most careful and diligent in his work, and thoroughly satisfactory in his conduct."

In the winter of 1869 he was removed from school, and remained at home for some months in sweet enjoyment of the country, and the society of the relatives he loved so well; he appeared healthy, but was rather delicate looking. He took ill on the 31st of 3d month, but for some days there did not appear any cause for alarm, and he looked forward with pleasure to the time when he should be able to be up and out again; but as he grew worse he was less sanguine, and would say: "These medicines are doing me no good, it will be a long time before I am strong again." At one time his mother seeing him suffering, said to him, "I hope thou looks to the Lord for help and asks Him to give thee patience;" he quickly answered, "I do." At another time he stretched out his hand to his mother and held her hand in his for some time; she said "My darling, I fear thou art in pain," he said "Not exactly pain, but so sick." Well, dear, she said, "In heaven there will be no pain no sickness; thou knows the little hymn—

'Around the throne of God in heaven,
Thousands of children stand,
Children whose sins are all forgiven,
A holy, happy band,'

and all who love the Lord Jesus He will take there to be forever with Himself, and I'm sure Sammy loves his Saviour." He replied "O I do; but not half enough." "Well, dear," said his mother, "We cannot love Him enough here while we are in these poor bodies but when we get to heaven we shall spend eternity in loving and praising Him." "But," he said, "Wouldn't it be very early?" She said, "Perhaps thou will be spared to us, and that the Lord is going to make thee a good and useful young man, for He does not willingly afflict,—it is for some wise purpose."

As he drew near the close, he became more resigned, and finding that the means used for his recovery were unsuccessful, he asked his nurse about some cure he had heard of; she said she thought it would be good, and if it were in season she would get it for him; he said, "No matter, it is God who does it all." On the day before his death, having obtained temporary relief from pain, he exclaimed "God is very good." In the evening he refused to take any more medicine, remarking "It is doing me no good." His nurse tried to teach him a little prayer, but he said, "I cannot remember all that," but he repeated the Lord's prayer with an effort. Soon after he said, "I want to go home." His parents took leave of him as his mind began to wander; he drew his mother down to him and kissed her repeatedly. He said, "I am tired heaven is my home, I want to go home." His sister asked him, should she give his love to his brothers? He said, "Oh yes, my dear love." And shall I tell them you wish them to love God? He looked round wonderingly and said decidedly, "Willie does love God, and George loves God, and I love God." He would sometimes exclaim, "Oh my Father, oh my Father, my own Father, my Heavenly Father!" He said his Lord was going to take him home where he would take all his loved ones in a little while; he had brought all his sins to his Saviour, and loved Him because he died for him.

A little before he became unconscious, he said, "I am happy going to my blessed Lord who died for me and for you all, up, up, to heaven." Just before recollection ceased, he threw up his arms and cried, Jesus! Jesus!—these were the last audible words he uttered. After a sharp struggle he gradually sank away, and with a little sigh his happy spirit fled to be forever with the Lord.

He died on Second-day afternoon, the 19th day of Fourth month, within a few hours of his 16th birth-day.

And now in concluding the foregoing short account of this amiable and hopeful young man, we desire to acknowledge the goodness and mercy of our God and Saviour, who did not only give the dear sufferer remarkable patience in the midst of pain and suffering, but enabled him also to glorify Him during the most trying conflict, which was so remarkable that the nurse said she had never tended such a death-bed.

"O death, where is thy sting? O grave, where is thy victory? The sting of death is sin; and the strength of sin is the law. But thanks be unto God, which giveth us the victory, through our Lord Jesus Christ."—1 Cor. v. 55-57.

For "The Friend."

GO FORTH AND SOW.

xxvi. 5-6; Eccl. xi. 4-6; Isa. xxxii. 20; Jer. iv. 3.

Go sow thy seed, with weeping though it be;
Heed His command,
Coupled with precious promise unto thee,
Of fruitful land.

Go, though in sorrow and in pain thy tears
Fall down like rain.

He promises, despite thy shrinking fears,
Thou'lt come again,
Bearing within thy arms the golden sheaves,
In harvest time;—

Notes such as only joyful heart conceives,
Making glad chime.

Go sow thy seed; nor heed the adverse wind,
Though it howls loud.

If thou a harvest full wouldst reap and bind,
Heed not the cloud.

Sow in the early morning's rosy light,—
Near thee the land;

And, in the quiet of the evening bright,
Hold not thy hand.

Blessed are ye who sow, all waters near;
Rich is the yield,

Housed when the leaf and bloom of life grow sear,
From such a field.

Break up the soil, untilled and fallow grown;
Sow not 'mong thorns.

Faint not, though o'er the ground debris is strown;
Heed not the storms.

When field is cleared and seeding time is done,
He'll send the rain;

He'll send the dew, He'll send the light of sun—
Quicken the grain.

The solitary and the desert place,
In beauty clad,

Shall then become a glory to His grace,
Joyous and glad.

Sow, then, while yet the light of day is ours,—
Soon comes the night;

Soon e'en the amber mist of evening hours,
Fades from our sight.

Large is the field awaiting to be tilled,—
Large as the earth.

E'en the whole world with seed is to be filled,
Of heavenly birth.

Go, then, and let thy ground with care be sown,
Ere life has fled.

Soon come the reaping and the "harvest home,"
When time has sped.

A. L. WASHBURN.

Philada., 8th mo. 3d, 1882.

A Mother's Influence.—In a railway car, once, a man about sixty years old came to sit beside me. He had heard me lecture the evening before on temperance.

"I am master of a ship," said he, "sailing out of New York, and have just returned from my fiftieth voyage across the Atlantic. About thirty years ago I was a sot; shipped while mad drunk, as one of a crew, and was carried on board like a log. When I came to, the captain sent for me. He asked me:

"Do you remember your mother?"

"I told him she died before I could remember anything."

"Well," said he, "I am a Vermont man. When I was young I was crazy to go to sea. At last my mother consented I should seek my fortune in New York."

"He told how she stood on one side the garden gate and he on the other, when, with his bundle on his arm, he was ready to walk to the next town. She said to him:

"My boy, I don't know anything about towns, and I never saw the sea, but they tell me those great towns are sinks of wickedness, and make thousands of drunkards. Now, promise me you'll never drink a drop of liquor."

"He said:

"I laid my hand in hers and promised, as I looked into her eyes for the last time. She died soon after. I've been on every sea, seen the worst kinds of life and men—they laughed at me as a milksop, and wanted to know if I was a coward. But when they offered me liquor I saw my mother across the gate, and I never drank a drop. It has been my sheet-anchor; I owe all to that. Would you like to take that pledge?" said he."

My companion took it, and he added, "It has saved me. I have a fine ship, wife, and children at home, and I have helped others."

How far that little candle threw its beams! That earnest mother saved two men to virtue and usefulness—how many more He who sees all can alone tell.—Wendell Phillips.

For "The Friend."

The Manufacture and Sale of Intoxicants.

Upon reading in the public papers the daily, the appalling, the even horrible accounts of misery and death caused by intoxicating drinks, from the recent wrecking of the Sciota, to the well-nigh hourly rum-murdered victims in the streets, and especially in the drinking saloons of large cities, one can but query: where does the responsibility come in for all this destruction of peace and prosperity, of the pursuit of happiness, and the preservation of even life itself? Do the pulpit and the press do their duty? Is public opinion sufficiently awake and outspoken to have its correcting influence around? Does the punishment and the odium fall where it so greatly belongs?—on the manufacturers and venders of this wholesale money-making out of the bodies and souls of men? Is it just that one class of men should be allowed to expose their temptations to the young, the weak and the erring? and not only this, but to prey upon the whole community in the way of oppressive taxation, for their private interests? Is the State, the national guardian of its citizens, alive to its duty herein? Where such a destructive enemy is in our very midst, every one, with every controlling influence, ought to be aroused to the occasion. If the government has the power to suppress lotteries, to prevent the sale of obscene literature, of poisons, of explosives and other hurtful things, has it not also the power to restrict and prohibit the infinitely greater desolating scourge flowing from the manufacture and sale of intoxicating drinks? Is this vortex of iniquity to go on swallowing up its victims without redress? Would that individual and public responsibility might be more quickened unto being deeply felt! so that this herculean power of Satan might be stayed, and a truly sickening scene of sorrow and misery be removed from the time-honored city of Philadelphia.

With respect to the maker and vender of this destructive beverage, would not the lines (a little altered) of a Christian poet not untruthfully represent the sentiments of a large and increasing class:

He that finds

One drop of Heaven's sweet mercy in his cup,
Can dig, beg, rot, and perish, well content,
So he may wrap himself in honest rags
At his last gasp; but could not for a world
Thus live upon gains so oft the price of blood,
And so bedewed with bitter tears of wives and children."

7th mo. 10th, 1882.

For "The Friend."

Awake—Turn to the Lord—Labor in his Vineyard.

The spirituality of the gospel of our Lord and Saviour Jesus Christ, has been much before me, as set forth in Holy Writ, which has been too much overlooked by both professor and profane, and the language hath presented: "I remember thee, the kindness of thy youth, the love of thine espousals, how thou wentest after me in the wilderness, in a land that was not sown;" "how then art thou turned into the degenerate plant of a strange vine unto me." "For though thou wash thee with nitre and take thee much soap, yet thine iniquity is marked before me, saith the Lord God." "Judgment will I lay also to the line and righteousness to the plummet, that everything that is offensive may be removed, for the bed is shorter than that a man can stretch himself on, and the covering narrower than he can wrap himself in." Yes, though we may be nicely clothed and securely seated in our ceiled houses, what will it avail at that great day that is fast approaching to us individually, when enquiry shall be made, "Where are the lambs committed to thy care?" O, the remorse and anguish that must follow, for many are saying in the line of their conduct, "Thou art a hard Master," and have hid their talents in the earth.

How my heart yearns for these, that He may yet spare the fruitless fig tree! that, per adventure, in one year only after the branches have been pruned by adversity and affliction, and the dry stumps moistened by celestial showers, there may yet be life found; for I do earnestly desire that we may all be brought to a sense of our responsibility to our Creator, to our Saviour, to Him who died for us and rose again, that led captivity captive, and received gifts for men, for the rebellious also, and has ascended on high, and is now sat down at the right hand of God, there to make intercession for us.

The query arises: what are these gifts? "It is expedient for you that I go away; if I go not away the Comforter will not come to you; but if I go away I will send Him unto you."

Dear friends, have we as individuals experienced for ourselves this renewing of the Holy Ghost, the change from a state of nature to a state of grace? A little leaven leaveneth the whole lump. When we have experienced this, all covetousness and evil surroundings will cease; instead of every man's hand being against his brother, there will be a feeling, "Come, let us go up to the house of God together," each one bearing his or her portion of the allotted burden of the Church with dignity and forbearance. It is an undeniable truth, a little leaven leaveneth the whole lump. When we are individually brought under this purifying power of light and life, we shall then, and not till then, be brought forth a chosen generation, a royal priesthood, a peculiar people, zealous of good works. Faith without works is dead.

My heart yearns for the establishment of Christ's militant Church the world over, that all may be brought to the true ground of repentance toward God and faith towards our Lord and Saviour Jesus Christ, who is the only Mediator between God and man, and the Advocate with the Father. Deism and atheism have been permitted to stalk through the land, to awaken and arouse us in our self-secure homes from our beds of ease. Oh, how listless and lifeless, how dead to a sense of our own individual interest or the welfare of the human family! Awake! awake! put on strength in the name of the Lord! The call has gone forth, "Come, labor in my vineyard, and whatsoever is right, that will I give. Cry aloud, spare not, lift up thy voice like a trumpet; show my people their transgression, and the house of Jacob their sin." No divination or enchantment shall prevail against those that are standing with their feet in Jordan, who are bearing the burden in the heat of the day, and have not bowed the knee to Baal, but who have stood valiantly for the cause of Truth and righteousness. As their day so shall their strength be; for, as the mountains are round about Jerusalem, so the Lord is round about his people, and He will gently lead them by the waters of life.

For "The Friend."

Natural History, Science, &c.

Physiological Action of Alcohol.—One of the first effects of this substance is to cause the heart to beat more quickly. Careful experiments on a young and healthy man gave the average number of beats of the heart, in 24 hours, to be 106,000 in a natural condition of the system. Under the influence of alcoholic stimulants, the number of beats in the same patient rose to 131,000 in the same length of time. Adopting the lowest estimate which has been given of the daily work done by the heart, viz., as equal to 122 tons lifted one foot, the heart in this case did extra work at the time of its greatest excitement equal to the lifting of 28 tons the same elevation, in 24 hours. It is little wonder that after such a labor imposed upon it, the heart should flag; or that the brain and muscles which depend upon the heart for their blood supply, should be languid for many hours, and should require the rest of long sleep for renovation.

While the heart is thus working, the minute blood vessels become distended, as is shown by the varying shades of color in the cheek or other exposed parts of the body. This may often be noticed in persons under the influence of wine, and is spoken of as the flush produced by wine. The effect of alcohol is to weaken the contractile force of the extreme and minute blood vessels which the heart fills with blood at each of its strokes. These vessels, thus partially paralysed, offer inefficient resistance to the force of the heart, and the pulsating organ thus liberated, like the main-spring of a clock from which the resistance has been removed, quickens its action. This engorged condition is not confined to the skin, but extends to the brain, liver and other parts of the body. In course of time, in persons accustomed to alcohol, these changes in the system become permanent. The bloom on the nose which characterizes the confirmed toper, is the established sign of alcoholic action on the blood vessels.

If the action of alcohol be carried further, a new set of changes is induced in the nervous system. The nervous control of certain of the muscles is lost, and the muscles themselves fail in power. They come under the depressing influence of the paralyzing agent, and their contractile power is reduced.

In the third stage, the brain becomes implicated, the mind loses its equilibrium; the rational part of man gives way, and all the mere animal instincts and sentiments are laid bare. The emotional faculties are all in wild disorder; foolish sentimentality extending often to tears, grotesque and meaningless laughter, absurd promises, insane threats and childish predictions impel the tongue, until at last there is a failure of the senses, insensibility, sleep, and utter muscular prostration.

The fourth stage of alcoholic intoxication is one of collapse of the most of the nervous centres which govern the actions of the body; and with their collapse, the organs under their control cease for the time to act. The nervous centres which stimulate the heart and the breathing apparatus are the most slowly affected of all. The different systems of organs experience a temporary cessation of action, one after another, with the exception of these two on which the continuance of mere animal life depends. But for this provision every deeply intoxicated man would inevitably die.

It usually happens that under favorable circumstances, the alcohol diffuses itself through the tissues and gradually escapes from the system; the living centres are thus slowly relieved, and so there is a slow return of power.

The continued use of alcohol, even in moderate quantities, tends to enfeeble the blood vessels; to alter the constitution of the blood; and to thicken, and interfere with the functions of, the membranous envelopes which cover every organ of the body, and on whose work the building up of the body depends. In this way the foundation is laid for organic changes in the heart and blood vessels, lungs, liver, kidney, &c., which lead to a long series of diseases that entail much suffering, and shorten the duration of life.—Condensed from Dr. R. W. Richardson.

Device of a Dog.—J. G. Wood, in his work entitled Man and Beast, relates the following anecdote.

"Whilst a friend of mine was superintending his workmen in a wood, he observed his dog busily occupied in collecting mouthfuls of hay and withered grass, and carrying it all to one spot. On going to examine it, he found the deposit made was on a closely coiled hedgehog. The dog, having attained his evident purpose of rendering the spines harmless, proceeded to take up the heap with its contents, and then set off triumphantly towards home.

Horse Begging for Bread.—The following account of a horse was sent to me by a clergyman:

"A neighbor possessed a young foal, which with its mother, used to pass our house daily, early in the morning, during our breakfast time, and had a habit of straying upon a piece of waste ground which then occupied its front, but has since been enclosed and formed into a front garden. My daughter, who is extremely partial to horses, used to run out and offer the little animal a piece of bread.

"This went on regularly, until at last when he was between two and three years old, he would not wait for the bread, but used to go to the door, plant his fore-feet on the steps, so as to gain sufficient elevation, and then lift the knocker with his nose, afterwards waiting for the expected morsel."

In this case the memory of the animal enabled him to expect his daily dole of bread, and his reason taught him, that when the knocker was sounded, some one came to the door. It is evident that the horse had seen the knocker, used, had noted the result, and had followed the example, using of course his nose in lieu of a hand.—J. G. Wood in Man and Beast.

THE FRIEND.

EIGHTH MONTH 19, 1882.

In the London Friend for 7th mo. we find given in full an address delivered at Friends' Devonshire House during the time of London Yearly Meeting, by Catharine Booth, the wife of William Booth, who commenced the movement known as the Salvation Army. She herself is an active worker in its ranks; and the address gives evidence that she is a woman of more than ordinary ability. Its object was to enlist more fully the sympathy and co-operation of Friends in her enterprise, to which some of our members in England have already contributed, at least, pecuniary aid.

As stated by C. Booth, the Salvation Army grew out of the efforts used by her husband to reach a large body of the working classes of England, who were practical heathens; never attending any place of religious worship, and regarding religion as a matter that concerned only the more respectable classes of society. The marching in procession with banners, and singing, and other similar expedients, are used by Wm. Booth and those under his control, to arrest the attention of this ignorant class, who in a general way refuse to go to any of the places for worship used by the regularly organized denominations.

The rapid growth of the Salvation Army during the seventeen years it has been in existence, gives it an interest as a matter of history; and, like every other honestly intended effort to spread the kingdom of the Redeemer and to promote the welfare of mankind, it appeals to the sympathies of those who love their fellow-men and earnestly desire to see them true servants of the King Immortal. But it is needful for us to be on our guard, that such sympathy does not lead us to sanction and unite in measures that are inconsistent with those truths of the gospel of which we have been convinced. While we may be willing to leave those who are active in these things to the judgment of our common Lord, in whose cause they profess to be laboring; and may rejoice at any degree of blessing which accompanies sincere labor; yet we are not to desert the standard which the Lord has given us to uphold.

The early members of our Society, and all since their day who have become truly convinced of our principles, were settled in the belief, that man without Divine assistance ould do nothing to help the Lord's cause; that the Holy Spirit must operate to turn any one from evil to good, from darkness to light, from the power of Satan to God; and that human efforts, when not Divinely required, are undertaken in man's own will, would prove ineffectual or even hurtful. This principle, they believed, was applicable to the exercise of the ministry of the gospel, as well as to other religious services; and it is the carrying of this into practice, that produces the principal differences between the religious meetings of Friends, and of Methodists, the Salvation Army, and other bodies termed Evangelical. Theoretically, the Methodists hold the same doctrine that we do on this subject. They believe that to be a minister, a man must receive the Divine call. But when he believes that such a call has been given to him, they encourage him to preach on every occasion, without waiting to receive a fresh appointing for every service. They arrange a series of performances for their meetings, which may prove attractive to the people—such as reading the Scriptures, praying, preaching and singing of hymns—without waiting to feel the Spirit of Christ directing them what to do and what to leave undone. The Salvation Army, as C. Booth said, has gone one step in advance of Wesley. They make it the duty of every one of their converts to engage in active work in their cause.

It is painfully evident that in many parts of our Society there has been a practical departure from a dependence on the Spirit of Christ as that without which no religious labor can acceptably be performed. In some places, ministers no longer wait in reverence to the Lord, to feel their own spirits bowed in homage to Him, but are eager to engage in local services; and too many of the people seem to have it so; and thus their attention is turned from the Spirit of Christ in their own hearts and fixed on the preacher, to their great loss. The very existence of our Society as a distinct body is thus brought into jeopardy in some places; for though many may be attracted to meetings where this modified Quakerism prevails, yet there is no sufficient reason for their separate existence, and they will probably in the end be merged in other denominations.

It is a grief to many thoughtful Friends, who love our Society, to observe that, as to several of the periodicals professedly published in its interests, those who conduct them appear to have been so dazzled by the show of good in many active labors, that they are induced to the steadily increasing departures from the standard of Truth which we have heretofore upheld as being really "primitive Christianity revived." Week after week they read before their readers, not merely as matters of information but as examples to be followed, the doings of those whose time and labor is always ready. Such excesses as might shock those who are not fully in sympathy with the departures from our ancient practices, are palliated as mere accidental accompaniments of renewed spiritual life. Efforts are used to create the belief, that the restlessness which prevails among some is of the same nature as that manifested by George Fox and others of his day; who indeed labored abundantly, but not in their own will and strength; and who were concerned to wait, for a long time, for the arising of the feeling of life and power before they ventured to engage in the Lord's work. The strong testimonies to the necessity of this fresh extension of help from on high, as a preliminary to religious labor, which abound in the writings of the consistent members of our Society, are seldom revived in connection with these narratives of religious services of our own members or of others; but the readers are left to infer that these are such as they may safely imitate. The want of earnestness in the cause of religion, and the absence of spiritual life which may be apparent in some places, is used as an excuse to justify those doings which give uneasiness to concerned Friends.

We have no doubt that the influence of such sentiments spread in the families of Friends, and operating slowly but steadily from year to year, is adverse to the true interests of our Society; and that it has been instrumental in leading some of our members away from the full maintenance of our doctrines and testimonies, and inducing them to adopt practices and views inconsistent therewith, and which at one time they would have rejected. And we fear that the effect on others has been, to so familiarize them with practices inconsistent with our profession, as to cause them to regard with comparative indifference assaults on those principles in defence of which our forefathers suffered the loss of liberty and life itself.

A new edition of the Memoirs of Mary Capper has been recently issued by the Meeting for Sufferings. Most of the expense of printing it was paid by a Friend who believed that the work was peculiarly fitted to be useful. It is a lively record of the experiences of one who, from youth to old age, found that as she walked in obedience to the light of the Lord Jesus revealed in her heart, she was safely led through the dangers and trials of time, firmly established in the truths of the Gospel, cheered and sustained by the sweet presence of her Heavenly Father, and animated by the sure and blessed hope of happiness hereafter. The book is neatly gotten up, and may be obtained at the Book Store, No. 304 Arch street, Philadelphia.

SUMMARY OF EVENTS.

UNITED STATES.—Congress adjourned finally at 3 o'clock on the 8th inst., a resolution for adjournment at that time having been agreed to by both houses. The vote on the resolution in the Senate was 26 to 17, all the negatives being Republican. No business of public importance was transacted in the last hours of the session. The House took several recesses, waiting for the Senate's action, and the Senate, before adjournment, spent most of the time in executive session. Most of the executive session was occupied by discussion of a treaty with Mexico.

The total exports of petroleum and petroleum products from the United States during the twelve months ending 6th mo. 30th last, were valued at $51,232,706, against $40,315,609 during the previous fiscal year.

The Milwaukee and St. Paul Railroad Company has sold to an English syndicate 105,000 acres of land in the Pipestone district, at $4.50 per acre.

The first bale of new cotton received in Montgomery, Alabama, was sold at auction in that city on the 9th inst. for 33 cents per pound. It was classed "scant middling."

Letters have been received by business houses in St. Louis, from correspondents in the South and West, saying that "there never have been such crops of corn and oats raised in Texas, Arkansas, Mississippi, Alabama, Tennessee, the Indian Territory, Kentucky, Missouri, and Kansas, as those of the present season."

The total wheat crop of Indiana this year is officially reported at 47,132,000 bushels, an increase of 6,507,000 bushels on the yield of last year.

The corn crop of Nebraska, it is thought, will reach 100,000,000 bushels this year. As there is scarcely any old corn in the State, however, it is doubtful if much of this immense crop will be shipped.

The small grain harvest in Dakota is finished. Wheat yields 15 to 30 bushels per acre, and is of extra quality. The yield of oats per acre is 50 to 80 bushels.

Amimikence, Little Thunder, a famous chief of the Chippewa Indians, and one of the two survivors of the Custer massacre, died in the Mercy Hospital, Chicago, Ill., on the morning of the 14th, aged 60 years. He was known as "a good Indian."

Dr. Reeves, Secretary of the Board of Health of West Virginia, has been advised of a new cattle disease—a contagious fever—which prevails in several counties in that State. A disease is reported among cattle in Berks county, Penna., which has caused a loss of thirty cows within a short time.

A "waterspout" flooded the valley near Shelby, Ohio, on Second-day night, last week, causing great consternation among the people and destroying the crops. "One wave two feet high swept down the valley with terrific noise," but the flood subsided almost as rapidly as it rose. There has been a frequent recurrence of such phenomena in that part of Ohio within the last ten days.

First Lieutenant Thomas L. Casey, Jr., Engineer Corps, has been detailed by the Secretary of War to accompany Prof. Newcomb's party to the Cape of Good Hope, to make observations of the transit of Venus.

Yellow fever being prevalent in Brownsville and at Matamoras, Mexico, the Governor of Texas has proclaimed quarantine against Mexican ports, and authorized the counties on the Rio Grande and exposed points, to proclaim local quarantine. Over 70 deaths from the disease have occurred at Matamoras.

There were 406 deaths in Philadelphia for the week ending 8th mo. 13th, as compared with 540 for the previous week, and 450 for the corresponding week of last year. Of the whole number 130 were under one year of age; 197 were males and 209 females: 69 died of cholera infantum, 46 of consumption, 26 of marasmus, 18 of inflammation of stomach and bowels, 14 of inflammation of the brain, and 10 of typhoid fever.

Markets, &c.—U. S. 3½'s, 101½ a 103½; 4½'s, 114½; 4's, 119½; currency 6's, 134.

Cotton was firmly held; sales of middlings are reported at 13½ a 13½ cts. per lb. for uplands and New Orleans.

Petroleum.—Standard white, 6½ cts. for export, and 7½ cts. per gallon for home use.

Flour is quiet and prices remain as last quoted. Sales of 2600 barrels, including Minnesota extras, at $7 for fresh clear, and at $7.25 a $7.50 for straight; Pennsylvania extra family at $5.25 a $5.50; western do. do. at $6 a $6.25, and patents at $7.25 a $8.75. Rye flour is dull at $3.50 a $3.75 per barrel.

Grain.—Wheat is quiet and easier. Sales of 9000 bushels new Southern at $1.14 a $1.18. Rye is scarce and wanted at 75 cts. for prime new. Corn.—Local lots are scarce and firm, and futures are firmer. Sales of 7000 bushels, including yellow, at 92 cts.; mixed, 91 cts.; steamer at 90½ cts.; No. 3 at 90 cts., and rejected at 89 a 89½ cts. Oats are scarce and firm. Sales of 9500 bushels, including old at 70 a 75 cts., and new at 66 a 70 cts.

Hay and Straw Market, for week ending 8th mo. 12th, 1882.—Loads of hay, 331; loads of straw, 49. Average price during the week—Prime timothy, 95 cts. to $1.05 per 100 pounds; mixed, 85 cts. to 95 cts. per 100 pounds; straw, 60 to 70 cts. per 100 pounds.

Beef cattle were in good demand and prices were firmer; 3500 head arrived and sold at the different yards at 4½ a 8½ cts. per pound, as to quality.

Sheep were active and firmer: 14,000 head sold at the different yards at 3½ a 5½ cts., and lambs at 4 a 7½ cts. per pound.

Hogs were active and firm: 3200 head arrived and sold at the different yards at 11½ a 12½ cts. per lb., as to condition.

FOREIGN.—In the House of Commons, Gladstone, moving the consideration of the amendments of the House of Lords to the Arrears of Rent Bill, stated that he would have to ask the House substantially to dissent from the first amendment. The Government will propose to enact that either a landlord or tenant can initiate proceedings subject to ten days' notice from the initiating party. Gladstone also said: I shall not ask the House to reject the second amendment, but to amend it so as to provide that, in case where a tenant right is sold within seven years, the landlord shall have a lien on the proceeds for the arrears he has been deprived of by the action of the bill to the extent of one year's rent, the landlord only to have this lien if the sum realized by the sale of the tenant right equal three years' rent.

The House sustained the views of Gladstone by a decisive majority, in which the Lords subsequently concurred.

According to the official return, 231 outrages, including two murders, occurred in Ireland during the 7th mo., against 283 outrages, with five murders, in 6th mo. The total number of evictions during 7th mo. was 321 families, representing 1619 persons. Of the families evicted half were reinstated as tenants or caretakers. The number of families evicted in 6th mo. was 515, representing 2669 persons.

The North German Lloyd's steamer Mosel, Captain Hesse, from Bremen for New York, is aground under Lizard Point. She had between 600 and 700 passengers. The mails and specie have been safely landed. There was no panic when the vessel struck, the officers assuring the passengers they were in no danger. The majority of the passengers have gone to Falmouth. Lighters have gone to the wreck to save the cargo.

At a meeting of the constabulary at Cork on the 9th inst., the following resolution, which was approved by the Limerick and Belfast men, was adopted: "Having seen, with surprise and disgust, a calumny cast upon our loyalty by the insinuation that we are in collusion with Fenians, we desire to mark our sense of its utter falsity by withdrawing from further agitation and relying upon a speedy redress of our grievances."

The sum of £2445 has been paid to the Limerick constabulary, it being their portion of the £180,000 granted by the Government for extra pay.

The Berlin Tribune says that Russia has assured the Porte that she has not instigated the Pan-Slavist agitation in Bulgaria and Roumelia, as she has no intention to increase the embarrassments caused by England.

An official return of the census of France shows that the population of the country is 37,672,048.

The Turkish Consul at Bombay has been ordered to give explanations to the Ulemas of India respecting the action of the Porte in sending Turkish troops to co-operate with the British in Egypt, which has produced a great sensation among Mohammedans in India. The Consul has been instructed to explain the reasons which have induced the Caliph to send troops.

Constantinople, 8th mo. 8th.—De Lesseps has sent a telegram here declaring that the whole of Egypt has embraced the cause of the National party, and that the English will find everywhere a determined and intelligent defence, to check their enterprise if possible. The departure of Dervish Pasha and Server Pasha for Egypt has been postponed.

Constantinople, 8th mo. 11th.—At the sitting of the Conference yesterday the Russian representative asked for an explanation of the action of the British in occupying Suez. Lord Dufferin, the British Ambassador, replied that the step was taken in consequence of military necessity, and in order to save the town from destruction and pillage.

At the Conference which met at the residence of Said Pasha and discussed the question of protection of the Suez Canal, no decision was reached. It is believed the resolutions of the Conference in relation to this matter have no immediate importance bearing on the situation. It is understood that a majority of the Ambassadors is in favor of bringing the Conference to a close or adjourning its sitting.

El Jawaib states that Arabi Pasha has already been made semi-officially acquainted with the terms of the proclamation declaring him a rebel. He has been informed that the Sultan would grant him free pardon should he make submission, but that if he refuse strong measures will be taken to enforce his obedience.

The Cherifs have condemned the acts of Arabi Pasha as contrary to the interests of Islam.

The Musselman jurists, whom the Sultan frequently consults, explain that Arabi Pasha, in so far as he has disobeyed the Caliph, is a rebel and may be unceremoniously treated as such; but, in so far as he has been a defender of the Mohammedan country against the aggressive designs of Christians, he has merely fulfilled the duties of a good Musselman, and consequently the Caliph cannot make common cause with England. The Sultan may punish Arabi Pasha, if some act of rebellion is proved against him; but he must not associate himself with those who wish to crush Arabi Pasha as the defender of Islam. A correspondent says this will greatly influence the Turkish military action.

Constantinople, 8th mo. 14th.—The irade declaring Arabi Pasha a rebel and authorizing the Anglo-Turkish Military Convention has not been signed. Arabi Pasha's troops are busy erecting earthworks beyond Mahala Junction. Several Abyssinian pumps have been sunk about the English positions and are found to answer well the requirements of the English army. Good water was quickly found. The rebels, in great force, have taken up positions immediately threatening the canal. The English Admiral has occupied the water works. He will not allow any interference whatever from De Lesseps.

A despatch from Buenos Ayres states that the vessel conveying Lieutenant Bove and the members of the Italian Antarctic expedition has been wrecked off Cape Horn. All on board were saved by the British vessel Allan Goodin.

Complications are reported between the native and the French fishermen on the so-called "French shore," on the west coast of Newfoundland. The French insist upon their exclusive right to fish there, while the natives claim a concurrent right, according to treaty. It is probable that the matter will have to be submitted again to the French and British Governments.

The army worms are reported to be numerous in the western and southern counties of Nova Scotia.

Toronto, Ont., advises state that during the past fortnight the weather has been so violent that through a large part of Ontario the farmers will suffer very serious losses. The reports go to show that south of a line drawn from Goderich to a point a few miles north of Toronto the actual yield of the crops will be very seriously reduced.

A telegram from Ottawa says, it is announced that $8,500,000 of the $10,000,000 Pacific Railway bonds have been taken up.

Advices from Sagua report the destruction of the corn crop, owing to the extreme drought.

El Triunfo publishes a letter from the President of the Central Board of Agriculture of the Republic of Colombia to Captain General Prendergast, warning the latter to take effective measures to prevent the larvae and locusts now devastating that Republic from being introduced into Cuba by vessels carrying cattle to the island. It is recommended in the letter that the cattle on board the vessels be fed with hay only. These locusts are rapid travellers, and are of enormous fecundity, and they would soon invade the United States after reaching Cuba.

Honolulu is to be lighted by "electric towers" and several street railways are projected there. A cable will soon be laid to connect the city with the various Hawaiian islands.

RECEIPTS.

Received from Martha R. Comfort and Henrietta Haines, N. J., $2.10 each, vol. 56; from Levi B. Stokes, Gtn., $2.10, vol. 56, and for Sarah P. Johnson, $2.10, vol. 56; from Richard C. Shoemaker, Pa., $2.10, vol. 56, and for Ezekiel C. Shoemaker, $2.10, vol. 56; from Benjamin B. Leeds, N. J., $2.10, vol. 56; from C. A. Hoffman, W. Philada., $2.10, vol. 56; from Mark Balderston, City, $2, vol. 56, and for James Cole, Me., and Phebe A. Elkinton, N. J., $2.10 each, vol. 56; from Mary Ann Heston, Pa., $2.10, to No. 14, vol. 57; from Samuel Allen, City, $2, vol. 56; from Thomas S. Pike, N. J., $2.10, vol. 56; from Ephraim Smith, City, $2, vol. 56, and for Morris S. Cope and Elizabeth Hughes, Pa., $2.10 each, vol. 56; from Robert Knowles, Agent, N. Y., $2.10, vol. 56, and for James R. Boss, Benjamin Knowles, Chester A. Weaver, Dorcas Collins, David Peckham and Lorenzo Rockwell, N. Y., and David F. Knowles, Vt., $2.10 each, vol. 56; from Mary N. Griffith, Va., $2.10, vol. 56; from Joseph J. Walton, City, $2, vol. 56; from Amy H. Nicholson, N. J., $2.10, vol. 56; from Lydia Ann Hendrickson, N. J., $2.10, vol. 56; from Martha S. Johnson, Ind., $2.10, vol. 56; from Mary M. Applegate, N. J., $2.10, vol. 56; from Sarah Middleton, N. J., $2.10, vol. 56; from Joseph Kay, N. J., $2.10, vol. 56; from James Smedley, City, $2, vol. 56; from Josiah L. Haines, City, $2, vol. 56, and for Amy Middleton and Albert Haines, N. J., $2.10 each, vol. 56; from Rebecca S. Troth, N. J., $2.10, vol. 56; from Uriah Borton, N. J., $2.10, vol. 56; from Ezra Engle, N. J., $2.10, vol. 56; from Nathaniel Barton, N. J., $2.10, vol. 56; from Joseph Barton, N. J., $2.10, vol. 56; from Sarah Haines, N. J., $2.10, vol. 56; from James Scarlet, Pa., $2.10, vol. 56; from Caleb Hoopes, Pa., $2.10, vol. 56, and for Benjamin P. Hoopes, $2.10, vol. 56; from Joshua Jefferis, Pa., $2.10, vol. 56; from Rebecca A. Bell, Pa., $2.10, vol. 56; from Edward Richie, City, $2, vol. 56, and for Edward B. Richie, N. J., and Rachel J. Shoemaker, Ind., $2.10 each, vol. 56; from George Abbott, Jr., City, $2, vol. 56; from Samuel L. Whitson, W. Philada., $2.10, vol. 56; from Sarah E. Evans, N. J., $2.10, vol. 56; from John R. Tatum, Del., $2.10, vol. 56; from Sarah Ann Allen and Sarah Ann Cox, N. J., $2.10 each, vol. 56; from Seth Shaw, Agent, O., $2.10, vol. 56, and for Rachel Cope, Job Huestis, Barak Ashton, Mifflin Cadwalader, Benjamin Harrison and Nathan M. Blackburn, O., and J. F. Harrison, Io., $2.10 each, vol. 56, and for Sarah

W. Gilbert, O., $1, to No. 52, vol. 56; also $1 for the Bible Association; from George McNichols, Io., $2.10, vol. 56; from Joseph Elkinton, City, $2, vol. 56; from Samuel M. Wickersham, Pa., $2.10, vol. 56; from Alice P. Roberts, Pa., $2.10, vol. 56; from John W. Buzby, N. J., $2.10, vol. 56, and for Elnathan Roberts, $2.10, vol. 56; from Huldah H. Bonwill, City, $2, vol. 56, and for James Kite, O., $2.10, vol. 56; from Albert Webster, City, $2.10, vol. 56; from George Sharpless, Pa., $2, vol. 56, and for Lewis Sharpless, Minn., $2.10, vol. 56; from Henry Albertson, Pa., $2.10, vol. 56, and for Mary Wistar, City, $2, vol. 56; from Peter Thomson Gtn., $2.10, vol. 56; from Jane Ann Passmore, Pa., $2.10, vol. 56; from Sarah L. North, Pa., $2.10, vol. 56; from Sarah C. Gaskell, N. J., $2.10, vol. 56; from Henry Trimble, City, $2, vol. 56; from Sarah Greene, R. I., $2.10, vol. 56, and for Eliza G. Sheffield, Conn., $2.10, vol. 56; from Joel Wilson, Agent, N. J., $2.10, vol. 56, and for Isaac C. Stokes and Ruth A. Harned, $2.10 each, vol. 56; from Robert P. Gifford, R. I., $2.10, vol. 56; from Alice H. Carter, N. J., $2.10, vol. 56; from Jacob R. Elfreth, Pa., $2.10, vol. 56; from Samuel Betts, City, $2, vol. 56; from Dr. Edward Maris, City, $2, vol. 56, and for Hannah M. Stokes, Pa., and Samuel W. Maris, Md., $2.10 each, vol. 56; from Elisha A. Griffith, N. Y., $1.05, to No. 27, vol. 56; from William George England, N. S., $2.10, vol. 56; from James G. McCollin, City, $2, vol. 56, and for Anna G. McCollin and Frances B. McCollin, City, $2 each, vol. 56, and Ann Garrett, Pa., and Margaretta E. Reed, West Philada., $2.10 each, vol. 56; from Charles M. Cooper, N. J., $2.10, vol. 56; from Thomas Perry, R. I., for Ann Perry, J. Barclay Foster, John W. Foster, George Foster, George C. Foster, Mary Ann Sbove and Lydia F. Nichols, $2.10 each, vol. 56, and for Charles Perry, $2.10, to No. 11, vol. 57; from Charlotte H. Hollingshead, Pa., 10 cents postage on vol. 56; from Jeremiah Foster, R. I., $2.10, vol. 56; from Mary A. Smith, Mass., $2.10, vol. 56; from Benjamin Lippincott, N. J., $2.10, vol. 56, and for Lydia Lippincott, $2.10 vol. 56; from Sarah McDonald, Ill., $2.10, vol. 56; from Jacob Edge, Pa., $2.10 vol. 56, and for L. Caroline Ash, and Joseph Harrison, $2.10 each, vol. 56; from Mary Ann Haines, Rebecca Ashead, and Mary and Rebecca Matlack, N. J., $2.10 each, vol. 56.

Remittances received after Fourth-day morning will not appear in the Receipts until the following week.

WANTED,

An experienced and well qualified female teacher, to take the charge of Friends' School at Plainfield, N. J. Apply at once to W. Taylor, Plainfield, N. J.

NOTICE TO TEACHERS, PARENTS AND OTHERS.

The Yearly Meeting's Committee on Education have placed a book at Friends' Book Store, No. 304 Arch St. Philadelphia, where applications from teachers wishing situations, and committees who desire to employ teachers among Friends, may be recorded.

Please give address, and full particulars.

ELLISTON P. MORRIS, Clerk.

FRIENDS' ASYLUM FOR THE INSANE, Near Frankford, (Twenty third Ward,) Philadelphia. Physician and Superintendent—JOHN C. HALL, M.D. Applications for the Admission of Patients may be made to the Superintendent, or to any of the Board of Managers.

DIED, at his residence, Barnesville, Belmont county Ohio, on the 5th day of the 6th month, 1881, ISAAC LIGHTFOOT, a beloved member and overseer of Somerset Monthly Meeting of Friends, in the 76th year of his age.

—, at her residence, West Chester, Pa., 1st mo 13th, 1882, ANNE PIM, in the 90th year of her age, an esteemed member of West Chester Preparative and Birmingham Monthly Meeting of Friends.

—, at Burlington, N. J., on the 8th of the 5th mo 1882, EMLEN CRAFT, in the 78th year of his age. He was well known in this city as one of the pioneers in the local express business, which he pursued almost uninterruptedly for more than 40 years, and in which, in all his affairs, his extreme care and strict integrity had become proverbial. He was a consistent member of the Society of Friends, strong in his attachment to its principles, and diligent in the attendance of meetings; and though little known beyond the sphere of his daily avocation, his memory is cherished as one of the upright and excellent of the earth.

THE FRIEND.

A RELIGIOUS AND LITERARY JOURNAL.

VOL. LVI.

SEVENTH-DAY, EIGHTH MONTH 26, 1882.

NO. 3.

PUBLISHED WEEKLY.

Subscription, if paid in advance, $2.00 per annum; if not paid in advance $2.50; 10 cents extra is charged for Postage on those sent by mail.

Articles designed for insertion to be addressed to
JOSEPH WALTON,
MOORESTOWN, BURLINGTON CO., N. J.
Subscriptions, payments and business communications, received by
JOHN S. STOKES,
NO. 116 NORTH FOURTH STREET, UP STAIRS,
PHILADELPHIA.

For "The Friend."

Wanderings South and East.

(Continued from page 10.)

THE NEW HEBRIDES, BANKS' AND TORRES' ISLANDS. THE SANTA CRUZ ISLANDS.

When on Norfolk Island, our author had been invited by Bishop Selwyn of the Melanesian Mission to accompany him in a tour among some of the islands of the Pacific, which he was in the habit of periodically visiting in the Southern Cross, a small vessel belonging to the Mission.

On the 1st of Seventh month, 1880, he went a second time to Norfolk Island, ready to begin his passage. About 40 of the natives, who had been receiving instruction, were to be returned to their homes, "and," he remarks, "I must say 40 Cook's tourists could have made more commotion. Some had dogs, many had cats, all had boxes and bundles, some had babies."

The island of Maewo, one of the New Hebrides, is described as an earthly Paradise. While walking in its interior they came upon a little village, which is thus described: "We found a wide clearing quite level and free from either grass or weed. Perfectly clean, moreover, so that one could not so much as step on even a cocoa-nut shell lying out of place. Sprinkled about upon this level clearing were about a dozen little houses. Some of them were fenced around with white cane fences, all had, planted beside the doors, one or more handsome flowering shrubs or trees. Some of the flowering shrubs, planted purely for their beauty's sake, were really magnificent; great scarlet flowers on one; cream-colored honeysuckle blossoms upon another; bright-yellow bell-shaped flowers upon a third. Not one of us was botanist enough to know the names or families of these flowers, although some of us had been in many countries, we could not compare more than a few of them to any we had seen before. The leaves of many of the trees were no less beautiful than the flowers, and I have seldom seen a more gorgeous display of crimson, red and brown foliage.

The houses are small, and have, strictly speaking, no walls. They consist of a deeply-tiled roof set upon the ground, and are, in shape, like very large and long hencoops. The cleanliness is, however, as I have said, neat and good. A small square doorway, perhaps two feet high, leads into the single room, and the floor is covered with rough mats."

"To each village is attached a club-house or 'gamal' as it is called. A club-system prevails throughout almost all the Western Pacific Islands, varying merely in detail. When the boys of the village have grown out of actual childhood, they are sent from their homes to sleep and eat in the village gamal, which is generally in a central position. Upon entering the club they pay a small fee, and sleep and eat at what is called the lower end. From this position they work their way gradually upwards, at each advancement paying the chiefs of the club-house certain fees."

"In connection with the fees paid for advancement in these curious lodges, I must not forget to mention a curious custom on this island. Of course the money is different in every group of islands, just as in every country of Europe, but here it is so singular that it deserves special mention. Near the centre of the village at which we stopped, was a small and rather exceptional-looking house. It was fenced around, and had a more elaborately-constructed front than the common dwelling-places. This we learned was the money house. We were taken to see what was inside, and crawled through the very small doorway for that purpose. From the roof of the hut were suspended eight or ten mats, their sizes as they hung down from the beam being about two feet by fifteen inches. They reached to within a foot of the ground, and under them a small wood fire was kept ever burning. In course of time the mats become coated with a shining black incrustation, which gradually accumulates in such a quantity that it hangs down in stalactite forms, called by the natives 'breasts.' The fire, it will be seen, requires very constant looking after, for if it became at all large the mats would be set alight, and if it went out, the process of coating them would be arrested. A man has, therefore, always to be kept watching these curious moneys, and it is the time thus spent upon them that makes them of value. This kind of money is, as far as we could learn, only current in the matter of club advancement. A fairly old mat is worth as much as a large boar with finely-curved tusks. Of all the forms of money that I have seen this is certainly the most curious, for it cannot even be carried about, and is, if possible, never moved even when it passes from one owner to another."

North of New Hebrides lie the Banks' and Torres' Islands. Several of these are practically without water. The soil consists of crumbled coral through which the rain percolates as it would through sand: the natives are accordingly dependent upon cocoa-nut milk as their sole beverage, and of course do not wash. The men in the Torres' group wear a short stick, generally about three-quarters of an inch in diameter and an inch and a half long, through the cartilage of the nose, which presses the sides of the nostril upwards. These little blocks are of polished black wood and have a small mother-of-pearl disc let into them at each end. On one of these islands, the vessel left Bishop Selwyn on his return from the north, to spend two months with the people who were suffering from horrible sores aggravated by want of water and careless treatment. The young girls and boys were very pretty and affectionate, holding the hands of their visitors as they walked along. W. C. says: "Nothing seemed to strike them so much as our nails, men and women being called up repeatedly by the more courageous ones to look at and feel them. When I first pulled up my sleeve there was quite a stampede—that any one should be white all over seemed to them something quite fearful! Towards the end of our visit we discovered an amusing fancy which we had not understood before; it was that the people were all most curious to know our names. I had been asked some question a hundred times, and at last some one guessed what it was that they wanted. After that Bishopé (Bishop) and Kooti (my name) were passed round with huge delight, and much pointing at the possessors of these titles!"

"One really needs to visit some such place as this to appreciate the value of water. Here were many hundreds of men, women and children, of whom I suppose but a few had ever known what it was to wash. Natives will not use salt water to wash in, although they will bathe in it while fishing or even perhaps for pleasure. On the whole, however, these dirty Torres' folk seemed to me more merry than any people I visited, and the noisy crowd that came down to see us off was evidently none the less happy for being so unclean. It was only when we saw the poor, dying wretches lying in dozens outside their houses in miserable little sheds, that we realized how awful a thing it is to be the prey of disease and flies and loathsome insects, in a tropical country, and without the all-purifying element."

One of the objects of the voyage was the establishing of friendly relations with the Santa Cruz Islanders, who are noted for their ferocity. It was here Bishop Patteson and others were killed in 1871, in revenge for the kidnapping of five of the natives which had taken place some time before, but of which he probably knew nothing. Here too, Commodore Goodenough and two of his seamen were wounded with poisoned arrows, which cost the lives of all three. Their vessel first touched at one of the small Reef Islands of Santa Cruz, which are small coral patches, nowhere more than 30 feet above the sea-level. The bishop had been there two years before, and had brought back one of their people who had been blown away as far as the Solomon Islands, and whom he had found a prisoner there. This man was among the first to board their vessel, and very glad he seemed to be to see his old friends. "Before long the vessel's deck was crowded with the natives, who swarmed up the sides like monkeys. They were finely made fellows of a dark copper-color. Through their noses they wore a thick tortoise-shell ring about an inch and a half in diameter, and in their ears were from ten to as many as twenty thin tortoise-shell rings of about the same size. A very fine and neatly made mat was their sole article of clothing. For ornaments the usual armlets were worn, and also in many cases a round, flat, shell breast-plate was hung round the neck. Most prominently of all, however, they carried, always and without exception, large red-wood bows, and from a dozen to twenty long and highly-ornamented poisoned arrows, which are certainly the most terrible and deadly weapons I have ever seen. They are not (indeed no arrows in these seas are) feathered like our own, but are made of a simple cane shaft four or five feet long, and carved with some care, the designs upon them being colored with red and white pigments. The points are long and thin, and of a light brown color, the tips being made of human bone."

Having made friends with these Reef Islanders, they persuaded a few of them to go along and introduce them to some of the people on the large island of Nitendi. They were well received. W. Coote was one of those who went on shore, and he was conducted to a house in a village in the forest. Here he was entertained with hot bread-fruit; and caused the most unbounded delight by exhibiting a white skin. "People flocked in to see and touch the strange creature, and their wonder and curiosity rose higher than ever. I had brought with me no presents or valuables of any kind—nor indeed any clothes beyond the plainest shirt and flannel trousers, as it was most desirable not to excite their cupidity, but I found, fortunately, a small bundle of fish-hooks in the pocket of my shirt, and these I distributed, amidst great enthusiasm, amongst my crowd of admirers. It was a strange experience, indeed, to sit there, where I suppose no white man had ever been, amongst that crowd of savages, perhaps the most treacherous in the world. The light was dim, for there were only two or three square holes for doorways; a fire burnt in one corner, and in the centre of the house was a large arrangement like a four-post bed, upon the top of which were stowed bags of nuts and stores of spare arrows and other treasures. Every one had his bow and arrows, and would not so much as cross the house without them, and I could not resist a suspicion once of foul play and quickly roused tempers; it was therefore pleasant to see through the little doorway the waves dashing against the rocks outside, and in the distance the ship with the canoes still round her."

"I have seldom been more utterly tired—not from actual bodily exertion, but from sheer excitement—than when I got on board the ship again. There was a feeling of relief amongst us all that night; the anxiety of the last few days was taken off our shoulders now, for the experiment was over and had proved satisfactory. With such terrible precedents we could hardly have expected so successful an experience. Our best hopes had been realized, and a beginning at least made upon an island that had been considered almost hopeless. It is impossible to say what the people thought of our visit, but, as we carried no arms and took practically nothing from them but gave away a considerable amount of, to them, inestimable treasure, one may presume they considered our intentions were friendly."

(To be continued.)

For "The Friend."

Desultory Selections and Pencillings.

The proceedings of the London Yearly Meeting just past, have reminded of what our late friend Christopher Healy is reported to have said at the dinner table of one of their prominent members of that day. Upon two of the daughters coming in late, their doing so was excused by the mother—a reputed minister in the Society—who introduced them to their guest with the apology that they had just returned from the Bible Society. C. H. made the rejoinder in his honest, straightforward manner: "First to the Bible Society, then to the Missionary Society, and then out of Society." Will not his language, "Out of Society," apply to the whole Body so far as that Body is committed by "the hasty manner in which the decision respecting 'Home Missionary work' was announced from the table?" An action which is thus characterized by a writer in The British Friend of Seventh month—"the sacrifice of one of our most precious testimonies on the mean altar of a faint-hearted expediency."

We sincerely hope the "large majority" in that Yearly Meeting may be so "nourished up in the words of faith and of good doctrine," as to stand for the right and the true; even to prove like "the few names in Sardis, which have not defiled their garments." We entertain but little hope that the committee, appointed without due Christian courtesy or authority, will do other than continue to "sacrifice on the altar of a faint-hearted expediency," or to carry out the policy of weak compliance long since, as an entering wedge, inaugurated, until nearly all our distinguishing characteristics as a people will be obliterated. Who can fail to see or to fear this, being familiar with the retrogressive steps of that Body for a number of years past?—once such "a burning and a shining light."

The following communications, addressed to Friends in England, or directly, to that once influential Body, the Yearly Meeting of London, are worthy of deep consideration at the present time.* Thus Daniel Wheeler in 1832:—"Assuredly, my beloved friends, a day of trial is approaching, yea, hastening upon the nations, when nothing short of an individual heart-felt knowledge of Him, in whom we profess to believe, will stand unshaken by the storm."

"Great is the solicitude I feel on behalf of our highly favored religious Society, that it may be preserved immovable upon this its ancient and sure foundation, Jesus Christ—

* Though most of the active members upon the stage when these testimonies were given forth have passed to their final account, the sour leaven then introduced into the Society has not ceased its infectious influence down to the present day. So that the prophetic warnings, authoritatively put forth at the time of their delivery, are yet but in the painful course of fulfilment, as he that runs may read. Hence how admonitory should they be to all, and especially to that Yearly Meeting to which it was addressed, lest the candlestick be removed out of his place, or the hand-writing upon the wall, as in the case of king Belshazzar, be forthcoming.

'Christ in you the hope of glory;' which never did, and never will, fail those, who in simplicity believe, and faithfully build thereon nothing doubting. By diligently maintaining the watch in that holy light, bestowed in redeeming love on every individual of the human race, the snares of the insidious adversary, although laid in the most insinuating manner, will be detected and broken; the specious guise of a false religion itself will be penetrated. This has assuredly slain its thousands, who dazzled and distracted by creaturely activity and excitement, have thus been corrupted from the simplicity that is Christ. 'Watch ye, therefore, and pray always; that ye may be accounted worthy to escape all these things that shall come to pass, and to stand before the Son of man.' Blessed and holy injunction,—never out of season,—never more needed!"

"Frequently am I brought under appalling apprehensions for us, a people, sought out and chosen of the Lord: for had we followed the footsteps of our honorable predecessors in religious profession, who bore the burden and heat of a day of deep suffering, in the faithful support, in their original brightness, of those principles which they transmitted to us, the spiritual beauty of the gospel church might have shone forth through us, with a splendour which the different professors of the Christian name, could neither have gainsayed nor resisted," &c.

A part of a testimony by that extraordinarily gifted minister and servant of Christ Ann Jones, of Stockport, England, in the Yearly Meeting of Men Friends, held in London 6th mo. 1836:—"I can truly say I came into this meeting, not knowing that I should have any thing to communicate; but my mind has been impressed, as I have sat for a short time in silence among you, and I was willing to become a fool for the Lord Jesus Christ's sake; would that there were more among you who were willing to become fools for his sake. There are those amongst you, who are encouraging a carnal wisdom, a head knowledge, an outward learning, which exalteth itself, and is ever endeavoring to find out the way of salvation by the study of the Scriptures. This spirit has spread, even among those who are making a high profession; men who are robbing Christ. They talk much of belief in the Atoning Sacrifice, but are setting a nought and despising Christ in his inward appearance, and apply them in a carnal sense. Such was not the way in which our worthy predecessors acted. The Lord raised our predecessors in the Truth, to be a light in a dark, degenerate age; and through their instrumentality, He was pleased to reprove the carnal professors of the outward letter in their day; but there are some among you who are holding up to scorn the acts and writings of these our worthy predecessors and are endeavoring to cast disrespect upon them. Take care, as you will have to give account in the awful day of righteous retribution, I charge you, take care how you hold up them and their writings to derision; they are resting from their labors far beyond the reach of your derision; your bitter cunning shafts will return upon your own heads. Beware, then, how you, with unhallowed feet trample over the ashes of your worthy predecessors, or attempt to cast a shadow over the brightness of their character. These expressions may appear strong, but I cannot choose my own words as a minister of the Gospel. I always desire to be the instrument through which the Lord shall speak, and not word more than He shall give me, and to declare to you the whole counsel of God, so that I may be clear of your blood. The Lord hath entered into a controversy with the spirit that has been put into this Society, and which is sitting in the judgment seat. The Lord, I say, hath a controversy with these, but He hath a still greater controversy with those who are seeking to please both parties. What concord hath Christ with Belial, what union between the temple of God and idols! But I have a word of comfort for the little remnant whom the Lord hath yet among his people; may He send you his Spirit to discern and avoid the serious errors which abound. And the Lord Almighty will show himself valiant on our side, and will arise for your signal deliverance."

The annexed is the substance of a portion of what was delivered in a visit to the Men's early Meeting, by Sarah Lynes Grubb, the same year as the preceding, viz., 1836; taken down by a Friend shortly after:—"Oh! my friends, there were some in ancient days who led one to another, 'Go to, let us make bricks, and burn them thoroughly;' 'let us build us a city and a tower, whose top may reach to heaven.' Some of you are laying hand on hand, and shoulder to shoulder, to erect a tower whose height may reach unto heaven; beautiful indeed to the eye, and of fair proportions; and you are saying to others, 'Come and behold what we are doing; join yourselves unto us, and we will show you the goodly path unto heaven; a path full of charity and love; an easy and a comfortable path, wherein ye may avoid the cross;' but, 'say ye not, a confederacy, to all them to whom this people shall say, a confederacy.' Oh! beware of that subtle spirit which would lead you from the pure truth, under such delusive pretensions; for though these talk of the unity of the Spirit, it is not the cementing influence with which Christ unites his disciples in precious fellowship. And I am commanded to tell you that, as in the instance of the tower of Babel, the Lord came down and confounded their language, so will it be with the Babel-builders amongst us; for when they come together, they will not understand each other's speech; and their building on the sand will tumble to pieces, and they themselves will wither, wither, wither; and be scattered to the north and to the south, to the east and to the west."

"And oh! let me earnestly entreat you of this description, in the love of the Gospel, to stand still and see what you are doing. I believe there have been times when some of you have been seen, in the true light, that you were wrong; but the pride of your hearts would not suffer you to acknowledge it; but, remember it is an awful thing to tempt the Lord your God: you know not how long these connections may be granted you; and 'if the light that is in you be darkness, how great is that darkness!'"

"And now, my beloved young people—you, dear children, on whose behalf I have often presented the secret petition in my chamber, and the more public one in the assemblies of the people, be not dismayed at the prospect before you; for I have to tell you (and I wish you to take notice of it, and to write it down) that I feel this that now causes so much stumbling and perplexity, and produces such a sensation, will fade away, and the authors of it will go back to the world and the beggarly elements. * * What became of those who, in former days, caused divisions in this Society? Were they not all blighted and scattered?"

"And ye, faithful ones, to whom the principles of truth are yet precious; who love the pure cause, and are often bowed down in spirit on its behalf, you have no cause to fear; for though you be left as the gleanings of the grapes of the vintage, yet shall you be planted on a very fruitful hill; not one of self-exaltation, but a hill above the spirit of this world; and you shall spread abroad, and increase, and flourish; for this Society was planted 'a noble vine; wholly a right seed;' and it is not the will of the Almighty that this people should ever cease to be a people."

The subjoined is from the pen of Mary Capper, in 1830:—"As an individual incorporated into the Society of Christian believers, denominated Friends or Quakers, not by education nor much familiar intercourse with any of them, not in my minority, but in more advanced years of my life; and having seen, with serious observation, it may be rather more variety of scenes and manners than falls to the lot of every private person, I may say, that although I was ignorant and as easily led into folly as my associates, brought up in the same habits and dissipations, there were times when I was led, in deep thoughtfulness, to query with myself, What is a profession of religion? Having at an early age, gone through the forms of what is called our National Church, and with reverence partaken of the outward and visible sign of faith in the blood of Christ, as an atoning sacrifice, oftentimes it arose in my mind, What has this done for me? Are my evil propensities subdued, and my steps directed into the path of circumspection and self-denial? I was made aware that the ceremony was but a shadow of the substantial good."

"Not without sacrifices, hindrances and discouragements, by little and little, not rashly, but after mature deliberation, in simple obedience to apprehended duty, I attended the religious meetings of Friends. To me, solemn and reverential was that stillness, that silence, which seemed to hush every thought. I believe that in this still calm, there is a renewal of spiritual strength to be known; yea! an enlargement of spiritual understanding, in communion with the Father of spirits, which surely is true, spiritual worship. Thus, as an individual, I was led step by step, and found no difficulty in comprehending the ground and consistency of adopting plainness of speech, behavior and apparel; all seemed consonant with apostolic counsel, evangelic doctrine, and the example of the early Christian converts. A corruption of language and of manners has crept in, and is adopted by many Christian professors, in the present day. The Society of Friends having seen this, and being gathered in early times as a 'people turned to a pure language,' I marvel not at their setting a cautious guard against innovations."

7th mo. 14th, 1832.

John Churchman, in allusion to a meeting he attended, says: "I thought the beauty and solemnity of the meeting were a little marred by one Friend speaking too long; to begin in the life, and conclude in the power and life, is becoming a minister of the gospel."

For "The Friend."

Excursion to Brown's Mills, N. J.

On the 24th of 7th mo., a little company of three concluded to explore the swamps about the head-waters of one of the branches of the Rancocas in the section of white sand barrens referred to in the lively and instructive article of J. S. L., describing his trip to Hamonton, N. J. We left the railroad which runs from Camden to Whiting's, at Brown's Mills station, and soon entered a swamp, which however unpromising to the eye of an agriculturist, was rich in floral treasures, and very inviting to a botanist. It was with a somewhat excited feeling of exultation, that we saw before us the side-saddle plant (now in fruit), the white pond lilies, the bright yellow polygalas, and nearly all of the plants described by J. S. L., as well as many others.

Barren as this section of country appears to be, it is the favorite abode of two plants of considerable economic value—the Cranberry and the White Cedar.

The Cranberry, Vaccinium macrocarpon, grows in considerable abundance in low swampy grounds. The stem trails on the ground, and sends up short shoots with very small heath-like leaves, and handsome, though not very conspicuous, flowers. The fruit is a round berry which, as it matures, assumes a beautiful red color, mingled with white, with which we are all so familiar. Its lively and agreeable acid taste, when modified by the sugar with which it is cooked, renders it a general favorite. The principal supply is obtained from artificial plantations, which are carefully made in positions—such as the old mill-ponds in the pine barrens—where a supply of water is available to flood the plants at proper seasons, which kills out intruding weeds, and promotes the vigorous growth of the fruit. The flowering season was almost past, and though we saw a few plants in bloom, far more of them were adorned by the young berries. The New Jersey species bears a larger fruit than the species which is found to the northward—as is signified by its specific name—"macrocarpon," which means "large-fruited."

The reader may naturally think, that though old mill-ponds may make good locations for cranberry bogs, yet the water-powers connected with them must be too valuable to be sacrificed for such a use. It is a thinly settled and unproductive part of the land, and one who travels through it on any of the lines of railroad leading to the ocean, will pass through miles of bush land or low pine and oak woods, burnt and stunted. The forests which once covered it, furnished logs for the saw-mills, and fuel for the glass-works and iron furnaces which were located in their midst. As the trees were cut down and consumed, the mills and furnaces which depended upon them ceased to be profitable as business enterprises. The extension of railroad lines through this country has been followed by a constant succession of fires, which in dry weather are kindled by the sparks of the passing locomotives, and overrun these lands; while rarely is an attempt made to extinguish them; so that they burn till the material is exhausted, or till a fall of rain prevents their spread. We saw several fires during our day's excursion—some of them quite limited in extent, but two were of greater magnitude. These fires prevent the growth of the timber through a large section of the Jersey Pine barrens, and thus render the land practically almost valueless; for the soil will not yield crops that pay for ordinary cultivation, and its power of producing timber was almost the only element of value about it. We need not be surprised, therefore, at the readiness manifested by the owners to turn their neglected mill-ponds into revenue-producing cranberry-bogs.

The White Cedar, Cupressus thyoides, grows in the swamps. The wood though soft is durable, and highly valued. The trees grow very closely together, and the foliage is principally confined to the tops. They are much used for fencing, being cut off when sufficiently large, and a new growth allowed to take the place of the old. A good piece of cedar swamp is regarded as quite valuable. The Cedar belongs to the same natural family as the Pine, the Coniferae, or cone-bearing plants. In this division, the young embryo, from which the seed develops, is not enclosed in a covering as is the case with all other plants that bear flowers, but is formed as a naked mass, generally on the upper side of scales which thicken and constitute the cone. In the course of our walk we saw but little cedar swamp remaining.

Meeting with one of the people who live in that section, we entered into conversation, and were rather curious to know how he managed to make a living and support his family. He had been much of the day picking the upland huckleberries which are found in the pines,—of which he had collected perhaps a quart. We found that in winter his business was burning charcoal. He was a good-natured fellow, and voluntarily went with us some distance to show us a path through the woods leading towards Brown's Mills. Though he asked no reward, yet his free-will service was at least as profitable to him as his huckleberry gathering. One of our company, who had held a judicial position for many years, said that this section of country furnished to the courts an unusual number of cases of violation of the law. This was owing to the fact that the openings for business employment were now so few, that the better class of the community went elsewhere to reside.

Much of the surface of the swamps and of the shallow bodies of water was covered with peat moss, Sphagnum, which is exceedingly abundant. As this dies away below, it continues to grow at the summit. The leaves contain large cells filled with water which gives the plant its remarkable power of retaining moisture for a long time, and peculiarly fits it for the use to which it is largely applied, as a packing material around the roots of living plants sent out by nurserymen. Among this moss grew in abundance the different species of Sun-Dew, Drosera. Of these, the Thread-leaved, D. filiformis was the most vigorous in growth, and many of the specimens were studded with small insects which had been entrapped by its glandular hairs, and were being slowly digested. The hairs when undisturbed, stand out straight from the leaf, but when an insect was captured, all those near were bent down over it like the clasping of the fingers of the human hand around an article held in it. We brought several specimens home with us, having taken the roots with them. They were placed in a dish with water, and continued for days afterwards to unfold in succession pink flowers, as the stem gradually unrolled the coil in which it first appears.

In the moss we found also many young pitcher plants, with leaves about an inch in length, and the cups just beginning to develop at their extremity. These must have come from the seed of the previous year, for the seed vessels of this year's growth were yet unopened.

The Arrow-head, Sagittaria variabilis, I had been familiar with in former years, in Chester county, Pa., as a common resident in moist grounds, where its white flowers, and large smooth arrow-shaped leaves were conspicuous objects. But one who did not know the extremely variable nature of this plant, as to the shape of its leaves, would scarcely believe the specimens we found to belong to the same species. Instead of leaves six inches wide at the point where the lobes diverge, with each of the two receding lobes or projections at the base of the arrow, of at least half that width; the greatest width of our leaves was less than an inch, and the long back-ward pointing divisions were so narrow as to be almost grass-like in their shape.

The examination of the air-bladders on the sub-aqueous stems of the Utricularia which we gathered, failed to reveal any of those minute animals which have been found in them by other observers. This may have been owing to a want of power in the microscope used, to the plants being gathered at a different season of the year, or to a difference in habit of different species. But these bladders, under the microscope, were very beautiful objects, presenting an elegant tissue of network, with a central bubble of air, which the plant must have the power of secreting. The drop of water which contained the portion of utricularia under examination, furnished also some interesting objects belonging to the lower forms of vegetable life. But the manner of growth of these is too extensive a field to enter upon at this time, though full of interest.

We had hoped to meet with two ferns which have been found in the white sand region of New Jersey, both belonging to the same natural division of the ferns, and the only representatives of that division found in the Northern United States. One of these, the Schizaea pusilla, it was stated some years since, had been discovered in but three localities; I think, Newfoundland, Quaker Bridge in New Jersey, and the Falkland Islands. It is a very slender inconspicuous plant. The sterile fronds or leaves are only about an inch in height, resembling narrow grass leaves; and the fertile frond is a thread-like stem, 3 or 4 inches high, with a minute cluster of fruit about one-fourth of an inch long. The similarity of the soil at Brown's Mills to the white sand at Quaker Bridge, renders it not improbable that this delicate little fern will yet be discovered by sharper eyes than ours—especially as the kindred species, Lygodium palmatum, or climbing fern, is known to grow in the region we traversed.

J. W.

For "The Friend."

Westtown Boarding School.

At a stated meeting held 9th mo. 6th, 1837, "Benjamin Cooper, Jeffrey Smedley, Clayton Wistar and Charles Downing were appointed to advise with the Superintendent and to assist him in the selection of a suitable situation for a new orchard, and to take such other steps as may be expedient to insure a timely succession of good fruit for the use of the institution."*

11th mo. 21st. Special meeting called, at the request of several Friends, to consider the following proposal, viz: "As the house near the east end of the boys' lane at Westtown has become vacant, it is proposed that Cyrus Mendenhall remove into it, and that James Emlen occupy the infirmary, subject to the existing agreement with the farming committee relative to the appropriation of the building for the use of the sick, whenever it may be needed for that purpose; it being also understood that the committee be accommodated at the infirmary as heretofore. On consideration these changes were approved, and the clerk was directed to furnish the superintendent with a copy of this minute."

1st mo. 18th, 1838. The farming committee informing that Jos. Bailey desired to be released at an early period from the care of the farm, and that Hughes Bell was willing to take his place, they were authorized to make the change, to go into effect on the 1st of 4th mo. next.

4th mo. 5th, 1838. The committee on alterations and improvements in the boys' collecting-room, grounds, &c., report they have nearly completed the proposed improvement. "By removing the partitions of the entry and school-rooms on the first floor at the east end they have made a collecting-room about 30 by 55 feet, capable of accommodating with comfort 120 boys. New black walnut desks were provided, which it was believed would add to the comfort of the boys, and be likely to promote habits of order and neatness. The amount expended for these improvements being $668.39—besides $139.80 for the board of the workman—of which $675 has been contributed by Friends interested in the welfare of the school, and it is expected that most of the balance will be procured from similar resources. 'The basement story has been fitted up for a wash-room for the boys, and furnished with a stove, boilers, &c. The yard at the east end has been enlarged and inclosed with a good fence, the ground neatly laid out and soddied, or sown with grass-seed, and a number of trees and shrubs set out, and when the advance of spring shall have clothed it with verdure, it will present a pleasing aspect in approaching the Seminary. The playground under the shed north of the yard has been paved with brick, which is found to obviate the disadvantage experienced from the mud and dirt in wet weather."

Signed on behalf of the committee by Benjamin Cooper, Thos. Evans and others.

The appointment of an additional teacher on the boys' side was proposed, "with a view of opening a primary or elementary school, which seems to be required to prepare many of the pupils for the studies of the regular classes, which on consideration was agreed to, and the committee on teachers desired to nominate at a future meeting, a suitable person for this department."

"As much danger and inconvenience attend the present mode of warming the house and cooking, the following friends were appointed to give the subject careful consideration, and report to our next stated meeting what improvement can be made in this respect, with

* Some of the apple trees yet remain, north of the girls' grounds.

estimate of the expense of the proposed un-ge, viz: Philip Garrett, Thos. Evans and others.

Enoch Lewis, Henry Cope and Thomas umber, were appointed to examine and settle accounts of the school for the past year, and to prepare an essay of a report to the Yearly Meeting. At the adjourned meeting on the 13th inst., a report was presented in which the following is taken, viz: "It appears that the sum of $10,000 agreed to be paid by the Yearly Meeting has been nearly paid, but owing to the unusually high prices of provisions, and the cost of introducing a supply of wholesome water for the use of the school, the expense of conducting the institution has much exceeded the income for the last two years, leaving a deficiency in the fund raised for defraying in part the expense of educating the children of Friends in straitened circumstances of $1430.78, and in other years of $2482.21, amounting to nearly $4000, most of which interest is allowed by the school.

As it is evident that the present charge for board and tuition is considerably below the actual cost to the institution, the committee is united in recommending to the Yearly Meeting that the price be raised to $10 per annum," &c.

While it is very desirable that the price of board and tuition should be kept so low as to be within the reach of Friends generally, the committee are persuaded that it comports better with sound economy than with a faithless performance of the trust reposed in them.
We endeavor to improve and extend the course of instruction as far as it can be done consistently with the design of the Yearly Meeting for the establishment of this valuable institution, and it is hoped Friends will cherish it with a spirit of liberality commensurate with the important benefits it is calculated to confer on the youth of our Society. Trusting that, while it is conducted with reference to religious concern in which it originated, the Divine blessing will continue to attend our efforts for the advancement of so good a work.

THE TWO GATES.

Selected.

A pilgrim once (so runs an ancient tale),
Worn, and spent, crept down a shadowed vale!
On either hand rose mountains bleak and high,
And the gusty air, and dark the sky,
The path was rugged and his feet were bare;
His faded cheek was seamed by pain and care;
His heavy eyes upon the ground were cast,
And every step seemed feebler than the last.

The valley ended where a naked rock
Rose sheer from earth to heaven, as if to mock
The pilgrim who had crept that toilsome way;
And while his dim and weary eyes essayed
To find an outlet, in the mountain side
A ponderous, sculptured, brazen door he spied,
And, tottering toward it with fast failing breath,
Above the portal read, "The Gate of Death."

He could not stay his feet that led thereto;
He yielded to his touch, and passing through,
He came into a world all bright and fair;
Blue were the heavens, and balmy was the air;
And, lo! the blood of youth was in his veins,
And he was clad in robes that held no stains
Of his long pilgrimage. Amazed, he turned:
Behold! a golden door behind him burned
With that fair sunlight; and his wondering eyes,
Now lustreful and clear as those new skies,
Free from the mists of age, of care, and strife,
Above the portal read, "The Gate of Life."

—Harper's.

Selected.

"NOW I LAY ME DOWN TO SLEEP."

It is said of the late John Quincy Adams, that he never went to bed without repeating this little prayer, the first taught him by the mother whose memory was so dear to him to the last.

There are two little poems descriptive of a child saying this prayer, that are among the tenderest in our language, and we give them both. The first is from Putnam's Magazine, (now merged into Scribner's Monthly.)

Golden head, so lowly bending;
Little feet, so white and bare;
Dewy eyes, half shut, half opened—
Lisping out her evening prayer.

Well she knows when she is saying,
"Now I lay me down to sleep,"
'Tis to God that she is praying,
Praying Him her soul to keep.

Half asleep, and murmuring faintly,
"If I should die before I wake"— Tiny fingers clasped so saintly—
"I pray the Lord my soul to take."

O the rapture, sweet, unbroken,
Of the soul who wrote that prayer!
Children's myriad voices floating
Up to heaven, record it there.

If, of all that has been written,
I could choose what might be mine,
It should be that child's petition,
Rising to the throne divine.

Where the other originally appeared we do not know. It is called "The Unfinished Prayer," and is equally tender and beautiful:

"Now I lay—repeat it, darling"—
"Lay me," lipsed the tiny lips
Of my daughter, kneeling, bending
O'er her folded finger-tips.

"Down to sleep"—"to sleep," she murmured,
And the curly head bent low;
"I pray the Lord"—I gently added,
"You can say it all, I know."

"Pray the Lord"—the sound came faintly, Fainter still—"my soul to keep;"
Then the tired head fairly nodded,
And the child was fast asleep.

But the dewy eyes half opened
When I clasped her to my breast,
And the dear voice softly whispered,
"Mamma, God knows all the rest."
—Lutheran Home Monthly.

A little girl was anxious to know how the Lord took the evil spirit out of one and put in the good spirit, and after an attempt at explanation, said she would "like to have the bad taken out of her, if it wouldn't hurt any."
A great many older people would like to serve the Lord if there were no cross-bearing or self-denial in the way; but when there is anything that "hurts" they beg to be excused, regardless of the ten-fold deeper hurts and
"wounds without a cause" in the way of sin.

None can be a minister of Christ Jesus but in the eternal Spirit, which was before the Scriptures were given forth; for if they have not his Spirit, they are none of his. Though they may have his light, them that hate it, yet they can never bring any into unity and fellowship in the Spirit except they be in it.
—George Fox.

I am sometimes comforted in the belief that there are a number meeting with us on First-days, not in membership, who are seeking the blessed Truth for themselves; reviving the language, "Other sheep have I not of this fold, them also will I bring, and there shall be one fold and one Shepherd.—H. Gibbons.

An Address, Issued by the Executive Committee of the Society for Home Culture, of Philadelphia, at the close of the Term 1881-82.

Another year in the existence of the Society for Home Culture is drawing to its close, and as we take a comprehensive survey of the work accomplished under its auspices—our gains and our losses—we find encouragement from the fact that, although the whole number of pupils who have shared in its benefits is smaller than in any preceding year, most of the heads of departments bear testimony to a livelier interest on the part of the students and correspondents, and a consequent increase of thoroughness. This falling off in numbers has been probably owing to want of time on the part of some, and on the part of others to unfounded fear of the amount of intellectual effort expected.

Lest the objects of our Association may be misapprehended or its aims overestimated, we would say, that these have always been and continue to be simple and limited in their scope. They do not tend to stimulate unduly a mere love for science, nor do they seek to promote a knowledge of literature beyond that which may be reasonably looked for from persons of average culture and acquirements.

The education of the mind and character is so inseparably connected with our highest interests that we need to approach its consideration with a reverent feeling of responsibility and a desire that all our aims and methods may be shaped in accordance with the Divine will, and so promote and not frustrate his purposes.

In the education of children this responsibility rests with the instructors, but in the association which we have undertaken, in which all have reached a time for more mature thoughtfulness, it is a matter of mutual con-cernment. Those who offer their help should see that they hold out no inducements to absorb any time or attention which rightly belongs to family, social, or religious duties, and the inward retirement which is needed for the nourishment of the spiritual life.
Those who avail themselves of the help should be governed by a single-hearted desire to improve the talent or talents committed to their keeping for the good of society. While enjoying with thankfulness the pleasure which it is intended we should receive from mental exercise and the acquiring of new knowledge, they should seek to have their spirits so subjected as to be freed from any unworthy ambition to excel or temptation to undue indulgence of their intellectual tastes.

We have reason to be thankful for the growing disposition to regard the acquisition of knowledge as subordinate to the cultivation of the powers of observation and reasoning, and also to recognize that the work of our school-days is only the beginning of that which must go on with our advancing years.
The power of sound minds, trained in right habits of thinking, furnished with general knowledge sufficient for the formation of broad and clear views of truth, and informed and guided by a wisdom better than our own, is greatly needed at the present day. Questions of profound importance are agitating the world, and warped and distorted conceptions of truth and right are brought into conflicts with each other which cannot be settled but by the presentation of higher and clearer views.

We as a religious Society are highly accountable for the privilege of having been educated in a practical belief in immediate Divine guidance, and the duty of reverent silent waiting to receive it. While this induces a calmness of mind, an impartiality of feeling, and humility of spirit very helpful to the judgment, we also find ourselves, if we are faithful to our own principles, naturally freed, as we approach social or religious questions, from many prepossessions and confusing considerations which have troubled the world. We need therefore, under a feeling of responsibility for this in the Divine sight, to seek for ourselves and our children, minds well informed and exercised in clear thinking; so that our judgments on the many subjects which greatly affect the true welfare of the community may be intelligent; that thus happily, they may be felt to be those of men and women who seek to know and desire to do the will of Him whose purpose is to shape all things to the good of mankind and his glory; and may also inspire confidence as being founded on a full understanding of the subjects, and have the influence which the power of clear expression gives.

The human mind needs food and exercise just as surely as the body; if it be denied these it can never develop into the instrument of power and usefulness which it is meant to be, any more than can the physical frame when deprived of proper nourishment, or kept in inactivity. The effect of mental starvation will show itself differently in different natures; in one case, the sluggish mind will simply run to waste, occupying itself feebly with trifles, with scarcely any appreciation of the faculties for which it is responsible. On the other hand, active spirits, craving knowledge, eager for mental employment, will be too apt to seize upon any books which may happen to be within reach, and, hasty and undisciplined in thought, with little knowledge of good and evil, and with no friend to counsel or to warn, may be led unawares into the wilds of scientific scepticism and materialism, or become enervated by the feverish atmosphere of sensational literature; while in the large number of cases to which these extremes do not apply, there will result more or less of lazy or careless habits of mind. To all such, as well as to those who only need a little assistance, the Society for Home Culture wishes to hold out a helping hand. The aims which it puts before itself are three:—sympathetic, wholesome stimulus to mental exercise, careful responsible guidance in the selection of books, and systematic training in clearness of apprehension, of thought and of expression. Nor must it be imagined that the Society assumes the position of a taskmaster, that it sets up any standard of attainment or any fixed requirement as to the amount of work to be accomplished in a given time; this must vary with varying circumstances. The sole desire of those engaged in the work is to help the students to make the most of their opportunities, and to increase these by offering the use of the lending library, free of charge.

Many of our young friends, who with ripening years may secretly regret that their school-days are ended, and yet would fain increase the stock of useful knowledge they have already gained, or pursue somewhat further certain branches of study in which they have become especially interested, might thus profitably occupy the periods of leisure which are still at their own disposal. The advancement which is being made in every department of knowledge is rapid and great; and we feel that the younger members of the Society of Friends should not be greatly deficient in their share of what has been thus added to the common stock. An acquaintance with what is really valuable as to the results of modern discovery or research is most desirable, in order that they may fill worthily their places in the domestic and social circle, and aid in the discouragement of unprofitable subjects of conversation; and especially, that they may be able the more effectively to cope with various forms of error when presented to them.

The position which our religious Society is meant to hold in the world cannot be advanced or even retained if an unwarrantable ignorance is permitted among its members. While, therefore, holding firmly to those exalted views of Christian truth and practice which are the rich inheritance received from our forefathers in Christian profession, we cannot but feel that, if we would fully prepare the rising generation for the work of their day, we must see to it that their minds, as well as their hearts are being trained for that wider field of usefulness which we believe is opening before Friends as an important branch of the professing church.

With a hearty sympathy in every commendable effort of our beloved younger members towards improving the talents which have been committed to them, yet conscious of the dangers and temptations to which they are continually exposed, our desires are still strong and deep to aid them, so far as the Society for Home Culture can, both tenderly and wisely; and we thus enter upon a new year craving that the Divine blessing may rest upon them and upon our labors in their behalf.

For "The Friend."

Natural History, Science, &c.

Biology and Agriculture.—Recent advances in our knowledge of the lowest forms of life have tended to bring into prominence, not only their relation to disease, but the ever-increasing importance of the part which they play in our arts and industries. Probably in none of the industrial arts, save those concerned with fermentation, commonly so-called, has the progress of this branch of biology shown such remarkable development as in its bearing on the art of agriculture.

We believe that Pasteur was the first to suggest, twenty years ago, that the process of nitrification going on in soils and waters might be due to the agency of an organism; but it was not until the last five years that researches conclusively showed that this is the case, and that the organism is a bacterium. This bacterium is present in all fertile surface soils, and under proper conditions is continually converting ammonia and nitrogenous organic matter, which has passed the putrefactive stage, into nitrates. That nitrates are the chief form from which most crops and especially the cereals assimilate their nitrogen is now admitted generally; the very great use of this nitrifying organism is thus apparent. It may be remarked in passing that this Schizomycete is able to effect a change in a mineral substance, ammonia, causing oxidation into nitric acid, all other known organized ferments being concerned in transformation of organic bodies, and this an operation hitherto unsuspected in the case of any Bacteria.

The bacterium of nitrification is but one of a great number of the lower forms of now engaging the attention of scientific men which are, or ought to be, of immense interest to the scientific pursuit of agriculture. The researches of Pasteur on the life-history of Bacillus of Anthrax, and the study of the organisms, concerned in the changes which occur during the souring of milk and the ripening of cheese, are kindred studies bearing in a direct manner on the daily practice of the farmer. The investigations into the too well-known coffee-leaf disease, and the fungus of potato disease, point to the growing relation between the kindred sciences of biology and agriculture.—Nature.

A Salt Mine Two Thousand Years Old.—A mine has been found in the mountain near Salzberg, Austria, which gives indications having been occupied and abandoned at least two thousand years ago. It contains a large and confused mass of timbers, which were used for support, and a number of mine implements. The timbers were notched and sharpened, but were subject to an inundation and left in confused heaps. The implements were mainly wooden shovels, axe-handles, &c. Among the relics, also, was a basket, made of untanned raw-hide, a piece of cloth woven of coarse wool, the fibre of which is very even and still in good preservation, and a torc bound together with flax-fibre. The probabilities are, that the ancient salt-miners were overtaken by the flooding of the mine, mummified bodies have been discovered, also. The find seems to have belonged to the pre-Roman times, as the axe-handles were evidently used for bronze axes, specimens of which have been found upon the surface of the mountain. The relics are of a high order, the basket being superior even to some that were used in the early historic times.—American Antiquarian.

The Tussock Moth.—The tussock moth (Orygia leucostigma) is one of those injurious insects the ravages of which might be entirely prevented by sufficient care at the proper time. The caterpillar is prettily marked with red, yellow, and white, and may at once be recognized by the long dusky tufts of hair which project like horns in front, and which appear to form a tail behind. It infests nearly all kinds of trees, including the maple, horse-chestnut, and apple, frequently preventing the fruitage of the latter. This season it is so numerous in the city as to become a nuisance, and the sparrows are unable to suppress it on account of the long stinging hair with which it is protected. Among garden plants I have observed that these caterpillars show a decided preference for the bergamot, collecting in numbers upon that plant, while others remain comparatively free. Availing myself of this liking, I have this year fed a number and have witnessed their change from the caterpillar to the moth. When fully grown, the caterpillar ceases eating and soon spins itself a small white silken cocoon, and passes into the chrysalis state; here it remains for a period varying from a few days to two three weeks. The females usually emerge with wings so small as to be wholly useless in flight; indeed, these are merely scales representing wings, but on the other hand I have had fully-winged specimens which laid eggs. In most cases, however, the mother does not leave the cocoon from which she has emerged, but clinging to it with her feet, she deposits on the outside from one to two hundred eggs; these are very minute, much smaller than a mustard-seed, and yellowish color. When all are laid, she deposits upon them a covering of froth, completely hiding them from view if looked at from the outside, though the eggs are distinctly visible underneath. In a short time this froth hardens and becomes of a snowy whiteness, making the mass of eggs a conspicuous object, less than an inch in length and not a half inch broad. At the present time there are probably not one dozen trees in the city which are free from the cocoons and eggs of the moth, and window-sills, doorways, brick walls, and board fences are lined with them wherever a safe shelter is afforded. Probably every foot of coping in the city will show them safely ensconced below. I have seen them so closely packed as almost to touch each other. At least one-half of these cocoons must be counted as females, and from this we may judge what the prospect for another year is likely to be.

The cocoons ought to be removed and reared as fast as they are formed during the summer, and the eggs at any time they are in, summer or winter.—Graceanna Lewis, Friends' Intelligencer.

Device of a Crow.—In places where pheasants are preserved, it is customary to give them their food in such a way that other birds cannot get at it. This is done by placing it in a feeding-box, which is closed by a lid, communicating by a lever with a perch. The weight of the lid is so adjusted that when a pheasant stands on the perch the lid is raised, and the bird can get at the food. The pheasants soon learn the object of the perch, for, when these boxes are first introduced, a few pheasants are laid on the outside of the lid. The bird gets on the perch in order to reach them, and so exposes the stores of food in the box. Such an arrangement is made at Mountquarrie, Cupar, Fife; and one day a gentleman was watching the pheasants and their boxes on the lawn just before the house, and saw a crow also watching them. Presently the crow flew to one of the boxes, settled upon the perch and expected the box to open. The bird, however, being much lighter than a pheasant, was unable to lift the lid in spite of its efforts. After several ineffectual attempts it flew off to a tree where there was another crow, and a grand jabbering ensued. The two crows then flew to the feeding-box, both settled on the perch, and their united weight was sufficient to raise the lid.—J. G. Wood in Man and Beast.

THE FRIEND.

EIGHTH MONTH 26, 1882.

We have received from Friends in Great Britain several pamphlets and printed slips, which show that efforts are being used to read, through the press, sound sentiments on war and other subjects. Four of these are entitled, "Peace Conference Papers," and are the report of the proceedings, and the papers read at a Conference on Peace held at Leeds in the 11th month of 1881. They point out the anti-Christian nature and tendency of war—the duty of Christians in relation to this monstrous evil—and the enormous evils, political, financial and moral which flow from the military establishments of civilized nations. Among other points to which the attention of the reader is called, is the strong tendency of standing armies and military preparations to produce hostile collisions. "War is a profession. The soldier in times of peace can hope for little or no promotion, has little chance of financially bettering his condition, no chance of booty, no opportunity of distinguishing himself or illustrating the military ability whereof he may deem himself possessed. Peace, so full of blessings to the nation at large, to him is idleness, and mere decay and frustration of his ambition. It is not reasonable that men highly trained, perfectly disciplined, conscious of vigor and ability and enthusiasm, whose professional future depends largely on opportunities for distinguishing themselves, should do otherwise than chafe at an inactivity which they regard as inglorious, and which, from their point of view, certainly is unprofitable."

"The War-System of Europe" is an 8 page tract issued by the Peace Society at London, and contains a mass of facts and arguments presented in a vigorous and concise style. It is an interesting and effective protest against the military system—which as the Hungarian statesman, Francis Deak, remarked, "reminds me of the state of things in the Middle Ages, when men wore coats of mail, which in the supposed necessity of more effectual self-defence, they went on increasing in weight, until at last they became so crushingly heavy as to weigh down their wearers altogether, and then from sheer necessity the custom was abandoned."

"The Crisis in Egypt," apparently issued by the "Anti-aggression League," argues that the armed intervention in Egyptian affairs by the British Government is inconsistent with the principles advocated by William Gladstone in the contest which drove Lord Beaconsfield from office; and that it is one of the unjustifiable intermeddlings in the internal business of other people of which English history furnishes so many disgraceful examples. The author of this address endeavors to give his readers a view of the feelings of the Egyptian people, who though very poor, are subjected to an excessively high taxation, one-half of the proceeds of which is sent out of the country to pay foreign bond-holders for money loaned at a high rate of interest to a former Khedive, and mostly spent in extravagant ways which did not promote the welfare of the general population. He says: "Imagine your own feelings, if you had to send every year some forty millions sterling out of the taxes of the country to pay Turkish or Arab or Chinese bond-holders; and then, having paid that regularly, that you had to keep a Turkish pasha and a Chinese mandarin in London to control your expenditure, so that every penny of the Budget had to get the sanction of their excellencies, and if Mr. Gladstone or any other Chancellor of the Exchequer wished to put on or take off a tax, down would come a fleet of iron-clads from the Bosphorus into the Thames, and train their 80-ton guns right in view of the Tower and Somerset House. That is the state of Egypt now."

The sincere love we bear to the English people leads us to mourn over every departure from Christian principle in its government, being well assured, that in the righteous judgments of God, retribution will follow in some shape; that it is righteousness alone which exalts a nation; and that sin is not only a reproach but a curse to any people.

SUMMARY OF EVENTS.

UNITED STATES.—The Department of State, at Washington, has information of an anti-foreign insurrection in Corea, and that the situation there is regarded as critical. Until the return of the Monocacy, which has been ordered to Corea, the details cannot be definitely learned.

The Choctaws in the Indian Territory are greatly excited because President Arthur signed the bill granting the St. Louis and San Francisco Railroad the right of way through their nation.

The Cree Indians are reported to be much discontented at the inroads which the various projected railway lines will make into their hunting grounds, and threats are freely made against any surveyors who may begin operations on their reservation.

Word was received from Pine Ridge Agency, Dakota, that Red Cloud, "who has been sullen ever since he was deposed from the chieftainship of the Sioux by General Crook, and for this reason deposed by the Agent from the chieftainship of his own band," has warned the Agent to leave the agency by the first of Tenth month. A general council of chiefs, head men and Indians at the Agency, have sworn allegiance to the police. Dr. MacGillivuddy, on the 21st inst., telegraphed to Indian Commissioner Price that Red Cloud and the hostile Sioux, at the Pine Ridge Agency, are completely disconcerted; that Red Cloud is on parole, and that the chiefs and police are responsible for his conduct.

The Pan Handle coal miners went to work on the 21st inst., at the reduced rate. Their struggle with the operators lasted 4½ months, and cost the defeated strikers about $250,000 in wages. The striking freight-handlers of the New York, Lake Erie and Western Railroads, at a meeting on the night of the 21st, in Jersey City, denounced those who induced them to strike, renounced the Union "now and forever," and requested the Company to permit them to resume their work.

The Convention called to meet at Duluth, Min., on Third-day, to organize a movement for the construction of a canal to connect Lake Superior with the waters of the Red River of the North, the Assiniboine, Saskatchewan, and other large navigable rivers in British America, closed its labors by adopting resolutions calling on Congress for aid, and on the State Legislature for support in the appeal to Congress.

There were 439 deaths in Philadelphia for the week ending 8th mo. 19th, as compared with 406 for the previous week, and 400 for the corresponding week of last year. Of the whole number 209 were males and 230 females; 135 were under one year old; 68 died of cholera infantum, 58 of consumption, 42 of marasmus, 19 of inflammation of stomach and bowels, and 7 each of diphtheria and typhoid fever.

Markets, &c.—U. S. 3½'s, 101½; 4½'s, registered, 113½; coupon, 114½; 4's, 119½; currency 6's, 133.

Cotton.—Prices remain about the same as last quoted. Sales of middlings are reported at 13¼ a 13½ cts. per lb. for uplands and New Orleans.

Petroleum.—Standard white, 6½ cts. for export, and 7¼ cts. per gallon for home use.

Flour is quiet, but choice sound old wheats are firm. Unsound and sour springs and new winter are weak. Sales of 2000 barrels, including sour, at $5.75 a $6; Minnesota extras, at $6.50 a $6.75 for clear, and at $7 a $7.50 for straight; Pennsylvania extra family at $5.15 a $5.37; western do. do. at $5.75 a $6.25, and patents at $7 a $8.75. Rye flour is dull at $3.50 a $3.75.

Grain.—Wheat is in light demand, and options a shade lower. Sales of 7700 bushels Southern at $1.14 for red, and $1.17 for amber. Rye is nominal at 75 cts. for prime new. Corn is dull and weak for local lots, and futures are also lower. Sales of 8000 bushels, including sail mixed, at 90 cts.; steamer at 88 a 88½ cts.; No. 3 at 87 a 87½ cts. Oats are quiet, but firm. Sales of 10,000 bushels, including new white, at 75 a 80 cts.;

new mixed at 70 a 71 cts., and new rejected at 70 a 72 cts. Old whites are nominal at 77 a 80 cts.

Hay and Straw Market, for week ending 8th mo. 19th, 1882.—Loads of hay, 346; loads of straw, 44. Average price during the week—Prime timothy, 90 cts. to $1 per 100 pounds; mixed, 80 cts. to 90 cts. per 100 pounds; straw, 60 to 70 cts. per 100 pounds.

Beef cattle were in fair demand, but prices were a fraction lower: 4000 head arrived and sold at the different yards at 4 a 8 cts. per pound, as to condition.

Sheep were without essential change: 14,000 head sold at the different yards at 2½ a 5½ cts., and lambs at 3 a 7½ cts. per pound, as to quality.

Hogs were firmly held: 3200 head sold at the different yards at 11½ a 12½ cts. per lb., as to quality.

FOREIGN.—In Dublin on the 16th inst., E. Dwyer Gray, Member of Parliament and proprietor of the Freeman's Journal, was sentenced to three months' imprisonment and to pay a fine of £500 for contempt of Court, in publishing a letter of O'Brien, editor of the United Ireland, accusing the jury which convicted Francis Hynes of the murder of John Doloughy, of being drunk on the night previous to the day their verdict was given, and an article commenting thereon. O'Brien and Davitt were put out of Court. E. D. Gray, after being sentenced, was handed over to the custody of the City Coroner. The latter evinced some reluctance to take charge of him, but Judge Lawson called upon him to do his duty. The Coroner, whose intervention was necessary, because Gray is High Sheriff of the city of Dublin, then conveyed the prisoner to the Richmond prison. Gray, at the expiration of his term, must find sureties—himself for £5000, and two others in £2000 each. The decision of the Court has caused a great sensation. The prisoner was Lord Mayor of Dublin for 1880, and was nominated a second time for 1881, but declined to serve the office. Judge Lawson refused to adjourn the case to allow Gray to be represented by counsel. Subscriptions are flowing in towards the fund for the payment of the fine. The list is headed by the names of Catholic Bishops. The Corporation of Dublin has passed a resolution of sympathy with Gray. The resolution describes Gray's imprisonment as arbitrary and oppressive, and expresses the opinion that proceedings for contempt should be regulated by statute. The Conservative members of the Corporation were absent from the meeting which passed the resolution.

Thirteen suspects, who were arrested under the Coercion act, have been released from Enniskillen prison.

A meeting of the Suez Canal Company was held at Paris on the 20th inst., at which resolutions were passed declaring that it is the duty of the company to uphold the claims already made in favor of the neutrality of the canal, and to oppose all warlike measures taken by England, acting in her assumed character as supporter of the Khedive. The resolutions state that the company's concession cannot be disturbed, even by the Sultan, and that the company reserves to itself the right to claim, before a competent tribunal, compensation from England eventually.

A despatch to the St. James' Gazette from Berlin says that the Germans who suffered loss by the bombardment of Alexandria have petitioned the German Government to claim compensation for their losses from England.

The Post understands that the Porte has countermanded the military preparations for the expedition to Egypt, and declines to accept the British conditions for a military convention.

A despatch to the Daily Telegraph from Constantinople says the Porte refuses to permit the exportation from Turkey of mules for British service in Egypt. Lord Dufferin, the British Ambassador, states that this is a contravention of treaty rights, and has addressed a strong protest to the Porte, stating that Turkey will be held responsible for heavy damages.

General Sir Garnet Wolseley, the English commander, with the authority of the Khedive, has issued a proclamation to the people of Egypt, representing the sole object of the British to be to restore the authority of the Khedive. It says all peaceful inhabitants will be kindly treated, the mosques will be respected, and all supplies paid for. General Wolseley adds that he will be glad to receive all chiefs who are disposed to assist in repressing the rebellion.

London, 8th mo. 20th.—The Eastern Telegraph Company announces that Port Said was occupied at 3 o'clock this morning by the English forces. At 2.30 o'clock this afternoon earthworks had been thrown up between the European and Arab quarters of the town. Seventeen transports and five men-of-war are at Port Said, and Admiral Seymour and General Sir Garnet Wolseley are both here. This morning Ismailia was also occupied by the British, and the rebel troops were driven from Nefick. The British have possession of the telegraph line from Port Said to Suez. The fleet and transports have since that time entered the canal.

A meeting of Bonapartists was held in Paris on the 15th inst., which was attended by 4000 persons. Among those present were De Cassagnac and Amigues. Resolutions were passed favoring the placing of Prince Victor Napoleon upon the throne of France. De Cassagnac made a speech, in which he declared that the Imperialists were ready for power and meant to take it.

The correspondent of the London Standard at Madrid says the spirit of the peasantry is becoming strongly socialistic in the provinces noted since the revolution of 1868 for the republican inclination of their large towns. The press says the state of affairs in Andalusia is serious, and requires prompt remedy. All the relief doled out by the Government in Andalusia, Estremadura, Galicia, Aragon and Catalonia has proved unavailing. Several acts of brigandage have occurred near Granada.

The correspondent of the Standard at Vienna telegraphs that the situation in Roumania is becoming very disquieting. The Russians have, apparently, commenced their old intrigues. Russian officers are frequently found on the Lower Danube studying the passages of the river and noting the Roumanian garrisons. Moldavia and the Dobrukscha are the chief headquarters of the Russian intrigue.

Despatches from Pietermaritzburg report that small pox is rapidly spreading in Cape Town. The Malay population resist isolation and treatment. The mortality is great.

The Jesuits of Quebec are agitating, as a matter of justice, for the restitution to them of all their property confiscated during the reign of Henry IV., of France.

RECEIPTS.

Received from Joshua T. Ballinger, Agent, for Susan B. Doan, Edward H. Hall, Rachel E. Woodward, Elizabeth M. Worth, and Lydia Yearsley, Pa., Mary E. Hall, O., and Mary H. Hambleton, Io., $2.10 each, vol. 56; from Sabina Hancock, Pa., $2.10, vol. 56; from James Maulsby, Agent, Ind., for Isaiah George, $2.10, to No. 27, vol. 56, and for Amos Whitson, Sarah Mills and Esther Mills, $2.10 each, vol. 56; from William J. Jenks, City, $2, vol. 56; from Sarah Hoopes, Pa., $2.10, vol. 56, and for John Hoopes, $2.10, vol. 56; from John Aikins, Pa., $2.10, vol. 56, and for Levi Aikins, $2.10, vol. 56; from Julianna N. Powell and Esther A. Haines, N. J., per Samuel Haines, $2.10 each, vol. 56; for Lydia Thompson, Io., and Emma Williams, Pa., $2.10 each, vol. 56; from John Letchworth, N. J., $2.10 vol. 56; for Elizabeth Mendenhall, O., $2.10, vol. 56; from Mary L. Evans, W. Philada., $2.10 vol. 56; from George S. Garrett, Pa., $2.10 vol. 56; from Aaron Mekeel, N. Y., for Sarah E. Haight, $2.10, vol. 56, and for Elizabeth Mekeel, $2.10, to No. 13, vol. 57; from John M. Sager, Pa., $2.10, vol. 56; from Joshua Haight, Agent, N. Y., $2.10, vol. 56, and for Levi H. Atwater, H. S. Haight, and William Breckon, $2.10 each, vol. 56; from Jacob Barrett, O., $2.10, vol. 56; from Jacob Roberts, Pa., $2.10, vol. 56; from George Sharpless, Agent, Pa., $1.10, to No. 52, vol. 56, and for Morris Cope, Isaac Good, Margaret Maule, Maria Pusey, Palmer Good, Robert W. Lewis, J. Borton Hayes, Hannah N. Harry, Margaretta J. Mercer, Mary Ann Wickersham, Mary Ann Chambers, and Joshua Sharpless, Pa., and Lydia Sharpless, N. J., $2.10 each, vol. 56; from Esther H. Griffen, N. Y., $2.10, vol. 56; from William Kite, Gtn., $2.10, vol. 56, and for Thomas Kite, O., $2.10, vol. 56; from Francis Bartley, Mich., $2.10, to No. 22, vol. 57; from Henry Wood, N. J., $2.10, vol. 56, and for George Wood and William C. Ivins, N. J., and Lewis Toft, Md., $2.10 each, vol. 56; from Elizabeth Hunt, O., $2.10, vol. 56; from William H. Brown, Gtn., $2.10, vol. 56; from William Evans, City, $2, vol. 56; from William Berry, Gtn., $2.10, vol. 56; from George Abbott, N. J., $2.10, vol. 56; from Priscilla M. Lippincott, N. J., $2.10, vol. 56; from Robert P. Lovett, Pa., $2.10, vol. 56, and for Elizabeth Satterthwaite, $2.10, vol. 56; for Phebe Coutant, O., $2.10, vol. 56; from Anna M. Warrington, Pa., $2.10, vol. 56, and for Curtis H. and T. Francis Warrington, $2.10 each, vol. 56; from R. B. Jones, Pa., $2.10, vol. 56; from Ezra Embree, Kansas, $2.10, vol. 56; from James S. Newbold, Pa., $2.10, vol. 56; from Benjamin Gilbert, Agent, Pa., $2.10, vol. 56, and for Joshua Cope, Albert Cope, Mary M. Price and Dillon Gibbons, $2.10 each, vol. 56; from Margaret P. Warner, Pa., $2.10, vol. 56; from Bartram Kaighn, N. J., $2.10, vol. 56; from Isaac Sharpless, Pa., $2.10, vol. 56; from Ruth A. Crandall, R. I., $2.10, vol. 56; from Caleb Wood, City, $2, vol. 56; from William Pickett, O., $2.10, vol. 56; from Edward Sharpless, N. J., $2.10, vol. 56; from

Richard B. Bailey, Pa., $2.10, vol. 56, and for Frank Worth, $2.10, vol. 56; from Samuel Williams, N. J., $2.10, vol. 56, and for George Williams, $2.10, vol. 56; from Thomas Twining, N. Y., $2.10, vol. 56; from Joseph Wing, Mass., $2.10, vol. 56; from Char Stokes, Agent, N. J., for George Haines, Jr., Mart H. Allen, George Haines, Elizabeth T. Engle, a John W. Stokes, N. J., and Priscilla M. Evans, Gt $2.10 each, vol. 56; from James R. Cooper, Pa., $2.1 vol. 56, and for Charles Cooper, Lettice Thompson, a Thomas B. Hoopes, $2.10 each, vol. 56; from Jam J. Lord and Lewis Stokes, N. J., per George P. Stoke $2.10 each, vol. 56; from Thomas M. Harvey, Agen Pa., $2.10, vol. 56, and for Clarkson Moore, Harve Murray, Rebecca S. Conard, Sen., Zebedee Haine Samuel Hoopes, George T. Satterthwaite, William Wickersham, Thomas H. Whitson and Lewis Forsyth Pa., and Sarah B. Chambers, Del., $2.10 each, vol. 56 from Enoch S. Zelle, N. J., $2.10, vol. 56; from Wi liam C. Buzby, N. J., $2.10, vol. 56; from Samuel I Wilkins, N. J., $2.10, vol. 56, and for Mary M. Wilkin $2.10, vol. 56; from William C. Allen, City, $2, vol. 56 from Ann Burgess, Pa., $2.10, vol. 56; from George I Smedley, Pa., $2.10, vol. 56; from Charles Darnel N. J., $2.10, vol. 56; from Mary Ann Baldwin, Pa $2.10, vol. 56, and for John E. Baldwin, $2.10, vol. 56 from M. Hodgson, Gtn., $2.10, vol. 56; from Jam Dennis, R. I., $2.10, vol. 56; from Martha T. Cox, Gtn $2.10, vol. 56; from George Blackburn, Agent, O $2.10, vol. 56, and for Theophilus Morlan, Josiah Fawcett, Catharine W. Darlington, Richard B. Fawcett Stacy Cook, William Fisher, Aaron Stratton, Thoma Y. French, Mark Bonsall, Barzillai French, Joh French, Sarah A. Cope, John M. Stratton, Sarah L Stanley, Ann Fawcett, Robert Miller, Amelia Maerkl Jonathan Blackburn, Charles Gamble, Mary French and Edward Bonsall, $2.10 each, vol. 56, and fo Samuel Street, $2.10, to No. 27, vol. 57; from William Carpenter, Agent, N. J., $2.10, vol. 56, and for Rebecca Wistar, Letitia Reeve, Ann D. Sinnickson, Josiah Wistar, John Wistar, Samuel P. Carpenter and Achsab S. Reeve, $2.10 each, vol. 56; from Mark Ballinger, N. J., $2.10, vol. 56; from Richard Buzby, N. J., $2.10 vol. 56; from Martin B. Holloway and John Vail, Io per Benjamin Vail, $2.10 each, vol. 56; from George W. Sheppard, N. J., $2.10, vol. 56; from Sarah H. Dutton, Fkfd., $2.10, vol. 56; from William Archut City, $2, vol. 56; from Walker Moore, Pa., $2.10, vol. 56, and for Andrew Moore, $2.10, vol. 56; from Joshua T. Ballinger, Agent, for Isaac Evans, Jr., Charles B. Sheppard, Sarah A. Harry, Susanna F. Sharpless, William P. Townsend, and George B. Mellor, Pa., Thomas Sharpless, Colorado, William T. Sharpless, W. Phila. and Thomas Thorp, Del., $2.10 each, vol. 56, and for Ann Sharpless, W. Town, $2, vol. 56; from Esther L. Jackson, Pa., $2.10, vol. 56; from Martha Evens, N. J., $2.10, vol. 56; from Henry R. Woodward, N. J., $2.10, vol. 56; from Mary B. Clement, N. J., $2.10, vol. 56; from Charles H. Shoemaker, Ind., $2.10, vol. 56; from Jane De Cou, N. J., $2.10, vol. 56. We have received $2.10 from Westfield, Ind., with no name attached.

Remittances received after Fourth-day morning will not appear in the Receipts until the following week.

MOORESTOWN ACADEMY.

This institution, under care of Chester Monthly Meeting of Friends, offers good opportunities for the instruction of youth, from 7 years upwards, under teachers of good attainments and qualifications, and subjected to moral and religious influences. Boarding may be obtained at reasonable rates.

Opens Ninth mo. 4th. Circulars and full information may be had from SETH WARRINGTON, Moorestown, Burlington Co., N. J., or WM. EVANS, 252 South Front St., Philadelphia.

NOTICE TO TEACHERS, PARENTS AND OTHERS.

The Yearly Meeting's Committee on Education have placed a book at Friends' Book Store, No. 304 Arch St., Philadelphia, where applications from teachers wishing situations, and committees who desire to employ teachers among Friends, may be recorded.

Please give address, and full particulars.

ELLISTON P. MORRIS, Clerk.

DIED, at his residence in Edgemont township, Delaware county, Pa., Second month 16th, 1882, JOHN MENDENHALL, in the 89th year of his age, an esteemed member of Middletown Preparative and Chester Monthly Meeting of Friends.

THE FRIEND.

A RELIGIOUS AND LITERARY JOURNAL.

OL. LVI.

SEVENTH-DAY, NINTH MONTH 2, 1882.

NO. 4.

PUBLISHED WEEKLY.

if paid in advance, $2.00 per annum; if not paid in advance $2.50; 10 cents extra is charged for Postage on those sent by mail.

Articles designed for insertion to be addressed to

JOSEPH WALTON,
MOORESTOWN, BURLINGTON Co., N. J.

scriptions, payments and business communications, received by

JOHN S. STOKES,
NO. 116 NORTH FOURTH STREET, UP STAIRS,
PHILADELPHIA.

For "The Friend."

Wanderings South and East.

(Continued from page 18.)

SOLOMON ISLANDS.

The Solomon Archipelago extends N. W. S. E. for the space of 200 leagues. It is composed of eight or ten principal islands, many others less considerable. Their general structure is that of a long chain of mountains. The people are fond of ornaments, but wear little or no clothing. Their canoes are exquisitely graceful, made of planks of wood and cemented with a sort of gum. The work expended on some of the more magnificent ones was quite surprising, in some cases there being many thousands of pieces of pearl shell, all carefully fitted and let-in in accordance with a quaint design.

At some points the natives have been utterly ruined by traders and whalers. W. says: "It is the old story; in Japan, China, in Africa, in the Sandwich Islands, if you will, the white man seems for a time only to change the vices of the natives. If he suppresses cannibalism he introduces drunkenness. If he improves the laws of humanity he makes more lax those of morality. I often feel that the difference between his wickedness and our wickedness is only of a kind."

They met with somewhat of an adventure on landing at a point on one of the Solomon Islands, where the natives have the reputation of being "the most treacherous and blood-thirsty of any known savages."

We went ashore at Palulaa one morning, going into a small estuary round which groves were growing in great quantities. When we arrived at the mouth of the little river itself we were somewhat surprised to find no canoes came off, and that there was a great number of natives on the shore. Getting nearer in we noticed that these natives were all men, and all armed with an unusual number of long spears and bows and arrows. Something was evidently about to take place, but what we could not tell. They did not shout or show us any welcome; they merely drew themselves up in line along the shore, their long spears standing up far above their heads, and having a most formidable appearance. There was no turning back, however, so we pulled on until the boat was grounded, and then jumped into the water and waded ashore. At first no one seemed to know us, nor could the bishop remember any face amongst the wild crowd, but he kept repeating the chief's name, and so we waited for some time, hoping for a friendly face. These men were evidently strangers, and did not know quite what attitude to assume. They made no actually hostile demonstration, but holding themselves aloof, shouted vociferously and seemed to be ready for anything that might turn up. There were no women and children near, and this little army was far more elaborately equipped than is usual in ordinary times. Their ornaments in some cases were most beautiful, one or two men wearing wide sashes, one might almost call them, of native bead-work, fringed with human teeth. The more elaborate of these were worn over the right shoulder, and round under the left arm. The colours were, as always in native workmanship, quiet and rich in tone and harmoniously arranged.

"After a rather awkward delay of twenty minutes or so, during which we laughed and talked amongst ourselves, and endeavored to appear quite at our ease, a merry old fellow arrived, who turned out to be the chief whom the bishop had seen on his former visit. This man spoke a few words to the crowd, evidently assuring them that he knew who we were, after which they were willing to trade in bows and arrows and spears and ornaments."

"We also made out with some difficulty that the assembling of these armed ruffians was on account of a feast to be given that night at the village; natives from far and wide had been asked, and were coming in all day long from the neighbourhood. The customs at these feasts are very curious. No part of the food provided, for instance, is eaten at the entertainment. Each guest, on the contrary, brings such provisions as are necessary for his own use during his stay, and takes his share of the feast away with him when he goes. Our idea of 'eat what you can, but pocket none,' is exactly reversed, and 'pocket what you can, but eat none,' is the Solomon Island practice. This custom is necessitated by the 'taboo' laws, which are so severe in this group that at a public feast it would be almost impossible to avoid some infringement of these complicated regulations; the difficulty is therefore avoided by the food being taken away and eaten at home. Without attempting any entrance upon so wide a field as the question of tabooing, I may illustrate the sort of complications that arise when the food is eaten on the spot by a single example. If after a meal a visitor should purposely or accidentally retain a morsel of the food, he is enabled thereby to exercise a mysterious influence over the giver of the feast. The host considering himself thus charmed will redeem the lost fragment at as high a figure as he can afford. A piece of betel nut was, at a feast on a neighbouring island, carried away by a guest a few weeks previous to our visit. The chief fell ill, and imagined something was wrong; at length he discovered what had taken place, and, although the man with the piece of betel nut was living far away, upon another island, sent across to him, and redeemed the fragment for forty dog's teeth, which is an equivalent for four thousand coconuts!"

"The curse of the northern Solomon Islands is an institution known as 'head-hunting.' The more savage tribes make collections of heads with which to adorn their houses, and are as assiduous in their search for these articles of vertu as any collector in Europe is for old china. The mere acquisition of such old heads among their own people as may turn up in the natural course of things, does not satisfy these zealous hunters. They go far afield for their highly-prized ornaments, and organize extensive expeditions, sweeping down on weaker tribes and carrying off all they can seize. The southern end of the island of Ysabel is a favorite hunting-ground for the more northern tribes, who come down in great force, bringing large canoes full of warriors from the islands of Choiseul and New Georgia. The more peaceful southerners make no attempt at resistance, but have built themselves strongholds into which they retire, and, if possible, defy their enemies. These places of refuge are of two kinds—tree-houses and hill-fortifications. The tree-houses possess the greatest interest, and in some parts of the island are quite numerous and even used as ordinary places of residence in times of peace. The people attain almost the agility of monkeys by continually climbing up and down these trees and walking along their branches."

"At the village near which we first anchored there was but one tree-house; but it was good of its kind. The tree in which it was built was a magnificent one growing upon the cliff by the shore; all the lower branches were cleared away, and its peculiar appearance made it most conspicuous amongst the surrounding palms and smaller growth. There was a cleared space around the foot of this giant, and from the branches hung a slender rattan cane ladder. The ascent is certainly not a very enjoyable affair, the ladder seems of the very weakest, and swings about unpleasantly; the rounds, moreover, are merely bits of stick lashed on to the cane rope, and afford practically no foothold to the booted European. On reaching the top I was surprised to find a large well-built house, quite level, and fixed in among the branches with the greatest ingenuity. The floor is covered with mats and scrupulously clean. It is twenty-six feet long by eighteen wide, and the ridge pole is ten feet from the floor. The strength and solidity of the whole structure is most remarkable, and I suppose at a pinch nearly all the inhabitants of the village might find refuge here. At either end of this house are pleasant balconies, one of which seemed literally to overhang the sea which lay more than a hundred feet beneath. The height of the house from the ground is between seventy and eighty feet. Arrayed along the sides are numbers of small heaps of stones for defensive purposes. When a raid by the head-hunters is reported, the people all retire to this curious fortress, and drawing the thin ladder up after them can defy their enemies. If the invaders come near to try and cut down the tree (no light work, for the trunk is hard as iron), the besieged party pelt them with stones from above, and unless the enemy were armed with rifles I should say these tree-fortresses were quite impregnable. Other fortresses there are upon this island, as I have said, and these are but little less curious; they are perched upon bold rocky peaks, and the approaches are in some cases cut off by the construction of large dykes or fosses, upon which a most surprising amount of labor must at one time have been expended."

The European colonists who have settled in Queensland, Fiji, New Caledonia and other places in the South Pacific, need laborers to develop the immense tracts of fertile lands which have come into their possession. This demand has led to an extensive traffic between these points and the South Sea Islands. Though this is now under government regulation, which limits the term of service to three years, and enforces the payment of the wages agreed upon, yet it has been and is a source of great oppression and ill-feeling. Unprincipled commanders of vessels engaged in this business visit the different islands, and often either kidnap by force, or carry off under delusive pretences, the natives to the labor-marts. This leads to reprisals by the friends of those who are thus taken away, and has been the primary cause of many of the murderous assaults which have been made on vessels and boats' crews of latter years; for the natives cannot in general distinguish between the innocent and guilty; and take their revenge on the first foreign party that comes into their power. Of this traffic W. Coote says: "The labor trade is in a bad state everywhere, whether under French flag or English, and what is said here on this subject applies equally to all the colonies to which natives are taken. For my own part, I believe that we, as a civilized nation, have no right to hire native men until we have first made them clearly understand what our terms of engagement are. At present the labor trade is merely a disguised slave trade. It is said the islanders are paid. Yes, but what does the pay amount to? Even if the "trade" given as wages were honest stuff, it would be no payment to them. They give it all away as soon as they land at their homes, and have not, nor can possibly have, any conceivable use for it."

"The whole labor trade system, therefore, I believe to be distinctly wrong as at present carried out, and very probably wrong however it were to be carried out, for we take the strongest men away from their homes at the best period of their lives, and as a rule we return them again demoralized and diseased, so that the whole social organization of the native tribes is corrupted, and their numerical strength most alarmingly diminished."

(To be concluded.)

Desultory Selections and Pencillings.

THOUGHTS RESPECTING PHILADELPHIA YEARLY MEETING.

To such as are disposed to criticise or to censure what they call the anomalous situation of this body, we would respectfully solicit an attentive perusal of "A Brief Narrative in Relation to the Position of Philadelphia Yearly Meeting," issued by its Representative Meeting in 1872. This sets forth the condition alluded to as having been brought about, through "the natural outgrowth of seminal principles, speciously presented and associated with much that is true, but tending to lead away from the spirituality of the Christian religion, as professed by Friends, and to substitute something else for submission to the revelations of the Light of Christ in the heart, as a means for perfecting salvation, and preparing for service in the Lord's army."

It should not be forgotten that Philadelphia bore an early and unequivocal Christian testimony against the novel views and practices now so prevalent, pleading again and again in reference to them with another co-ordinate body within whose limits they originated, and setting forth whereunto they would most surely lead, if not promptly met and testified against. With respect to this brotherly labor and faithfulness, it may be queried upon an impartial retrospect of the same, What more could have been done than was done to stay the threatening wave of innovation? The sequel has proved, that the honest labor of Friends herein was not appreciated nor regarded; one official minute of London Yearly Meeting (see "Brief Narrative," &c., pp. 23, 24) closing the correspondence on this important subject with that body.

The modified faith and altered practices warned and pleaded against while in the blossom, ripened in their season unto the bitter but legitimate fruits now so wide spread, and, when adopted, so fatal to the fundamental doctrines and testimonies of this religious organization.

Philadelphia could not then, neither can it now, unite with these adulterated views and principles; hence her apparent isolation. But because of this has she ceased to exert any influence as some have predicted? Was the influence of Noah wholly lost when, as directed, he took to the ark for safety? Was the influence of Mordecai rendered nugatory in the eyes of the Omniscient by his sitting at the king's gate clothed in sackcloth—so much to the disturbance of proud Haman? Was the constancy of the captive Jews of no avail at least with Him who seeth in secret, when they hung their harps upon the willows, and wept when they remembered Zion? Was the influence of the prophet Jeremiah abrogated when, because he prophesied against certain popular measures, he was thrown into prison? Or was the salutary influence of our early Friends lost upon those among whom they were set as a light by their being incarcerated in filthy dungeons for a faithful adherence to what they believed to be their duty? We believe but one answer can be given to these interrogatories. And surely it is far better, like ships at sea, to "lie to" in seasons of peril and of danger, rather than run the risk of shipwreck by standing out against adverse winds and threatening gales upon a tempestuous main!

For "The Friend."

True, Philadelphia has been much spoliated against, and her holding-back course or "ecclesiology of silence," condemned, because endeavoring to heed the "cantonary signals which abound; and heeding too, we hope for all, the pillar of cloud and of fire—typical to us of the only safe guidance of the Spirit of Christ—which in the case of Israel pointed out respectively their duty to journey or abide in the tent. Like Joseph in Egypt who was also separated from his brethren "the archers have sorely grieved, shot at, and hated;" but at the same time Philadelphia with her sister Ohio are Yearly Meetings that almost alone, have early and continuously pleaded for, and sought to uphold the precious doctrines and testimonies of this religious Society—believed to be primitive Christianity revived.

While profoundly assured that it hath nothing wherewith to boast, nothing to glory in save its manifold infirmities, it is nevertheless earnestly desired that, "He that is holy, He that is true, He that hath the key of David," who in his own time, in undeserved mercy opened the door for Philadelphia which no man could shut; and verify his ancient promise: "I cause thou hast kept the word of my patient; I also will keep thee from the hour of temptation, which shall come upon all the world to try them that dwell upon the earth."

RELIGION—THE VISITED OF THE LORD.

"There is nothing appertaining to man more noble and glorious, than the cause of religion, and an eye is now and then opened in us, which sees it to be so; but unless we be diligent in spirit to have this sight renewed, and this vision of life repeatedly impressed on our understanding, in our frail state, the things that are present will be apt to operate more forcibly upon our nature, than the things which are to come. The splendor of the world, and its spirit, in some shape or other will be ready to dazzle our view, and hinder us from seeing the intrinsic beauty and comeliness which is in the Truth. I have at times pondered why the visitation and call of Divine condescension should be so universal, and yet that there should be so slender succession, in this generation, of serviceable gifted men and women in our religious Society. I have thought the defect has been here,—that the visited of the Lord have not sufficiently humbled themselves under his hand, nor gone down the number of times appointed them to wash in Jordan, so that they come not up sufficiently cleansed, they are in some degree, but not altogether clear; there still remains some of the old disorder to be seen, their flesh is not that of little children, of whom it is said, 'Of such is the kingdom of heaven,' and to whom the mysteries of the kingdom are revealed.

"We want sanctified spirits amongst us; we have worldly-wise people, we have some tolerably skilled in handling the outward law, and we have half-baked cakes; but spirit tried as gold is tried, refined, baptized seven times, and so purified, we want in the house."

"The day calls for diligence, and living active members in our religious Society will have enough to do in their several departments; the harvest is great, the field of labor is honorable, and the wages are glorious and everlasting; so that I rest in hope that many of our successors of the present generation will not give their strength entirely to the world, either to the profits or pleasures of it; not considering the excellency and dignity of the cause, the short term of human life, and the awfulness of the silent grave to which we hasten, will enquire after the Lord God of our forefathers, and nobly aspire after those things which make for their present and eternal peace, the knowledge of the Truth, and the promotion of it among men."—From Letters of Richard Shackleton.

RESPONSIBILITY OF PARENTS.—WANT OF FAITH.

"I wonder how parents who love their children, can put in competition a temporary indulgence, which may foster one evil temper, with the eternal welfare of that child's soul—a soul of such inconceivable worth, whether we consider its nature, its duration, or the price which was paid for its redemption! What parent, I say, can by his own rash negligence, or false indulgence, risk the happiness of such a soul, for a few days or years, but for a period compared with which the whole duration of life is but a point? What remorse can equal the pangs of him who has reason to believe that his child has not only lost an eternity of glory, but incurred an eternity of misery, through the carelessness of that parent, who signed his very fondness as a reason for his neglect? Think of the state of such a father, when he figures to himself the thousands and tens of thousands of glorified spirits that stand before the throne, and his darling excluded!—excluded perhaps by his own ill-judged fondness. Oh, my friends, disguise it not, we may, and deceive ourselves as we will, but want of faith is as much at the bottom of this as of all others. Notwithstanding an indefinite, indistinct notion which men call faith, they do not actually believe in this eternity; they believe in it in a general way, but they do not believe in it practically, personally, influentially."—Hannah More.

THE SECRET OPERATION OF DIVINE GRACE IN THE SOUL.

"However kind and even amiable, any may be by nature, there must be a change of heart experienced, termed in scripture a new birth, a new spiritual creation, through the secret operation of Divine grace in the soul. My measure of experience disposes me to feel tenderly for those in whom this work is begun, because I am aware that it must be carried forward through humiliations, close pressings, and searchings of heart. Nature has her strongholds; but we must not be discouraged though the triumph of Grace be a great work. The Divine Power is above every other power, and can complete as well as begin that which is our sanctification. I know there are times when our faith is so weak that we can scarcely read and understand the scriptures; this is no new thing; our prayers may seem unavailing, and clouds of thick darkness may appear to envelope us; but we must persevere in earnest, wrestling prayer, though it may only be with sighs, and constant muttering.

"Surely our Heavenly Father deals gently with the feeble of the flock. I can bear my testimony to his protecting power, the internal evidence manifested in the soul. Oh how checks, how it teaches, how it guides from childhood to the oldest age, just according to our state, obedience opening the way to an enlargement of spiritual understanding. Marvellous are the Lord's dealings with his humbled, patient, and believing children. O! that there was a believing heart in every child of man; there would be no need to puzzle and bewilder the mind, in things too high for us; secret things would be left to the Lord. I am set much as a solitary one, though in the bosom of kind friends. Shall I be presumptuous if I record, with feelings of great seriousness, that my prevailing exercise in this my latter day, is secret, wrestling prayer, oft on the bended knees, in my quiet, secluded chamber. My spirit craves for more evident marks of godly simplicity among the Quakers, so-called. I am one of those who mark the boasted 'March of intellect' with a jealous fear. The refinements of our day seem, in my view, to draw the mind from under the cross of Christ. According to my observation, we are not the plain, unfashionable people that, if faithful, we should be; we are too generally intermingled with the manners and maxims of the times. Everlasting mercy can yet turn and overturn, and settle a faithful people."—From Letters of Mary Capper when about 78 years of age.

THE SCHOOL OF THE SAVIOUR.

"Only with the aid of God's blessed Spirit, I had found out the way of the Lord. I knew what it meant. I knew that it was one way, and not many ways. I had a personal, experimental acquaintance with the only path that led to communion with God. I had found it to consist, not only in the silencing of the outward man, but in the silencing also of every thought, and the concentration of the soul and all its powers into a simple, quiet watching and waiting for the food which its Heavenly Father might see fit either to give or to withhold. In no case would it be sent away empty."—From a reminiscence of religious experience.

A TESTIMONY IN PHILADA. YEARLY MEETING.

Mildred Radcliff once expressed herself in the Yearly Meeting of Philadelphia nearly as follows: "I had rather be an Indian—the attention of the meeting was at the time directed to this people—than one of those in this highly favored city, who are neglecting their privileges, in that awfully approaching period that fast maketh haste."

The Nobleman's Offer; or, the Door was Shut.

Our Saviour, when on earth, taught the most important truths by parables; and Bunyan, in his wondrous dream of the "Pilgrim's Progress," has set forth some of the most impressive lessons of both truth and duty. In the light of the parable that follows, all may learn a lesson of the deepest moment—the lesson that the Saviour taught in the parable of the Ten Virgins and the Marriage Feast:

Lord A—— was a nobleman of wealth and influence; and as an earnest Christian, he was ever seeking to do good, both to the poor about him, and to the tenants on his large estates. Like many other faithful Christians, he was often saddened and grieved to find that so few seemed impressed with the calls of the gospel and the offers of redeeming grace. Thinking over the matter, he fixed upon a plan which he hoped might teach a lesson of faith that would not be forgotten, and which, at the same time, might impress the importance of now accepting the gracious offers of salvation.

Going down to his large estates, he had the following notice posted up in various places where all his tenants could see it. It fixed on a date some ten or twelve days in advance, and read as follows:

NOTICE.

Mr. A—— will be present, with his steward, at his office in the village, between the hours of nine and twelve, on Tuesday after next, and will then and there freely pay all debts, to whomsoever due, of any of his tenants who have not the means to discharge their obligations. To avail themselves of this offer, the applicants must each give an exact statement of the amount and nature of his debts, and to whom they are due, and they must also give a full statement of their own means, and of what property they have.

Very soon crowds were seen gathering about the various placards through the village and at the office; and curiosity and astonishment possessed them all. Every one was asking, "What does this mean?" But to one and all the steward had but one and the same answer, "This is Mr. A——'s offer, and the notice speaks for itself." Any further explanation he declined to give. He merely said he was directed to put up the notice by Mr. A—— himself, and that it meant just what it said.

The day appointed in the notice rapidly drew on, and the excitement among the tenants increased. Some, as they read the last clause of the notice, seemed to think it meant that they must give up all they had if they would claim the offered benefit. And as they were not insolvent, they concluded that they would not apply. Some looked over their accounts, and made out the required statements, but thought they would wait and see how others might fare, intending, if the latter succeeded, then to present their own list of debts. Some, again, planned to keep back part of their assets; while others, influenced by argument or ridicule, gave up all thought of the matter; and still others thought the idea was so strange and incredible that they did not deem it worth a moment's notice. "But there's his own offer, and he'll never go back on that," said a neighbor: and so the discussion went on.

At last the day came; and the crowd of tenants and lookers-on gathered about the office. A little before the appointed hour Mr. A—— stepped from his carriage into the office, and closed the door after him. Precisely at 9 o'clock a step came from the inner room, and the door was thrown wide open, so that any one could enter. Men looked at each other and waited, none being willing to be the first to go in fearing either to confess their poverty and indebtedness, or to meet the ridicule that might follow an unsuccessful application. "Do you go and try, Jones," said one to his neighbor. "No," said the other; "I'm not so poor as that." "Do you go," was said to another. "I guess I'll wait, and see what the others do," was the answer. "Why don't you try it?" said a fourth. "Well," said the one spoken to, "there's plenty of time yet." And so the hours passed on, each waiting to see what the others would do, and no one going in.

It was nearly eleven o'clock, when an old couple from the poor-house came up to the office. "Is it true," they asked, "that Mr. A—— has offered to pay all our debts?" "Well—yes; but he hasn't paid any yet." "Has any one been in to see if he would do it?" "Well—no—not yet; we are thinking about it." "Well," said the old man, "the offer seems plain, and, thank God, we may yet die free from debt; for we have some debts we were never able to pay." And they both started for the door of the office. "That's right, old man," exclaimed one; "you go in first, and let us know how you fare." "Well," said another, "I guess he'll find himself fooled after all." "And," said another, "I guess he'll go back to the poor-house just about as he came." Such were some of the comments and remarks as to the old couple; but, disregarding them all, they went forward and entered the office.

Within, they found Mr. A—— and his steward. And the old man laid his statements on the table, saying, "There, sir, are my debts. I have no property, but live in the poor house; but that matters little, if I can but pay what I honestly owe, and so die free from debt." "But why should I pay your debts?" asked Mr. A——. "I do not know, except that you say you will; and I fully believe your promise and rely upon your word." "That is enough," said Mr. A——; and turning to his steward he told him to fill out a check for the whole amount, which being done, he signed it, and handed it to the old man, who received it with the deepest thankfulness, and then started for the door, saying, "I must go and tell all those outside, of your kindness, that they, too, may come as I have done." "No," said Mr. A——, "you must not tell them; they must trust my word for themselves, as you have done." And so the old couple were shown into another room, to wait till twelve, while Mr. A——, being satisfied that their poverty was their misfortune and not their fault, ordered the lease of a nice little place to be made out to them for life, and added this to the check he had given them.

Outside the office, time wore away; some wondering why the old couple did not come out, and some concluding that they must have failed, and that, after all, there was nothing in the matter. The hour of twelve drew near. Men looked at each other, but still did not go in. At last, the hour rang out from the church-clock; and, with the last stroke from the bell, the door opened, and the old man and his wife were seen coming out. "How is it? how is it?" cried the people. "Have you got the money?" The old man showed them his check. "Good," he said, "as solid gold; it was all so." And at the same moment, Mr. A—— came out: and, as he went to his carriage, there was a rush toward it, each one pressing forward with his statement, and crying, "Here, Mr. A——, will you not pay my debts?" "Here is my account." "Will you not look at my statement?"

"Friends," was the reply, "it is after twelve o'clock. The hour is past. It is too late!" And he drove away!

"Now is the accepted time;" and "now the day of salvation!" "Strive to enter in at the strait gate; for many, I say unto you, shall seek to enter in, and shall not be able when once the Master of the house hath risen up and hath shut to the door!"—Selected.

A Safe Dwelling-place.—Now that our labors in New South Wales are nearly concluded, it is my lot to dwell much under the feeling of emptiness and unprofitableness. For this I desire to be thankful; for were it otherwise,

I might be in danger of taking to myself the glory of any little services that I have been enabled to perform, instead of giving it to the Lord, who gave the qualification, and in whose sight no flesh may glory, without condemnation.—James Backhouse.

*MORNING WORSHIP IN THE ROCKY MOUNTAINS.

Refreshed, from the sleep of the night, we arise
Amid grandeur of earth, beneath splendor of skies,
Fanned by health-bringing breezes from summits of snow,
On the desolate wastes where the sage-bushes grow,
Where no beast treads the sands and no bird skims the air,
We turn to our morning devotion and prayer.
On the fast-moving train as the Scripture is read,
And silence is over our company spread,
For thanksgiving and prayer is fit utterance found,
And here is the desert made hallowed ground.
In these solitudes vast, and these altitudes high,
We are freshly assured that our Father is nigh.
I would not forget what we feel in this hour,
Of the presence of God, of his goodness and power;
Of the calm of his peace, and the strength of his care:
His own benediction and answer to prayer.
6th mo. 19th, 1882.

J. B.

Selected.

THE LOOM OF LIFE.

All day, all night, I can hear the jar
Of the loom of life, and near and far
It thrills with its deep and muffled sound,
As tireless the wheels go round and round.

Busily, ceaselessly, goes the loom
In the light of day and the midnight gloom,
And the wheels are turning early and late,
And the woof is wound in the warp of fate.

Are we spinners of good in this life-web, say?
Do we furnish the weave a thread each day?
It were better, then, by far to spin
A beautiful thread than a thread of sin.

Selected.

RESOLUTION.

If you've any task to do,
Let me whisper, friend, to you,
Do it.

If you've anything to say,
True and needed, yea or nay,
Say it.

If you've anything to love,
As a blessing from above,
Love it.

If you've anything to give,
That another's joy may live,
Give it.

If some hollow creed you doubt,
Though the whole world hoot and shout,
Doubt it.

If you know what to do to light,
Guiding others through the night,
Light it.

If you've any debt to pay,
Rest you neither night nor day,
Pay it.

If you've any joy to hold,
Next your heart, lest it get cold,
Hold it.

If you've any grief to meet,
At the loving Father's feet,
Meet it.

If you're given light to see
What a child of God should be,
See it.

Whether life be bright or drear,
There's a message sweet and clear
Whispered down to every ear—
Hear it.
—Harper's Magazine.

* Our party of Friends numbered ten. Most of our fellow passengers in our car, and occasionally some from others on the train, gathered together to our morning readings. Also to a First-day (Friends') meeting for worship, which was an impressive occasion.

Selected.

JESUS ON THE SEA.

When the storm of the mountains on Galilee fell,
And lifted its waters on high;
And the faithless disciples were bound in the spell
Of mysterious alarm—their terrors to quell,
Jesus whispered, "Fear not: it is I."

The storm could not hurry that word in the wave,
For 'twas taught through the tempest to fly;
It shall reach his disciples in every clime,
And his voice shall be near in each troublous time,
Saying, "Be not afraid: it is I."

When the spirit is broken with sickness or sorrow,
And comfort is ready to die;
The darkness shall pass, and in gladness to-morrow,
The wounded complete consolation shall borrow
From his life-giving word, "it is I."

When death is at hand, and the cottage of clay
Is left with a tremulous sigh,
The gracious fore-runner is smoothing the way
For its tenant to pass to unchangeable day,
Saying, "Be not afraid: it is I."

When the waters are passed, and the glories unknown
Burst forth on the wondering eye,
The compassionate "Lamb in the midst of the throne"
Shall welcome, encourage, and comfort his own,
And say, "Be not afraid: it is I."

Nathaniel Hawthorne.

Prohibition not a Failure.

An article by Thurlow Weed published in the New York Tribune on Intemperance, says: "Maine laws have been so generally either violated or evaded as to satisfy calm thinkers that drunkards are not to be reformed by prohibitory enactments. The great champion of Prohibition, Neal Dow, worn out by long years of indomitable efforts, has announced his intention to retire."

To this Neal Dow replies:

"I am so far from being worn out in temperance work that I was never more active in it than now, and so far am I from any intention of retiring that I was never before so full of heart, hope and confident expectation of success in the near future." "Prohibition is now, and has been from the day of its enactment in Maine, a great success, and it is for that reason that Kansas and Iowa have imitated our example, and have resorted to prohibition by their constitutions, in which line of policy Maine will immediately follow their lead, as will Michigan and Indiana."

From the resolutions of the Maine Republican convention of 1882, he quotes the following paragraph:

"We refer with confidence and pride to the general record of the Republican party in support of the policy of prohibiting the traffic in intoxicating liquors, the wisdom and efficiency of which legislation in promoting the moral and material interests of Maine have been demonstrated through the practical annihilation of that traffic in a large portion of the State; and we favor such legislation and such enforcement of law as will secure to every portion of our territory freedom from that traffic. We further recommend the submission to the people of a constitutional prohibitory amendment."

Neal Dow concludes his letter as follows:

"It is in the face of such declarations widely published to the world, of which no shrewd politician should be ignorant, that Mr. Weed has ventured to affirm Prohibition in Maine to be an abortion. There is no distillery or brewery in Maine—not one; all have been suppressed by the law. Three-fourths of our territory is now practically free from the liquor traffic, so that The Port nd Press said a little while ago: 'In a large part of our territory an entire generation has grown up practically unacquainted with the liquor traffic and its effects.' Our State is now more prosperous by far than it ever was before. The liquor traffic which lingers here is on the sly and on a very small scale, and is confined to our larger towns and cities, from which it will soon be expelled by certain amendments to our law that are necessary to that end. The whole face of the State has been wonderfully changed for the better by the policy which has so largely driven the liquor traffic out, thereby saving to the people the wages of their labor and the profits of their business, which now go to build up and stimulate every legitimate industry. Formerly the entire valuation of all our property of every kind was spent in strong drink in every period of less than twenty years, making Maine the poorest State in the Union, while now it is one of the most prosperous. There are a great many districts in many States not yet having Prohibition, where the liquor traffic is under the ban of the law, by virtue of local option or of special enactments. The same thing is true of the Dominion of Canada, and in England there are more than thirteen hundred parishes under Prohibition, while in Scotland, Wales, and Ireland there is Prohibition for the Sunday, and the policy of Prohibition is rapidly extending in the United Kingdom. As to Mr. Weed's suggestion that wine is a remedy for intemperance, it is as wide of the mark as his declaration that Prohibition is an abortion in Maine, and therefore Kansas and Iowa put that policy to their Constitutions. I do not care to write a line even, upon that matter; it is an old piece of lumber, laid away with dry-rot, and worm-eaten long ago.

NEAL DOW.

Portland, Me., July 11, 1882."

For "The Friend."

Westtown Boarding School.

6th mo. 8, 1838. "The consideration of the appointment of a literary head to the institution was again brought before the committee, and as no way opened for action on the subject at present, it was concluded to defer its further attention at some future meeting." The following report on the subject of warming the house was received, and the committee was continued to make an experiment of the proposed plan so far as it relates to the heating of a few of the rooms with coal; the remainder of the report was deferred for attention at a future meeting. The report is as follows: "That having conferred with the superintendent and made careful inquiry in her quarters, they have arrived at the following result,—It is the judgment of the committee that the house may be more comfortably warmed and with much less risk to the building by the use of coal. For this purpose there will be required 100 tons of coal, which can be delivered at Norristown at $4.50 per ton,

	$450.00
Hauling do. at $2,	200.00
Carrying coal and making fires,	60.00
	$710.00
Cost of new stoves, &c.	287.10
	$997.10

Should it be concluded to substitute coal for wood, it is proposed that 40 acres of wood should be sold off, which according to the estimate of the superintendent will bring $90 per acre. The proceeds of this sale would enable the committee to erect a saw mill, which is much wanted in the neighborhood, and could be profitably employed, and leave a fund of $3000 for any other desirable purpose, while the land thus cleared would be productive under tillage. As a supply of wood is already prepared for the consumption of a year, it is suggested that the experiment should be made during the ensuing winter in a few of the school-rooms only. The expediency of providing a substitute for wood in cooking has engaged the attention of the committee, but they have not arrived at any conclusion which they deem safe to submit with the report. Signed on behalf of the committee, BENJAMIN COOPER.

BARTHOLOMEW WISTAR."

10th mo. 11th, 1838. The committee on the orchard report that 180 trees have been planted.

From the report submitted to the Yearly Meeting in 1839.

"We believe there are few, if any, seminaries, which offer greater advantages for the acquirement of useful knowledge in all the elementary departments; and when we combine with this the smallness of the charge for board and tuition, the religious instruction, and the watchful care exercised over the morals of the scholars, and their being sheltered from many of the temptations incident to the period of youth, and to indiscriminate association in mixed schools, the benefits which the Society derives from the Boarding School, are strikingly apparent." "In conformity with the concern which has so long existed in the Yearly Meeting, that the religious education of the children of our Society may keep pace with their literary improvement, endeavors are used to instruct the scholars in our doctrines and testimonies. Meetings for divine worship are regularly held on First and Fifth-days, in which the deportment of the scholars is orderly; and we trust that through the condescending goodness of the Shepherd of Israel their minds are at times favored to experience a degree of that solemn quiet and introversion of spirit which is the preparation for acceptable worship."

Soon after the commencement of the winter session, the measles made their appearance among the children, introduced by one of the girls who had been exposed to the infection a short time before leaving home. Although the disease was of a mild form, and many of the invalids had it very lightly, yet it imposed a heavy duty on the care-takers and nurses, occasioned a loss of many weeks time to some of the scholars, and in a few cases its effects proved of a serious character. The scarlet fever having been introduced into the school in a similar manner at the opening of a former session, the committee deem it incumbent on them earnestly to request that no child may be sent to the school who is known to have been exposed to the risk of contracting any infectious disorder.

At this trying period there were about 172 pupils in the institution, 94 of whom had the measles. The nursery accommodations were not so comfortable as now, two rooms on each side in the main building being all the space devoted to nursery purposes, until beds were placed in two of the school-rooms and thus occupied.

The kind attention of Edith Jefferis, (a valuable minister, daughter of the matron, Martha Jefferis), who came to assist in nursing, her gentle manners, as well as her endeavors to make good impressions on the minds of the children, are still held in lively and grateful remembrance by some who were then there as pupils.

Nothing unrighteous, impure, or unregenerate can enter the kingdom of heaven. And even were it possible for us to enter that holy habitation, unprepared, what would it avail us? Surrounded by holiness, we could not be happy unless we were holy ourselves; no, we should be wretched indeed, without the mantle of righteousness, in the presence of an infinitely holy Being.

If I must pass through the furnace of refinement, of what consequence is it in what manner it is done or what the temperature is? Thou knowest, Almighty Father, that while sustained by thy supporting arm, it is immaterial to me whether by pain and sorrow, trouble or sickness, if thy will may be fulfilled and my heart made acceptable, it is all, it is more than I am worthy to ask; but knowing thy matchless goodness I believe it possible, and will still hope through the merits of the blessed Saviour.—Catharine Seely.

For "The Friend."

Religious Items, &c.

Pere Hyacinthe.—In conversation with some intelligent Frenchmen I learned that the non-success of his movement is generally admitted. He preaches to a small audience, and his list of followers does not include a single Frenchman of prominence. His fatal error has been his open opposition to Protestantism. Though he professes to be a communicant in the Church of England, he has repeatedly declared that Protestantism can do nothing of permanent value to France. The result is that the Protestants of England and France cannot hopefully rally to his support. As to the reforms in the Romish Church, for which he eloquently pleads, they are all well, except that they do not go far enough.—Correspondent of Chr. Advocate.

Responsibility for Drunkards.—In a Westchester County Court, recently, an old man of eighty-two years of age was summoned by the Overseer of the Poor of Portchester, who wished him to provide for a worthless, drunken son, thirty years of age. The old man proved that his income was not sufficient to maintain the family dependent upon him, among whom were a blind son, and a daughter subject to fits, and with choking utterance tried to tell how much he had done for the drunken son whose maintenance the town was trying to avoid. Judge Gifford firmly declined to grant the order asked for. "The town," he said, "has licensed the establishments where this old man's son buys his rum, so the town must take care of the drunkard. I cannot order a man of eighty-two to provide for a son, who, were it not for rum, could, and should now be, caring for his father."

The United Christian Army.—The United Christian Army recently held its Annual Conference at Goole, England. Most of its members originally belonged to the Salvation Army. The United Christian Army has stations in Yorkshire and North Lincolnshire, and is purchasing and acquiring property at its several stations, the last purchase being the Public Rooms there, which cost them $8,500. The main business of the Conference was to settle a code of doctrines, as well as rules and regulations, for the government of the "Army." The doctrines defined, are of the simplest—the belief in God, Christ, and the Holy Ghost, and the efficacy of Christ's atonement. The rules place the government of the body in the hands of an annual conference. Over 100 delegates and evangelists were present.

For "The Friend."

Natural History, Science, &c.

Corns.—Whenever any part of the surface of the body is for any time subjected to greater friction and pressure than usual, the outer layer of the skin thickens in response to the need of increased protection to the tender parts underneath. If we examine the cuticle with a microscope, we find that it is made up of innumerable minute scales matted together, their edges overlapping in accumulating layers. These are secreted from the true skin underneath, and a constant condition of shedding of the outermost scales and the formation of new ones is going on throughout life. This is the source of the scurf, the dandruff, the scarf-skin which we find forming upon our persons.

Pressure and friction upon the skin of the toes provokes an increased formation of these scales as a protection; the pressure mats them together, presses them back again down into the skin, which increases the irritation of the skin; increased effort at protection results, a thicker mass of scales is formed, and thus a corn is produced. There is so little of soft flesh in the make-up of the upper surface and sides of the toes, that the skin, when pressed upon, finds itself between the hard bone within and the compressing leather without, neighbors who stand firm against pressure, so that the poor skin has to bear it all! Whenever, as the result of unusual irritation, the skin underneath the corn becomes inflamed, (a comparatively frequent occurrence,) the suffering may be extreme, and the tortures of walking in the customary shoe unendurable.

The great secret of thoroughly and easily removing a corn is to get under its edges where it merges into the surrounding natural cuticle, and to work in under it from all points toward the centre, gradually lifting it up until it is completely lifted away, and the soft, somewhat reddened depression in the skin, which formed its bed, is exposed. To do this one does not want too sharp a knife; after the first approaches at the edges have been accomplished, the sharp knife should be put aside, and something less likely to wound be substituted; a pair of seissors will often answer admirably for slowly snipping a way under the corn. The practice of simply shaving off the most prominent layers of the corn with a razor or sharp knife is not a good one, for the relief which it affords is very transient. The use of pastes and caustics is thoroughly bad, and even dangerous, for in many cases it has provoked serious inflammation of the toes and feet.

Whatever is done will produce only a temporary effect unless the cause is removed; if the same ill-fitting, cramping shoes continue to be worn, the corns will continue to reappear. Indeed, after a corn has once become established, by right of long possession of its site, it will take far greater watchfulness to keep it down than it would to have prevented its development in the first place. The toes must have room to spread and to get away from each other; this is the essential fact to be borne in mind in every effort to prevent or cure this annoying affection. One who is compelled to simply wage a prolonged warfare against these pests is to be pitied. The relief which proper dressing for the feet does bring in these cases is marvellous. A strong and broad sole, with a soft and ample upper, a low heel, and a firmly grasped instep constitute the best defence against corns, and are susceptible of giving an entirely new color to life.—L. S. Pilcher in Chr. Adv.

The Nebula in Orion.—Dr. Henry Draper has succeeded in photographing four times the spectrum of the nebula in Orion. The same spectrum has been photographed by Dr. Huggins, of England. Dr. Draper has also taken photographs of the nebula itself, so as to watch for changes in it, and observe whether the process of aggregation into stars can be detected. Collated with the photographs of the spectrum, they show clearly, it is said, evidences of condensations.

Anecdote of a Horse.—J. Nelson Smith tells me that, while examining one of the American mines, he saw a horse which was doing his work without the assistance of any driver. As soon as his cart was filled with ore, one of the miners gave his signal, and the animal went off to the spot where his load was to be dumped, waited until the cart was unloaded, and then returned for another load. The strangest point in his conduct was, that he had to take a certain number of loads daily, and knew when his task was finished, as well as did any of the men. J. N. Smith happened to be present at the time when he deposited his last load for the day, and, on seeing him trot off quickly in another direction, was told that he knew his work to be finished, and that he was going home, where he would meet a kind reception from his mistress.—J. G. Wood in Man and Beast.

A Welsh Pony.—At Rhyll there are many of these animals let for temporary hire, and among them there was one that was ridden by a young lady in delicate health, who was obliged to keep to a very slow pace. One day in 1873 the pony was seen dashing along at full gallop, until it reached a blacksmith's forge, into which it went without a pause, carrying its unwilling rider with it.

The astonished blacksmith tried to lead the animal out of the forge, but it resisted this strongly, and he found it had east a shoe, which it wished to be replaced. In this instance, as in many others, reason conquered instinct. The instinctive feelings of horses are strongly opposed to the operation of shoeing, and it requires a determined exercise of reason to induce an animal voluntarily to counteract its own instincts.—J. G. Wood in Man and Beast.

Insects on the surface of Oranges.—When a dish of oranges is seen on a table for dessert, the fact is hardly realized that in all probability their surface is the habitat of an insect of the Coccus family. This tiny creature is found on the orange skin in every stage of transformation, from the egg to the perfect insect, during the winter months, instead of remaining dormant in the cold weather, as is the case with most of the insect tribe. It would hardly be possible to find a St. Michael or Tangerine orange that had not hundreds of these little creatures in various stages of development on their surface. Lemons, too, are frequently covered. Upon inspection, the skin of an orange will be found to be dotted over with brownish scarlet spots of various sizes; these specks can be easily removed with a needle, and when placed under a microscope an interesting scene is presented, consisting of a large number of eggs, which are of white bodies standing on end, like little balls of flour, some of the inhabitants of which may very probably be seen in process of emerging from the opened end of the egg. The female insect upon leaving the egg, has six legs, two long hair-like appendages, and no wings; she thrusts a sucker into the orange in order to obtain nourishment and never moves again, passing through the various stages of development until it lays its eggs and dies. In the case of the male insect, the chrysalis after a short period opens and the insect flies out. The male is supplied with wings twice the length of its body, and each of the legs has a hook-like projection; it has four eyes and two antennae, and is so tiny that it cannot be seen when flying.

From some parts of Spain oranges come to us having their rind covered with a coccus of quite a different type. The surface of orange indeed, affords the possessor of a microscope an infinite amount of interest and amusement.—Chambers' Journal.

THE FRIEND.

NINTH MONTH 2, 1882.

We have received a book written by A. L. Washburn, and published by Garrigue Brothers, Philada., entitled, "Wayward and Obedient." It consists mainly of a narrative of the outward travels and inner experience of a young man for a period of seven years from about the age of 15. It was written by the author as narrated by the young man himself; the facts and thoughts, though not the language, being scrupulously preserved.

He was a Kentucky boy, whose father had removed to Arkansas. There the child became very ill, so that it was not thought likely he could recover. He had for several years been under religious convictions, and these were deepened by a knowledge of his dangerous situation. After enduring much mental conflict, he was enabled to yield up his own will, and trust himself unreservedly in the hands of God. This was followed by a feeling of relief and a sense of the forgiveness of his sins and of acceptance with the Lord.

In detailing his subsequent religious progress, he describes two occasions in which he was unusually affected by Divine visitations. These he regards as marking special eras in his history, or planes of religious experience. We think the difference between these and the usual manifestations of Grace, is more in degree than in kind. When through the Lord's goodness any have been brought to submit to his visitations, and been made sensible of his love, and that the door of mercy is open to them; they must still follow on to know the Lord, by waiting on Him in spirit, and seeking to maintain communion with Him, so that they may partake of spiritual food and be preserved in a living condition.

this daily watch and the constant warfare against evil are maintained, they will grow grace, and the Lord will make known to them the mysteries of his kingdom, unfolding their spiritual vision one thing after another, as they are prepared to receive it. This is the path in which all Christians should walk. Those who become negligent and careless fall away from the good condition they were once in, and would become spiritually dead, if it were not for the renewed visitations of the Lord's Spirit. In a sense of this danger, Isaac Pennington exhorted the Friends at Chalfont, "that none of you grow slothful, drowsy, or negligent, and so, unfaithful, in relation to the great talent, which God hath put into your hands; and so, the Lord be provoked against you, and suffer the enemy to tempt and prevail upon you." On another occasion he addresses them in these stimulating words: "My dear Friends, be encouraged to wait upon the Lord in the pure fear, the precious faith and hope which is of Him; and you will see and feel He will exalt the power of his Anointed in you over the power of that which is unanointed, and will creep, and cleanse, and purify, even till He hath left no place for the impure; and then, ye shall become his full dwelling-place, the place of his rest, the place of his delight, the place of his displaying his pure life and glory; and He will be your perfect dwelling-place forevermore!"

The most prominent thought in the book before us is the possibility, reality and blessedness of so trusting in God and living in communion with Him, as to be sensible of his aidance and help in our outward concerns as well as in our religious experiences. This is in accordance with the scripture declarations, "In all thy ways acknowledge the Lord, and He shall direct thy steps." It is one of the unspeakably valuable privileges of the true Christian to feel, that the Lord is ever watching over him; and that, if we are attentive to his voice, He will lead us in the way which we should go, both inwardly and outwardly, and overrule everything for our ultimate good. "Because thou hast made the Lord which is my refuge, even the Most High habitation, there shall no evil befall thee," the encouraging language applicable to the sincere follower of the Lord Jesus.

Our author tells many interesting incidents of the experience of the young man whose story she relates, showing how he was assisted to make long journeys and voyages to distant countries, though poor and in feeble health. Some of these incidents are very simple in their character; and the reader may doubt whether the traveller has always put right construction on them.

Conversion, and the indwelling of the Holy Spirit, are spoken of as wholly distinct experiences. Though a distinction may be made between them, yet conversion is effected in us through the presence and power of the Spirit turning him from evil, and influencing him to yield in all things to the government of the Spirit of Christ, which is to be his Guide and Leader through life. So that conversion may be regarded as the early stage of that dwelling with Christ which is to continue through life.

The book as a whole is interesting and instructive; and it leaves on the mind an increased conviction that "a good man's steps are all ordered of the Lord."

SUMMARY OF EVENTS.

UNITED STATES.—A statement prepared at the General Land Office, Washington, shows that during the fiscal year ended 6th mo. 30th, 1882, there were 15,699,848 acres of land disposed of for "about" $8,361,091, against "about" $5,000,000 received for lands in the previous year.

The New York, Lake Erie and Western Railroad Company's elevator, at Buffalo, New York, was by an explosion of gas burned to the ground late on Fifth-day night. Loss $410,000, insurance $190,000. Five of the employees lost their lives.

The steamer Coptic, which arrived at San Francisco last week from China and Japan, confirms the reports of the insurrection in the capital of Corea on the 23d of 7th mo. All the Japanese in the city, including several members of the Japanese Legation, are believed to have been killed. The Japanese Envoy and Consul escaped to a British vessel. The insurgents took possession of the palace and murdered the Queen and all the royal family except the King. Thirteen Ministers of State and other dignitaries were also slaughtered. The massacre is attributed to the ex-Regent Fai In Kun, father or uncle of the King, a violent opponent of foreign intercourse. Japan has taken prompt measures to secure reparation for the murder of her representatives, and will make war if it is refused. Admiral Clitz has been advised from Washington of the rejection of Commodore Shufeldt's treaty with Corea, requesting that a ship of war be sent to Corea, and stating that Young, the U. S. Envoy to China, would assume diplomatic control of the question.

The second artesian well bored at Yankton, Dakota Territory, has developed powerful magnetic properties. A piece of steel held in the water becomes speedily magnetized.

Special despatches from the Indian Territory say that "the election of Overton for Governor is a great triumph for the stalwart Indian element as against outside influences and the violation of treaties. He has been Governor for four years, and the Indian nation made giant strides during that period. Overton opposes the railroads."

Major Sumner has advised the War Department that Red Cloud and the dissatisfied Sioux have demanded an investigation, and will put Agent McGillicuddy off the reservation by force within the notified sixty days. Red Cloud, he says, is cool and determined, and has quite a following, which is daily increasing.

Advices received at military headquarters in Chicago show that the Piegiens, a band of Blackfeet Indians, are suffering from hunger, and likely, in consequence, to "go upon the war-path." They recently stole a number of horses, and three companies of soldiers had to be sent to "overawe them." It is requested that speedy action be taken by the authorities to relieve their distress. Agent Miles, of the Cheyenne and Arapahoe Agency, in the Indian Territory, reports that the Northern Cheyennes have "declared their intention of migrating to the Pine Ridge Agency in Dakota, regardless of the wishes of the Indian Office in the premises. These Indians had previously requested permission to make the removal to the Pine Ridge Agency, but, receiving no reply from the Commissioner of Indian Affairs, they have resolved to act upon their own responsibility."

A telegram from Wichita reports the notorious Captain Payne encamped on the Canadian river, in the Indian Territory, with "a colony embracing 27 fighting men, who are well armed and well mounted." Neither Indians nor Federal soldiers have yet interfered with the raiders.

The Smithsonian Institution at Washington has received from Professor Forster, of Berlin, the announcement of the discovery by Palica at Pola, on the 22nd instant, of a planetoid of the twelfth magnitude, in 22 hours 18 minutes right ascension and 13 degrees 41 minutes south declination.

Professor Daniel Kirkwood, the astronomer, reports the observance of 1526 meteors at Bloomfield, and 521 at the State University, in Indiana, on the night of the 10th inst. He considers this an extraordinary display of August meteors.

Surgeon General Hamilton, of the Marine Hospital Service, reports that the deaths from yellow fever in Brownsville have numbered 40, of which 17 occurred last week. The total number of cases of fevers of all kinds has been 343. An effective cordon has been established around the infected district by means of mounted guards, and the disease "is now confined within the triangle bounded by the Rio Grande, the Gulf and the cordon extending from Laredo to Corpus Christi." Forty-six new cases of yellow fever and three deaths were reported in Brownsville on First-day, eighty-six new cases and eight deaths on Second-day of this week.

Seven more cattle died at Weedsport, New York, on Seventh-day, of the Texas fever, which has been prevailing at that place. The "ticks," which accompany the disease, are being found in many fields near the infected pastures, and there is great excitement among the farmers.

On Fifth-day last, the 24th inst., about twenty-seven hundred persons, descendants of John Sharpless, a Friend, who landed at Chester two hundred years previously, gathered at Ridley Creek, near Chester, to celebrate that event. There were representatives present from Florida, Kansas, Missouri, North Carolina, South Carolina, New Jersey, Mississippi, New York, Delaware, Minnesota and Ohio. They all gathered at the old homestead and indulged in a social reunion. Several relics of interest were displayed.

The Acting Treasurer of the United States, in accordance with an appropriation for the purpose made at the last session of Congress, has ordered the transfer to the Philadelphia Mint, for recoinage, of all the uncurrent subsidiary silver held at the different depositories throughout the country. About $500,000 of these coins are held at the various offices, including three-cent, five-cent and twenty-cent silver pieces and other uncurrent silver.

For the week ending 8th mo. 26th, there were 356 deaths in Philadelphia, as compared with 439 for the previous week, and 349 for the corresponding week of last year. Of the whole number 191 were males and 165 females; 42 died of consumption, 33 of cholera infantum, 25 of marasmus, 17 of diphtheria, 13 of inflammation of stomach and bowels, and 11 of typhoid fever.

Markets, &c.—U. S. 3½'s, 101½ a 101½; 4½'s, registered, 113¼; coupon, 114¼; 4's, 120; currency 6's, 133. It is estimated that three-and-a-half per cent. bonds, aggregating about $300,000,000, have been surrendered to the United States Treasury Department for exchange into the new 3 per cent. bonds.

Cotton.—Prices remain about the same as last quoted. Sales of middlings are reported at 13¼ a 13½ cts. per lb. for uplands and New Orleans.

Petroleum.—Standard white, 6½ cts. for export, and 7½ a 7¾ cts. per gallon for home use.

Flour continues in fair demand at former rates. Sales of superfine, at $3 a $3.25; western and Pennsylvania extras, $3.50 a $4.50; sonr at $4.25 a $6; 400 barrels Minnesota extras, clear, $6.75 a $7; 350 do. Minnesota extras, clear, straight, good, at $7 a $7.50; 550 do. Pennsylvania extra family, good, $5.12½ a $5.30; 600 barrels do. fancy, $5.37½ a $5.50; 100 do. Ohio do. do. good and choice, at $6 a $6.25; 100 do. St. Louis do. do. on private terms; 100 do. winter wheat patents, $7.50 a $8.75; 200 do. Minnesota do. at $7.50 a $8.75; 800 do. do. city mills, family, on private terms. Rye flour was dull; sales in small lots at $3.50 a $3.75. In corn meal there was very little doing, and prices were nominal. Feed.—Sales are reported at $20 a $20.50 for winter, and $19 a $19.50 for spring wheat bran.

Grain.—Wheat was unsettled and rather lower. Sales of 7500 bushels red and amber for milling at $1.10 a $1.18, as to quality and location; 3000 bushels do. at $1.16½; 2000 bushels do. at $1.16½; 1700 bushels ditto at $1.16; 3300 bushels spot at $1.16½; 1900 bushels spot at $1.16½; 1800 bushels spot at $1.16, and 70,000 bushels No. 2 red at $1.15½ a $1.16. Corn was unsettled; sales of about 9000 bushels, lots at 89 cts. for yellow, 88 cts. for mixed, 87 cts. for steamer, 87 cts. for No. 3 84 cts. per bushel for rejected, and 30,000 bushels sail mixed at 87½ a 88½ cts. Oats were also unsettled; sales of 10,000 bushels white at 65 a 68 cts., and rejected and mixed at 53 a 55 cts. per bushel, and 20,000 bushels No. 2 white at 60 a 61 cts.

Hay and Straw Market, for week ending 8th mo. 26th, 1882.—Loads of hay, 330; loads of straw, 45. Average price during the week—Prime timothy, 90 cts. to $1 per 100 pounds; mixed, 80 cts. to 90 cts. per 100 pounds; straw, 55 to 65 cts. per 100 pounds.

Beef cattle were in fair demand at about former rates: 4000 head arrived and sold at the different yards at 4 a 7½ cts. per pound, as to quality.

Sheep.—Good sheep were in demand at full prices: 15,000 head arrived and sold at the different yards at 2½ a 5½ cts. per lb., as to condition.

Hogs were in demand at an advance: 2800 head arrived and sold at the different yards at 11½ a 12½ cts. per lb., as to quality.

FOREIGN.—Earl Spencer, Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, having ordered the dismissal of five of the sub-constables who objected to being removed from Limerick to the north, the event caused considerable excitement.

The discontent of the constabulary extended to the metropolitan police. Four hundred of the latter met to complain that they were not compensated for extra work. While the meeting was proceeding, the Chief Commissioner appeared and ordered the Chairman to quit the chair. The Chairman refused. The Commissioner threatened to make an example of the Chairman. The meeting dispersed shortly after.

In Limerick there have been thirty resignations from the constabulary in consequence of the dismissal of the five sub-constables. The Inspector General made an attempt to address the men who have resigned, but they refused to listen to him.

The city was without the usual police on beat on the night of the 28th.

The straits in which many Irish landlords find themselves is illustrated by a recent experience of Allies, Secretary of the London Catholic Poor School Committee, who is the proprietor of two islands off Galway, containing 3140 acres, with a nominal rental of $3,170. Having been sued for $1000 for poor rates, he, by legal advice, paid it, and then wrote to Gladstone to ask if the Government could not intervene to help him in view of the fact that for four years he had not received a penny of rent, and his agent had informed him that any attempt to evict would be at the risk of his life. Gladstone replied, expressing his great regret that he was utterly unable to assist him.

The majority of the French papers comment very unfavorably on the action of the British in occupying the Suez Canal.

In consequence of the representations made by Lord Dufferin, the British Ambassador, the Porte has authorized the exportation of mules from Smyrna for British service in Egypt.

The hesitation of the Sultan to ratify the Military Convention with England, is stated to be principally due to the receipt of anonymous threatening letters from Syria, Arabia and Egypt.

Constantinople, 8th mo. 28th.—Austria supports Nedidoff, the Russian Ambassador, in his effort to have the Military Convention, when signed, officially communicated to the Conference, and to obtain from Great Britain a declaration that she will seek no exclusive advantage in Egypt, and will submit the final solution of the question to the decision of Europe.

A despatch to Reuter's Telegram Company from Constantinople, on the 25th, states that Said Pacha and Assym Pacha, the Turkish delegates to the Conference, yesterday advanced fresh demands relative to the Military Convention with England, to the effect that the Turks should land at Alexandria, and that the proclamation relative to Arabi Pasha, instead of declaring him a rebel, should summon him to submit to the Khedive.

De Lesseps adheres to his opinion in regard to the National party in Egypt. He says he still considers Arabi Pasha a noble patriot, and he felt happy to think that he (M. De Lesseps) had had a great share in preventing France from participating in an adventure which he believes will have even more disastrous consequences than those of the French expedition to Mexico. He believed the campaign would be a long one, and that the English would encounter a determined resistance.

A despatch from Ismailia to Reuter's Telegram Company reports that the Egyptians have cut the fresh water canal near there, but states that the supply of water will suffice for some time.

A despatch to the Times from Ismailia, states that Arabi Pasha's soldiers are doubtless suffering great hardships, as those captured by the British look worn and feeble. The English also are suffering from the heat of the sun and its reflection from the sands.

Some fighting occurred last week, in regard to which General Wolsey telegraphs from Ismailia, under date of the 27th, as follows: "I have just returned from the outposts, and find that our actions on Thursday and Friday had far more important results than I was aware of yesterday. The enemy were completely routed, and fled toward Zigazig, throwing away their arms and accoutrements. A very large amount of camp equipment and munitions was captured. Mahmoud Fehmy, Arabi Pasha's Chief Engineer and Military Adviser, is now a prisoner in my camp."

A telegram received in London from Hong Kong, dated Fifth-day, last week, says: "Four thousand natives have died of Asiatic cholera in a single Philippine province, but the epidemic is now decreasing. There have been only six fatal cases among European residents."

Pink-eye has again become prevalent among the horses at Ottawa, Ont., and its immediate vicinity.

There were nineteen deaths from yellow fever in Havana last week.

RECEIPTS.

Received from Joseph S. Middleton, N. J., $2.10, vol. 56; from William Y. Warner, Gtn., $2.10, vol. 56; from Rebecca K. Masters, W. Philada., $2.10, vol. 56; from Samuel Nicholson, N. J., $2.10, vol. 56; from Charles Walton, City, $2, vol. 56, and for Jacob Parvin, Pa., $2.10, vol. 56; from Mary Anna Matlack, N. J., $2.10, vol. 56; from Mary W. Stokes, for Horace Stokes, W. Va., $2.10, to No. 27, vol. 57; from Joel Thompson, Del., $2.10, vol. 56; from William H. Blackburn, Agent, O., $2.10, vol. 56, and for Hannah Blackburn, Abel H. Blackburn, and J. Tullis, $2.10 each, vol. 56; from Ann Smallwood, Pa., $2.10, vol. 56; from Dr. Stephen Wood, L. I., 10 cents postage on vol. 56; from Phebe L. Waln, Fkfd., $2.10, vol. 56; from Thomas Hoyle and Sarah V. Willis, Io., $2.10 each, vol. 56; from Samuel Morris, Pa., $2.10, to No. 27, vol. 57; from Daniel Smith, O., $2.10, vol. 56; from Hannah Mickle, N. J., $2.10, vol. 56; from John S. Lowry, City, $2, vol. 56, and for John C. Lowry, $2.10, vol. 56; from Joseph G. Evans, N. J., $2.10, vol. 56; from Hugh D. Vail, Cal., $2.10, vol. 56; from William B. Oliver, Agent, Mass., $2.10, vol. 56, and for Mercy H. Meader, $2.10, vol. 56; from Dr. William R. Bullock, Del., $2.10, vol. 56; from William Bishop, City, $2, vol. 56; from Joseph N. Taylor, Ind., $2.10, vol. 56; from Russel Taber, Io., $2.10, vol. 56, and for Phebe C. Harkness, $2.10, vol. 56; from Stephen M. Brinton, Pa., $2.10, vol. 56; from William C. Taber, Mass., $2.10, vol. 56; from Samuel Woolman, N. J., $2.10, vol. 56; from Francis Taber, Mass., $2.10, vol. 56; from Jacob P. Jones, City, $2, vol. 56; from Ephraim Tomlinson, N. J., $2.10, vol. 56; from Ellwood E. Haines, N. J., $2.10, vol. 56; from Richard J. Allen, City, $2, vol. 56, and for Rowland D. Allen, City, Richard J. Allen, Jr., Col., and Rowland J. Dutton, N. J., $2.10 each, vol. 56; from Milton Stanley, Agent, Ind., for Joel D. Carter, $6.30, to No. 52, vol. 55, Ira Carter, $2.10, to No. 28, vol. 56, Isaiah George, $1, to No. 52, vol. 56, and Joel Newlin, $2.10, vol. 56; from Daniel Packer, N. J., $2.10, vol. 56; from James R. Kite, Agent, O., for Jesse Dewees, Elizabeth Burgess, Samuel King, Samuel Fawcett, William Harner, Richard Penrose, and Robert Milhouse, $2.10 each, vol. 56; from Deborah Paxson, Pa., $2.10, vol. 56, and for Elias E. Paxson, $2.10, vol. 56; from George B. Allen, Pa., $2.10, vol. 56; from John D. Harrison, Pa., $2.10, vol. 56; from David Edgerton, O., $2.10, vol. 56; from Isaac Hall, Pa., $2.10, vol. 56; from William Bettles, Ill., $2.10, vol. 56; from Benjamin W. Passmore, Pa., $6.30, vol. 56, 3 copies, and for Sarah W. Passmore, $2.10, vol. 56; from Parker Hall, Agent, O., $2.10, vol. 56, and for William Hall, William Hall, Jr., Lewis Taber, Elwood D. Whinery, Jonathan Binns, Joseph P. Binns, David Thomas, Gilbert McGrew, Jonathan Fawcett, Joseph P. Lupton, Israel Steer, Lindley B. Steer, Elisha B. Steer, and Robert Smith, $2.10 each, vol. 56, and for John C. Hill, 75 cents, balance of his account; from S. H. Headley, Pa., $2.10, vol. 56; from Hannah Stevenson, Ill., $2.10, vol. 56; from John W. Hilyard, N. J., $2.10, vol. 56; from Josiah A. Roberts, Pa., $2.10, vol. 56; from Allen John, Io., $2.10, vol. 56; from Maria Penrose, Io., $2.10, vol. 56; from Richard Patton, George E. Young, Zacheus Test and William Test, Io., per M. B. Test, $2.10 each, vol. 56; from Daniel Williams, Agent, O., for Branson D. Sidwell, Asa Branson, Joseph H. Branson, William L. Ashton, Maria Walker, Mary J. French, Thomas Conrow, Mary Ann Holloway, Sarah Purviance, Juliann H. Branson, John C. Hoge, Jacob Holloway, Edwin F. Holloway, Mary Chandler, Joseph Bailey, Mary A. Mitchell, Richard Ashton, Ephraim W. Holloway, Stephen Hobson, and Henry Stenton, $2.10 each, vol. 56; from Richard Mott, Agent, Io., $2.10, vol. 56, and for Thomas E. Mott, Joseph Embree, Joseph Patterson, Robert W. Hampton, and William P. Young, $2.10 each, vol. 56; from Amy J. Brooks, N. J., $2.10, vol. 56; from Elwood Thomas, Pa., $2.10, to No. 14, vol. 57; from Samuel J. Eves, N. J., $2.10, vol. 56; from Levi I. Hoopes, Pa., $2.10, vol. 56; from Daniel J. Morrell, Pa., $2.10, vol. 56; from John T. Moorman, Io., $2.10, to No. 13, vol. 57, and for John M. Mendenhall, Ill., $2.10, vol. 56; from Edward Michener, Pa., $2.10, vol. 56; from Lydia T. King, Pa., $2.10, vol. 56, and for Thomas Evans, Md., and Joseph E. Mickle, Pa., $2.10 each, vol. 56; from Edmund S. Fowler, Agent, O., for Edwin Hollingsworth, Thomas Hobson, Elizabeth Bowman, Stephen Hobson, Thomas Bowman, Thomas Bundy, Daniel M. Mott, Benjamin J. Hobson, and Joseph Penrose, $2.10 each, vol. 56, and for Elisha J. Holloway, $1.60, to No. 52, vol. 55; from Joshua T. Ballinger, Agent, Pa., for Deborah G. Brinton, Charles S. Carter, John Cope, Joseph P. Eldridge, Jesse H. Garrett, Thomas C. Hogue, Ruth P. Johnson, Enos Smedley, Thomas F.

Scattergood, Sarah S. Scattergood, Susan L. Temple and Jonathan Tomlinson, $2.10 each, vol. 56; from Henry Briggs, O., $2.10, vol. 56; from Susan J. Yerk Fkfd., $2.10, vol. 56; from Mary B. Buffinton, Mass., $2.10, vol. 56; from Ann Satterthwaite, N. J., $2.10, vol. 56, and for Mary Jane Satterthwaite, Mic., $2.10, vol. 56; for Margaret C. Venable, N. J., $2.10, vol. 56.

Remittances received after Fourth-day morning will appear in the Receipts until the following week.

CORRECTION.—In essay "Desultory Selections and Pencillings," in last issue of "The Friend," 24th line from beginning, for "large majority," read "large minority."

FRIENDS' SELECT SCHOOLS.

These schools, under the care of the three Monthly Meetings of Friends in this city, will re-open on Second day, Ninth mo. 18th, 1882.

A limited number of children will now be admitted who are not members of our religious Society, who parents may desire to have them educated free from the unnecessary but fashionable accomplishments, too common in many schools at this day.

The attention of Friends residing in the city and neighborhood is invited to them. The terms are moderate, and Friends belonging to Philadelphia Year Meeting, sending children to these schools, (also members), who may find the charges burdensome, can be fully relieved.

The principal schools will open for the next term under the care of John H. Dillingham and Mary Wocman, as Principals, both experienced teachers of many years' experience. Facilities for illustration are afforded by a valuable collection of philosophical and chemical apparatus, minerals, and Auzoux's models of parts of the human system, &c.

The primary Schools on Cherry St., and at Sixth and Noble Sts., will be continued under their former efficient management.

Further information may be obtained upon application to the Treasurer of the Committee,

JAMES SMEDLEY, No. 415 Market St.

MOORESTOWN ACADEMY.

This institution, under care of Chester Monthly Meeting of Friends, offers good opportunities for the instruction of youth, from 7 years upwards, under teachers of good attainments and qualifications, and subjected to moral and religious influences. Boarding may be obtained at reasonable rates.

Opens Ninth mo. 4th. Circulars and full information may be had from SETH WARRINGTON, Moorestown, Burlington Co., N. J., or WM. EVANS, 252 South Front St., Philadelphia.

FRIENDS' ASYLUM FOR THE INSANE,
Near Frankford, (Twenty third Ward,) Philadelphia.
Physician and Superintendent—JOHN C. HALL, M.D.
Applications for the Admission of Patients may be made to the Superintendent, or to any of the Board Managers.

DIED, on the 31st of 7th month, at her residence in Philadelphia, after a short illness, ABIGAIL WOOD, widow of Horatio C. Wood, in the 70th year of her age. This dear friend's latter days shone brighter and brighter, so that she often remarked, "If more joy were her portion, she did not think she would be able to bear it." She felt her time was short, and earnestly pursued the path she believed her loving Saviour was leading her in. On the 29th of 7th month, the day she was taken ill, she queried of a friend if she thought she would recover? On being answered in the affirmative, she asked, what her daughter thought? A similar reply being given, the friend inquired what she thought herself. She said, "I feel my Saviour very near me underneath are his everlasting arms bearing me up—what is his will, will be done, and that is best." Several times she alluded to feeling her Saviour near her. On First-day she spoke only when roused, being in state of extreme weakness; which continued until she quietly ceased to breathe, on Second-day as the morning was beginning to break. "The path of the just as the shining light, that shineth more and more to the perfect day."

—, at Newport, R. I., on the 14th of 8th month, REBECCA F., widow of Charles H. Abbott, and daughter of the late Robert L. and Elizabeth Pitfield, in the 58th year of her age, a member of the Monthly Meeting of Friends of Philadelphia for the Northern District.

THE FRIEND.

A RELIGIOUS AND LITERARY JOURNAL.

VOL. LVI.

SEVENTH-DAY, NINTH MONTH 9, 1882.

NO. 5.

PUBLISHED WEEKLY.

if paid in advance, $2.00 per annum; if not paid in advance $2.50; 10 cents extra is charged for Postage on those sent by mail.

Articles designed for insertion to be addressed to

JOSEPH WALTON,
MOORESTOWN, BURLINGTON CO., N. J.

Subscriptions, payments and business communications, received by

JOHN S. STOKES,
NO. 116 NORTH FOURTH STREET, UP STAIRS,
PHILADELPHIA.

For "The Friend."

Wanderings South and East.

(Concluded from page 26.)

CHINA—MEXICO—PERU.

China and Japan have been made so familiar to modern readers, that W. Coote's visit to those countries may be passed over very briefly. An excursion from the city of Peking to see the tea plantations on the Paeling Hills, gives so pleasant a picture of peasant life, that it may be quoted here.

Immediately on reaching the crest of the hills we found ourselves amongst the tea plantations. On all sides of us were men, women and girls stooping over the little bushes and gathering the leaves into large bamboo baskets. They only pick certain young and green leaves, which must be selected with some care, and they do it with wonderful quickness and dexterity. From these plantations we passed on to the little tea-houses, where we found them carrying out the various other processes for preparing tea for the city market. On being brought from the fields it is spread out on large mats in the sun for a short time, after which it is put into flat trays of four or five feet diameter and rolled by men's feet. The coolies roll their toes like fingers, and curl the tea into a large ball, rolling it in that manner round and round the circular tray; by this process the first curl is given to the leaf. When it is spread out again in the sun for a while, and then curled once more, this is done more carefully and by hand. At last the tea is dried a third time until almost all the green color has left it, when it is ready for firing. Very little firing goes on in the tea districts, that little being done over red-hot charcoal in the peasants' cottages. The final operation consists of packing it tightly into bags weighing half a picul or sixty-four pounds, in which state it is sent down Foochow.

We met scores of women and young girls on our way up, carrying these bags upon their backs. They hang one on each end of a bamboo pole, which makes their load at least a hundred and thirty-four pounds apiece. This enormous weight they all take for ten, twelve and fifteen miles a day. Many of the girls were not more than sixteen or seventeen years old, and more healthy, merry and even pretty young women no one could wish to see. They were all neatly dressed, wearing wide and very short blue trousers, which covered only very little of their brown round sturdy legs. Above these garments was a loose blue tunic, which covered, though failed to hide their well-proportioned figures. Their hair is always of the deepest black and shiny, I am afraid, with grease, but ornamented with bright silver hairpins and scarlet or white artificial flowers. People who have only seen the yellow, sickly, washed-out women of the Chinese cities, can form no idea of these rosy-cheeked, chubby wenches of the Paeling Hills; down they came in files of eight or ten or twelve, singing a little grunting tune to which they kept step in order to make their loads more easy.

"The wild flowers, amongst which such familiar ones as azaleas, rhododendrons and violets were conspicuous, excited my surprise no less than these bright pretty peasant women, for I had no idea that China produced such homely objects."

The Spanish-American countries in general did not impress our traveller favorably.

"Mexico in its earliest days of independence stood at the very top of the tree of ancient civilization in the New World; the Tezucans and the Aztecs in many ways surpassed even the Incas of Peru in their advancement. Again, Mexico in the early days of colonization was the most magnificent of all the Spanish possessions. It has now fallen to the very lowest place among nations, and has become an actual bye-word 'with none so poor to do it reverence.' As I think of this I am tempted to quote a few lines from the works of one of the old kings of this land, a monarch who reigned many years before Columbus discovered the West Indies, and who was the most high-minded and enlightened perhaps of all barbaric potentates. In his old age, this king, Nezahualcoyotl, the Tezucan, retiring from the government of his country to pursue his literary inclination, perhaps anticipating the downfall of his great empire, wrote as follows:

"All things on earth have their term, and, in the most joyous career of their vanity and splendor, their strength fails, and they sink into the dust. * * * The great, the wise, the valiant, the beautiful, alas! where are they now? They are all mingled with the clod; and that which has befallen them shall happen to us and to those which come after us. Yet let us take courage, illustrious nobles and chieftains, true friends and loyal subjects, let us aspire to that heaven where all is eternal and corruption cannot come. The horrors of the tomb are but the cradle of the sun, and the dark shadows of death are brilliant lights for the stars.' I fear there are few modern Mexicans with either the wisdom or the religion of this old royal philosopher."

Of the Oroya railroad in Peru which climbs

the Andes to the height of 15,722 feet, W. Coote says; "The scenery throughout the whole ascent is simply tremendous, and nothing more grand or awful could be conceived. The crags, precipices and peaks are those of nightmares and dreams, the whole terror and awful magnificence of the Andes being laid open to the spectator."

"There was a feature of the valley scenery far more interesting to me than any other. The sides of the mountains for many miles at a time are covered with irrigation works of the old Inca race. These works are in the form of terraces, though smaller than the rice terraces of China and Japan, being in places mere horizontal ledges but a few feet wide, yet admirably adapted to the growth of corn. The work that these terraces represent, scattered as they are over miles and miles of hillside, and reaching to incredible heights, is so stupendous, that it is, in my opinion, a no less wonderful specimen of human capability than the railway itself.

"No one can travel in Peru without a feeling of wonder at that vast organism—the Inca empire: it is only with the temples of Egypt and of Nineveh that such works as these of the Incas can be compared. I have always felt most keenly the contrast between those past and these present days; it is ever upon the field of the greatest human works of the past that the most despicable human conditions of the present are to be found. In the Nile valley and amongst the ruins of Syria; at poor modern Tunis, or amongst the hovels on the plain of Smyrna, turn where you will to seek monuments of the past, and the very Pariahs of modern races shall you find. And if the lowest of Eastern peoples are to be found at Thebes and Carthage and Ephesus and Nineveh, the same fact is no less observable in the new world, where the Tezucans and Aztecs have been supplanted by the lawless Mexicans, and the royal land of the Incas has given place to poverty-stricken Peru."

"We passed out of Peru with the Chileno flag flying over one of her most valuable districts, and an expensive and disastrous war raging along her whole coast line; with Callao in a state of perpetual alarm at the reported advent of the Chileno fleet, and Lima in the now almost chronic throes of revolution and anarchy. There seems to be a judgment on these Spanish Americans for that great crime at Caxamalea, when the ransomed Inca was burnt in the great square, and the honor of Spain and the fair name of Christianity were dragged in the very dust. That murder perpetrated by Pizarro three hundred and fifty years ago is, perhaps, the foulest crime in the long black list of wickedness that history can show: it seems that his own assassination in Lima was not punishment enough; it seems that the fall of his race and at last of the whole line of Viceroy was not enough; it seems that the crimes of those bloodthirsty Conquerors are still bearing their punishment even unto these last generations of these that have hated Him."

For "The Friend."

Desultory Selections and Pencillings.

PLAINNESS AND SIMPLICITY IN DRESS.

Dress, to be consistent with the spirit of Quakerism, should not be merely plain in color and form, but in the simplicity and inexpensiveness of the material. Such a garb for our poor perishing bodies as would show that we took little thought about it, further than was necessary to convenience and neatness. Such as should not occasion the remark that is often made, that the Friends' dress though peculiar in its style of plainness, is often made of the richest of silks and the finest of cloths.

There surely never was a time which called for more faithfulness in holding up our standard of plainness and simplicity, and in such a manner that we shall not be stumbling blocks to those who are inquiring into the ground of our testimonies. The tide of fashionable folly seems at its very height, and its votaries are following its course of extravagance to the extent of wicked indulgence, so that dress and show would seem to be the object of life with some of the young women who parade their finery in our streets; it is enough to make the more thoughtful blush with very shame for their sex.

The modest attire of many of our young people is a safe-guard against the evils which follow in the course of fashion—the corrupt conversation—the pernicious reading—the dangerous maxims and debasing pleasures of a world lying in wickedness. When adopted, not in the spirit of self-righteousness or sectarianism, but in simple obedience to the light of Truth as manifested to the waiting, watchful soul, it will be a means of preservation to them. So may our dear young friends not be discouraged by the cry so often raised against plainness, that it is a form of self-righteousness; that it is not bearing the cross of Christ, but making a cross for ourselves; but if they feel that the Master calls for this sacrifice from them, offer it in child-like, unquestioning obedience, and they may find that this humbling, mortifying way of confessing their Saviour, is just what their spiritual health requires. "Whose adorning, let it not be that outward adorning of plaiting the hair, and of wearing of gold, or of putting on of apparel; but let it be * * even the ornament of a meek and quiet spirit, which is in the sight of God of great price."

"No less care should be exercised and observed with respect to the size of our houses, the style of our furniture, and the general manner of our living; so that the precept of the apostle be not trenced upon: "Let your moderation be known unto all men:" for the superadded reason, "The Lord is at hand."

It was a sage testimony borne by Samuel Bettle the elder, and one which he no less commended by his consistent practice, that a man's increase of means was no excuse for indulgence in excesses of any kind; especially if such excesses might tend to entangle himself with the affairs of this life, might prove prejudicial to his children, might be a bad example to others, or might abridge his charity to the poor. If we are truly "not of the world," how can we do other than prove by our consistent godly lives, that we have renounced its ways, wages and customs! and are, as we profess, the filial, self-denying followers of Him who "pleased not himself;" who bought us that we might glorify Him; verifying the language: "Ye are not your own"—"ye are not of the world, even as I am not of the world."

The injunction, "Let your light so shine before men, that they may see your good works and glorify your Father which is in heaven," has lost none of its binding obligation upon every follower of Christ. Then is there not danger of our so swimming with the current, in our so amply providing for the desires of the fleshly mind in relation to these worldly gratifications and indulgences, as to overlook consistency, and to render in the view of critical observers any real difference between man and man—between the professor of Christ and him who denies Him—to be very questionable?

Under these circumstances, how imperative becomes the "watch" so enjoined by our blessed Lord and Lawgiver!—"Watch and pray lest ye enter into temptation." Nothing short of this can preserve any steadfast in the truth as it is in Jesus. And oh! that there was more heed given to his still small voice—to his internal reproofs—to the restraints of his cross—to the preciousness of his holy example—to his law written on the heart, as our sufficiency and guide into all truth! This would induce a "Looking diligently lest any man fail of the grace of God;" with also a "Looking for that blessed hope, and the glorious appearing of the great God and our Saviour, Jesus Christ; who give himself for us, that He might redeem us from all iniquity, and purify unto himself a peculiar people, zealous of good works."

BEWARE OF BEING STUMBLING-BLOCKS.

"As every degree of luxury hath some connexion with evil; for those who profess to be disciples of Christ, and are looked upon as leaders of the people, to have that mind in them, which was also in Christ, and so stand separate from every wrong way, is a means of help to the weaker. * * I have felt an increasing care to attend to that Holy Spirit which sets right bounds to our desires, and leads those who faithfully follow it, to apply all the gifts of Divine Providence to the purposes for which they were intended."

"I trust there are many who at times, under Divine visitation, feel an inward enquiry after God, and when such in the simplicity of their hearts mark the lives of a people who profess to walk by the leadings of his Spirit, of what great concern is it that our lights shine clear, that nothing in our conduct carry a contradiction to the Truth as it is in Jesus, or be a means of profaning his holy name, and be a stumbling-block in the way of sincere inquirers."

"When such seekers, wearied with empty forms, look towards uniting with us as a people, and behold active members among us depart in their customary way of living from that purity of life, which under humbling exercises has been opened before them as the way of the Lord's people, how mournful and discouraging is the prospect! and how strong-ly doth such unfaithfulness operate against the spreading of the peaceable, harmonious principles and testimony of Truth amongst mankind!"—John Woolman.

AN EXAMPLE OF SELF-DENIAL AND FAITHFUL DEVOTEDNESS.

It is related of Daniel Wheeler that when on his religious visit to the South Sea Islands he was solicited to visit a volcano not many miles off, and which, as he had never seen would undoubtedly have been an object of interest to him. He replied "No; that was not in his certificate; and that he was afraid to lose the time, not knowing what might depend on it."

Should not the above relation convey cautionary hint to those of our members who appear, perhaps to an increasing degree, feel at liberty to consult only self-inclination and then to go when and where they list in pursuit of new things—even to crossing the ocean for a wider field of scenic view or of a tiquarian research and novel entertainment? If, as saith the apostle, "we are not our own ought there not to be a recognition and consultation, with a felt permission of Him "whose we are and whom we profess to serve," before going on such tours of relaxation, and before setting such examples? Is such "lose time" which, it may be in the counsels of Heavenly wisdom, should be otherwise appropriated, and thence without "knowing what may depend on it?" Time and influence and even life, are talents to be used under the direction of the Great Husbandman, and for which a strict account must be rendered. How faithfully, then, should we seek to know whether heavenly approbation, direction and unction—within the reach of all—be vouchsafed! which are so necessary to a right war and warfare through this perilous journey of very responsible existence.

A TESTIMONY CONCERNING THE CHURCH.

"The middle of the last century was a very low period with the Christian Church under various names and in most countries. Of the state and condition of the Society of Friends in Pennsylvania and the Jerseys, during the period from 1750 to 1820, it may be more difficult to speak with precision. In many parts much weakness existed, particularly in the period preceding the revolutionary war. Profoundly in the things of time, too many were forgetful of those pertaining to eternity. Job Smith, of Marlborough, in Pennsylvania, an aged minister, who had witnessed, as he believed, considerable declension among his brethren, expressed himself on this subject in 1764, in a meeting of ministers and elders, to the following purport: "That he had been a member of our Society upwards of sixty years, and he well remembered that in those early times, Friends were a plain, lowly-minded people; and that there was much tenderness and contrition in their meetings. That a twenty years from that time, the Society increasing in wealth, and in some degree conforming to the fashions of the world, true humility was less apparent, and their meetings in general were not lively and edifying. That at the end of forty years, many of them were grown very rich; and many of the Society made a specious appearance in the world; that marks of outward wealth and greatness appeared on some in our meeting of ministers and elders; and as such things became more prevalent, so the powerful overshadowings of the Holy Ghost were less manifest in the Society. That there had been a continued increase of such ways of life, even until the present time, and that the weakness that had w overspread the Society, and the barrenness manifest among us, is matter of much sorrow."

THE LORD WILL STILL HAVE A PEOPLE.

"Whatever may be the good pleasure of Him, who raised us up by the breath of his word, with regard to the undisturbed enjoyment of those sweet privileges of fellowship together, as a visibly distinct body, of which we have so long and so unworthily partaken, it is more and more clear to me, that the faithful, and those that humble themselves in the dust before Him, will never be utterly forsaken or forgotten:—that these will never altogether disappointed of their confidence, though they have the bread of affliction and the cup of adversity administered for a long season and in large measure:—the Lord will still have a people peculiarly formed for Himself, who shall purely show forth his praise, and be enabled to lift up his standard to the nations. Those who love our Lord Jesus in the truth, not feignedly,—and who in proof thereof are given up to follow Him in the reprobation and daily cross, I trust will not be permitted to be moved by afflictions, nor be tried away by delusions, nor exalted by abundance of revelations, nor turned aside by business or the pleasures, the cares or the joys of this life, or by the love of other things; but these are concerned to lie low before the Lord, and to be crucified with Christ; and so they may say in truth, 'I live, yet not by Christ liveth' and moveth and reigneth with me."—John Barclay.

For "The Friend."

African Malaria.

The journals of most of the African explorers contain frequent allusions to the malarial fever, with which many parts of the continent are so infested, that few travellers can remain long in its precincts escape one or more attacks of the disease; and many of them die from its effects.

In the narrative of the "East Central African Expedition," written by Joseph Thomson, some interesting statements are made of the effects of this fever, and of the best means for resisting its depressing influences. This writer, who speaks from experience, says:

"It is a well known fact that the only way to resist successfully the enervating effects of the humid tropical climate is by constant exertion, and by manfully fighting the baleful influence. The man who has nothing to do, won't do what he has to do, is sure to succumb in a few months, and degenerate into an idiot or a baby. He becomes the helpless victim of manifold bilious troubles, and is continually open to attacks of fever, diarrhoea, dysentery. His mental energy flies with his physical, till any sustained thought is impossible, and to pass the time he must doze night and day, except when he is grumbling and defaming the climate. Hard constant work is the great preserver. Sweat out the malaria and the germs of disease, and less will be heard of the energy-destroying climate of the tropics."

As he ascended the mountain ridges which form the flanks of the central plateau of Africa, he felt more evidently the effects of his long sojourn in the malarious lowlands, which are thus described:

"The poison began to show itself, and as we were to ooze out under the effects of a purer atmosphere. It seemed to take the form of rheumatic fever, and acted with such dire effect on my lungs and heart that I thought it would kill me. The hard work of an entire day seemed concentrated in each step I took. Every few feet I had to stop, gasping for breath and blowing like a broken-winded horse, while my heart palpitated in the most alarming manner. My mind became dazed and stupid, while my poor limbs seemed made of jelly, so utterly incapable of supporting me did they feel.

"In this dreadful condition I continued my journey, wearily dragging myself behind the caravan, and struggling desperately to keep up with it, but finding myself each day gradually falling back till I would be left alone with my servant in the lonely solitude of the mountains, to wonder where all this would end."

About a month later the party reached a point almost in sight of Lake Nyassa, towards which they had so long and wearily tramped. "Yet," he says, "I felt as if it required more strength than I possessed to reach it. The frightful fever which attacked me on first leaving the lowlands, still clung to me like a vampire, sucking my heart's blood. But for the rule I adopted I think I should never have survived to get so far. That rule was simply to keep marching on as long as my legs would sustain me, and never to be carried by my men. For an African traveller to halt that he may get better is the worst policy possible. With nothing to amuse him, he lies and groans in his tent. There is little to think of but his troubles, his delays, and his thousand and one vexations, while a burning sun pours down on his flimsy tent. He is thus apt to become worse rather than better. But when on the march it is different. He has his route to think about; he has to note the characteristics of the country, to hold consultations with guides and chiefs, and keep a vigilant eye on the men, so that everything may be straight. His mind is thus drawn away from his troubles. The physical exertion helps to keep his system in better working order, and enables him to eat and sleep."

"On this principle then I moved on. I never allowed my illness to stop me a single day. Perhaps some may be skeptical when I say that I have frequently marched till I have fallen on the road, but carried I would not be. Poor Johnston's tortures rose too vividly before my eyes. For more than a month at this time my memory entirely forsook me, so that I have sat at night vainly attempting to write up my diary, and almost tearing my hair in despair. The day's journey would appear as a perfect blank, and I would sit and stare at vacancy like an idiot, when I tried to think whether or not we had crossed any streams, passed any villages, or seen any mountains. I could not remember the names of any of my friends. And thus I would sit in the most ludicrous plight, endeavoring to recall what had marked our course. I have actually a clearer idea now of the incidents of each day's march than I had at the close of any particular day, and but for my constant habit of jotting down at the moment whatever occurred or was seen, my map and diary would have shown a considerable hiatus. And now when I had got almost within reach of Nyassa I was so weak that I could hardly lift a weight of six pounds.

Under these conditions mountains were crossed, and more lay before us.

"On leaving Mtandala we had a long march to reach the next village. The men got into camp after midday, but I was so far behind with my good servant Uledi that the men became alarmed, and came back with a hammock to carry me. That I knew would only have been torture amongst such precipitous hills. However, as I could not get along, a rope was tied round my waist, and with this I was hauled up the mountain, while two men steadied me behind. I was thus brought triumphantly into camp like a valuable prisoner of war."

At a later period of his journey, as he rose in altitude and got into purer air the same effect was produced, already described as marking the change from the coast lowlands to the mountains. The malaria began to work out and reduced him terribly. He became partially delirious and excessively irritable. He says, "I felt like an untamable animal newly caged, and in my impotent rage would almost dash my head against any obstruction. The weaker I grew, and the more unable to wreak my vengeance physically on any of my men who thwarted me, I developed a certain strength of language which would have astonished those who know me. I make this confession in justice to the Zanzibar porters. We hear frequently about their troublesome conduct, desertions, obstinacy, &c. But we are never told how much they have to bear from their masters, when they have lost all moral control of themselves by incessant troubles, and throw on the most frivolous pretexts, sticks, books, boots or the strongest language of Billingsgate, at them."

For "The Friend."

Docks.

We had on our farm an old enclosure which lay long uncultivated. Owing to the press of business, incident to farm occupations, it was little looked after, till at length our attention was attracted by noticing that the spot was growing up with weeds. Among them we saw docks, and knowing them to be "vile weeds that spoil the land," we took a leisure moment to endeavor to eradicate them. Some were mere seedlings, of recent growth, and these yielded to a smart pull and came out, root and all; but some were more vigorous, well rooted in the soil, and resisted the attempt to remove them. Being in earnest to succeed we applied more strength, and persevered, till those which could not be pulled up were broken off, and our lot was cleared of them.

We went our way, and at times looked with pleasure on the clean appearance it presented, clothed with grass and free from weeds. We were busy, here and there, for some time, and almost forgot our old experience with the weeds, when we one day found a few weakly docks here and there among the grass. They looked insignificant, but at a leisure moment we went over the ground, intending to eradicate these intruders also; but when we attempted to pull them they invariably broke off instead of drawing out, and at last we found they were shoots from the old roots left behind when we first tried to clear our ground of them. They were again broken off and left, again to put up an appearance later in the season and once more to give us the trouble of trying to be rid of them. At last we were forced to do, what ought to have been done at the first, to get a dock-spade and lift the roots out of the ground. They were old, well set in the soil, and hard to move; but by the aid of the spade, and some hard labor, they were all taken out and the land cleared of a spreading and evil weed.

Now reader, for the moral of all this. The Christian, desirous of doing his duty, as he enters the vineyard of his own heart to labor, is careful to watch lest any evil of this world's growth take root and mar the beauty of a clean heart. But the cares and daily occurrences of life sometimes get so entangled with our better moments that they gain an undue ascendancy, and habits are formed, or ways of worldliness fallen into, which mar the sweetness of our early love for the Truth. If these are not watched against, the weeds of the world take root and become fixtures in our characters, hard to turn away from. After a time some of them become quite conspicuous to ourselves, and we are led to look over our conduct—the loving Master moving us there-to by his Spirit—we see and mourn our weakened love, and earnestly set our hearts to overcome these failings, as we call them. If we do so as we ought, and come humbly to our Lord asking the help and strength He can give us, we will know a victory which will be permanent; but too many of us do, as we did with Docks, go to work in our own strength and will to break off from what we see are wrong in our ways. We turn from these growing evils, and watching over ourselves, realize a reformation for a season. Thinking we have known an overcoming, we guard against them for a time, but busy times of a worldly character intervene, and we become slack in this watchfulness, till at length we waken up to the knowledge that the old evil roots have sprung up once more in our hearts. We sometimes try to excuse ourselves thinking they are but little things, brought out by care and trouble, and we are tempted to pass them by as some of the frailties of human nature—matters of small moment, though forced to admit they mar our happiness:—wishing to ignore the truth that these little things spring from the old unradicated root of wrong.

Well will it be for us if, in merey, we early see our state, for if we would know a returning and rest we must get down to the root of the matter,—not now in our own way and strength, but seeking in heartfelt prayer for divine help, know these evils eradicated from our hearts. Ah me! what work some of these old roots, grown too near to our hearts, give us, ere we know a thorough cleansing, and the sweet peace of a pure heart is again ours.

Reader, thoroughly search thy heart; it may be some wrong things thou thought destroyed are faintly coming to the surface again because the old roots are yet alive. Beware of Docks, new or old! W.

Use Your Books.—Individual owners of books do not always get much advantage from the books on their shelves. A very small percentage of the volumes contained in many a home, are put to constant and serviceable use. The books are there, ready to instruct or to amuse; but their possessors fail to "get the good of them." Just as men and women express their desire for more faith and more grace, but do not use the faith and grace they have, so do they sigh for more books, and lament the poverty of their book-shelves, while neglecting to avail themselves of the existing stock. A good beginning for a profitable use of one's books is the formation of a habit of looking up things at the time when they are uppermost in the mind. You are not quite sure of the spelling or meaning of a certain word; perhaps you have dodged it for say five to fifty years; get down your Webster or Worcester, and fix it in your mind. The reader who overcomes the first feeling of inertia, and, instead of postponing his studies to a time that never comes, makes now his opportunity, will be surprised to find how soon his sense of increased intellectual strength will become apparent to himself and his friends.

TO WHICH KINGDOM?

A TRUE INCIDENT.

A hush in the school-room prevailed;
Each heart with expectancy burned,
For the Kaiser was coming that day,
And all eyes to the portals were turned.

And now he has entered the room,
Lo, that Kaiser, so stately and proud;
He has gazed on each sunny head there
That before him in reverence is bowed.

And now every heart gives a throb,
As before him is stationed a class,
And the Kaiser, so great and so tall,
Thus questions a bright little lass:

"To which kingdom belongeth this rose?"
Taking one from the vase by his side;
Her blue eyes were lifted to his,
"To the Vegetable," quick she replied.

"Right, right, little maiden; and this?"
And forth from his pocket he drew
A fair jeweled watch, with its chain,
And then held it up to her view.

Not a doubt to her blue eyes arose,
As she stood 'neath the Kaiser's proud gaze,
But clear came her answer again:
"To the mineral, sir, if you please."

With a smile at her answer so quaint,
Said the Kaiser, so mighty and high:
"And now, little maid, can you tell
Of which kingdom a member am I?"

Ah! poor little maid, 'twas indeed
A specimen strange to her eyes:
She gazed at the Kaiser, so tall,
But mute were her lips with surprise.

A specimen rare—that wise little maid
That question had not heard before;
Of the kingdoms three, to which he belonged,
That Kaiser—it puzzled her sore.

The elephant great she had seen,
And the spotted tigers as well,
And the lions, too, with bristling mane,
And their kingdom she quickly could tell.

But a Kaiser! ah, never before
Had she seen one so stately and grand;
Sure, not with the rose or the watch,
Or the elephant huge, could he stand.

A sweet puzzled look filled her eyes,
And she stood in a wondering maze;
On the stately form and the kingly brow
Of the Kaiser she fixed her gaze.

But now springs a light to her eyes,
As, placing his hand on her head,
"To which kingdom?" he questions again;
"To the Kingdom of Heaven!" she said.

Ah! wise little maid! may thy words
A prophecy truly unfold;
And when thou shalt enter the Kingdom above,
Thou may'st then the Kaiser behold.

N. Y. Tribune.

Selected

SINS CAST INTO THE DEPTHS OF THE SEA

"Thou wilt cast all my sins into the depths of the sea."—Micah vii. 19.

Deep sea! in whose unfathomed caves
Our sins are cast and found no more;
No tempest rage, no surging waves,
Can beat them back upon the shore.

Low in unsounded depths they lie,
Like Egypt's submerged chivalry.

Like the army and horse, the shield, bow and quiver
They slumbered deep down on the coral-paved floor

So our legion transgressions are buried forever;

In judgment they rise to condemn us no more;

Buried forever!

Evermore!

"Thou wilt cast all their sins into the depths of the sea!"

How gracious the tidings for you and for me!

Deep sea! the load from sight is lost;

But where the mighty burden fell,

Though many a gallant ship has crossed,

There is no milestone left to tell.

Unsounded caverns, low and deep,

Forever will the secret keep.

Oh, yes! the great burden is sunk in no river,

Which the drought of the summer to sight might restore;

It is plunged in the ocean depths, buried forever,

In judgment to rise and condemn us no more;

Buried forever!

Evermore!

"Thou wilt cast all their sins in the depths of the sea!"

Thrice blessed the tidings for you and for me!

J. R. Macduff.

For "The Friend."

A Word in Season.

As a friend was walking along the street of Philadelphia about the middle of the day he passed the corner of Second and Walnut streets, where at that hour may generally be found a group of loungers. His attention was arrested by hearing, behind him, the name of the Supreme Being uttered in a careless tone. Looking around, he noticed that it came from a stout-built, weather-beaten man, perhaps past the meridian of life, who had just joined one of the small knots of men who were lounging about; and that it seemed to be a mere salutation to his friends, and not the result of any feeling of anger.

Our friend paused a few moments to consider what was his own duty in the case. It was very possible that any advice from him would not be kindly received, and might not prove of any real benefit to the person to whom it was addressed. But yet it was important to keep his own conscience clear of any neglect of duty. After deliberating a short time, the right course seemed clear; and finding a lull in the conversation, he spoke to the man and requested his attention. He willingly stepped aside, and listened to the advice given him to avoid using the sacred name unnecessarily. There was no irritation; but a kind response to the remarks made, and repeated and hearty thanking of the one who had thus shown an interest in his welfare.

The friend passed on, not only relieved of the concern that had pressed upon him, but with a sweet sense of tenderness and spiritual refreshment, which reminds one of what was said many years ago of Samuel Emlen,—that he earned his daily bread by jobbing.

Simple and common-place as this little incident is, it illustrates the way in which Christians are led. Their preservation and growth in grace largely depend on the watchfulness to the pointings of duty, often in very little matters; and on the honest faith ness with which they obey the commands of the Lord of the vineyard, and perform the work which He assigns them. Such will experience the fulfilment of the Scripture promise—"If ye be willing and obedient, ye shall have the good of the land." J.

For "The Friend."

Spiritual Gifts.

Those who occupy the responsible position of ministers and elders, should be changed persons, should know the work of regeneration in their own particulars, and also a right qualification for the work to which they are led.

Among the gifts which God bestows upon the members of his church, that of true spiritual discernment holds a prominent place. It is virtually the basis of all other gifts. The slave who is instructed unto the kingdom of heaven, and qualified to bring forth out of the treasure, things new and old, has given heed to the evidence of right and wrong, that has been afforded in the lines of his own experience. By this evidence, the minister gains to soundness in word and doctrine, to follow the Shepherd's putting forth; to recognize the provision that a compassionate Saviour deigns to bless for the benefit of the people. And each disciple is enabled to know what portion they have to hand forth, and when the people have enough. It is practical wisdom for ministers to know and observe the right time to begin and conclude their service. To feed, but not overcharge the people. By a faithful exercise of this gift of God, the elder is made quick of discerning in his work.

Those on whom God is pleased to bestow special gifts, He prepares for the position to which He designs them. Many are the trials to which they are subjected in the fiery furnace. In these severe operations the vessel may be marred by the enemy in transformations, suggesting an easier way. But as there is a passive endurance until judgment is brought forth unto victory, ability is given to offer unto the Lord an offering in righteousness. In such an experience there is a growth, as from the child to the strong man. As in the physical developments when health and the enjoyment of suitable food and exercise, the growth is as rapid as God signs it should be. There is an increase in wisdom. Those who have to teach doctrine, and to feed the flock, have first to be taught themselves, and to partake of the food that is convenient for them. If they are to be ministers of Christ, He must first minister to them. He, from time to time, enlarges their minds in spiritual things, giving them understanding in the Scriptures. During these varied experiences they may have to endure severe temptations. The enemy, with his deviousness, may present himself as an angel of light, and make suggestions to the teachable mind that are liable to be mistaken for the teachings of Christ; and will lead from the simplicity of the truth as it is in Jesus; the mind becoming vainly puffed with the thought of superior attainments—which is a spiritual disease. When such is the case, the rough temptation in whatever form, there is but one Physician that can prescribe, or apply the remedy. A refusal to take the prescription, or receive the application, will aggravate or prolong the disease. A careful attendant nurse is very useful under such circumstances. When such nurse or nurses are father or mother, or both, having a good understanding of the mind of the physician, and a deep interest in the health of the children, and faithfully advise submission to the needful treatment, such advice ought to have a salutary effect. Herein the younger in religious experience should be subject to those who have arrived at greater maturity. The members who are under the care and teaching of the one Master, will be very much of one mind, and will witness a comfort and strength in being "subject one to another in love." May the heart of the fathers be turned to the children, and the heart of the children to their fathers, that God's blessing may rest upon the earth.

Empress Eugénie and the Crimean War.—In the late Count Kesseléff's memoirs which are coming out (in French) at St. Petersburg, is an account of the visit of the Grand Duke Constantine to the Imperial Court of France. Count Kesseléff, be it remembered, was then ambassador of the Czar Alexander to Napoleon III., and an elderly, grave, and observant old gentleman who wished to think the best of everyone. At the dinners and dejeuners given in honor of the Grand Duke, his Imperial Highness sat on the right hand of her Majesty and Count Kesseléff on the left. They found her voluble, laughter-loving, and yet pretentious, and animated with a burning desire to prove that it was she who really held the sceptre. One morning, at a gala dejeuner, she suddenly, in her talkative way, said to the Grand Duke, "Oh! I was going to tell you yesterday in what way the Crimean war happened, when the Emperor interrupted me. It began in a letter from the Czar Nicholas, in answer to the one in which we had announced our marriage. The Emperor took it into my room one morning to read it to me. When he was folding it up he observed that it was cold. I said, 'It is worse—it is severe.' The exact word I made use of was (here the Empress turned round, and put her lips close to my ear,) 'it is coarsely rude' grossière. 'How do you make that out?' returned the Emperor. 'Why read it again, and you will see.' He re-read. He admitted that I was right, and said he would reflect over the matter. I took care he should. From that moment the war was resolved upon.' 'And so your Majesty,' I interposed, 'caused the death of 200,000 men and the destruction of eight milliards of francs!' 'I did, and I don't repent of it a bit,' she retorted. 'Such perturbations must take place in the lives of nations. France (the Emperor and herself) was determined to hold her head high and regain her ancient position. Thanks to the English alliance, we attained our object. With England, we shall be powerful abroad and tranquil at home.'" The Emperor, who was seated opposite, was on pins and needles. He called over to the Empress, "I dare say you are talking politics." She was going to answer, when he rose, and made a sign to her that the breakfast was at an end. The Empress was also the author of the war with Prussia. She called it ma guerre à moi. She is sorry that she risked it, I believe, but it does not appear that she has "repented" in the theological sense of the word. The motives of Hartmann and his associates which led them to blow up a railway train were certainly, as compared to those which the Empress Eugénie avowed to Count Kesseléff, infinitely noble. She was animated by wounded vanity, and incurred no personal destruction when she caused the death of 200,000 men and the waste of eight milliards of francs. The "Yes; and I don't repent of it a bit," seems more horrible than the destruction.—Herald of Peace.

For "The Friend."

Religious Items, &c.

Methodists in Rome.—The Christian Advocate speaks encouragingly of the progress of their denomination in Rome. They have recently received two persons who had been Catholic priests, and whose labors it was hoped would be useful among the people.

Judicial Oaths in France.—In the French Chambers the bill from the Committee on Judicial oaths proposed a uniform secular declaration or affirmation. The Government recommended a religious oath, with a dispensation for persons entertaining religious scruples; while the Roman Catholic chiefs demanded the retention of the old Church oath, with the infliction of heavy penalties in case of its violation. Some parts of the debate were intensely exciting. The most powerful speech in favor of the Committee's report was made by Jules Roche. He described with wonderful effect the Roman Catholic efforts for centuries to tyrannize over the conscience, and hurled against the defending logic of their leaders, with tremendous emphasis, the stubborn facts connected with the massacre of St. Bartholomew, and their prolonged persecutions of the Huguenots. He closed by denouncing these persecutions as crimes from whose consequences France is still suffering. The effect of his argument is shown by the vote which followed the debate. An amendment, ingeniously offered to meet all objections to the oath by defining it as a mere attestation, not implying any profession of religious belief, was lost by a vote of 220 to 205, and the formula, "On my honor, faith, and conscience I swear," was adopted.

Hindu Approval of the Bible.—A Hindu paper, published in Bengal, speaks as follows of the excellence of the Bible: "It is the best and most excellent of all English books, and there is not its like in the English language. As every joint of the sugar cane, from the root to the top, is full of sweetness, so every page of the Bible is fraught with the most precious instruction. A portion of that book would yield to you more of sound morality than a thousand other treatises on the same subject. In short, if any person studies the English language with a view to gaining wisdom, there is not another book which is more worthy of being read than the Bible."

Intoxicating Liquors.—The Mariposa Gazette says the Methodist Conference in session at Memphis prohibited the manufacture and sale of intoxicating liquors by any member of that church.

For "The Friend."

Natural History, Science, &c.

An Electrified Party.—Professor W. G. Adams, of Kings College, London, describes in Nature certain electrical effects experienced in the Alps. We reached, he says, the top of the Jungfrau Joeh at 10.5 A. M.; and were met by a violent hailstorm, which came rolling up from the northern side of the Col. We at once started to return, and had been walking for two hours down the centre of the Aletsch glacier when the electrical effects began to be felt. We were enveloped in cloud, above which there were no doubt other clouds charged with electricity, and as they approached we were gradually being charged more and more strongly by induction from the lower cloud, and when the discharges of thunder occurred we were suddenly relieved by an electric shock. A kind of brush discharge of gradually increasing intensity went on for some minutes, followed by a sudden shock, and this process of bringing us up to the right state of excitement, to be relieved by a sudden shock, was repeated over and over again several times.

The hissing sounds were first heard in the alpenstocks, and gradually increased in loudness up to the sudden discharge. There were clear indications that, as condensers of electricity, we were not all of the same capacity. We were roped together in threes; in one set of three I was in the middle. While the charging was going on I felt a pricking sensation at the waist on the side where the cord was knotted, showing that those who were more influenced by electrical induction were charging the others through the rope, which acted as a conductor.—Chr. Advocate.

Colossal Fern.—Recently a huge stump-fern, Todea, was brought away from its seclusion in the Dandenong Ranges, near Port Philip. After the removal of its hundreds of fronds, the stump-like trunk weighed 2900 pounds. It required to be dragged by a train of oxen out of its recess, where it may have grown for more than a century to accumulate the substance of its massive stem. This monster fern was to be placed in the conservatory of Melbourne. Giant Todeas may be obtained from South Australia (Mount Lofty Ranges), various places in Victoria, Tasmania, New South Wales and Queensland, but specimens weighing over half a ton (without fronds) are rare. This colossal fern has also the recommendation of bearing a considerable amount of frost, so that in temperatures like that of Arran it could be grown in the open air. In South Africa it seems never to attain to the enormous weight of extra large Australian specimens. Todeas are often seen in American collections of exotic ferns, usually kept under glass cases, as it seems almost impossible for them to thrive anywhere but in a close and damp atmosphere. In such glass cases, however, they thrive amazingly, and those who have them usually feel that they have something to be proud of when they exhibit them to admiring friends.—Gardener's Monthly.

Mischievous Plants.—That water-eress which I gathered with such delight from the sparkling brook at Kawan has proved anything but a boon to the Southern provinces, where what was originally so carefully planted in the streams has spread in such dense masses as literally to obstruct the course of rivers and choke their mouths. In Otago and Canterbury Provinces, destructive floods, which have resulted in loss of life and property, are attributed solely to the increase of this simple plant; and thousands of pounds are annually expended in the effort to check its too luxuriant growth. The innocent daisy, round which weary, toil-worn men assembled in almost tearful homage, does not seem to have done any damage; but the tall purple thistle which was brought to New Zealand by a too zealous Scot, now runs riot over the land. I saw it growing in thickets on the waste lands near Auckland; and, though some enthusiasts maintained that it was doing good work in preparing the soil for more remunerative crops, I think the farmers would certainly have preferred its absence. Certainly, those of Australia do not attempt to conceal their dismay at its extraordinary increase. It is barely a quarter of a century since the very first thistle was imported to Australia and landed safely at Port Philip. Every Scotchman in Victoria made pilgrimage to the capital to have a look at the old familiar emblem and dream of home. A great public dinner was given in its honor, and the precious plant occupied the post of honor on the table. Many were the speeches made and toasts drunk on the occasion, and the enthusiasm knew no bounds. Afterward, this thistle was carefully planted in its new kingdom, and right royal has been its rule. Never was conquered country held with a firmer grip. The stately thistle proved so prolific in the congenial soil and kindly climate that now thousands of acres of the farmers' best land are completely cropped with thistles, and no efforts can by any possibility eradicate this pest. Thousands and tens of thousands of pounds have been expended in carrying out various schemes for its extermination; but the hardy invader laughs at them all, and blooms as fresh and fair as ever it did on its own native soil. Indeed, it is a much stronger and handsomer plant than were its Scottish ancestors. Another plant, which in all these isles has taken a too vigorous hold of the soil is the common sweet-briar. Introduced for the sake of its fragrant perfume, it now, especially in Tasmania, has become so strong and so tenacious that it is impossible to keep it within bounds. Its thick roots penetrate the soil to a great depth; and it forms a dense scrub, to the total destruction of what were formerly pleasant pasture-lands. Just in the same way, both in Ceylon and Tahiti, I have seen the lantana, introduced a few years ago as an ornamental garden shrub, now overrunning thousands of acres, to the despair of the cultivators; and in Tahiti and Hawaii, I have ridden through miles of guava scrub, all descended from a few guava bushes introduced in fruit gardens.—Gentleman's Magazine.

Sympathy of a Dog.—A gentleman living in Edinburgh sent me this remarkable anecdote of sympathy in a dog:

"I once gave a spaniel, called 'Jack' to a farmer friend in the neighborhood of the city and Jack's kennel was placed in the farm-yard, where the poultry were daily fed. Amongst them happened to be a poor, unfortunate, unpopular cock, which was not allowed to have a share of what was going, but was punished severely whenever he made an attempt to get any food.

"Jack somehow observed this, and, feeling sympathy for the poor bird, was seen daily to leave some of his food, to carry his 'bicker' which contained it into his kennel, and wait there until all the poultry were gone. He would then take his bicker outside, put it down where the cock could get it, and stand on watch all the time in order to protect him. Sometimes he would leave the bicker inside the kennel, and, if the bird were near at hand, he would go round about him until he got him into the kennel, so that he might take his food without being disturbed."

The end of this strange friendship was remarkable. The ill-usage of the other bird still continued, and at last the cock was accustomed regularly to take refuge in the dog kennel. Probably from the perpetual bullying which he endured, he fell ill, and one morning was found dead in the kennel, lying closely pressed to his only friend.—J. G. Wood.

THE FRIEND.

NINTH MONTH 9, 1882.

We have received a letter from a friend in Canada, which refers to the short account of the proceedings of their Yearly Meeting published in No. 1 of the present volume. Our correspondent thinks that the terms used—"A Yearly Meeting for Canada"—"virtually gives to the other meeting a right to be identified as Canada Yearly Meeting; and it does not accord to us any right to such identity.

In reply, we may state that we did not suppose our words would bear such a construction, and we had no intention of conveying such an impression. As the status of the two bodies in Canada is a question which has not been investigated by our own Yearly Meeting, we simply desired to avoid an expression of opinion upon it.

The letter received gives the following brief outline of the position of the two bodies:

"In Norwich, the other party set up the separate meeting which they managed to get the Yearly Meeting to acknowledge, and let our meetings untouched which we held in a isolated manner, and made no report for two years. In 1880, the party having contrived managed to adopt a new discipline (containing doctrines at variance with Friends' principles) in the face of a protest, and many Friends would not submit to it, and West Lake Four Months' Meeting was so divided in sentiment that a separation took place. One part adhering to the old discipline determined to meet at Pickering and re-establish the Yearly Meeting on original ground, and invited [Norwich Friends] to join them. The other part sanctioned the act of the Yearly Meeting and met at Norwich."

Not having received a copy of the printed minutes of that body which accepts the new Discipline, we have published no account of the proceedings of their late Yearly Meeting. From other sources we learn that several of its members are uneasy with the charge that have been made, that the body with which they are connected did not maintain testimony to the original principles of our Society; and that both Yonge Street and West Lake sent up a request for the Yearly Meeting to issue a confession of faith, so that it might be seen that they stood on right ground. This proposition was strenuously opposed in the Yearly Meeting, and after considerable discussion a vote was taken on the subject, when a majority were found to be in favor of issuing such a statement of doctrine. Its preparation was referred to the Select Meeting, which decided not to report till next year.

A letter written by a friend of Pickering says: "The report on Pastoral work opened the way for [one of the strangers in attendance] to advance some of his views. He said the time had come when the members of Canada Yearly Meeting would have to put their hands into their pockets, and support work. The Quaker Church must come out. There was no getting around it. They sent preachers out to gather souls to Church. Which resulted in a collection being taken up."

We wish to bear a decided protest against the practice of submitting to vote questions affecting the doctrines of our Society, which suppose is sanctioned by the new discipline under which one of the bodies claiming to be Canada Yearly Meeting is now acting; also against hiring persons "to gather souls to the Church," which we regard as a decided step in the abandonment of those principles of worship and ministry, which have heretofore distinguished the Society of Friends.

The Western Friend, whose editor has recently been paying a religious visit in Canada, writes that in Yonge Street Quarterly Meeting, which is far the largest of the three meetings, and where no separation has taken place, there is a strong conservative element opposed to the "Regressive methods and doctrines" which have been the fruitful source of trouble among Canada Friends as well as elsewhere. We are quite prepared to believe that this is the case; and we would heartily rejoice if such Friends would unite in removing those things which have been destructive to the unity of the body, and prepare the way for a reunion of all those who believe in the original doctrines of our Society, and are willing to bring their practices into conformity therewith. Those, whose belief or preference would lead them in a different path, could not join themselves to whatever body they might desire—as some have done already;—three of the Regressives ministers" having, we said, "gone into water-baptism, and are now preaching for other denominations."

The General State Temperance Convention held at Harrisburg on the 19th and 20th of the first month last, provided for a State committee. We have received a copy of an address issued by this body, signed by Joshua Bailey as chairman, and containing an article proposed to be added to the Constitution of the State of Pennsylvania prohibiting the manufacture and sale of intoxicating liquors for drinking purposes. This article it is proposed to lay before the next General Assembly, with the prayer that it may be committed to the qualified electors of the Commonwealth.

We do not doubt that many of our readers will be so impressed with a sense of the evils which flow from intemperance, that they will be ready to assist every right movement looking to its suppression or discouragement. The effect of the proposed amendment is as follows:

ARTICLE XIX., Sec. 1.—The manufacture and sale of alcoholic or intoxicating liquors, whether fermented, brewed or distilled, or compound of such liquors which can be used as a beverage, is prohibited within this Commonwealth; but the manufacture and sale of such liquors, or compounds thereof, for purposes other than a beverage, shall be regulated by law. The General Assembly, at its next session after the adoption of this article by the qualified electors of the Commonwealth, shall enforce its provisions by adequate penalties."

We observe the "State Committee" is constituted in part of representatives from such organizations as "Sons of Temperance," "Good Templars," &c. The paraphernalia, display, processions, &c., of such bodies we do not believe to be consistent with the profession of "Friends," nor calculated to promote the best interests of our members. However good may be the object they professedly aim to secure, there is a better way for us to perform our part of the social, civil and religious duties that claim attention, than by uniting in such organizations; which we hope all under our name will be careful to avoid.

We have received a few lines from a friend, who, in commenting on a selected article that recently appeared in our columns, revives the doctrine ever held by our religious Society—that it is only by the help of the Holy Spirit of Christ, that we can approach the throne of Grace, not in our own time, nor in our own words, for He that knoweth our need will teach us what to say. We believe the views held by the unknown writer are correct, and that his concern was an honest one; but we think he need not have withheld his name and residence from the Editor.

SUMMARY OF EVENTS.

UNITED STATES.—A telegram from Salt Lake City says the Utah Commissioners have concluded the work necessary to secure a thorough revision of the registration lists. "Officers are being appointed in every county, with deputies in each precinct, amounting to over 350 in all, with power to purge the lists of every voter disfranchised by the Edmunds law. To accomplish this it became necessary to direct that every person, male or female, who, since the passage of the law of 1862, has at any time lived in violation of said law, be refused the rights of franchise. It is not expected that the result of the election will change materially the existing condition of affairs in the Territory, the monogamic Mormons being in the majority."

The six thousand Sioux Indians now at Standing Rock Agency, 65 miles south of Bismarck, Dakota, have, most of them, become farmers, and will harvest ten thousand bushels of wheat this season. They have a white teacher in husbandry.

The Galveston News publishes a summary of the amount and value of the products of the State of Texas for the year ending 8th mo. 31st, 1882, as follows:—Cotton, 878,854 bales, value, $50,094,678; wool, 22,299,652 pounds, value, $5,128,919; hides, 13,572,795 pounds, $1,628,735; cattle, 681,367, $16,654,070; horses and mules, 13,724 head, $1,093,100; lumber and shingles, $7,644,329; grain and hay, $8,497,625; cottonseed, cottonseed cake and oil, $2,485,740; miscellaneous products, $3,427,568; sugar and molasses, $725,694. Total value, $97,380,458. During the year there were completed 1641 miles of railroad, at an estimated cost for construction and equipment of $44,525,000. The State now has 5908 miles of completed railroads, costing for building and equipment $165,800,000.

Captain Payne and six of his followers were arrested in the Indian Territory on the 23rd ult. The arrest was made by the military authorities, and as Payne refused to leave the Territory peacefully he and his gang were disarmed and taken to Fort Reno as prisoners. The Acting Secretary of the Interior has requested the Secretary of War to order Captain Payne to be turned over with his followers to the civil authorities at Fort Smith, Arkansas, for trial.

The oat crop of Illinois, this year, is officially reported at 99,275,000 bushels, which is 24,000,000 bushels greater than the crop of 1875. The crop is mostly threshed, and its quality is generally good. The winter wheat crop exceeds 50,000,000 bushels, and it is the largest, except that of 1880, ever harvested in that State. The spring wheat aggregates over 52,000,000 bushels, a little under the average of 1879, but the quality is much better. The hay crop is reported at 4,389,000 tons, which is 345,000 larger than the heaviest previous crop, that of 1878. The crop is generally in good condition, but not of the best quality, being rather rank.

Shipments of wheat are being made from Kansas City direct to St. Paul and Minneapolis, for milling purposes. Over 1,000,000 bushels have been sent, and 250,000 more are contracted for.

The wheat prospects throughout Oregon are "flattering." It is estimated that the amount available for export will be 235,000 tons.

The Charleston News and Courier says the yield of wheat, oats and corn in South Carolina "far surpasses that of any previous season," and the business of Charleston shows an increase of $5,000,000 compared with last year. There are now in the city 138 factories, employing 4456 persons, and a new cotton mill with nearly 20,000 spindles is ready to start. The city debt has been reduced $362,000 during the last twelve months.

Nine steamers—eight British and one German—sailed from Baltimore last week with full cargoes, for various European ports. Among the exports were 843,109 bushels of wheat.

The Cincinnati Price Current estimates the total corn crop of the present year at 1,800,000,000 bushels, or 50 per cent. larger than the crop of last year.

A telegram from San Antonio, Texas, confirms the report that 120 human lives were lost by the Concho flood; 15,000 sheep, cattle and horses also perished, and the loss in property is estimated at nearly $100,000.

Edwin Smith, of the U. S. Coast Survey, who is chief of the party selected for observation of the transit of Venus, left Washington Seventh-day for New Zealand, where the observation is to take place. He will be joined at Omaha by Professor Pritchett, his principal assistant. After the task in New Zealand is completed, E. Smith will go to Japan to make pendulum observations.

How the cost of some public works grows with their progress is shown by the great East River Bridge. The original estimated cost was $5,000,000; the Comptroller of New York now estimates its cost at completion at $20,000,000.

The public debt statement shows the total debt, less cash in the Treasury, to be $1,658,926,171, and the decrease during 8th month $16,128,262.

Diphtheria is reported to be very prevalent in Lunenburg county, Virginia. In some instances two or three deaths have occurred in a single family.

The total number of cases of yellow fever officially reported in Brownsville during last week was 482, and of deaths 26. Total of cases from the beginning of the epidemic until Seventh-day noon last week, 1113; deaths, 66. There is great destitution in the city, and the Mayor is about to issue another appeal for aid. The protective cordon established around Brownsville and other infected places on the Rio Grande is maintained. Several deaths from the same disease have taken place in Pensacola, Florida.

There were 372 deaths in Philadelphia for the week ending 9th month 21, as compared with 356 for the previous week, and 375 for the corresponding week of last year. Of the whole number 108 were under one year of age; 200 were males and 172 females; 50 died of consumption, 38 of marasmus, 31 of cholera infantum, 19 of inflammation of the stomach and bowels, 24 of old age, 14 of typhoid fever, and 13 of diphtheria.

Markets, &c.—U. S. 3½'s, 101½; 4½'s, 113½; 4's, registered, 119; coupon, 120; currency 6's, 133.

Cotton is steady at 13½ cts. for middling uplands.

Petroleum is dull at 6½ cts. for refined in barrels, and at 9½ cts. for cases.

Flour and Meal.—Flour is quiet and unchanged. Sales of 1650 barrels, including Minnesota extras, at $6.75 a $7 for clear, and at $7 a $7.50 for straight; Pennsylvania family at $5.12 a $5.25; western do. do. at $6 a $6.25, and patents at $7 a $8.75. Rye flour is steady at $3.50 a $3.75.

Grain.—Wheat is dull and ½ a ¾ c. lower. Sales of 8000 bushels red at $1.07 a $1.17. Options closed with $1.12½ bid for 9th mo., $1.12½ for 10th mo., $1.13½ for 11th mo., and $1.11½ for 12th mo. Rye.—None here. Corn was unsettled and ¾ a 1½ c. lower. Sales of 6000 bushels No. 3 and steamer at 82 a 84 cts. Sail mixed closed with 83½ c. bid for 9th mo., 82½ c. for 10th mo., 77c. for 11th mo., and 67c. for 12th mo. Oats were dull and lower. Sales of white at 45 a 50 cts., and rejected at 40 a 42 cts. No. 2 white closed with 46c. bid for 9th month, and 45½ cts. bid for 10th, 11th and 12th months.

Hay and Straw Market, for week ending 9th mo. 2nd, 1882.—Loads of hay, 231; loads of straw, 49. Average price during the week—Prime timothy, 95 cts. to $1.05 per 100 pounds; mixed, 90 cts. to $1 per 100 pounds; straw, 60 to 70 cts. per 100 pounds.

Beef cattle were dull and rates were barely steady; 3800 head arrived and sold at the different yards at 4 a 7½ cts. per pound, as to quality.

Sheep were dull and ¾ c. lower on the top grades, while common stock was fully ¾ c. lower; 16,000 head arrived and sold at the different yards at 2½ a 5½ cts. per lb., as to condition.

FOREIGN.—On the 1st inst. 234 members of the Dublin Metropolitan Police force were dismissed. Great excitement prevails in the city. All the police stations occupied by a strong guard of military. Rioting broke out on College street in the evening. The mob was very violent. Some policemen who remained on duty at the College Street Station were brought out in a body, but were obliged to retire before the mob. The whole police force, comprising 883 men, besides the 234 men who were dismissed previously, left the service, only the officers, numbering 26, remaining. The men who resigned sent a memorial to the Castle in the evening, expressing deep regret at their action, and respectfully asking Lord Spencer to consider their case. Lord Spencer replied that if they returned to duty at once their case would receive the fullest consideration. A number of the men returned to their posts. This result unquestionably saved the city from scenes of rioting, as many of the special constables who came forward were unable to cope with the disorder. The military were, however, employed in clearing some of the streets; there was much stone throwing; a number of persons were injured, one fatally.

Dublin, 9th mo. 4th.—Evening.—The military are not out to-night. The constables who have returned to duty were allowed a good rest to-day. They apparently desire to discharge their duties faithfully. The special constables have ceased wearing badges, in order not to attract marked attention. A proclamation has been issued by the Lord Mayor thanking the citizens for their hearty response to the appeal for aid and for special constables, and giving notice that there is no necessity for the appointment of any more constables.

The annual report of the wheat crop in France shows it is excellent in twenty departments, good in forty-five, fair in eleven, poor in nine, and bad in one—that of Corsica.

On the 4th inst. a train of cars, running between Freiburg and Colmar, left the rails near Hugstetten, Germany. Nineteen coaches were smashed or shot down an embankment into a swamp, where their weight caused them to sink. It appears that the train was overtaken by a heavy wind and rain storm. One account ascribes the disaster to the washing away of a part of the embankment by an overswollen brook. A telegram from Mulhouse states that 160 persons were killed and 300 others injured by the accident.

The Siberian plague is appearing to an alarming extent in most widely-separated quarters of European Russia. One death from the disease has occurred at Odessa.

Four German expeditions will soon leave Hamburg for America to observe the transit of Venus, being destined for different points of view on the northern and southern continents. Each party will consist of two astronomers, a student and an assistant. The points of observation allotted to the Germans are in Connecticut, South Carolina, Costa Rica and the Straits of Magellan.

A hail storm occurred near Pesth on Second-day last week, destroying vineyards and maize fields and partly demolishing fifty houses. Many workmen were killed.

A syndicate of London capitalists have entered into contract for the construction of an electric railway, upon the Edison system, between Geneva and Ferney and Geneva and St. Julien.

All the Powers, including England, have replied favorably to the proposition of Italy, that Holland and Spain be admitted to take part in the collective protection of the Suez Canal. It is believed, however, that in consequence of the recent turn of affairs, the proposal for collective protection of the canal will be without result.

A contest has been entered upon between Greece and Turkey, in Thessaly, on account of disputed territory. On the 4th inst. Said Pasha, Turkish Minister of Foreign Affairs, had a conference with Candouriotis, the Greek Minister. The Porte is disposed to surrender the territory claimed by Greece, except a portion bordering on Lake Zenas. It is believed that the matter must again be submitted to an European conference before a final settlement can be obtained. Austria has remonstrated with Greece on the subject of the latter's action on the Thessalian frontier, and has declared that Europe cannot permit Greece to disturb the peace.

Lord Dufferin, the British Ambassador, informed the Sultan that he had been authorized to assent to the landing of 2000 or 3000 Turkish troops at Port Said. It is understood that Dervisch Pasha will command the expedition, and that Baker Pasha will be his Chief of Staff.

Cholera is prevailing to an alarming extent in the Philippine Islands. As many as 300 have died of the disease in one day.

Out of 775 cases of cholera within twenty days at Yokohama, 572 cases have proved fatal. At Tokio about eighty cases and fifty deaths occur daily.

A despatch to the Times from Durban states that besides the Kafir chief Secocoeni, his son and fourteen followers were also killed. The killing was done by Mampoor, the chief put into his place by the British.

The yellow fever epidemic in Matamoras is reported to be slowly abating. During the 8th mo. the deaths from the disease numbered 214, in a population of about 8000.

Extensive forest fires are destroying valuable timber in Annapolis county, Nova Scotia. The crops in that province are suffering from drought.

The stock of sugar now in Cuba is reported to be 64,000 tons in excess of that at the corresponding date last year. The customs receipts of the island for 7th mo. were $199,178 in excess of those for 7th mo. 1881.

Thirteen deaths from yellow fever were reported in Havana last week.

RECEIPTS.

Received from Sarah T. House, Pa., $2.10, vol. 56; from Benjamin S. House, Pa., $2.10, vol. 56; from Ezra Barker, Ind., $2.10, vol. 56; from Benjamin Hoopes, City, $2, vol. 56, and for W. Walter Hoopes, $2.10, vol. 56; from Jacob Smedley, Pa., $2.10, vol. 56; from William Webster, Pa., $2.10, to No. 11, vol. 57; from Edward C. Jones, Pa., $2.10, vol. 56; from John Trimble, Agent, Pa., $2.10, vol. 56, and for Caleb E. Thomas, Rebecca Larkin, Harvey Thomas, Thomas M. Webster, Samuel Fogg, and Henry L. Paschall, $2.10 each, vol. 56; from John E. Darnell, N. J., $2.10, vol. 56; from William P. Smedley, Pa., $2.10, vol. 56; from Joseph B. Cooper, Gtn., $2.10, vol. 56; from Horatio G. Cooper, Pa., $2.10, vol. 56; from Mary E. Branson, City, $2, vol. 56; from N. Newlin Stokes, M. D., N. J., $2.10, vol. 56; for James McLaughlin, N. Y., $2.10, vol. 56; from Jehu L. Kite, Agent, O., $2.10, vol. 56, and for Edwin Holloway, Joseph Lynch, David Ellyson, Robert Ellyson, Abner Woolman, Eliza Ann Fogg, Sarah Stanley, Mary Woolman, Mary Warrington, James A. Cope, Rebecca Painter, Joel Kirk, Anna W. Cobb, Edwin Fogg, Samuel R. Smith, and John Brantingham, $2.10 each, vol. 56, and for Lydia Warrington, $2.10, to No. 18, vol. 57; for Daniel Peckham, N. Y., $2.10, vol. 56; from Edmund S. Fowler, Agent, O., for James Hiatt and Ellwood Dean, $2.10 each, vol. 56; from Hetty Ann Bellah, Del., $2.10, vol. 56; from Rebecca V. C. Pugh, Pa., per T. Valentine, $2.10, vol. 56; from Lucy Pope, Pa., $2.10, vol. 56; from George M. Haverstick, N. J., $2.10, vol. 56, and for William Matlack, $2.10, vol. 56; from Elijah Haworth, O., $2.10, vol. 56; from Asa Garretson, Agent, O., $2.10, vol. 56, and for Benla Roberts, Esther Wilson, Isaac N. Vail, George Tatum, Dr. Ephraim Williams, Joseph Doudna, Robert Plummer, Elisha Doudna, James Steer, Lydia H. Bailey, Sarah S. Bundy, Sarah M. Bailey, Rebecca W. Bundy, Elizabeth Bailey, Jesse Bailey, Jesse K. Livezey, Jehu Bailey, Joseph Cowgill, Aaron Frame, Eli Stanton, Joseph W. Doudna, Elizabeth Wilson, Francis Davis, William Stanton, Esther Sears, Jonathan T. Scofield, John Bundy and Anasa Frame, O., and Homer Gibbons, Io., $2.10 each, vol. 56; from Sarah R. Whitall, N. Y. City, $2.10, vol. 56; from Mary H. Pennell, W. Philada., $2.10, vol. 56; from John M. Roberts, N. J., $2.10, vol. 56, and for Amos Roberts, $2.10, vol. 56; from Edward L. Sonth, City, $2, vol. 56; from Hannah Twitchell, O., $2.10, vol. 56; from John Woolman, City, $2, vol. 56, and for Elizabeth Wright, N. J., $2.10, vol. 56; from Pelatiah Gove, Vt., $2.10, vol. 56; from Mary Eldridge, Pa., $2.10, vol. 56; from Seth Warrington, N. J., $2.10, vol. 56; from Joseph Brinton, Pa., $2.10, vol. 56; from Margaret Robinson, Gtn., $2.10, vol. 56; from Mary R. Maule, City, $2, and Edward R. Maule, N. J., $2.10, vol. 56; from Job McCarty, Pa., $2.10, vol. 56; from Joseph Snell, Pa., $2.10, to No. 12, vol. 57; from Abel J. Hopkins, Del., and Lawrence Hopkins, D. C., $2.10 each, vol. 56; from Josiah W. Leeds, City, $2, vol. 56; from Hannah J. Reid, City, $2, vol. 56, and for James F. Reid, Pa., $2.10, vol. 56; from John Tatum, City, $2.10, vol. 56; from T. Chalkley Palmer and Mary C. Palmer, Pa., $2.10 each, vol. 56; from Mahlon M. Child, Del., $2.10, vol. 56; from Finley Hutton, City, $2, vol. 56, and for Mary H. Fritchman, O., $2.10, vol. 56; from John Forsythe, Pa., $2.10, vol. 56, and for Edward Forsythe, Ill., $2.10, vol. 56; from Dr. Isaac Huestis, Agent, O., $2.10, vol. 56, and for Burwell Peebles, Joseph Doudna, Harmon Rhodes, Hannah Ann Vanlaw, Belinda H. Schofield, Jesse Hiatt, Abel

W. Bye, Thomas E. Vanlaw, David Smith, Ann Smith, Eliza Branson, Henry Crew, Amy John, Jane H. Sear, Clarkson Burgess and Fleming Crew, $2.10 each, vol. 56; from Joseph Masters, Kana., $2.10, vol. 56; from Rebecca E. Bacon, City, $2, vol. 56; from Ovee Rosdai Io., $2.10, vol. 56; from George D. Smith, O., $2.10, vol. 56; from Isaac Roberts, Pa., $2.10, vol. 56; from Joshua T. Ballinger, Agt., Pa., for J. Jones McFadgion, E. Malin Hoopes, Alfred Embree, Lydia Embree, Samuel Worth, and Albina B. Carpenter, $2.10 each, vol. 56; from Isaac W. Stokes, N. J., $2.10, vol. 56; from Susan Brinton, Pa., $2.10, vol. 56; from Elizabeth C. Cooper, City, $2, vol. 56; from James W. Haine, N. J., $2.10, vol. 56; from Juliann Hoyle, O., $2.10, vol. 56; from Richard P. Gibbons, Del., $2.10, vol. 56; for Daniel Blackburn, O., $2.10, vol. 56; from Isaac Leeds, N. J., $2.10, vol. 56, and for I. Powell Leed, $2.10, vol. 56; from Henry R. Post, L. I., $2.10, vol. 56, and for Lydia Post, $2.10, vol. 56; from Mary I. Maris, Del., $2.10, vol. 56; from Joshua Brantingham, Agent, O., for Edward Y. Cope, Josiah Cameron, Joseph Stratton, Uriah Price, Joseph Winder, Cyrus Brantingham, Alfred Brantingham, William Brantingham, Nathan Whinery, and Joshua Coppock, $2.10 each, vol. 56, for Anna M. Edgerton, $4.20, to No. 5, vol. 56, and for Charles W. Satterthwaite, $2.10, to No. 19, vol. 57; from Eliza J. Barton, City, $2, vol. 56.

Remittances received after Fourth-day morning will not appear in the Receipts until the following week.

In the notice of the decease of ABIGAIL WOOD, in the last number of "The Friend," it was omitted to state, that she was a member and a minister of the Monthly Meeting of Friends of Philadelphia.

WESTTOWN SCHOOL.

A stated meeting of the Committee on Admission will be held in the Committee-room of Arch St. Meeting-house, on Seventh-day, the 16th inst., at 10 A. M.

TOUGHKENAMON BOARDING SCHOOL

Will re-open Ninth mo. 18th, 1882.

H. M. COPE, Principal.

Toughkenamon, Chester Co., Pa.

WANTED,

Teachers and assistant teachers for the Evening Schools for Adult Colored Persons, men's and women departments. Apply to

Ephraim Smith, 1110 Pine St., Philadelphia

Thomas Elkinton, 400 S. Ninth St., "

Thomas Woolman, 858 Marshall St., "

Finley Hutton, 400 Chestnut St., "

FRIENDS' SELECT SCHOOLS.

These schools, under the care of the three Month Meetings of Friends in this city, will re-open on Second day, Ninth mo. 18th, 1882.

A limited number of children will now be admitted who are not members of our religious Society, who parents may desire to have them educated free from the unnecessary but fashionable accomplishments, too common in many schools at this day.

The attention of Friends residing in the city and its neighborhood is invited to them. The terms are moderate, and Friends belonging to Philadelphia Year Meeting, sending children to these schools, (also members), who may find the charges burdensome, can be fully relieved.

The principal schools will open for the next term under the care of John H. Dillingham and Mary V. Woolman, as Principals, both experienced teachers many years' experience. Facilities for illustration are afforded by a valuable collection of philosophical and chemical apparatus, minerals, and Auzoux's models parts of the human system, &c.

The primary Schools on Cherry St., and at Sixth and Noble Sts., will be continued under their former efficient management.

Further information may be obtained upon application to the Treasurer of the Committee,

JAMES SMEDLEY, No. 415 Market St.

DIED, at her residence, Greenwich, New Jersey, 8 mo. 22d, 1882, ANN H., widow of the late John Bacon, aged nearly 83 years. "Blessed are the pure in heart for they shall see God."

WILLIAM H. PILE, PRINTER,

No. 422 Walnut Street.

THE FRIEND.

A RELIGIOUS AND LITERARY JOURNAL.

VOL. LVI.

SEVENTH-DAY, NINTH MONTH 16, 1882.

NO. 6.

PUBLISHED WEEKLY.

Subscription, if paid in advance, $2.00 per annum; if not paid in advance $2.50; 10 cents extra is charged for Postage on those sent by mail.

Articles designed for insertion to be addressed to
JOSEPH WALTON,
MOORESTOWN, BURLINGTON CO., N. J.
Advertisements, payments and business communications, received by
JOHN S. STOKES,
NO. 116 NORTH FOURTH STREET, UP STAIRS,
PHILADELPHIA.

For "The Friend."

The Christian Seaside Resort, Pacific Grove
Retreat, Monterey Co., California.

On the westerly shore of the beautiful Bay of Monterey, in a grove of pines, surrounded by scenery of the most diversified character, is a lovely spot, nestled beside the restless, surging sea, and sheltered by the swaying of wide branching trees, and the songs of woodland warblers, is the pleasant watering place known as the Christian Seaside Retreat.

Feeling the need of a summer resort, free from the follies and vicious influences of more pretentious fashionable places, some good Christian people, a few years ago, conceived the idea of fixing upon this spot as likely to combine all the requirements for camping and other purposes. As its adaptability and beauty became better known and appreciated, its popularity increased; and now thousands flock thither each summer, and many permanent and temporary, neat, comfortable cottages are to be found there, and the place has assumed quite the air and proportions of a large flourishing village.

To me it was very interesting to pass through the labyrinth of pines and its many paths, lined on either side with the pretty hut-like structures and cosy cottages of its settlers. At night, canopied by trees and relieved by myriads of lights, the songing of the wind, and the "sound of many waters," added to it a charm peculiarly its own. Here and there are seen handsome houses, their sides garlanded with sweet-scented flowers and vines, and beautifully furnished and decorated within, indicative of wealth and culture, indicating that those in the different spheres of life are alike attracted by the salubrity of the climate and the many natural advantages. Immediately below the "Grove" is the bathing ground, and then, just beyond, a ledge of large granite rocks projects seaward, against which the waves dash in wild fury. Within easy walking distance of the Grove are shell-heaps and quiet rocky nooks, where the sea's limpid waters ripple on the pebbly sands. Passing around Point Pinos Light-house, about two miles away, are extensive grass-lined beaches, with smooth, firm, white shores of sand.

On the drifting sand hillocks here, and in many places along the shore, is found the tunitas, or wild fig, a pleasant refreshing fruit. Its leaves are a bright green, somewhat resembling the iceplant, bearing rich purple flowers. The fruit is much sought after by the native Spanish Californians.* The wild verbena (or a flower resembling it) grows in great profusion near the shore line of the bay. There are many curious plants and flowers found on the rocks and sands near the margin of the sea in that region, which would doubtless interest the botanist; the rocks and sands also abound with sea life.

By taking a public or private conveyance over a fine macadamized driveway (built by the "Pacific Improvement Company," who own most of the "Grove" and immense tracts of lands adjacent,) with the ocean nearly always in sight, Point Cypress, Pebble Beach, the old Carmelo Mission and other points of interest are reached, after an exhilarating ride of about twenty miles. The old Carmelo Mission is worth more than a passing notice, the quaint old ruins are visited by hundreds, if not thousands yearly. The antique looking front is still in a good state of preservation, and presents quite an imposing appearance. After looking back about a hundred years, we can here see in its stone walls, arched and tile-covered roof, and its interior vestiges of ornamentation and architectural finish, the industry, zeal, and energy of its early Spanish founders. We pass on to the old town of Monterey, the ancient capital of California, with its curious old Mission, finely preserved and always open to visitors. All around are to be seen old adobe tile-covered houses still occupied or in ruins. A little further on is the elegant Hotel Del Monte, in the midst of a grove of large live oaks, with park-like grounds, tropical plants, and a profusion of brilliant shrubs and flowers, forming a rare and wonderful combination of views and scenery. There is a fine beach near, and a large swimming bath-house attached, supplied with warm and cold salt-water, where the timid can indulge in bathing with safety. Lastly may be mentioned the "old Monterey Whaling Company," with their boats and the various "warlike" implements used by them in this dangerous occupation. Whales frequent the Bay of Monterey in the fall, winter and spring months, and are sometimes captured in large numbers; the bones of these sea monsters, bleached and whitened, are strewn along the shore, and can be had for the taking—great quantities being carried away by curiosity seekers.

The charges at the "Grove" are quite moderate, and the homelike feeling pervading brings a peaceful influence not often found at popular watering places. Intoxicants and gambling are prohibited, which largely tends to produce quiet and good order. This is where the Chatanqua Literary Society of

* It is largely cultivated in the handsome flower-beds of the Hotel Del Monte.

California meet annually, and religious gatherings are encouraged.

Here, in the lovely climate of California, standing on the margin of this fine bay, and looking out over its blue waters, a feeling indescribably grand and delightful seems to steal over the senses—there we see a long sweep of shore-line of glistening sands, surf-washed with snowy foam that beats ceaselessly against its whitened margin—here, at our feet break the resistless surges of wave lines on rock and cavern; then again, we stand gazing on the majestic waves of the mighty Pacific as they roll in beside us, each succeeding wave seeming more grand and awful; dashing high, with quickened and tremendous force, a cloud of seething foam bursts on the frowning rocks. Contemplating this sublime and overpowering scene, how utterly helpless and insignificant man appears. The Creator is exalted, and we are led to exclaim, "Great and marvellous are thy works, Lord God Almighty!"

Here, too, are scenes of quiet beauty. The sun gilds the surface of the water and warms and vivifies with many tints the sands of the sea shore; the fisherman's boat moves noiselessly over the bay, giving it new life; the sea-birds wheel past in long curving lines; and porpoises and sea-lions are seen disporting themselves; landward, ranges of rugged mountains, purpled by the evening sunlight, fade away in the dim shadowy distance, the whole forming a picture somewhat similar, but grander and more expressive than the famous Bay of Naples, without the terrors of Vesuvius. The sun, imparting its setting glory to all, sinks below the water line, and as the evening shadows lengthen into the darkness of the night, I bid farewell to a scene not easily forgotten, and that has so wonderfully and charmingly embraced, the wild, the romantic, and the beautiful! J. BELL.

San Jose, Cal., 8th mo. 1882.

Worth the Diamonds.—The Princess Eugenie, only sister of the present King of Sweden, is known less widely than she deserves to be. It is known that she not only gives out of her abundant wealth, but she also makes personal sacrifices in order to insure the success of charitable schemes she sets on foot. One of her designs was the building of a hospital for the sick. This was of so extensive a character that her present resources were exhausted before the building was completed. But in order that no delay should take place, she sold her diamonds to raise the necessary funds. Since the hospital was completed and in working order, the princess has paid it a visit, and talked with many of the sick. One man, overcome with the intensity of his emotions, wept as the princess approached his bed. The scene was one of deep solemnity; and the princess, standing by his side, said, "Ah! now I see my diamonds again."—Selected.

For "The Friend."

Selections.

FIRST-DAY SCHOOLS—RELIGIOUS INSTRUCTION.

The Methodist says: "Religious instruction by schools ought not to become a means of abrogating the duties of parents. We have, in recent years, read often with growing amazement that Sunday-schools are depended upon by the Church to give her children religious instruction. It is a most astonishing theory, for it implies a communistic order of ideas—that children are not in the custody of particular persons called parents, but of a body of persons called a church. If the Church has in this communistic fashion forgotten all about parents, and undertakes to do without their service of childhood, it is not very surprising that the Sunday-school is 'regarded as falling short of its duty.' No possible Sunday-school can ever do the mother's work. If any are troubled on this subject, they will do well to labor for a restoration of parental obligations rather than for a Sunday-school which shall do away with any moral and religious uses of parents."—British Friend, 7th month, 1882.

A TESTIMONY CONCERNING THE QUAKERS.

The following is the substance of a declaration made in 1877, to ———, by an elder in another religious organization concerning the Society of Friends:—"I want to say to you, that the Quakers (I mean no disrespect by the term) have been of incalculable advantage to Christendom.

"You must not come to us, we are going to you. But I fear many of your people are departing from original Quakerism; and I think you will have to take a new start on the original foundation.

"I am a Quaker in many respects; and among other things do not approve of instrumental music in our churches, nor the adornment of them.

"I think I know what Quakerism is; and should not be surprised if I understand the departures being made by some of the members, better than they do themselves."

He said he thought there was especial need now, for Friends "to press their views of spiritual worship, as there was an evident tendency in the different churches to magnify and to depend upon things not of vital importance."

TRUE STANDARD OF SIMPLICITY.

"I believe myself called upon to bear an open, unequivocal, unflinching testimony, not only against all pride, extravagance, ostentation and excess, but also in a particular manner against all the secret insinuations and covered appearances, under which they are creeping in, and growing up amongst us as a Society. I have for years believed, that the declension among Friends from the true standard of simplicity is great; and I am of the mind, that if they had diligently hearkened unto, and implicitly obeyed the dictates of best Wisdom, they would have been led to 'apply all the gifts of Divine Providence to the purposes for which they were intended.' I believe that it is my duty to live in such a humble, plain, homely, simple manner, as that neither in the furniture, food, or clothing used, any misapplication of the gifts of Divine Providence be admitted or encouraged."—John Barelay.

A CHRISTIAN EXAMPLE.

"Both the father and mother of the Bishop of Alet were persons of superior piety. Distinguished for affluence, they were yet more so for Christian simplicity, self-denial, and humility; a simplicity which they were not only careful to maintain throughout their whole household economy, but with a love for which, they were very peculiarly anxious to inspire their children, which is often too much neglected amongst religious parents. The bishop's house exhibits a model of true Christian hospitality, as well as of primitive simplicity."—Memoirs of Port Royal.

A SCHOOL FOR HAPPINESS.

"If men consider the world on the true Scripture ground, as a state of probation; if they consider religion as a school for happiness indeed, but of which the consummation is only to be enjoyed in heaven; the Christian hope will support them, the Christian faith will strengthen them. They will serve diligently, wait patiently, love cordially, obey faithfully, and be steadfast under all trials, sustained by the cheering promise held out to him, 'who endures to the end.'"—Hannah More.

THE SCHOOL OF CHRIST.

This is a day in which, while there may be much surface work, there appears to be too little of "that sub-soil upturning of the heart with the plough-share of the Holy Ghost." Too little of the washing of regeneration and renewing of the Holy Ghost, which make men and women for God. Hence the low estate into which the Society has fallen. "As our members more generally come to experience the heart-changing power of Divine grace in themselves, whatever may be their rank or station in life, they will be taught in one common school; a school very different from that in which the acquirement of knowledge depends upon the vigor and subtlety of the intellectual powers; a school in which the lessons taught break down the pride and haughtiness of man, reveal to him his incapacity to judge in holy things, except as he is enlightened by the Spirit of his divine Master; and in which he is instructed to value obedience to the least intimation of that Master's will, beyond all the deductions of his unsanctified reason, or the judgment of a fallen and corrupt world. It is of members thus disciplined and instructed that the true Church is made up, and when met together for the transaction of its business, and waiting in reverent dependence to be qualified to order its affairs aright, its adorable Head condescends to communicate to such as these the mind of the Spirit, enables them to act and speak in his own authority, and preserves them from being led astray by their own fallible understandings, or by the suggestions of that spirit which is always seeking to exalt itself into His place, and to mislead by its deceptions."

PARENTAL DEFICIENCY, WITH ITS CONSEQUENCES.

* * * I have a secret hope thy little ones will grow up to be a help and comfort to thee, and in order that it may be so, and that the Lord may delight to bless them, I doubt not but it is thy solicitous care, to watch over the tender plants, lest any budding of pride, or any wrong shoot, spring up and frustrate the gracious intentions of Heaven in any degree towards them; and carefully and assiduously to nurture them up in that simplicity of manners and appearance which Truth leads into. Many parents, it is to be feared in our day, have been miserably deficient in the education of their offspring; checking, hindering, and preventing that which ought to be cultivated in them, and cherishing, forwarding, and encouraging what ought to be rooted out and destroyed; and hence it comes to pass that so little tenderness of spirit and amiable simplicity is to be seen in our youth, and very little of a succession of testimony-bearers in prospect. One of the first temptations thrown in the way of children, after the age of infancy, is a little finery in dress, and the convictions of grace remonstrating against being resisted, the reproofs of that Divine Monitor, (through repeated resistance,) become less forcible, less clear and less felt, and so disregarded too much; and hence for want of faithfulness in the little, and in the early discoveries, there is not a right growth experienced, but the contrary prevails, and he is one great reason that the city of our fathers' sepulchres waste.—From a Letter of Richard Shaakleton.

A WORLDLY SPIRIT IN PARENTS, WITH NEGLIGENCE OF DUTY.

"I next went to ———, where I had pretty full meeting, which was painful and exercising under a sense of a worldly spirit with parents, that caused them to neglect their duty to their children, with respect to teaching them the principles of Truth and the fear of the Lord; an evil much to be lamented and hard to be removed. This has the effect to settle such children in the form of godliness without the power, whereby they become a grievous burden to Society; for parents feed their children with what they love and teach them what they admire; thus the old Pharisee educates the young to follow his steps, and they become a burden to the next generation."—Journal of Joseph Hoag.

A CALL TO GREATER FAITHFULNESS.

"Many affecting scenes I passed through in this land, feeling the language pass through my mind: Oh! that Friends did but enough consider what our forefathers passed through in support of the principles we profess, and the righteous blood that was shed for the liberty we enjoy, they would not wander from the secret enclosure of Israel's King as the do; seeing the Lord doth not withhold anything that is for the good of those that love Him."—Joseph Hoag in England.

YE SEE YOUR CALLING, BRETHREN.

"As a religious body, did God call us out of darkness, out of gross and superstitious worship, into his marvellous light; and now it is at our very life that Satan is striking—the inward revelation of the Lord Jesus, the true light, borne testimony to by many faithful martyrs, and preached again with power by our enlightened predecessors—and it is from among ourselves that the enemy is trying to take and make instruments to suit his purpose.

"There is a path which no fowl knoweth which the vulture's eye hath not seen, the king's highway to holiness; it is so contrary to flesh and blood, to the highly cultivated natural understanding, and to that which on the wing exploring the depth of science at few there be that find it. In it, through tribulation and suffering, did our predecessors pursue their holy course; and now, when so many things present, in the garb of religion, to divert from it, we should be cautious of being drawn aside from the simplicity of the truth as it is in Jesus."

COUNT THE COST OF BEING A CHRISTIAN.

Thus we find it will cost much to be a Christian; and that if we mean to purchase a goodly pearl of gospel salvation, we must give up back no part of the price, but sell all that we have to give in exchange for it. But how hard is this doctrine! how few can bear it. What pleadings of nature, what torturing of the Scriptures, what ingenious pretences, what learned evasions in favor of the sin that so easily besets us, and to reconcile duty with inclination!"—Hartley.

OUR DEPENDENCE FOR SALVATION.

All that Christ hath done for us, without which will avail us nothing, unless we be inwardly transformed, and renewed in the spirit of our minds, unless we become new creatures, unless we make it the continual and sincere endeavor of our lives to keep the commandments of God."—Richard Claridge.

The Periodical Literature of India.

The heathen are not all illiterate. The members of society in all the castes of India, in a sense, educated. They read and write at least. In old times knowledge was confined to the higher castes, and even among them, all were not allowed the key of knowledge. The mysteries of every profession, or even trade, were not divulged needlessly to outsiders. It was the advent of Western peoples that stirred up the demand for the press to the consequent supply. To-day there are 230 different newspapers published in the vernacular languages of India. It was the missionary from Christian lands who longed to sound out the great Gospel message, who first made use of this mighty organ in the use of his Master. Soon opposition was aroused, resulting in the present large number of newspapers, which represent every region in the land, and in some instances the various schools of thought in the same region. The old Brahmins have their paper, the young Brahmins theirs. The Keshab Chunder Sen sect, who have renounced Brahminism, have theirs. The latter offshoots of this sect have theirs. So with the Mohammedans and others.

As it is a fact that the native vernacular newspaper started in the interest of religion, it has kept on. A few have taken up politics, but the statement is correct that religion occupies the greater part of their discussions. For awhile this class got so bold, so terrible in their rulers, that Lord Beaconsfield established a censorship over the whole vernacular press. This measure, however, was opposed by some of the most enlightened Englishmen even in the Indian office. A few papers were suppressed, but this whole measure was evidently wrong and unnecessary, and Gladstone has removed the embarrassing conditions his predecessor had imposed, and the press is free once more.

The English press in India never was interfered with by the Government. A Hindu writing in the English language had rights, and would find him if he wrote in the vernacular.

This itself was inconsistent. There are to-day several non-Christian sheets published in India in English by educated natives.

It is surprising to a stranger to see how many English newspapers India supports. There are five or six in each of the large cities, such as Calcutta, Bombay, Madras; one or two in such cities as Allahabad, Agra, Delhi, Lahore. It is a careful estimate to say there are from fifty to seventy-five English newspapers published in India.

Now this has been proven, that the natives who conduct the vernacular press are in many, if not in most, instances men acquainted with the English language; and that the English newspaper, in the language of their rulers, has the latest news which they covet. The English press largely influences the vernacular press. Thoughts and discussions in the English newspapers are translated and read by the Hindu in the secret chamber of his home. The effete civilization of that ancient land is being constantly touched and shaken by the freshest discussions of this advancing generation. The language of the most pronounced Christian nations of the world is giving its burden of pure thought and ideas to one of the neediest lands on the globe.—J. H. Gill.

For "The Friend."

Grace Evans.

A tribute to the memory of Grace Evans, of Springfield, Delaware Co., Pa., who deceased 17th of Eighth month, 1867.

"A woman that feareth the Lord,
She shall be praised."

From the pleasant remembrance I have, and also the exemplary Christian walk of my beloved aunt, Grace Evans, I feel constrained to give forth a short testimony concerning her; not only as a little tribute of love, but also with a view to magnify the power of Divine grace, that made her what she was; and to incite us, her survivors, to follow in her self-denying, careful walk, as she endeavored to follow her blessed Redeemer.

She was one whose affectionate and cheerful disposition, joined to a pious consistent life, rendered her company very pleasant. She felt tenderly for her friends, and others, under the varied trials incident to this life, manifesting in tender love her sympathy for the afflicted.

She was a loving and faithful wife, and an affectionate, careful mother over her children; an example also in industry, rising early in the morning, and encouraging her family to do so,—often reminding us that the morning was the most lively part of the day, and if we rose early it would forward our outward business, and we would have more time for reading and meditation. She used the things of this world as "not abusing them;" being a good example of moderation in all things. A diligent attender of all our religious meetings for worship and discipline, and thoughtful in making way for others under her care. She was fitted and qualified and willing to support the good order of our Society; and her services in her own Monthly Meeting, and also the Quarterly Meeting, were acceptable to her friends.

She attended the Quarterly Meeting at Concord in the Eighth month, 1867, and seemed very lively in her spirit; and on returning home remarked, she thought we had a favored meeting, and hoped it would be remembered. She spoke afterwards of the exercises of the meeting being fresh in her mind, and requested me to get the Bible and read several passages that were quoted, that had much impressed her; and seemed comforted in hearing them revived.

She appeared to be in her usual health until Sixth-day, when she spoke of feeling indisposed, but was able to be down stairs, and employed at her sewing, as she generally was; and conversed cheerfully with her family; and, as her dear husband remarked after she was gone, seemed remarkably sweet in her spirit all that day—the last she spent with us on earth. In the evening after tea she was not so well, and thought she would retire early. The pain returned with much severity in the night, and she suffered some time before she was willing the family should be disturbed. When we came to her, she said she was sorry to have us called; and after taking medicine and bathing her, she thought she soon would be relieved, and desired us to go to bed. We left the room a short time but soon returned, finding she was no better.

While we were preparing applications to relieve her, she was engaged in fervent supplication. At one time she said, "Cast me not off in the time of old age; forsake me not when my strength faileth." We inquired of her if she could take a little nourishment. She replied, "yes;" but we found she could not swallow; and soon after she prayed very fervently, "Oh, holy Father! thou wilt not lay more upon us than thou wilt enable us to bear." These were the last words that we could understand. She appeared to be entirely sensible, although articulation had ceased. She looked at us all very sweetly, and soon after became very quiet and calm, as if falling into a sweet sleep, and passed peacefully away, we doubt not, to her Heavenly rest.

Although thus suddenly called away, we believe her work and labor of love was accomplished before any shade came over to veil her loveliness; and her sun went down in brightness, and she has been permitted, we doubt not, to "enter into the joy of her Lord."

L. K.

The number of signatures to the petitions in Great Britain against the opium trade, at last accounts, was 73,926. Additional petitions are being circulated. One of these, on which there are over 400 names, contains the signatures of the Bishop of Bedford, the Bishop of Rangoon, the Archdeacons of Middlesex and Southwark, the Dean of St. Paul's, and many other dignitaries. Now that the anti-opium cause is making so much headway, its opponents are putting out some hitherto unheard-of arguments—asserting that "opium-smoking is not only an innocent, but even a beneficial practice, and that the promoters of the trade are really philanthropists laboring to effect a great temperance reform, and that it is pure hallucination to suppose that China was ever under constraint in the matter." This may certainly be called assuming a bold front. It has a pretty close parallel in the assertions of the liquor dealers of this country. Griffith John has done signal service to the cause in a pamphlet entitled, "Plain Questions and Straightforward Answers about the Opium Trade." He appeals to those who have "a simple desire to see things as they are, and to act justly towards all men;" and that class of men will find in his pamphlet an unanswerable condemnation of the traffic. The Friend of China, from which we gather the above items, reprints Dr. Thoburn's articles on "The Opium Shops of Calcutta," in which he shows that one has no need to go outside of India to learn the terrible results of opium smoking.—Chr. Adv.

Garibaldi on War.—In 1860 Garibaldi issued a manifesto headed, "The present state of Europe and what it might be, for the benefit of Governments and of Populations." In this document he urged a general disarmament of the overburdened nations of Europe, —a movement which he believed "only to need a powerful and generous initiative," so that "the immense capital which is almost always wrung from the wants and the miseries of the people, and is prodigally spent in murderous and unproductive armaments, would be converted, to their advantage, into a colossal development of industry, into the construction of roads, the building of bridges, the cutting of canals, the foundation of public establishments, and the erection of schools, which would rescue from misery and ignorance so many poor creatures who in all countries of the world, whatever be their degree of civilization, are now condemned to a state of brutishness, to prostitution of soul and body, by the selfishness, calculation, or bad administration of privileged and powerful classes. With the disbanding of these forces, the minds of sovereigns, ceasing to be occupied with schemes of ambition, conquest, war, and destruction, would be directed towards the creation of useful institutions." Thirteen years later, just after the adoption by the British House of Commons, of the motion in favor of international arbitration, introduced by H. Richard, the member for Merthyr Tydfil, Garibaldi headed an address of congratulation, signed by most of the other leading men of Italy, in which they declared that, "Inasmuch as the English Parliament has now set a noble example to all nations, by its sanction of this excellent method, we hereby give expression to our joy at this event, both as Italians and as men sincerely devoted to peace between all civilized nations —peace which is a blessing to the whole world, injurious to none, and the most effectual means of securing real progress and true liberty."

Do Your Best.—A gentleman once said to a physician, "I should think, doctor, that at night you would feel so worried over the work of the day, that you would not be able to sleep."

"My head hardly touches the pillow till I fall asleep," replied the physician. "I made up my mind," he continued, "at the commencement of my professional career, to do my best under all circumstances, and so doing, I am not troubled by any misgivings."

A good rule for us all to follow. Too many are disposed to say, "No matter how I do this work now; next time I'll do better." The practice is as bad as the reasoning. "No matter how I learn this lesson in the primary class; when I get into a higher department then I'll study." As well might the mother in knitting a stocking say, "No matter how the tip is done; even if I do drop a stitch now and then, I'll do better when I get further along." What kind of a stocking would that be?

As well might the builder say, "I don't care how I make the foundation of this house; anything will do here; wait till I get to the top, then I'll do good work."

Said Sir Joshua Reynolds once to Dr. Samuel Johnson, "Pray tell me, sir, by what means have you attained such extraordinary accuracy and flow of language in the expression of your ideas?"

"I laid it down as a fixed rule," replied the doctor, "to do my best on every occasion, and in every company to impart what I know in the most forcible language I can put it."—Review and Herald.

THE LITTLE COMFORTER.

Selected.

I have a little comforter
That climbs upon my knee,
And makes the world seem possible
When things go wrong with me.
She never is the one to say,
"If you had only been
More careful and more sensible,
This thing had been foreseen."
She blesses me,
Caresses me,
And whispers, "Never mind;
To-morrow night
All will be right,
My papa, good and kind."

To give me wise and good advice
I have of friends a score;
But then the trouble ever is,
I knew it all before.
And when one's heart is full of care,
One's plans all in a mess,
The wisest reasoning, I think,
Can't make the trouble less.
My Mamie's way
Is just to say,
"O papa, don't be sad;
To-morrow night
All will be right,
And then we shall be glad."

Some think I have been much to blame;
Some say, "I told you so;"
And others sigh, "What can't he helped Must be endured, you know."
Of course, if trouble can be helped,
Then crying is in vain;
But when a wrong will not come right,
Why should I not complain?
In Mamie's eyes
I'm always wise;
She never thinks me wrong;
It's understood
I'm always good—
Good as the day is long.

All day I've kept a cheerful face,
All day been on the strain;
Now I may rest, or I may sigh,
Or, if I like, complain.
My daughter thinks as papa thinks,
And in her loving sight
I am a clever, prudent man,
Who has done all things right.
Faith so complete,
Oh, it is sweet,
When neither wise nor strong;
But Love stands best
The bitter test
Of Sorrow and of Wrong.

Then come, my little comforter,
And climb upon my knee;
You make the world seem possible
When things go wrong with me.
For you've the wisdom far beyond
The reach of any age,
The loving, tender, hopeful trust
That best can strengthen age.
Say, "Papa dear,
Now don't you fear;
Before to-morrow night,
The cares you dread
Will all have fled,
And everything be right."

—Harper's Weekly.

From "The Recorder and Covenant."

The following lines brought to me in a severe spell of illness, by a dear friend, so much sweet comfort to me, that I desire very much to make them messenger of the same to some other sorely tried ones.

Faithfully yours,

C.

"Blessed Jesus! I am lying
On my weary couch of pain,
Night and day, to thee I'm crying—
Do not let me cry in vain!
Blessed Jesus
Speak in love, to me again!

I am lying still before thee,
Racked with pain by night and day,
Yet I know thou'rt bending o'er me,
Hearing more than I can say;
And thy presence
Turns my darkness into day!

Let thine arms of love enfold me,
Make me lean upon thy breast—
With thy gracious strength uphold me,
Soothe me into perfect rest.
Blessed Jesus!
In thine arms I'm fully blest!"

For "The Friend."

Dublin Meeting-house.

The endorsement at the foot of that interesting paper, "Germantown Friends' Protest against Slavery," is dated "At our Monthly Meeting at Dublin, 30th, 2nd mo. 1688," as signed on behalf of the Monthly Meeting 1 Jo. Hart. The question was naturally raised, Where was Dublin Meeting-house? Some research in the matter, I think, has enabled me to answer the question.

In 1857, Ed. Y. Buchanan delivered a "Historical Sketch of the Parish of Trinity Church, Oxford, Philadelphia." A few extracts from this address, which was printed in pamphlet form, will, I think, give us the information needed.

Before, however, turning to the pamphlet I will take a few lines from Comly's Miscellany relative to the settlement of Byberry Meeting, which throws light on the subject. It says, the Monthly Meeting in 4th mo. 1688 "Ordered that the meeting which of late hath been held at Giles Knight's, be removed to the house of John Hart." In the 6th mo. following it is stated—"Friends did free accept of ten acres of land given by Walter Forrest for a burying-ground for the service of Friends, near Poetquesink creek, and it was left to the trust and care of Joseph Fisher, John Hart, Samuel Ellis, and Giles Knight, to get the ground surveyed and a deed of conveyance to be made from Walter Forrest to themselves for the only use and behoof of Friends forever."

When George Keith disturbed the harmony of the Society with his schism, John Hart went off with him, and after a few changes became a preacher among the Baptists. "Some disorders and disturbances are reported to have taken place in the meeting at Poetquesink, so that Friends were induced quietly to abandon the meeting-house and meetings, and afterwards held their religious assemblies at the house of Henry English."—Comly. Henry English emigrated to America in 1683.

To return to Buchanan's pamphlet.

"Evan Evans, Episcopal Minister of Christ Church in Philadelphia, in a letter dated 1707 says: 'Trinity Church, in Oxford Township lies in the county of Philadelphia, nine miles from the city, where for the first four years after my arrival in Philadelphia I frequently ached and administered both sacraments, I had, when I last preached in it, about a hundred and forty people—most of the people brought over to the Church of England by Quakers, Anabaptists and other persuasions." Page 8.

"The church to which Mr. Evans refers, is a building, probably of logs, which, according to Keith, had been put up, or at least ed, for a Quaker meeting-house, but had been given by its proprietors to the parish—most of them having become converts to the church." Page 9.

"It probably stood near the present church-building, and may have been the one afterwards spoken of in the records of the parish as the 'School-house belonging to Oxford Church.' Previous to the donation of it to the church it may have been used, and probably was, by the Dutch Anabaptists and Swedish Lutherans of the neighborhood, as well as by the English Quakers from whom it came." Page 9.

"The passage in which Keith speaks of the place whence it was received by the church have transcribed. It reads thus: 'The place at Frankfort in Pennsylvania,'—or Frankfort alias Oxford,—as he had before written—'where the congregation assembles on the Lord's day, is called Trinity Chapel. It was formerly a Quaker meeting-house, built or fitted by Quakers, but some time ago had been given to the church by such who had the right to it.' Pages 9, 10, quoted from Keith's Journal, P. E. Hist. Society's edition, page 51.

Though some doubt may be felt, there could be good grounds from the above to believe that the meeting-house where Dublin Monthly Meeting was held stood on the grounds now occupied by Oxford Trinity Meeting-house, Philadelphia.

WILLIAM KITE.

A Sailor's Wife.—There have been heroines as well as heroes on the sea, and of these Annie Wilson is one. When she was four years of age she married the captain of a vessel, and for seven years accompanied him on his voyages around the world without incident.

But in 1872 the ship encountered a terrible storm off the banks of Newfoundland. The captain was knocked down and his shoulder was broken. The first mate and several of the crew were also disabled, and the second mate was so frightened that he could not give any orders. The captain was carried down, lashed on a door, into the cabin; and when his wife saw him rendered helpless in this way, instead of yielding to lamentations, she only thought of what she could do to supply his place. She rushed on deck, and led the men around her.

"Boys, our lives are in danger," she said; "stick to me, and I'll take you into port right."

She set them to work to clear away the wreck. They manned the pumps; and when the gale had subsided a little, they rigged up jury-mast, under their new captain's orders, and sailed again, and in twenty-one days the ship was safely anchored at St. Thomas.

After the necessary repairs had been made here, and as her husband was still quite helpless, the brave woman worked the ship to Liverpool, and made the voyage in thirty days. After this she settled down in New York, and for seven years supported her crippled husband and her child by working in a dry-goods store.

When her husband died Secretary Sherman appointed her to the post of Inspectress in the New York Custom-house.—Harper's Young People.

For "The Friend."

Westtown Boarding School.

At a meeting of the committee, 4th mo. 24th, 1840. "A communication was received from Nathan Sharpless and Martha Jefferis, informing that they have looked towards being released, in the 4th month of next year, from their present stations of Superintendent and Matron of the Institution. The subject was referred to the Committee on Instruction, to report when prepared.

The report made to the Yearly Meeting in 1841, states that "Our friend Thos. Stewardson, who has long and faithfully served the institution as Treasurer, having requested to be released from that station, the committee united in appointing Jos. Snowdon to succeed him." Then follows a list of securities received by J. S., and signed by him.

At the meeting held 6th mo. 1842, a legacy was reported from Ann Swigett, deceased, amount not stated. At the same time there is recorded an extract from the will of Jos. Ely, deceased. After devising to his wife, Ann Ely, an estate for life in his brick dwelling house, did further devise in the words following, viz: "And at her decease, I give and devise to Henry Cope, merchant, and Thomas Evans, druggist, and their heirs, all that aforesaid three-storied brick dwelling house, No. 190, and lot or piece of ground thereunto belonging, situate on south side of Mulberry St., between Delaware 7th and 8th Sts., in the city of Philadelphia, * * * together with the appurtenances, to hold to them, the said Henry Cope and Thomas Evans, and the survivor of them, &c.: In trust, nevertheless, for the sole use and benefit of an Institution established at Westtown, Chester Co., Pa., (under the care of the Yearly Meeting of the religious Society of Friends, which has for many years held and still continues to hold its meetings and transact its business in the Friends' meeting-house on Mulberry St., between 3d and 4th streets, in the city of Philadelphia,) commonly called and known by the name of the "Westtown Boarding School," and upon this further trust absolutely to dispose of and convey the same, either in fee or for such other estate and in such way and manner as the committee for the time being having charge of said Boarding School, shall or may at any meeting or meetings, by minute of their proceedings in writing, direct, order and require." Geo. Williams, Henry Cope, Thos. Kimber and Chas. Yarnall, Committee on Trusts, made a report of their condition at this meeting, which was placed on record.

12th mo. 1842. "It being represented that the amount of outstanding debts due the institution is large and increasing, a committee was appointed to consider the subject, who at the next meeting proposed that a committee of eight Friends, chosen with regard to their location in different parts of the Yearly Meeting, be appointed to aid the Treasurer in collecting the outstanding debts," &c. The Committee on Collections, thus established, continues yet to afford valuable assistance in this department.

From the report of 1843: "The frequent reading of the Holy Scriptures is practised, and portions thereof are committed to memory by the pupils; they are taught the principles of our Society as set forth by our approved writers, and endeavors are used not only for their literary improvement, but to afford them the advantage of religious instruction, and to encourage them in the practice of virtue and piety. The examination which recently took place, afforded to the committee satisfactory evidence of the attention bestowed by the teachers in these respects, as well as of application on the part of the scholars, many of whom evinced a degree of proficiency in their studies which was quite commendable."

The following is worthy of consideration at the present time:—"Notwithstanding the ample means provided in this institution for accommodating the children of Friends, it is probable that during the approaching session the school will be considerably smaller than usual; this is a source of regret, especially as the committee believe that owing to the operation of the school law and other causes, a number of our youth are receiving instruction in situations where a due regard is not paid to their moral and religious improvement."

Extract from the will of Ennion Cook, deceased, which was proved 8th mo. 8th, 1842. "I further direct that the residue of my estate, after paying the foregoing sums, be divided as follows, viz: one half of said residue to be distributed among the persons before named who are relatives of my said wife and myself * * the other half of said residue be paid over by my executors to the treasurer for the time being of the Boarding School in Westtown township, Chester county, under the direction of the Yearly Meeting of Friends held on Mulberry St., in the city of Philadelphia: the said sum to be appropriated first to the fund for increasing the salaries of the teachers of said institution, and then in any other way the committee having charge of said school may deem proper for its benefit."* Ennion Cook resided near the meeting-house at Birmingham, Chester Co., Pa., and was for some time usefully engaged in conducting a boarding school there. Residue, according to the administrator's account filed, $4970.13,—($2472.43 was subsequently received as the net amount of this legacy.)

At a special meeting held 9th mo. 15th, 1843. This meeting was called at the request of the Committee on Instruction, whose minute, dated the 28th ult., was now produced and read, informing that Pennock and Sarah Passmore had offered themselves to fill the stations of Superintendent and Matron at the boarding school, and that they had agreed to forward the subject for the consideration of this committee. The application of these friends being now read and deliberately considered, after a full expression of sentiment, it was unitedly agreed to accept this offer, and they are accordingly appointed to their respective stations, to enter upon their duties at the opening of the winter session. Saml. Bettie, Thos. Evans, Ann Mifflin and Rebecca Allen, are appointed to inform them of this

* It is very desirable that the example here set by E. C., should be followed by others who may have property thus to dispose of viz., that of leaving the distribution of it to the discretion of the committee, unless the testator has some special object of benevolence.

conclusion and to introduce them into the school."

The Higher Criticism.—A contemporary gives the following very clever slash at what is styled the "higher criticism," which speaks of two Zechariahs, several Isaiahs, and half a dozen or more Moseses. The writer proves as satisfactorily as any of these writers have done on the same method that there could not have been less than six Robert Burns. "For it is beyond a doubt, and indeed admitted on all hands, that there was one Robert Burns who wrote poems and songs in the broadest Scotch Doric. But then there was another Robert Burns who wrote the 'Cotter's Saturday Night,' and 'Mary in Heaven,' in the purest Saxon English. So that, according to the critics, in their two perfect incompatible styles, we have clear and unmistakable evidence that there must have been, at least, a second Robert Burns. But this is not all. For there must have been a third Robert Burns who held low Democratic-Radical principles, and wrote 'A Man's a Man for a That.' And a fourth Robert Burns, who was at heart a Jacobite loyalist, and had no sympathy with the divine rights of the people. Further, there must have been another Robert Burns of very questionable religion and morality, who wrote 'Holy Willie's Fair,' who could not possibly have anything in harmony with the writer of the 'Cotter's Saturday Night.' And to sum up all, there must have been some editor or interpolator of a later period who wrote the epitaph of the poet. For how could it be possible for a man to write his own epitaph, and tell the very place he was to die and be buried, and the character and the quality of the grassy sod? No, no! It must have been written by some editor of a later period—say 100 or 200 years later—one that had examined into all facts of the history of the primitive Robert Burns.—London Freeman.

John Bright's Resignation.—Much as I regret the loss sustained by Gladstone and his cabinet, I rejoice on many grounds in this resignation. John Bright is the foremost champion of the peace party. He holds that the commandment, "Thou shalt not kill," is broken when men are slain in war. He cannot approve, much less justify, bombardments, military occupation, armed intervention in the affairs of Egypt. To be consistent with himself and loyal to his convictions, he could do none other than resign his membership in a government which ordered Admiral Seymour to bombard the forts at Alexandria, and which has sent out some thousands of soldiers to coerce Egypt into compliance with the proposals of England. Bright has covered himself with honor, alike by his resignation and by the dignified and patriotic statement he made in response to the calls upon him for an explanation. Better far that the government should lose Bright than that he should be unfaithful to his conscience, or disloyal to the Prince of Peace.—Correspondence of Nat. Bapt.

It is well to attend to the making of one's will in proper season, and to remember, that in the Day of Judgment, account will assuredly have to be rendered for the right use and the disposal that has been made of the talent of property, as for that of any other talent.

Marriage in Stamboul.

The state of society was revealed to me with rather startling force one day. I called upon a young Mohammedan whose English education has made him one of ourselves in all respects, saying that it has not shaken his religious faith. He held in his arms a lovely child of two years old or so, who screamed with passion. A small Circassian boy, fair haired, blue eyed, was trying to appease her, but the apparition of the "Chelebi" was more successful.

The children were presently dismissed to the harem, and my friend observed:

"I dread to think of that boy's departure. My baby has the temper of a little fiend, and only he can manage her."

Knowing the small Circassian to be a slave, I asked why he was leaving.

"I must send him to Robert College soon," was the reply, "and get another playfellow for the child."

Robert College is the American school where so many middle-class youths are being educated—well educated, too, though perhaps the training is not in all respects the best.

I said, "The kindness of your people toward their slaves is well-known to me, but I did not think it ran so far as to pay their expenses at college."

He answered, laughing: "Not as a rule, of course. But my intention is to marry those two if Ahmet turns out well. He is clever and well disposed. The missionaries will keep him honest, I hope."

This was such a novel view of the relations between bondsman and mistress, that I discussed the matter at length several times.

My friend told me that such matches, never rare in Turkey, are now quite usual. The state of morals is such in Stamboul, that parents do not willingly take a daughter or son-in-law from families of their own rank. They distrust all the world. It has lately become a common thing to choose a slave, boy or girl, to grow up under their eyes. The first expense averages, perhaps, forty pounds, and the female child costs little. She is taught truthfulness and virtue, fine sewing, the mystery of coffee-making and of filling a pipe—the arts of a very simple housewife. A boy is vastly more expensive, as in this case he must be sent to school, launched upon some kind of employment, and provided for until the parents are satisfied that he will make their child happy. Then the pair are married and the ex-slave becomes a member of the family, though that makes little change to him.

My Moslem friend is on such terms with me that I speak of his wife almost as freely as I should speak of a Christian's. Remember that he was brought up in England and speaks the language as well as we. Many readers acquainted with Constantinople will know to whom I refer.

To my question how the child's mother regarded this idea, he answered that it was her own conceiving. And then he related various stories of domestic misery and crime within her knowledge which had brought his wife to a fixed resolve that her daughter should not wed a Turk of Stamboul.

I asked what they proposed to do if this little slave died before marriage.

"In that case," said the father, "we are determined to look out a husband in Syria, where there are still honest men."

Such is the view which a Turk, educated in the real sense, expresses of his countrymen—not the elder, but the new generation, whom so much is hoped.—All the Year Round.

Origin of Names in Eastern Pennsylvania.—The following are the meanings or significations of some of the names of rivers, streams and places in the eastern part of Pennsylvania in the Schuylkill and Lehigh Valleys:

Schuylkill, (Holland Dutch,) originally Schuilen, "hidden or concealed," kill, "river or creek."

Lehigh, from Lecha, or Leechaw, "water branch."

Manayunk, or Manajung, (one of the Indian names of the Schuylkill river,) "our place of drinking."

Perkiomen, Pakihomink, Pakkehomal "cranberry place."

Catasauqua originally Caladaque, meaning " parched land."

Manch Chunk, "bear mountain."

Manatawny, Mahanatawny, or Menhattink, "the place where we drink."

Coplay, from Copeechan, "a fine running stream."

Hockendauqua, from Hockondogue, "searching for land."

Towamencin, or Towamensing, "wilderness."

Wissahickon, from Wisamekhan, "catfish creek."

Skippack, or Schkipeek, "stinking or stagnant pool."

Wyoming, from Maughwanwame, "large plain."

Susquehannah, "long crooked river."

—Selected.

A Question and Reply.—Said a cavalier of the Bible and religious truth, whose delight it was to propound questions which might puzzle and confuse the Christian professor to a good man whose face had been set heavenward for many a year, "What do you think of this doctrine of annihilation? As for me, the more I think of it, the more I believe in it. It doesn't seem like God to punish the wicked eternally. What do you think about it?"

"I don't think much about it," was the reply. "It doesn't concern me, for I am not going that way. I have started for heaven and I mean, by the grace of God, to get there and take others with me. I don't care whether it is hell or annihilation. You must not come to me. Ask those who are travelling that way. They ought to know what kind of a place they mean to fetch up at."

The cavalier was silenced, and his question thrown back upon him in a way he did not expect. An honest doubter deserves consideration, but a caviling spirit merits more of slight than rebuke.—American Messenger.

For "The Friend."

Religious Items, &c.

Faith-Cure Camp Meeting.—The Faith-Cure Camp-meeting at Old Orchard Beach is one of the things that it is very difficult to comment upon, yet which is deserving of serious notice. On the one hand, we have no desire to say a word that could be construed into disparagement of the faith or zeal or Christian character of so devout and earnest a man as Dr. Cullis. On the other hand, the spectacle of 600 invalids passing in procession before the or, some tottering on crutches, some carried in invalid chairs, dwarfs, cripples, blind men, each to be anointed with oil, and laid over, for the purpose of being healed, do not seem to us altogether edifying. Some of these persons declared themselves healed. We said that some threw away their crutches, and walked off in the consciousness of regained strength. Others feel themselves greatly benefited, though not cured. Many experience no change in their condition. What is the effect on this latter class? If it is the power of faith that is to heal the sick, why not all of them, as well as five out of a hundred? Is any one sure that the persons related cured were as helpless as they supposed themselves to be? These may be called questions of skepticism, but they are questions that naturally arise, and to which it is not that an answer should be given before we acknowledge that the day of miracles has passed.—Chr. Adv.

Missions in Egypt.—One effect of the war in Egypt has been to suspend the work of the missionaries employed there. Many of these have left the country and sought refuge elsewhere.

Liquor and Tobacco Statistics.—The report of the Commissioner of Internal Revenue for the year ending 6th mo. 30th, 1880, gives the amount of distilled spirituous liquors used for drinking purposes in the United States in 1880 as over 66,000,000 gallons; of wines, 100,000 gallons; of ale, beer, and other fermented liquors, 14,000,000 barrels; of tobacco, consumption was more than 136,000,000 pounds; and the number of cigars and cigarettes consumed in smoke approached three millions.

The money expended in these useless luxuries in two years would probably pay the whole of our national debt; and a small fraction of it would suffice to pay the expenses of government, and to support hospitals, schools and other institutions for the good of the community in all parts of the country. When we reflect that the effect of these stimulants is injurious to health and character, and that therefore the sums spent on them are more than wasted, it is difficult to see how their use, or the trading in them can be reconciled with the advice of the apostle—"Avoid every appearance of evil."

THE FRIEND.

NINTH MONTH 16, 1882.

The duties that devolve upon different persons are very different; yet, however unlike the lines of service may be which open before them if they are performed in the fear of the Lord and with an eye to the promotion of the cause, all will tend to our own welfare as well as that of others. So closely interwoven are our mutual interests, that it may truly be said of the church, if one member suffer all are affected with loss, and if one member prospers all partake in its joy. And those qualities which seem comparatively of a humble and inconspicuous character are as essential to the welfare of the body, and their faithful performance may yield as rich a reward of peace, as those of a more public nature which more fully attract the notice of others.

We believe there are few members of the Christian church that are more worthy of sympathy and respect, than those faithful mothers who are bringing up their families in "the nurture and admonition of the Lord;" watching carefully over the development of character in their offspring; looking after their physical and intellectual culture; checking the buddings of evil propensities in the young children; turning their thoughts to their Heavenly Father as an ever-present witness of all that they say, and do, and think; and directing their attention to the impressions of his Spirit in their minds as a guide to their steps. Those who occupy such a position will necessarily partake of the exercises of spirit which attend all laborers, of whatever kind, in the Lord's vineyard. Such exercises tend to humble our self-confidence; lead us to seek to the Lord for wisdom and strength; and teach us to depend on his blessing for success in our endeavors.

In a recent conversation with one of these "honorable women," she feelingly referred to the manner in which the multitude of little distracting cares connected with her flock and household drew away the mind from that communion with the Source of all good, which is so essential to the preservation of spiritual life; and to the constant occurrence of little things which tended to produce a mental unsettlement which was not favorable to true peace or to the proper discharge of her duties. We do not doubt that she expressed the feelings which often rise in the hearts of many mothers. But cannot all such take comfort in the thought, that this burthen is one, which in the ordering of the Lord has been allotted to their position, and that if it is patiently borne, it may be blessed to themselves, and effectually help forward their own growth in grace?

Since writing the above, we have met with the following scrap, which may prove strengthening and encouraging to some.

"WAIT.—'Oh, the drudgery of this everyday routine!' cries many a business man, and many a house-keeping woman. 'To get through the day, and to have the same round to traverse to-morrow!' Yes, but how do you know what use the gracious Superintendent of your life is making of this humdrum, as you call it? A poor, blind mill-horse treads his beat, hour after hour, and it all seems to come to nothing. But the shaft he is turning is geared into others, and they into wheels, that in other rooms, above him, far away beyond his hearing, are working out results that he could never comprehend. Wait until you see no longer through a glass darkly, and see the unknown bearings and connections of your life-work with other generations, and may be with other worlds."

While we cannot know the unseen results of our labors and prayers and exercises, the humble and devoted follower of Christ may be comforted by the belief that the Lord will do all things well, and that his blessing will assuredly rest on those who honestly and sincerely move forward in the path which He assigns them.

A recent excursion into some of the Eastern parts of Pennsylvania gave evidence of the spread in those fertile lands of the cultivation of tobacco. It awakened a feeling of regret, and a desire that the members of our own religious Society, at least, might be preserved from such an eager desire after gain as would lead them to devote their fields to the production of a plant whose general use is certainly injurious to mankind. That a plant of such strong narcotic and poisonous properties may have a useful place in the economy of civil society, we do not doubt; and if its use was confined, even approximately, to such purposes, there might be a reasonable excuse for a Friend to cultivate it. But there is no reason to believe that one pound in a thousand is applied to uses which promote the good of mankind; on the contrary, with a very slight exception, the tobacco crop is devoted to ministering to a depraved appetite, and injuring the health and impairing the vitality of our fellow-men.

As Christians, we are called upon to do everything with an eye to the glory of our Creator. "Whether ye eat, or whether ye drink, or whatsoever ye do, do all to the glory of God." If we devote our labor and our lands to the production of a substance which is hurtful to mankind, and which we are reasonably certain will be so used as to do harm; or if, by trading in such an article, we are instrumental in bringing it within the reach of those who will use it to their own injury; how can we suppose that in so doing we are acting to the glory of our Creator, or doing his will?

We desire not to hurt the feelings of anyone who may have been drawn into these things without sufficient consideration; but rather to invite such to carefully and submissively regard the feelings of uneasiness with their course which we believe the Light of Christ in their own hearts will inspire.

SUMMARY OF EVENTS.

UNITED STATES.—Recent investigations into the management of the Almshouse in Philadelphia, have shown that Ellis P. Phipps, the late Superintendent, has been in the practice of fraudulently disposing of a large amount of articles of food and other movable property under his charge, for a considerable time past; and been engaged in dishonest transactions involving a large amount of money. Phipps having fled from the city, a reward has been issued for his arrest. Some of his accomplices have been taken into custody and released on bail. The value of property plundered from the city during the past nine years it is thought will amount to several hundred thousand dollars.

For the week ending on the 9th inst., there were 375 deaths in Philadelphia. Of these 135 were of children under 5 years of age; 40 deaths were from consumption of the lungs; 33 from cholera infantum; 26 from marasmus; 17 old age; 17 diphtheria; 13 typhoid fever.

The crop reports of the Agricultural Department at Washington for the 9th month, indicate that the corn crop in all the region south of Pennsylvania and of the Ohio river, is in high condition in every State except West Virginia, represented by 100 or higher figures. In the New England States there has been a decline in the probable crop, as compared with the prospect last month, excepting in Vermont, as is also the case in New York, Pennsylvania and New Jersey. If early frosts do not injure the crop the yield, it is thought, will be materially larger than last year.

The oats crop when harvested was in unusually high condition, and the rye crop is also above the average.

A verdict in the trial relating to the Star postal routes, which commenced in the 3rd month last, was rendered on the 11th inst. Two of the accused, John R. Miner and Montford C. Rerdell, were found guilty, two others were found not guilty, and in reference to three, the jury were unable to agree. Attempts were made to bribe the jury, which are to be investigated.

At a recent meeting of the National Telephone Association in Boston, it was stated that reports had been received from 81 exchanges, representing about 29,000 subscribers. There are about 60,000 to 70,000 subscribers in the United States. In New York there are 2873 exchanges, and the smallest number in any one place is 10. There is a steady and continued growth all over the country. The number of connections increase each month at all localities with improved service.

The Chickasaw Legislature met on the 5th inst., at Lispingo, in the Indian Territory, and Governor Overton was installed. The Governor, in his message, recommended stringent laws for the protection of life and property, and favors the improvement of educational facilities and the establishment of manual labor schools, where youth can be taught the science of chemistry, practical agriculture and mechanics.

An extensive cave-in recently occurred at Lost Creek, on the Lehigh Valley Railroad, about three miles from Shenandoah. The ground continued settling during the day, and at 3 o'clock in the afternoon a scam was opened along the railroad track, about three feet in width and 1000 yards in length. The running of trains was stopped for a time, until the track was raised to its usual grade. The sinking was caused by the working of underlying coal veins.

The oat crop of Illinois this year is now estimated at the enormous aggregate of 100,000,000 bushels—one-third larger than the largest crop of any previous year.

The Governor of Texas has issued an appeal to the authorities of the towns and cities of that State for relief for the Brownsville sufferers from yellow fever. The total number of cases to the 10th inst. has been 1539, and of deaths 88.

On account of the increase in the number of new cases of yellow fever in Pensacola, Fla., an appeal has been made to the public for help.

During a thunder storm on the 9th inst., "a meteor weighing one pound and eleven ounces" fell in Lebanon, Pa., appearing like a ball of fire as it touched the ground.

In carrying into execution the provisions of the late anti-Chinese law, the question has arisen "whether a certificate is required of Chinese travelling from one point to another in this country on a through ticket, and who may stop in Canada en route." The Acting Secretary of the Treasury has concluded not to decide the matter, but to "leave all such questions to the discretion of the customs officers to act according to the law."

In the case of an alleged Chinese merchant, who arrived in San Francisco from Panama, and was not permitted to land, Judge Field, in the U. S. Circuit Court, has decided that "merchants coming from other countries than China may land without certificates."

Careful calculators say that by the close of the season there will have been sent to New York 1,500,000 baskets of peaches, and about 500,000 direct to various points in New England. The canners of Baltimore and Philadelphia, and the evaporators located near the peach-growing section have operated very heavily this year, using fully 1,500,000 baskets. No fewer than eighty evaporating establishments are said to have been busy in Delaware and Maryland ever since fine fruit was ready to be plucked. This evaporating method, it is believed, has almost superseded the old custom of sun drying. It is believed that the crop of this year will equal that of the remarkable yield of 1875.

The Commissioners appointed by Congress to investigate the working of the present tariff with a view to its improvement, have had interviews in several of the large cities, with individuals representing large manufacturing interests, and are expected to sit in Milwaukee on the 11th inst., St. Paul and Minneapolis 13th, Des Moines 15th, St. Louis 18th and 19th, Nashville 21st, Chattanooga 23d, Atlanta 23d, Savannah 25th, Charleston 26th, Wilmington 27th, Richmond 28th, Baltimore 29th and 30th, and at Philadelphia on 10th mo. 2d.

It is stated that a party of capitalists in Chicago have formed a company, with $6,000,000 capital, to ship refrigerator beef from Texas to New York.

The returns of the State election in Maine, held on the 11th inst., indicate that Robie the Republican candidate for Governor has been elected, and that the Legislature, in both branches, will be largely Republican.

Markets, &c.—U. S. 3½'s, 101½; 4½'s, 113½; 4's, registered, 120; coupon, 121; currency 6's, 133.

Cotton moves slowly at 13 cts. for middling uplands. Flour and Meal.—Flour is inactive. Sales of 1700 barrels, including Minnesota extras, at $6.75 to $7.25 for clear, and at $7.25 to $7.50 for straight; Penna. extra family at $5 to $5.25; western do. do. at $5.50 to $6, and patents at $6.50 to $8.50. Rye flour is firm at $3.75 to $4.

Grain.—Wheat is unsettled and irregular. Sales of car lots at $1.01½ to $1.14. No. 2 red closed at $1.07½ bid for this month; $1.09½ for 11th mo., and $1.09 for 12th mo. Rye is nominal. Corn is dull at irregular prices. Sales of car lots at 80 to 82 cts., as to quality. Sail, mixed, closed with 72 cts. bid for 9th mo., 72 cts. for 10th mo., 65 cts. for 11th mo., and 50 cts. for 12th mo. Oats quiet, No. 2 white, 45 cts. bid for 9th mo., 44½ cts. for 10th mo., 44 cts. for 11th mo., and 44½ cts. for 12th mo.

Beef cattle were dull except for extra good stock, and prices declined ¼ to ½ c. per pound: 4300 head arrived and sold at 4 to 7½ cts., as to quality.

Sheep with decreased receipts were firmer: 11,000 head arrived and sold from 3 to 5½ cts. per pound, as to condition.

Hogs were firm: 3400 head arrived and sold at 11½ to 12½ cts. per pound, as to condition.

FOREIGN.—A proclamation of the Sultan of Turkey against Arabi Pasha has been published, which declares that the maintenance of the authority and prestige of the Khedive is indispensably necessary, and that the designs of Arabi Pasha justify his being described as a rebel, and exhorts the Egyptians to obey the Khedive. It is stated that Lord Dufferin is dissatisfied with the Sultan's proclamation, inasmuch, while it states that Arabi deserves to be declared a rebel, it does not expressly proclaim him as such.

It is stated that Arabi Pasha's army consists of: Infantry, 44,600; cavalry, 18,000; Bedouins, 30,500.

On the 8th inst. an engagement took place near Kassassin of an undecisive character, after which the English army made a slight advance towards Tel-el-Kehir, where Arabi Pasha's army is encamped. Additional troops have sailed for England.

In reference to the annual report of the crops of the world collected and published at Marseilles, the London Times says: "Never, during the time since these reports were collected, has the harvest in the Northern hemisphere been so good all round. We usually had to report a deficiency either in Europe or America. This year there is absolutely none. The world over an average harvest, and with such a harvest the year is likely to be one of cheap abundance."

A late earthquake at Panama has resulted in the destruction of several thousand dollars worth of property in that city. At Aspinwall several lives were lost, and the railroad between the two cities so injured that travel has been stopped.

The Mexican National Railway has reached the 93d mile post from the City of Mexico, entitling the company to a subsidy for the 270 miles of the main line completed, amounting to $3,000,000. The company has built in all, of main line and branches in Mexico, about 400 miles.

WESTTOWN BOARDING SCHOOL.

The WINTER SESSION begins on Second-day, Tenth month 30th, 1882. Parents and others intending to send pupils, will please make early application to JONATHAN G. WILLIAMS, Supt., address Westtown P.O., Chester Co., Pa.; or to CHARLES J. ALLEN, Treasurer, 304 Arch St., Philadelphia. Terms, $80 per session.

WANTED,

Teachers and assistant teachers for the Evening Schools for Adult Colored Persons, men's and women's departments. Apply to Ephraim Smith, 1110 Pine St., Philadelphia.

Thomas Elkinton, 400 S. Ninth St., "
Thomas Woolman, 858 Marshall St., "
Finley Hutton, 400 Chestnut St., "

FRIENDS' SELECT SCHOOLS.

These schools, under the care of the three Monthly Meetings of Friends in this city, will re-open on Second-day, Ninth mo. 18th, 1882.

A limited number of children will now be admitted who are not members of our religious Society, whose parents may desire to have them educated free from the unnecessary but fashionable accomplishments, too common in many schools at this day.

The attention of Friends residing in the city and its neighborhood is invited to them. The terms are moderate, and Friends belonging to Philadelphia Yearly Meeting, sending children to these schools, (also members), who may find the charges burdensome, can be fully relieved.

The principal schools will open for the next term under the care of John H. Dillingham and Mary W. Woolman, as Principals, both experienced teachers of many years' experience. Facilities for illustration are afforded by a valuable collection of philosophical and chemical apparatus, minerals, and Auzoux's models of parts of the human system, &c.

The Primary Schools on Cherry St., and at Sixth and Noble Sts., will be continued under their former efficient management.

Further information may be obtained upon application to the Treasurer of the Committee,

JAMES SMEDLEY, No. 415 Market St.

RECEIPTS.

Received from Mary De Con, N. J., $2.10, vol. 5 from Joshua Taylor, Mich., $2.10, vol. 56; from Richa H. Reeve, N. J., $2.10, vol. 56; from George S. Hutton City, $2, vol. 56, and for Phoebe Hutton, $2, vol. 5 from Charles Stokes, Agent, N. J., for Benjamin Wilkins, Thomas Wilkins, Richard Haines, Mary Ely, and Richardson S. Reeve, $2.10 each, vol. 5 from Joshua H. Ballinger, N. J., $2.10, vol. 56, and Charles Ballinger, $2.10, vol. 56; from Larkin Penne Gtn., $2.10, vol. 56, and for Martha L. Scott, Pa., $2.1 vol. 56; from Frances S. Williams, City, $2, vol. 5 from James M. Price, Pa., $2.10, vol. 56; from Jol S. Fowler, O., per Edmund S. Fowler, Agent, $2.1 vol. 56; from C. I. Hayes, O., $2.10, vol. 56; from Elhanan Zook, Pa., $2.10, vol. 56; from Abner Elridge, Agent, Io., $2.10, vol. 56, and for Alexander McGrew, $2.10, vol. 56, and M. A. Fritchman, $2.1 to No. 19, vol. 57; from Dr. William H. Walker, Io. $2.10, vol. 56; from Samuel A. Willis, N. J., $2.1 vol. 56; from Elwood Comfort, Mich., $2.10, vol. 56 from Reuben Battin, Agent, Pa., $2.10, to No. 10, vol. 5 and for Joseph McCarty, Abel McCarty, George Schil John S. Brown, Charles F. Hess and Theodore Hess $2.10 each, vol. 56; from Deborah Hopkins, City, $2.1 vol. 56; from Samuel W. Stanley, Agent, Io., $2.10, vol. 56, and for Benjamin V. Stanley, Thomas E. Stanley Thomas D. Yocum, Eli Hodgkin, John E. Hodgkin Asenath Edgerton, and Micajah Emmons, $2.10 each vol. 56; from Hannah G. Evans, N. J., $2.10, vol. 56 from Joseph E. Hoopes, Pa., $2.10, vol. 56; from Asenath Raley and Jacob Maule, O., $2.10 each, vol. 56; from Mary Hasket, O., $2.10, vol. 56; from Lloy Balderston, Md., $2.10, vol. 56, and for George Balderston, $2.10, vol. 56; from William H. Blackburn Agent, O., for Wilson Hall and Joseph Hall, $2.1 each, vol. 56; from Charles Jones, Gtn., $2.10, vol. 56 and for Mary Ann Jones, $2.10, vol. 56; from Woolsto Comfort, Mich., $2.10, vol. 56; from Stephen H. Foster III., $2.10, vol. 56; from Sarah C. Glover, N. J., $2.1 vol. 56; from Truman Forsythe, Pa., $2.10, vol. 56 for Richard M. Acton, N. J., $2.10, vol. 56; for William C. Reeve, N. J., $2.10, to No. 14, vol. 57; from William E. Wood, City, $2, vol. 56; from William B. Cooper N. J., $2.10, vol. 56, and for Lydia Cooper, $2.10, vol. 56; from Sue and Arthur Jones, Gtn., $2.10, vol. 56 from Samuel Jones, Gtn., $2.10, vol. 56; from Samuel B. Smith, Del., $2.10, vol. 56; from E. W. South, M. D. N. J., $2.10, vol. 56; from Sidney Garrigues, Pa., $2.1 vol. 56; from Samuel F. Balderston, City, $2, vol. 56 from Charles T. Lukens, Pa., $2.10, vol. 56; from Miriam French, O., $2.10, vol. 56; from John E Ballinger, N. J., $2.10, vol. 56.

Remittances received after Fourth-day morning will not appear in the Receipts until the following week.

THE CORPORATION OF HAVERFORD COLLEGE.

A Stated Annual Meeting of "The Corporation of Haverford College" will be held in the Committee-room of Arch Street Meeting-house, Philadelphia, on Third day, Tenth month 10th, 1882, at 3 o'clock, P. M.

EDWARD BETTLE, Jr., Secretary.

WESTTOWN SCHOOL.

A stated meeting of the Committee on Admission will be held in the third-story room of Friends' Book Store, 304 Arch St., on Seventh-day, the 16th inst., at 10 A. M.

TOUGHKENAMON BOARDING SCHOOL

Will re-open Ninth mo. 18th, 1882.

H. M. COPE, Principal.

Toughkenamon, Chester Co., Pa.

NOTICE TO TEACHERS, PARENTS AND OTHERS.

The Yearly Meeting's Committee on Education have placed a book at Friends' Book Store, No. 304 Arch St. Philadelphia, where applications from teachers wishing situations, and committees who desire to employ teachers among Friends, may be recorded.

Please give address, and full particulars.

ELLISTON P. MORRIS, Clerk.

FRIENDS' ASYLUM FOR THE INSANE,

Near Frankford, (Twenty third Ward,) Philadelphia. Physician and Superintendent—JOHN C. HALL, M.D. Applications for the Admission of Patients may be made to the Superintendent, or to any of the Board of Managers.

THE FRIEND.

A RELIGIOUS AND LITERARY JOURNAL.

OL. LVI.

SEVENTH-DAY, NINTH MONTH 23, 1882.

NO. 7.

PUBLISHED WEEKLY.

if paid in advance, $2.00 per annum; if not paid in advance $2.50; 10 cents extra is charged for Postage on those sent by mail.

Articles designed for insertion to be addressed to

JOSEPH WALTON,
MOORESTOWN, BURLINGTON CO., N. J.

Subscriptions, payments and business communications, received by

JOHN S. STOKES,
NO. 116 NORTH FOURTH STREET, UP STAIRS,
PHILADELPHIA.

For "The Friend."

Robert Proud, the Teacher.

Some manuscript memoranda of Robert Proud, the author of the first History of Pennsylvania, which were placed in my hands, led to the preparation of the following sketch of his life. In compiling it, some use has been made of the Memoir by Charles West Thompson, published by the Pennsylvania Historical Society; and additional information has been obtained from the MSS. letters of the Pemberton family and other records.

He was a member of the Society of Friends, was born on the 10th of 5th month, 1728, in Yorkshire, England. Of his early years, he says: "I had a sense of what is good and evil, and of the contrary; and have ever been according to that sense, very desirous to do the best things; and therefore early, in my young years, had a strong inclination for piety, virtue and true wisdom, or improvement of mind and mental felicity, be it in preference to all mere worldly or carnal considerations; which I afterwards acted on that account, when I was courted by the world, and had it in my power to have been in a much superior character and position in the world, than I am since known to be in."

In carrying out this desire for mental improvement, he went to live, when about seven years of age, with David Hall, who kept a boarding school at Skipton in Yorkshire, as R. P. says, "esteemed one of the most learned, reputable and most worthy persons in that part of England." Here he remained four years with great satisfaction and improvement. By the persuasion of his father, he applied himself to the study of Latin and Greek, in which he made considerable proficiency. A firm friendship was created between preceptor and pupil, and R. Proud left the school a correspondent, which was kept up between them until the death of D. Hall. This was carried on in the French tongue. In R. P.'s MSS., the last of a series of letters is transcribed, when he himself was drawing near the close of life, (written then in his 82d year. When received, more than 50 years before,) R. Proud was in London. It reads as follows:—

Amice dilectissime, Oblata per consanguineum J. Foster ad te gratis et sine pretio literarum

mittendi occasione, his te breviter certiore facio nos plerosque omnes impræsentiarum prosperâ frui valetudine, teque plurimâ salute impertire, meque Karâ rō elos erudiendorum puerorum officio fungi; quod quidem opus est mihi annum ætatis septuagesimum primum agenti (Dei opt. max. beneficio difficilia, facilia, dura mollia reddenti) haud quidem est permolestum, sed potius pergratum.

"Amicos meos omnes prout se tibi offert salutandi opportunitas, nomine meo salutes velim; qui sum tibi amicus certus, salutisque tue semper studiosus,

DAVID HALL.

Uxor necnon et filius, tibi plurimam salutem mittunt.

"Skiptoniæ 4to 9ni mensis, 1753."

Ad Robertum Proudum.

David Hall was not only a learned man as to literary attainments, but he had been taught in the school of Christ, and was an accepted minister in the Society of Friends. After his death, some of his productions were collected into a small volume, with a sketch of his life written by himself.

In 1750, R. Proud removed to London, where through the influence of his relative, Dr. John Fothergill, he obtained a situation as private tutor to the children of Timothy Bevan. In his intervals of leisure, he continued to prosecute his literary and scientific pursuits; and after a time entered on the study of medicine, which he successfully pursued for several years. His prospects of success as a physician were very good, but he became dissatisfied with his situation. It exposed him, he remarks, "to a very glaring view of the chief causes of those diseases, (not to say vices,) which occasioned the greatest emolument to the profession of medicine;" and, upon this ground he abandoned the pursuit and determined to go to America.

He arrived in Philadelphia in the First month of 1759, and resided there during the remainder of his long life. During a part of this time his home was with his worthy friend Anthony Benezet; and he frequently spoke, with great satisfaction, of the many pleasant hours he had spent in the company of that estimable man. He used to compare Benezet's house to a ship's cabin, it being below the level of the ground, with descending steps to the door. This antiquated building stood on Chestnut street below Fourth, and was removed in the year 1818, to make room for a more modern edifice.

The certificate of his membership in the Society of Friends, granted to him on his leaving the country of his nativity, is addressed "To the Monthly Meeting of Friends in Philadelphia, or elsewhere in America." It reads as follows:—

"A certificate being requested on behalf of Robert Proud, a member of Grace Church Street Monthly Meeting, and son of William and Ann Proud, of Wildon, in the County of York: This may certify you, that due inquiry having been made, nothing appears, but that he is of a sober and orderly conversation and exemplary in his conduct, and also clear of any engagements respecting marriage, so far as we know. We recommend him to your kind notice and brotherly regard and remain with the salutation of love,

Your friends and brethren.

"Signed in and on behalf of our Two weeks Meeting held in London, 18th of Ninth month, 1758.

SILVANUS BEVAN,
TIMOTHY BEVAN,
JOSEPH PHIPPS,
SAMUEL BOWNAS."

In Philadelphia he soon resumed his employment of teaching—in which most of the active years of his life were spent. A letter from Israel Pemberton, dated 2d mo. 12th, 1760, speaks of procuring a teacher of Latin for the Public Schools, and says: "I am not out of hopes we shall be able to engage Robert Proud to undertake the care of the school, though he at present chooses only the care of a few children, and seems rather calculated for that than a public school. My two younger sons are with him (the eldest being apprentice), and they, I think, improve in their learning. Charles reads Horace and his Greek Testament, and has a good notion of what he learns."

That he was esteemed as a teacher, is shown by a letter of James Pemberton, of 12th mo. 22nd, 1760, to William Logan, who was then in England, which thus refers to him: "Robert Proud being so uneasy with his situation in respect to his board, where he was subjected to divers inconveniences, that to prevent his breaking up school and returning to England, which he talked of, I have with my wife's consent offered to take him into my family, and to provide him with the counting house in my yard for his boys until he can furnish himself more to his satisfaction, with which he seems pleased. My son and his other pupils make so good advancement in their learning, that I think it would be a manifest prejudice to them to suffer him to leave us."

A second letter from James Pemberton to William Logan, on the 21st of 12th mo. 1761, mentions that Robert had been in the school for some time past, that he had thirty scholars and an usher to assist him, that he appeared contented, and that "things are in a fair way of being conducted with reputation."

C. W. Thomson says that teaching "was his element, and perhaps the sphere of his most extensive usefulness. He took great delight in the languages—was well acquainted with Latin and Greek, and had also a considerable knowledge of French and Hebrew. With the Latin he was so familiar that he thought he could understand a subject better in that language than in his own. Under such competent government, the school necessarily flourished; and he had the satisfaction of sending forth from it many, who have since attained a high standing in society, and become ornaments to the circles in which they have moved. His manners as a teacher were mild, commanding and affectionate. I once heard a gentleman, who had been his pupil, speak with much satisfaction of Proud's conduct towards him on leaving school. He entered with perfect freedom into familiar conversation, enquired with the most paternal anxiety respecting his prospects in life, and with the greatest kindness offered him some appropriate advice, and parted with him as a father parts with his son. It produced on the mind of this individual, though he was at that time but a boy, an impression of the deepest respect."

This kindly interest in his pupils, is manifested in some lines which he wrote on the decease of one of them in 1783—a child of Nicholas Wain, who was then in Europe on a religious visit. J. W.

(To be continued.)

Dreams.

CONVERTED BY A DREAM.

John Newton, the fame of whose piety fills all Christendom, while a profligate sailor on shipboard, in his dream thought that a being approached him and gave him a very beautiful ring, and put it upon his finger, and said to him, "As long as you wear that ring you will be prospered; if you lose that ring you will be ruined." In the same dream another personage appeared, and by a strange infatuation persuaded John Newton to throw overboard that ring, and it sank into the sea. Then the mountains in sight were full of fire, and the air was lurid with consuming wrath.

While John Newton was repenting of his folly in having thrown overboard the treasure, another personage came through the dream, and told John Newton he would plunge into the sea and bring that ring up if he desired it. He plunged into the sea and brought it up, and said to John Newton, "Here is that gem, but I think I will keep it for you, lest you lose it again;" and John Newton consented, and all the fire went out from the mountains, and all the signs of lurid wrath disappeared from the air; and John Newton said that he saw in his dream that that valuable gem was his soul, and that the being who persuaded him to throw it overboard was Satan, and that the one who plunged in and restored that gem, keeping it for him, was Christ. And that dream makes one of the most wonderful chapters in the life of that most wonderful man.

John Hardonk, while on shipboard, dreamed one night that the day of judgment had come, and that the roll of the ship's crew was called, except his own name; and that these people, this crew, were all banished; and in his dream he asked the reader why his own name was omitted, and he was told it was to give him more opportunity for repentance. He woke up a different man. He became illustrious for Christian attainment.

Dr. Crannage, one of the most remarkable men I ever met—remarkable for benevolence and great philanthropies—at Wellington, England, showed me a house where the Lord had appeared in a wonderful dream to a poor woman. The woman was rheumatic, sick, poor to the last point of destitution. She was waited on and cared for by another poor woman, her only attendant. Word came to her one day that this poor woman had died, and the invalid of whom I am speaking lay helpless upon the couch, wondering what would become of her. In that mood she fell asleep. In her dreams she said the angel of the Lord appeared, and took her into the open air and pointed in one direction, and there were mountains of bread; and pointed in another direction, and there were mountains of butter; and in another direction, and there were mountains of all kinds of worldly supply. The angel of the Lord said to her: "Woman, all these mountains belong to your Father, and do you think he will let you his child, hunger and die?"

Dr. Crannage told me by some divine impulse he went into that destitute home, saw the suffering there, and administered unto it, caring for her all the way through.—Talmage.

For "The Friend."

Joseph Evans.

A tribute to the memory of Joseph Evans, of Springfield, Delaware Co., Pa.

"Precious in the sight of the Lord,
Is the death of his saints."

A testimony lives in my heart, which I desire to preserve as a little tribute of love to the memory of my beloved and honored uncle, Joseph Evans.

He was indeed a striking example of humility, and a preacher of righteousness in his life and conversation; to whom may justly be applied the words of the Psalmist, "Mark the perfect man, and behold the upright, for the end of that man is peace." His memory is very precious, and its fragrance, like the "odor of the ointment, has filled the house, and may it long remain as ointment poured forth," to the refreshing of many.

Although we have the consoling assurance that our beloved relative has joined the "just of all generations," and is forever with the Lord; yet we cannot but deeply feel the loss we have sustained by his removal—the loss of his pleasant company and his excellent counsel,—but his shining example still lives. May we be afresh incited to follow him, as he endeavored to follow his dear Saviour; and finally be permitted to meet him around the throne, where sorrow and death cannot come!

My dear uncle closed his valuable life on the 10th of 2d mo. 1871, in the 82d year of his age. The morning he was taken ill he remarked to us, that it might be the will of his Heavenly Father to take him out of the world with this sickness, but he did not know how it would terminate. In the afternoon he seemed relieved from pain, and appeared disposed to converse. He said he had been much comforted that morning in reading the Bible, particularly the 147th Psalm, 11th verse, "The Lord taketh pleasure in them that fear Him, in those that hope in his mercy." He mentioned that he felt a little assurance that it was applicable to himself, for his only hope was in the mercy of God in Christ Jesus.

The pain returned with great severity that night; his sufferings were so intense that he thought he could not continue long; and prayed fervently for patience to bear all that was laid upon him, to be made fit to appear in the presence of Infinite Purity. In the morning he was relieved from severe pain, but suffered so much from oppression that it was needful to fan him almost constantly. The disease seemed to be making rapid progress, but he did not express what he thought respecting the issue until his dear brother the physician, came. He inquired of him he considered the disease of a serious nature. He replied, he did. He looked very thoughtful and said, "It is an awful thing to die have nothing to trust to but mercy." It seemed to be much of the time engaged in fervent supplication,—sometimes using the words, "O Heavenly One, be pleased to shorten the work in righteousness, if consistent with thy holy will." His sufferings from oppression were so great, he feared his patience would not hold out to the end; and expressed the hope he would not bring any dishonor to the Truth. Soon after he said with much fervor, "Lord, I have loved the habitation of thy house, and the place where thine holy dwelleth; gather not my soul with sinners."

One morning after taking a glass of water he said, "O that I might drink of the water of Life!" He was not able to lie down several days, but sat up in an easy chair, was observed to him that the poor being seemed weary with sitting up; he looked us very sweetly, and calmly repeated the passage, "For we know if our earthly habitation of this tabernacle were dissolved, we have building of God, an house not made with hands, eternal in the heavens."

On Fifth-day before the close, his dear and only surviving brother coming in, he said to him, "Dear brother, I hope we shall meet before the throne." Soon after, he had a family called around the bed, and spoke very instructively to us all,—desired his grandchildren to keep with the friends of the Truth and the Truth would keep them. He appeared to be peacefully wearing from earthly things; and continued in a sweet heavenly frame to the close.

On Sixth-day, the last of his useful life, said to his brother, "I think the time nearly come." He replied, "I think it will not be long before thou wilt be released from all thy sufferings." Soon after, the family went down to dinner, I only remained with him. He asked for a glass of water, took it in his hand, and drank it, and, I think, said, "O what shall I do," took my hand, pressed it, and soon after, leaning on the arm of his compassionate Saviour, his purified, deemed spirit was gathered, we doubt not its heavenly rest. L. T. E.

A Test.—A young man told me not long ago that he tried this principle of forming his judgment as to the character of religion from observation with respect to his country brother. That brother of his had come under the power of the gospel in a mission I myself had held some time before. This man told me that when the tidings of this change came to his ears he said to himself, "Now I will just observe him, and see if he is really happier, and in every way better man than he was before." "Twelve months had passed away," said my informant, "and I had plenty of opportunities during that time of seeing his life, and forming my judgment about it. At the end of that time I came to the definite conclusion that he was in every respect a finer man than ever before; he was kinder, more generous, more manly, and above all obviously a 'happier man.' And now," he added, "I am persuaded that the only true secret pininess is to be found in the service of ist, and so I desire to take my brother's for my own."—A. H. Aitken.

Grace Darling.

Who has not heard of Grace Darling, the heroine of the Longstone Lighthouse, whose name, associated with the wreck of the "For-farshire" steamer, will long be remembered among the annals of those who, although living humble stations in life, have yet exhibited traits of natural greatness which would grace the occupier of the loftiest position in society?

Grace Darling was born in 1815, and was the daughter of William Darling, keeper of the lighthouse on the Longstone, one of the rocks off the Farne Islands, in which solitary place she constantly resided with her parents.
 She is described as having been "remarkable for a retiring and somewhat reserved disposition, of a fair complexion and comely countenance, with nothing masculine in her appearance, but, on the contrary, gentle in aspect, and with an expression of the greatest kindness and benevolence," which latter qualities, we need scarcely remark, are not uncommonly found associated with gallant bearing and the most resolute courage.

The Farne Islands lie off the northeastern coast of England. They are a group of barren and desolate rocks, inhabited principally by gulls; and their sides are in many parts extremely precipitous.

Through the channels between the smaller islands, the sea rushes with great impetuosity; and doubtless many a shipwreck of which there is no record has occurred there former times, when no beacon existed to warn the mariner in his path through the straits. Rather more than a century ago, a 40-gun frigate, with all her crew, was wrecked among them; and numerous other wrecks are recorded to have happened between that time and the present.

Living on this lone spot, in the midst of the ocean, with the horrors of the tempest familiarized to her mind, Grace Darling was not at all, as it were, from the active scenes of the world, and was principally occupied in assisting her mother in the management of their little household; and it is worthy of remark—in order to the better appreciation of the magnanimity she exhibited on this occasion—that she was not habituated to the use of an oar in the management of a boat, those offices having been performed by other members of her family.

She had received a good education for her station in life, and had reached her twenty-second year, when the incident occurred which has rendered her name so famous, and which we will now proceed to relate.

On the evening of the 5th of [Ninth mo.], 1838, the "Forfarshire," a steamer of about three hundred tons burthen, John Humble, master, sailed from Hull for Dundee, having on board a valuable cargo; and, as nearly as could be ascertained, sixty-three persons, namely: the master and his wife, a crew of twenty men, and forty-one passengers. She was a new vessel, being only two years old;
 but her boilers were, no doubt, in a culpable state of repair. Previous to her leaving Hull, a small leak had been discovered in them,
 and for the moment closed up; but when off Bamforth Head it broke out afresh to such an extent as to put out two of the fires.

The boilers were, however, again partially repaired, and the fires relighted, and in this state she proceeded on her voyage, passing the "Fairway" between the Farne Islands and the mainland at about 6 p. m., on the 6th.
 At about 8 p. m., she entered Berwick Bay, the sea running high, with the wind strong from the north. The leakage now increased to such a degree that the firemen could not keep the fires burning, and at about 10 p. m., she bore up at St. Abb's Head, the storm still raging with unabated fury. The engine soon after became useless and would not work, when the sails were hoisted fore and aft, and the vessel tacked, in order to keep her off the land. She, however, soon became unmanageable, and, the tide setting strong to the south,
 she was carried by it in that direction.

It rained heavily during the whole time,
 and the fog was too dense to enable the position of the vessel to be ascertained.

At length, breakers were discovered close to leeward, and the Farne lights became visible, leaving no doubt as to the imminent peril of all on board.

It was in vain attempted to avert the catastrophe by running between the islands and the mainland; she would not answer her helm, and was impelled to and fro by a furious sea. Between three and four o'clock, she struck with her bows foremost on the rock, which was there so precipitous that a person could scarce stand erect on it.

A part of the crew now lowered one of the quarter-boats and left the ship, having one of the passengers with them, who had contrived to throw himself into the boat; but two others, making the same attempt, perished.
 The scene which now presented itself was of a most heart-rending description. Several women were uttering cries of anguish and despair, and amidst them stood the bewildered master, whose wife, clinging to him, frantically besought the protection which he was unable to afford. Very soon after the first shock, a heavy wave struck the vessel on the quarter, and raising her off the rock allowed her immediately after to fall violently upon it, when, a sharp ledge striking her about amidships, she was fairly broken into two pieces; and the after-part, containing the cabin and many passengers, was immediately carried off by a rapid current through the Pifagut, while the fore-part remained on the rock.

A portion of the passengers and crew had previously betaken themselves to the foremost part of the vessel, considering it to be the safest place.

In this dreadful situation, exposed amid darkness to the buffeting of the waves, and fearful lest each rising surge should sweep away into the deep the fragment of the wreck on which they stood, they waited in anxious expectancy the breaking of the day. In the fore-cabin, also exposed to the intrusion of the sea, was a woman, the wife of a weaver, with her two children, who, when relief at last came, was found yet alive, but her two children lay stiffened corpses in her arms.

Such was their seemingly hopeless position, when, soon after the day broke, they were desisted from the Longstone by the Darlings, at nearly a mile's distance. A mist hovered over the island; and, though the wind had somewhat abated its violence, the sea was still raging fearfully, making any approach to the rugged pinnacles and sunken rocks which surround these islands a work of extreme peril. Indeed, even at a later period of the day, a reward of £5, offered by the steward of Bamforth Castle, could scarcely induce a party of fishermen to venture off from the mainland.

To have braved the dangers of that terrible passage would have done the highest honor even to the well-trying nerves of the stoutest of the male sex. But what shall be said of the errand of mercy being undertaken and accomplished mainly through the strength of a female heart and arm?

Through the dim mist, with the aid of a glass, the figures of the sufferers were seen clinging to the wreck. But who could dare to tempt the raging abyss that intervened, in the hope of succoring them? W. Darling, it is said, shrank from the attempt. Not so his daughter. At her solicitation, the boat was launched, with the assistance of her mother—the father and daughter entering it,
 and each taking an oar.

In estimating the danger which the heroic adventuress encountered, there is one circumstance which ought not to be forgotten.
 Had it not been ebb tide, the boat could not have passed between the islands; and they knew that the tide would be flowing on their return, when their united strength would be utterly insufficient to row the boat back to the light-house island. So that, had they not got the assistance of the survivors on their return, they themselves would have been compelled to remain on the rock, beside the wreck, until the tide again ebbed.

It could then only be by the exertion of great muscular power, as well as of determined courage, that they could hope to reach the wreck; and when there, the danger would be much increased from the liability they would run of being dashed to pieces on those rugged rocks.

It must have seemed to them a forlorn hope; but their courage rose with the emergency, God's blessing accompanied them, and their efforts were crowned with success. The whole of the nine survivors were taken into their little bark, and conveyed in safety to the light-house. Here, owing to the violent seas which continued to prevail, they were compelled to remain two days, during which time they received every kindness and comfort that the household could afford, and in which they were in so much need.

The party who had left in the ship's boat, also nine in number, were picked up the next morning by a Montrose sloop, and conveyed to Shields.

The subsequent events of Grace Darling's life are soon told. The deed she had done may be said to have wafted her name all over Europe. That lonely light-house became speedily the centre of attraction to curious and sympathizing thousands, including many of the wealthy and the great, who in numerous instances, testified by substantial tokens the feelings with which they regarded the young heroine. Among the number were the Duke and Duchess of Northumberland, who invited her father and herself to Alnwick
 Castle, and presented her with a gold watch.
 Grace and her father received the silver medal of the National Lifeboat (then Shipwreck) Institution, and numerous testimonials from other public bodies and admiring strangers.
 A public subscription was also raised with a view to reward her for her bravery and humanity, which is said to have amounted to about $3,500. To such an extent indeed, did the popular enthusiasm reach, that portraits of her were eagerly sought for; and she was even offered large sums by the proprietors of one or more of the metropolitan theatres, on the condition that she should merely sit in a boat for a brief space during the performance of a piece whose chief attraction she was to be. All such offers, however, were promptly and steadily refused; and it is gratifying to know that, amid all this tumult of applause, Grace Darling never for a moment forgot the modest dignity of conduct which became her sex and station. The flattering testimonials of all kinds which were showered on her seemed to produce in her mind no other feelings than those of wonder and grateful pleasure. She continued to reside at the Longstone Lighthouse with her father and mother, finding, in her limited sphere of domestic duty, on that sea-girt islet, a more honorable and more rational enjoyment than the crowded haunts of the mainland would have afforded her, and thus giving, by her conduct, the best proof that the liberality of the public had not been unworthily bestowed.

Grace Darling did not live long in the enjoyment of the honors that had been showered on her. She died of consumption, Tenth mo. 25th, 1842, at the age of twenty-seven years, and four years after the occurrence which has made her name famous for all time.—Sunday at Home.

For "The Friend."

Conversation—Retirement.

"What is social intercourse unseasoned by the fruits of the Spirit? It is an easy matter to sit down and interest ourselves in what is passing in the world around us,—what has happened as a matter of particular interest to a friend, or has been striking as an event in a neighborhood; and no doubt to a certain extent these are allowable themes. But when we come to find them necessary to beguile a passing hour, or to give zest to our intercourse, there is reason to fear they are unduly occupying our minds, and tending to disarrange that balance the Truth calls upon us to maintain."

"How often do I wish that chastened seriousness might take the place of levity; and that we might evince more by our conduct and conversation that the mind was stayed upon an anchor, which outward and worldly variations can neither reach nor disturb." "Tis not in created objects to impart to the mind that settled and abiding satisfaction which renders to this life its comfort and its hope. We may mingle with the 'loved of earth,' and derive from the congeniality of tastes and pursuits, much that tends to cheer the weary round of care, and lighten the burden of toil and anxiety that the lack of friendly intercourse might cause us more to feel. But to be enjoyed it must be partaken of only at intervals; an incessant round must certainly weary and exhaust the better strength. And as for myself, if obliged to choose between constant society and uninterrupted solitude, I think I should unhesitatingly decide upon the latter; believing frequent retirement so essential to the growth of that Divine life so important for all to experience and cherish above every thing else. The retirement of a solitary chamber is often a source of unspeakable satisfaction; and I have returned to it, after being obliged to devote much of my time to society, or the ordinary care of life, with a relish heightened by abstinence."—From the Letters and Memoranda of Mary M. Sheppard.

CONVERSATION.

— "Souls that carry on a blest exchange
Of joys they meet within their heavenly range,
And with a fearless confidence make known
The sorrows sympathy esteems its own,
Daily derive increasing light and force
From such communion in their pleasant course,
Feel less the journey's roughness and its length,
Meet their opposers with united strength,
And, one in heart, in interest, and design,
Gird up each other to the race divine."

—Cowper.

Selected.

VANISHED FACES.

BY MARY CLEMMER.

The vanished, vanished faces
Press on our inner sight;
We see them in the morning,
We see them in the night.
Beloved are the living,
Who have not taken flight,
But the vanished, vanished faces,
Make the lonely heart's delight.

O the vanished, vanished faces!
The baby's fairy face,
The mother's, sweetly human,
The maiden's airy grace.
O the endless, endless patience,
O the peace upon the face
Of the dear old, weary father,
As he neared the heavenly place!

O the vanished, vanished faces!
The ones that life hath ta'en
And set in passless distance,
Beyond our love or pain.
We see them in our sorrow,
We see them in our pride;
But they're farther from us
Than the loved ones who have died.

Life, life's the hopeless robber,
When it sets its iron wall
'Twixt eyes that seek each other,
'Twixt hearts that love and call.
O the vanished, vanished faces
Fill the swift receding years,
Leaning in upon our visions,
Touching all our smiles and tears.

—Home Journal.

Selected.

CANST THOU BY SEARCHING FIND OUT GOD?

Thought plumed her wings of heavenly birth
And sought through all the fields of earth
The footsteps of her God.
She scanned its surface bright and fair,
And searched the viewless tides of air,
And farthest ways untrod.

She passed the sunbeam in its flight,
And smote the azure plains of light,
With never-tiring wing;
She kept her course from star to star,
And searched the universe afar,
But sought her God in vain.

Then back she came to earth again,
With mournful heart and lowly mien,
Oppressed by sad despair;
To her cast down by sore unrest,
A voice ariseth sweet and blest,
"Lo, God is every-where!"

She hears the voice, she lifts her eyes,
And lo! beneath the bended skies
Sees every-where his power;
The sunshine speaketh from above,
It speaks a benison of love,
And God himself is there!

"Beautiful is the light of Christian faith and hope, when the evening of a lovely and useful life blends itself with the dawning of the life everlasting."

FAREWELL TO MUSIC.

Select

I have loved thee, O Music, I have tasted thy power
And have praised thy sweet song that has robbed me hours.

I have said thou couldst lull every feeling of strife,
And counted thee one of the blessings of life.

I have thought that thy anthems of holy delight,
Brought the dawning of day, mid the shadows of night
That the spirit oppressed with unspeakable grief,
Could at last find one refuge, one certain relief.

Ah! thou lily-white wand, and thou rose-bedecked
thorn,
Thou betrayest the heart, and then leaves it to morrow
For thou hast not one comfort, one boon to bestow;
From thy high-mounting anthems, what deep mean flow.

Then I'll leave thee, I'll shun thee, I'll bid thee farewell,
Nor shall reason or conscience henceforward rebel;
Thou shalt rob me no more of sweet silence and rest
For I have proved thee a trap, a seducer at best.

Yes, thou spirit of darkness transformed out of light
Thou voluptuous form, clad in raiment of white;
It is thine, when our passions seem conquered and fled
But to raise up and cherish the evils we dread.

Then go where vice haunts the thoughtless and gay,
Where the midnight of folly sends reason away;
Where the mind draws its sorrows, its pleasures from thence,
And the heart pants alone for the raptures of sense.

But oh! enter thou not where devotion has trod,
To beguile the poor soul from its duty to God;
For the well-springs of life, and the bread of the day,
It is thine not to give, but to barter away.

Then may each son of folly and each daughter of care
Hear the whisper that bids others reflect and beware
The sin that will seduce them from peace and from rest
The arrow whose point will envenom their breast.

For while sin, open sin, leads its thousands astray,
Tens of thousands are borne by false pleasures away
Let the Christian in heart redeemed and set free, Never dare to return, Oh! Music, to thee.

—Amelia Opie.

The New England Journal of Education has the following paragraph on the recent liquor dealers' convention:

A national convention of the Liquor Dealers' Association, representing $400,000,000 invested in drink, has been held at Chicago to devise means to resist the gathering of popular indignation against the ravages of intemperance. It is refreshing to observe the compudence with which a body of men who are responsible for three-fourths of the crime, pauperism and misery of the land, the vast of whose trade exceeds by millions the whole cost of education in the Union, assumes the air of martyrdom and demands the protection of its unalienable right to flood the land with ruin!

Face to the Light.—It had been one of those days on which everything goes contrary, and I had come home tired and discouraged. As I sank into a chair I groaned, "Everythin' looks dark, dark, dark!" "Why don't you turn your face to the light, auntie dear?" said my little niece who was standing unperceived beside me.

"Turn your face to the light!" The words set me thinking. That was just what I had not been doing. I had persistently kept my face in the opposite direction, refusing to see the faintest glimmer of brightness. Artless little comforter! She did not know what healing she had brought. Years have gone by since then, but the simple words have never been forgotten.—Christian Index.

Praying Always.

In the precept to pray always," says Archbishop Trench, "there is nothing of exhortation, nothing commanded which may be fulfilled, when we understand prayer to be the continual desire of the soul after God; having, indeed, its times of intensity—moments of an intense consecration of the spiritual life—but not confined to those times, the whole life of the faithful should be, the beautiful words of Origen, 'One great needed prayer.'" And so good old Dr. Wymore tells us, "That the soul that is accustomed to direct itself to God, on every occasion, and which, as a flower at sun-rising, receives a sense of God in every beam of light, and spreads itself in thankfulness for every blessing He sheds upon it; that soul feels sometimes when it does not know it why." And in the same spirit, Augustine says that "longing desire prays always, though the tongue be silent," and that, "if we are ever longing, we are ever praying."* We read of an excellent woman in humble life, who, when spoken to on the subject of prayer, meekly replied, that with all her incessant toil and labor in struggling to support a dependent family, she found but little time for the closet; but she added, "If I am anything, I pray that my soul may be washed in the blood of Christ; if sweeping, that my heart may be cleansed by the Holy Spirit; if eating my plain meal, that I may be fed with the Word of God; if weary, that I may find rest in Jesus; if diligent with my daily toil, that I may be faithful and diligent in the whole life; if I am trying to provide for the wants of my family, that all my wants, both moral and spiritual, may be provided for by my covenant-keeping God and Redeemer, so that He will receive me, at last, to the blessed family of the redeemed above!" In this spirit, one may be always praying; not only, as Cecil says, by "finding parentheses in prayer in the intervals of the most pressing business," but by associating every form of business, or pleasure, or daily avocation of every kind, with the up-going of the soul in prayer and communion with God, asking his presence and guidance and blessing at every step of our way. And if this be our spirit, we may truly say, with another,

Though once I sought a time and place,
For solitude and prayer;
Yet now where'er I find thy face,
I find a closet there.

Holding fast thus to prayer, we hold fast to Christ; and holding fast to Christ, we are ever safe and blest. "He that knows how to pray," says Jay, "has the secret of safety in prosperity, and of support in trouble; the art of overcoming every enemy, and of turning every loss into a gain; the power of doing every care; of subduing every passion; and of adding a relish to every enjoyment. The merchandize of it is better than the merchandize of silver, and the gain thereof is fine gold." Not till life is over, will the full answer to such prayer be given, or its full strength be understood, or the full glory and blessedness it has brought us be fully known and felt, in the perfect blessedness!—N. S.

[This must be accepted with this qualification—the longing is that produced by the Spirit of Christ, in which all true prayer comes.]

Extract from the writings of Isaac Penington.

—Let all strive to excel in tenderness and long-suffering, and to be kept out of hard and evil thoughts one of another, and of harsh interpretations concerning anything relating one to another. Oh, this is unworthy to be found in an Israelite towards an Egyptian, but exceedingly shameful and inexcusable in one brother towards another.

How many weaknesses doth the Lord pass by in us! how ready is He to interpret all things well concerning his disciples, that may bear a good interpretation! When they had all been scattered from Him upon his death, He did not afterwards upbraid them, but sweetly gathered them again.

O, dear friends! have we received the same life of sweetness? Let us bring forth the same sweet fruits, being ready to excuse, and ready to receive that which may tend to the excuse of another in any doubtful case, and where there is any evil manifest, wait, Oh wait, to overcome it with good.

Oh! let us not spend the strength of our spirits in crying out one of another because of evil, but watch and wait where the mercy and healing virtue will arise. O Lord, my God, when thou hast shown the wants of Israel in any kind sufficiently, (whether in the general or in the particular,) bring forth the supply thereof from thy fulness, so ordering it in thy own eternal wisdom, that all may be ashamed and abased before thee, and thy name be praised in and over all.

Hurry and bustle are not essential to successful action, but impede it. The spirit of hurry causes confusion, and is fatal to soundness of judgment. Nélaton, the greatest of French surgeons, said that if he had but four minutes in which to perform an operation on which a life depended, he would take one minute to consider how best to do it. "Always in haste, but never in a hurry," was John Wesley's rule.—Selected.

Did Not Go Where They Were.—"I've been in India for many a year, and I never saw a native Christian the whole time." So spake a colonel on board a steamer going to Bombay. Some days afterward the same colonel was telling of his hunting experiences, and said that thirty tigers had fallen to his rifle. "Did I understand you to say thirty, colonel?" asked a missionary at the table. "Yes, sir, thirty," replied the officer. "Because," pursued the missionary, explanatorily, "I thought perhaps you meant three." "No, sir, thirty," this time with emphasis. "Well, now, that's strange," said the missionary, "I've been in India twenty-five years, and I never saw a wild live tiger all the while." "Very likely not, sir," said the colonel; "but that's because you did'n't know where to look for them." "Perhaps it was so," admitted the missionary, after a moment or two of apparent reflection; but may not that be the reason you never saw a native convert, as you affirmed the other evening at this table?"—Shanghai Temperance Union.

Finger Marks.—A gentleman employed a mason to do some work for him, and among other things to "thin-whiten" the walls of one of his rooms. This thin-whiting is almost colorless until dried. The gentleman was much surprised on the morning after the chamber was finished, to find on the drawer of his desk standing in the room, white finger-marks. On opening the drawer, he found the same on articles in it, and also on the pocket-book. An examination revealed the same marks on the contents of a bag. This proved clearly that the mason with his wet hand had opened the drawer, and searched the bag, which contained no money, and had then closed the drawer without once thinking that any one would ever know it. The "thin-whiting," which happened to be on his hands, did not show at first, and he probably had no idea that twelve hours would reveal his wickedness. As the work was all done on the afternoon the drawer was opened, the man did not come again; and to this day does not know that his acts are known to his employer. Beware of evil thoughts and deeds! They all leave finger-marks, which will one day be revealed. Sin defiles the soul. It betrays those who engage in it by marks it leaves on them. These may be almost, if not quite, invisible at first.—Selected.

I was constrained to express something, by way of stimulating to good order, in sitting down to meals; that we may be favored, in our short pauses at such times, to participate also in renewed refreshment of spirit. Paying but a slight regard to these moments, allowed in a family for individual secret breathing to the Fountain of all our rich supplies, temporal and spiritual, is attended with great loss. There is a danger of the lamp of life, in a spiritual sense, becoming dim, and even being extinguished by the cares of this life. The deep work of regeneration, redemption and entire sanctification, is not sufficiently the object of Christian professors.—Mary Capper.

For "The Friend."

Religious Items, &c.

Ritualistic Worship.—The correspondent of the National Baptist thus describes his attendance at a Roman Catholic service at Cologne.

"In the morning, at 9.30, we went to the cathedral, the stateliest Gothic building in the world, a marvel of architectural skill, and one of the most impressive places of worship in christendom. It was the time of High Mass. The procession of priests and acolytes and choristers was most imposing. As it proceeded down the nave and up the aisle, chanting solemnly and sweetly, the congregation dropt on their knees and did obeisance. Then came the service. Celebrating priests were attired in gorgeous garments, 'made for glory and for beauty.' Their intonation was nearly perfect. The prayers, however, were recited with their faces toward the altar; and, had the crowds of spectators understood Latin, they would have caught only part of a sentence now and then. The music and the singing were all that could be desired for harmony, and volume, and effect. But there was no message delivered, no gospel proclaimed, no word of any kind spoken to the people. It was a performance by the priests. The clouds of incense, the uplifting of the wafer and the adoration thereof, and the meek reception of the benediction, were also notable features in the service."

Such a celebration as above described is as far removed from the idea of religious worship, as held by the Society of Friends, as we can well imagine. The attention of the people is drawn outward to the performances of the priests; instead of being turned inward to the spirit of the Lord, from which alone ability can be received to offer that worship of the heart which is "in spirit and in truth."

Effect of Liturgical Forms.—In most great churches, and especially in churches which are established by law, and in which liturgical forms are used, the language of public worship is of a kind which can, at most, be appropriate to a very small fraction of those who use it. The customs of society draw within the church men of all grades of piety and of faith. The skeptical, the frivolous, the selfish, the worldly, the indifferent, or at least, men whose convictions are but half formed, whose zeal is very languid, and whose religious thoughts are very few, form the bulk of every congregation; and they are taught to employ language expressing the very ecstasy of devotion. The words that pass mechanically from the lips, convey in turn the fervor of the martyr, the self-abasement or the rapture of the saint, a passionate confidence in the reality of unseen things, a passionate longing to pass beyond the veil. The effect of this contrast between the habitual language of devotion and the habitual disposition of the devotees, between the energy of religious expression and languor of religious convictions, is, in some respects, extremely deleterious. The sense of truth is dulled. Men come to regard it as a natural and scarcely censurable thing to attune their feelings on the highest of all subjects, to a key wholly different from their genuine feelings and beliefs, and that which ought to be the truest of human occupations, becomes, in fact, the most unreal and the most conventional.—Lecky's Hist. of England.

Oaths.—Judge Edward A. Thomas discusses, in the North American Review, the value of oaths in courts. In his judgment the oath should be entirely dispensed with, as doing more harm than good. He declares that the conscientious man will tell the truth, when legally called upon to do so, as thoroughly without the oath as with it, and that dishonest persons are seldom restrained by the utmost solemnity of form. In short, he believes that the oath has lost its force as a restraint, and is merely the formula of an exploded superstition.

For "The Friend."

Natural History, Science, &c.

A Ceylon Jungle.—Prof. Haeckel, who is giving in the German Rundschau some account of his travels in Ceylon, thus describes his first attempt to penetrate a Ceylon jungle: The jungle, he says, is not, properly speaking, primeval forest—forest that is untrodden by the foot of man, (such are in Ceylon of small extent and rare occurrence;) but it corresponds to our idea of such a forest in that it consists of a dense and impenetrable mass of mighty trees of all kinds, which have sprung up without regularity or any interference from man, and are surrounded and overgrown by a wilderness of creeping and climbing plants, of ferns, orchids, and other parasites, the interstices being so completely filled up with a motley mass of smaller weeds, that it is quite impossible to disentangle the coil of tendrils so as to distinguish one species from the other. My first attempt to penetrate such a jungle as this was sufficient to convince me of the impossibility of the undertaking except with the aid of ax and fire. A hard hour's work brought me only a few steps into the thicket, and then I was obliged to acknowledge myself vanquished and make good a retreat, stung by mosquitoes, bitten by ants, with torn clothes, and arms and legs bleeding from the thorns and prickles with which the climbing palm, (Calamus,) the climbing Hibiscus, the Euphorbia, and a multitude of other jungle plants, repulse every attack made on their impenetrable labyrinth.

But the attempt had not been made altogether in vain; for it enabled me to gain a very fair idea of the jungle as a whole, more especially of the magnificence of its trees and creepers, besides introducing me to many separate varieties of animal and vegetable life, which were of the highest interest. Here I saw the magnificent Gloriosa superba; the poisonous climbing lily of Ceylon, with its red and amber flowers; the prickly Hibiscus radiatus, with large cup-shaped, brimstone colored flowers, deepening to violet in the hollow; while around them fluttered gigantic black butterflies with blood-red spots on their tail-shaped wings, and chafers and dragonflies flew past with a metallic gleam.

A remarkable sand storm, accompanied by an intensely cold temperature, is mentioned in Icelandic journals as having raged on that island for two weeks during the past spring. The air was filled with dry, fine sand to such a degree that it was impossible to see more than a short distance, and the sun was rarely visible, though the sky was clear of clouds. Nobody ventured out of his house except upon matters of most urgent necessity, and many who were exposed to the storm were frozen. The sand penetrated into the houses through the minutest crevices. It was found mixed with articles of food and drink, and every breath drew it into the lungs. Thousands of sheep and horses died.

Sagacity in a Dog.—The following anecdote was sent by a gentleman resident in the neighborhood of the locality where the adventure occurred. The dog of which it speaks, belonged to a miller, and after being unchained in the morning was in the habit of going from the mill on the Teviot, near its junction with the Tweed, to the house and bringing his master's breakfast.

"On one occasion, when the Teviot and the Tweed were in flood, a little dog ventured incautiously into the Tweed, and was rapidly carried down the stream, struggling and yelping as it was hurried along.

"It so happened that the miller's dog, while carrying his master's breakfast to him, saw the little dog in distress. He immediately put down his burden, turned, and set off at full gallop down the stream. When he had got well below the drowning dog, he sprang into the river, swam across; and so exactly had he calculated the rapidity of the river and his own speed, that he intercepted the little dog as it was being helplessly swept down the current, and brought it safely to land.

"When he got his burden safely on shore, the dog, instead of displaying the least affection for it, cuffed it first with one paw and then with the other, and returned to the spot where he had deposited his master's breakfast, and carried it to him as usual."

The whole behavior of the dog is exactly like that of a burly, kind and rugged bargee, possessed of cool judgment and rapid action, willing to risk his life for another, and then to make light of the whole business. I was for some years in charge of a water-side parry and knew many a bargee who would have acted exactly in the same way, if a child had fallen into the river. He would have got the child out at the risk of his own life, and then instead of waiting for thanks, would have boxed its ears soundly, rated it for interrupting him in his work, and then have proceeded with his journey as if nothing had happened.

The animal exhibited self-denial, preservation of mind and forethought. Had he jumped into the water at once, he could not have caught the little dog; but by galloping down the stream, getting ahead of the drowning animal, and then stemming the current till he was swept within his reach, he made sure of his object; and no man could have acted better if he had tried to save a drowning child.—Man and Beast by J. G. Wood.

THE FRIEND.

NINTH MONTH 23, 1882:

NORTH CAROLINA YEARLY MEETING.

We have received from one of the members an account of the recently held Yearly Meeting of North Carolina, the substance of which is given below.

We have good reason to believe that there are within the limits of that body many whom the principles of truth, as held by our early members, are precious; and who are endeavoring to walk consistently therewith. Yet it is evident, from the narrative we have received, that there are influences at work which tend to lead astray. This is shown in the utterances of one or more of the strangers in attendance, and by the holding of so-called "Devotional Meetings," different in their character from ordinary meetings for worship, and in which expounding the Scriptures and singing are permitted.

We do not suppose the Friends of that Yearly Meeting are at all conscious of the loss they have sustained by recognizing the Birney Body in Ohio, and thus opening the door to the operation of influences adverse to true Quakerism, and shutting out in measure the helps which would have tended to promote their true spiritual welfare.

"North Carolina Yearly Meeting convened this year three months earlier than last, New Garden, Guilford Co. There were few strangers present, and a pretty full attendance of our own members.

"Representative meeting commenced Fourth-day the 16th of 8th mo., at 10 A. The first business was routine and reading the minutes of proceedings since last year. The new safe was ready to be put in its place in the house for reception of the documents and papers belonging to the Yearly Meeting. Many old and valuable records of the Society are scattered and need to be collected and cared for before they become useless. Friends were encouraged to collect and forward all papers connected with the history of the Society.

"At 3 P. M., the meeting on ministry and oversight was held, and a minute from one of the subordinate meetings read, concerning strangers being allowed to attend. Considerable discussion took place on this subject, at advice was given in a loving Christian spirit, to the need of fostering the true babes in the budding forth of spiritual life, and against what would repress and discourage the Lord's work.

At 7 P. M., the meeting of the Peace Association began, and a report for the past year was read, and agreeably thereto it was concluded to ask the Yearly Meeting to appropriate $100 towards the expenses for the current year. A Friend from South Carolina gave an interesting and encouraging account of the progress of peace principles amongst the public in South Carolina, as well as their leaning towards the principles of the Gospel professed by Friends.

Fifth-day, 8th mo. 17th. The meeting for Discipline assembled at 10 A. M., and in the forenoon before entering into the business, were favored with spiritual refreshment which was felt to be a good beginning. Most of the Representatives answered to their names when called. Minutes were read for several months in attendance from other Yearly Meetings, who were welcomed. The London Yearly Meeting's Epistle was read, and after some remarks thereon 3000 copies were ordered to be printed and circulated. Epistles from London, Dublin, Canada, New England and Kansas Yearly Meetings were read, and a committee was appointed to prepare epistles to all the Yearly Meetings with whom we correspond. The Devotional Meeting, so-called, began two hours later, and was small. After reading a chapter in the Bible and some explanation thereof, a hymn was sung by one of the Friends attending the meeting, in which he was joined by several in the congregation. Later on, a young Friend in the station of minister called for attention to the stanza,

'E'er since by faith I saw the stream
Thy flowing wounds supply,
Redeeming love has been my theme,
And shall be till I die.'

He queried whether every one who joined in singing it could truthfully say so? Another member informed strangers present, that congregational singing was contrary to the rules of the Society of Friends of North Carolina; and that these meetings, called Devotional, were appointed for the performance of true worship in spirit and in truth, and unless individuals felt they were required by the Presence of all rightly gathered assemblies for true worship, the Lord Jesus Christ, to each, pray, expound or sing, it was a grave responsibility to do so. If felt to be a duty, there was freedom.

At 3 P. M. meeting for worship was held, and at 4 P. M., that on Indian affairs. Reports were read of the work done amongst the band of East Cherokee Indians, numbering about 100, under our care and Western Yearly Meeting. Five schools have been in operation amongst them during part of the year; money received for interest on funds belonging to them, was accounted for; vigilance and wisdom is required in the effort to do them good, and it is no light weight for Friends, on whom the responsibility rests, to carry.

8th mo. 18th. Adjourned meeting for Discipline met at 10 A. M., Nereus Meddenhall reported that the Representatives had met and were united in proposing the names of Sam Cox for Clerk, and L. L. Hobbs and N. Parker for Assistants, to which the meeting agreed. Reports were read from the Peace Association and on Indian affairs. The meeting agreed to contribute $100 for the peace cause—much of interest was communicated on both these subjects. The dividing shutters between the men and women Friends being raised, a joint conference was held to consider a proposal to give up the present meeting-house and near school premises, to be fitted for educational purposes in advance of the present, involving a change in the place for holding future Yearly Meetings, and the building of a new house. The meeting was united in accepting the proposal, with a slight modification so as to give more freedom in selecting a new site to the committee appointed; a man and woman Friend from each of the Quarters being named to undertake this important work, and they were advised to seek best help and direction in the location, and to proceed with diligence, as the conditions of the very kind and liberal offers of help for the alteration and partial endowment of the present meeting-house premises require to have a new meeting-house built before progress can be made in the re-arrangement of the old one. It is not necessary to have a very expensive house, but neat and accommodating; and that improvement shall be made in the acoustical construction, so as that speakers can be easily heard.

The shutters having been lowered, minutes of the Representative Meeting were read; not much progress in building new meeting houses had been made during the year. Mention was made of some property at Charleston, S. C., now under care of Friends in Philadelphia, and as North and South Carolina were included under the name of the Carolinas when this property was acquired, the meeting was of the opinion that the property, and all funds derived therefrom, should be administered under care and direction of North Carolina Yearly Meeting, and a few Friends were named to attend thereto, and report next year.

At 4 P. M., meeting on First-day schools,—these appear to have been well sustained during the year,—reports sent up were not as full as desirable.

8th mo. 19th. Meeting of ministry and oversight met at 9 A. M. The answers to the queries were read and considered.

"The meeting for Discipline again assembled. The answers to the queries were read; excellent council on the attendance of meetings for worship and other important duties, was given—many of our own members taking part. The statistical returns showed a membership of nearly 5,500, an increase above last year of nearly 500, but the difference may be accounted for by more accurate returns this year. Books for the purpose of having a correct record of births, deaths, and removals, are to be provided, and old records to be collected and lodged in the new safe at Yearly Meeting-house. Concern was felt on the report this year showing a larger number of members who use and grow tobacco, and Friends were earnestly and lovingly invited to give up its growth and use in every way. One of the answers to the queries having returned 22 exceptions, it was explained as consequent on newly admitted members; and we were told it was desirable to receive fresh accessions, and then work to reform and teach them; and the apostle Paul was quoted, 'Let him that stole, steal no more,' &c., as applicable. This certainly is a departure from the practice of our forefathers, who were careful before receiving applicants into membership, to ascertain whether they were truly convinced of our principles, otherwise how can they do us any good? or walk in communion with us unless we are agreed? Numbers do not necessarily add to our strength.

"At 4 P. M., the meeting on education was held, and much encouragement given to the workers in this department of the Lord's vineyard, to find out and help to develop the powers and talent which He has given; training efficiently for life's work, and for eternity, the hand, the head and the heart, all brought under discipline for the good of man and the glory of God—a noble work; and as the teacher individually seeks to be taught by Him 'who teaches as man never taught,' and 'requires truth in the inward parts,' so will they be enabled to explain the truths of Holy Scripture, which are 'able to make wise unto salvation, through faith which is in our Lord Jesus Christ.'

"8th mo. 21st and 22nd. The remaining business of the Yearly Meeting* was transacted; essays of epistles prepared by the committee appointed were read and passed; Friends were favored to conclude the meeting in love and mutual forbearance, agreeing to meet again next year in 8th month, if the Lord will; time and place to be fixed by 4th mo. next, and notice given.

"It was felt as cause for regret that a Friend not young in years, and in high standing in another Yearly Meeting, should have spoken slightly of the use of the plain language now-a-days, as if what our forefathers so suffered for is of little account with us, or as if God had changed, or truth become less strict; no doubt it is more agreeable to the fleshly part that wants an easier way.

"Friends who came from Tennessee this year found it much easier and cheaper to reach New Garden, as the railroad through the mountains from Tennessee to North Carolina, by way of Warm Springs, Ashville and Salisbury, to Greensboro', was completed. Travelling from Tennessee is as cheap now as from Eastern Quarter of North Carolina."

SUMMARY OF EVENTS.

UNITED STATES.—The report of the Department of Agriculture for the Ninth month says, regarding the wheat crop: "The general condition of winter and spring wheat, when harvested, is represented by 100, an average rarely attained. * * * The aggregate of winter wheat, as indicated by the returns, is about three hundred and eighty million bushels, spring wheat about one hundred and forty millions, or five hundred and twenty millions in all."

At the meeting of iron finishers held recently in Pittsburg, 200 delegates, representing 35 mills and 5000 men, being present, it was decided that "the time had arrived to terminate the strike."

In Chicago and some other large cities mills have resumed work, while the men of Pittsburg are idle. The workmen in the latter city, it is said, have lost so far this season, wages amounting to over two million dollars by the strike.

On the 13th inst., three of the crew of the steamer Jeannette, lost in the Arctic regions, arrived in New York, viz: Chief Engineer Melville, and Noros and Ninderman, seamen. The Jeannette left San Francisco about four years ago, on a voyage of exploration, under Capt. De Long, and was broken to pieces in the ice, north of Siberia; after which the crew in different parties endeavored to find their way to the abodes of civilized men. The parties under Capt. De Long and Chipp perished in the attempt, while that under Melville, after traversing trackless fields of ice and snow, reached the coast near the mouth of the Lena River. The U. S. Government, in view of the long absence of the Jeannette, had sent a vessel in search of her, under Lient. Berry, which was also lost. Berry and the party under Melville met on the shores of Siberia, and the latter retraced a journey of some hundred miles in search of De Long and his crew. They were successful in finding the remains of this party, and the records of their expedition, the latter of which they brought away, and have been carefully preserved by Melville to be forwarded to Washington.

In the Criminal Court at Washington, on the 15th inst., the verdict in the cases of Rerdell and Miner, the alleged Star Route conspirators, was set aside by Judge Wylie, and they were granted a new trial. They were then released in $10,000 bail each. The first Second-day in 12th mo. was fixed for the new trial of the cases.

William Dickson, the foreman of the jury in the late trial of the Star Route conspirators, has addressed a letter to Benjamin H. Brewster, Attorney General of the United States, stating that he had been approached by Henry A. Bowen, an officer in the Department of Justice, with an offer of a bribe to influence his judgment in the case. It is said another juror was also approached with similar intent. Brady and Dorsey are the two defendants whose conviction was sought by these attempts.

During the week ending on the 16th inst., 232 new cases of yellow fever occurred at Brownsville, Texas, and 6 deaths, making the total number of 1793 cases and 95 deaths. At Matamoros, and on the Mexican side of the river, the disease appears to be spreading.

On the 14th inst., the steamer Asia foundered on Lake Huron during a violent storm. She belonged to the Great Northern Transit Company, and had left Collingwood, Ont., the previous evening, for French River and Saint Ste Marie, laden with about 100 passengers and freight. But few of the passengers it is feared have escaped.

Markets, &c.—U. S. 3½'s, 101½; 4½'s, 113½; 4's, registered, 119½; 4's, coupon, 120½; currency 6's, 132.

Cotton.—Sales of middlings are reported at 13 to 13½ cts. per lb. for uplands and New Orleans.

Flour is inactive and weak. Sales of 2000 barrels, including Minnesota extras, at $6.75 a $7 for clear, and at $7 a $7.25 for straight; Penna. extra family at $4.87½ a $5.25; western do. do. at $5.50 a $6, and patents at $6.50 a $8.50. Rye flour is firm at $4 a $4.25 for Pennsylvania.

Grain.—Wheat is in fair demand and steady. Sales of 8000 bushels red in ear lots at $1.02 a $1.12. At the open board, 15,000 bushels 10th mo. sold at $1.03½, and 30,000 bushels 12th mo. at $1.10½ a $1.10¾; $1.08½ was bid for 9th mo.; $1.09¾ for 11th mo. Rye.—Nothing doing. Corn is in moderate request and unchanged. Sales of 10,000 bushels, in ear lots at 74 a 80 cts., as to quality. At the open board, 73 cts. was bid for 9th mo., 74 cts. for 10th mo., 70 cts. for 11th mo., and 60 cts. for 12th mo. Oats are quiet but firmer. Sales of 9000 bushels, including white, at 40 a 51 cts., and rejected and mixed at 25 a 38 cts. At the open board 45½ cts. was bid for 9th mo., 44½ cts. for 10th and 11th mo., and 44½ cts. for 12th mo.

Beef cattle were in fair demand this week and extra stock higher; other grades were unsettled and rather lower: 4500 head arrived and sold at the different yards at 4 a 7½ cts. per pound, as to condition.

Sheep were in fair demand, and better grades were a fraction higher: 11,000 head arrived and sold at 3 a 5½ cts., and lambs at 6 a 7½ cts. per lb., as to quality.

Hogs were active and firm: 3500 head sold at the different yards at 11 a 12½ cts. per lb., as to condition.

FOREIGN.—On the 12th inst., the British army in Egypt began a movement from Kassassin towards Tel-el-Kebir, where Arabi Pasha's troops were encamped, and during the night advanced to such a position as to attack them before day break. The force under Arabi is reported to have been 20,000 to 30,000 regulars troops and 6000 to 7000 Bedonins and other irregulars. The English army is stated to have been 13,000 in all. At 9 o'clock the battle was practically over, and the Egyptians flying in confusion, having suffered great loss. Cairo was afterwards occupied by the English. All persons of rank who were concerned in the rebellion, have made submission.

Despatches from General Wolseley on the 15th state, Arabi Pasha and Toulba Pasha have surrendered unconditionally. Ten thousand troops at Cairo have laid down their arms. The Prefect of Police has undertaken to maintain order. The war is over.

Arabi Pasha and Toulba Pasha have been arrested by the Egyptian police at Cairo, it is reported, for having incited the populace to incendiarism and plunder. Ali Roubi Pasha has been handed over by the Egyptian authorities to General Wood as a prisoner of war.

Arabi Pasha was handed over to the English on their arrival at Cairo.

It is stated that a regular constituted Court will be established for the public trial of the rebel chiefs, who will be allowed to engage counsel.

With the exception of a few leaders and one or two persons accused of crimes, no rebels were made prisoners by General Lowe, at Cairo, who merely required them to surrender their arms. Many who have been prominent in the rebellion were told, much to their surprise, that they were free.

A despatch from Cairo to Reuter's Telegram Company says: "The news from the interior is favorable. It is believed that all the towns will tender allegiance to the Khedive."

A despatch from Alexandria on the 17th says: The following decree was proposed at the Council of Ministers to-day, and has been signed by the Khedive:

Article 1. The Egyptian army is dissolved.

Article 2. Officers guilty of rebellion will be prosecuted and punished according to military law.

The commanders at Rosetta and Aboukir having offered to surrender to the Khedive, he replied that they must march to Kafr-el-Dwar and surrender to the English.

It is announced from Dublin that Parnell, Davitt, Dillon and Brennan have decided to hold a conference in the autumn, in order to inaugurate a national movement in which the various movements will be consolidated upon a platform of national self-government, the abolition of landlordism, the promotion of home industries, the rights of laborers and a paid representation in Parliament.

The committee appointed by the Dublin police have prepared a document setting forth their grievances. The authorities expected from the police that they would omit references to the discipline, the rigor of which, however, is the chief matter of which the police complain.

President Gonzales read his message to the Mexican Congress on the 16th. It refers with satisfaction to the general progress of the Republic; it speaks approvingly of the agreement with Guatemala and the establishment of diplomatic relations with Chili, and declares that "The Government of the United States, a country with which we are in connection by other interests in addition to those of proximity, has given and received from us proofs of the sincerest friendship." It states that the revenue for the last fiscal year was thirty million dollars, while from 1867 to 1877 it averaged only sixteen million dollars. The import duties during the last fiscal year produced more than that amount. It concludes by referring to the railroads, and saying, "If the country continues to progress as at present, the coming generation will doubtless celebrate the Centennial of Independence in 1921, with the same just pride as did the Americans in 1876."

WESTTOWN BOARDING SCHOOL.

The Committee who have charge of this institution, meet in Philadelphia on Sixth-day, 9th month 29th, at 11 A. M.

The Committee on Admissions and the Committee on Instruction meet on the same day, at 9 A. M.

The Visiting Committee meet at the school on Second-day evening, 9th mo. 25th. For the accommodation of this committee, conveyances will be in waiting at Street Road Station on the arrival of trains which leave Philadelphia at 2.40 and 4.55 P. M.

WM. EVANS, Clerk.

WANTED,

A woman Friend, as teacher in the Boarding School for Indian children, at Tunesassa; also one to assist the matron in care of the household. Apply to

Jos. S. Elkinton, 325 Pine street, Philada.,

John Sharpless, Chester, Delaware Co., Pa.,

Ephraim Smith, 1110 Pine street, Philada.

WANTED,

Teachers and assistant teachers for the Evening Schools for Adult Colored Persons, men's and women's departments. Apply to Ephraim Smith, 1110 Pine St., Philadelphia.

Thomas Elkinton, 400 S. Ninth St., "

Thomas Woolman, 858 Marshall St., "

Finley Hutton, 400 Chestnut St., "

FRIENDS' ASYLUM FOR THE INSANE,
Near Frankford, (Twenty third Ward,) Philadelphia.
Physician and Superintendent—JOHN C. HALL, M.D.
Applications for the Admission of Patients may be made to the Superintendent, or to any of the Board of Managers.

RECEIPTS.

Received from Josiah W. Cloud, N. J., $2.10, vol. 56; from Jesse D. Hockett, N. C., $2.10, vol. 56; from Ashton Richardson, Del., $2.10, vol. 56; from Pearl Hall, Io., $2.10, vol. 56, and for Nathan Satterthwaite, James Frame, and Esther Fogg, $2.10 each, vol. 56; from Benjamin Ellyson, Io., $2.10, vol. 56; from Rebecca Hibberd, Pa., $2.10, vol. 56; from Jane Pickering, N. J., $2.10, vol. 56; from William Tatum, N. J., $2.10, vol. 56; from Jonathan E. Rhoads, Del., $2.10, vol. 56; from Joseph Cartland, Mass., $2.10, vol. 56; from Huldah M. Beede, R. I., $2.10, vol. 56; from Levi Varney, Canada, $2, vol. 56, and for William Branscomb and Mary E. Jones, $2 each, vol. 56; from Rebecca H. Wills, N. J., $2.10, vol. 56; from Stacy Haines, N. J., $2.10, vol. 56; from Tacy R. Satterthwaite, Pa., $2.10, vol. 56; from David Wallace, $2.10, vol. 56; from Charles Bell, N. J., $2.10, vol. 56; and for Joseph K. Lippincott, $2.10, vol. 56; from Elizabeth Allen, Gtn., $2.10, vol. 56; from Sarah Roberts, Pa., $2.10, vol. 56; from Clement Ogden, I., $2.10, vol. 56; from Dr. George Thomas, Pa., $2.10, No. 24, vol. 57, and for J. Preston Thomas, $2.10, No. 23, vol. 57, Charles T. Thomas, $2.10, vol. 56, a Jonah Ogelsby, City, $2, vol. 56; from Owen Y. Wister, Pa., $2.10, vol. 56; for Edwin Leeds, N. J., Herman H. Leeds, Pa., Barclay R. Leeds, Philada., William H. Leeds, Oregon, $2.10 each, vol. 56; from Maria Carey, O., per George Blackburn, Agent, $2, vol. 56; from Sarah Ann Leeds, Pa., $2.10, vol. 56; from Henry A. Knowles, Io., $2.10, vol. 56; from Thomas Emmons, Agent, Io., for Elwood Spence Jonathan Briggs, John Lipsey, Edward G. Vail, a Jesse R. Garwood, $2.10 each, vol. 56; from John Allen, City, $2, vol. 56, and for John C. Allen, Jr., a Samuel L. Allen, N. J., Samuel Leeds, Mich., and J. B. Broomall, Del., $2.10 each, vol. 56; from Jas. Smedley, City, $2, vol. 56, and for Deborah S. Kitchin, $2.10, vol. 56; from Pennell L. Webster, Pa., per Josiah T. Ballinger, Agent, $2.10, vol. 56; from Capt. William Reed, Mass., $2.10, vol. 56; from Parker Hall, Age O., for John W. Smith and Josiah Hall, $2.10 each, vol. 56, and for Joseph Russell, $2.10, to No. 20, vol. 56; from Mary W. Bacon, N. J., $2.10, vol. 56; from William H. Boone, Pa., $2.10, vol. 56; from Jan Forsythe, Pa., $2.10, vol. 56; from Samuel B. Smith, O., $2.10, vol. 56.

WESTTOWN BOARDING SCHOOL.

The WINTER SESSION begins on Second-day, Twelfth month 30th, 1882. Parents and others intending to send pupils, will please make early application to JONATHAN G. WILLIAMS, Supt., address Westtown P. Chester Co., Pa.; or to CHARLES J. ALLEN, Treasurer, 304 Arch St., Philadelphia. Terms, $80 per session.

THE CORPORATION OF HAVERFORD COLLEGE.

A Stated Annual Meeting of "The Corporation of Haverford College" will be held in the Committee-room of Arch Street Meeting-house, Philadelphia, on Third-day, Tenth month 10th, 1882, at 3 o'clock, P. M.

EDWARD BETTLE, Jr., Secretary

MARRIED, at Friends' Meeting, Burlington, N. on Fifth-day, Ninth month 14th, FRANCIS BART GUMMERE, Ph. D., to AMELIA SMITH, daughter of Richard F. Mott—all of Burlington.

DIED, at her residence, near Fallsington, Bucks Co. Pa., on the 24th of Eighth month, 1882, JANE LOVE in the 77th year of her age, a member of Falls Month Meeting of Friends.

—, on the 16th of 8th mo. 1882, at his residence in Baxter Springs, Kansas, in the 65th year of his age JOHN N. MILLER, a member of Coal Creek Month Meeting, Iowa. He was a man of talent and influence and an ardent lover of the ancient principles of our Society. On reviewing the many trials through which he had passed he said, I freely forgive all. His illness was short, and he was mercifully spared much suffering; yet from the first expressed that he had no prospect of recovery, and repeatedly requested those about him not to grieve. Nearly his last words were, "This is perfect rest." May the childlike tenderness of spirit that grew upon him, as the close of his life drew near, be the clothing and ornament of those who mourn his loss.

WILLIAM H. PILE, PRINTER,
No. 422 Walnut Street.

THE FRIEND.

A RELIGIOUS AND LITERARY JOURNAL.

OL. LVI.

SEVENTH-DAY, NINTH MONTH 30, 1882.

NO. 8.

PUBLISHED WEEKLY.

If paid in advance, $2.00 per annum; if not paid in advance $2.50; 10 cents extra is charged for Postage on those sent by mail.

Articles designed for insertion to be addressed to

JOSEPH WALTON,
MOORESTOWN, BURLINGTON CO., N. J.

Subscriptions, payments and business communications, received by

JOHN S. STOKES,
NO. 116 NORTH FOURTH STREET, UP STAIRS,
PHILADELPHIA.

For "The Friend."

Ancient Testimonies and Advices.

THE CARE AND TRAINING OF CHILDREN.

The following are extracts from "Annual Testimonies" issued by London Yearly Meeting of Friends, beginning with the year 1690, extending to 1725. They not only show Christian care and concern of the early members of this religious Society in relation to the time-honored and truth-honored minor testimonies (as they are called)—guarding and admonishing both parents and teachers to faithfulness in support of these lesser "tithes" as well as the more important ones "of judgment and the love of God,"—but they also show a fact, which he who runs may read, even in that once favored church, there has been a gradual apathy and lukewarmness creeping over many of its members, until we have, with these, been an almost total losing of "the ancient land-marks" in these respects, which their illustrious forefathers so earnestly suffered for, and so nobly set and maintained before the world. A portion of the language of the Spirit to the angel of one of the churches was: "Be watchful, and strengthen the things that remain, that are ready to die: for I have not found thy works perfect before God." "Thou hast a few names even in Sardis which have not defiled their garments; and they shall walk with me in white: for they are worthy."

Our early Friends claimed that they were out of conformity to the world in these things by the Spirit of Christ, our holy Law-giver. Can any one presume to hold that the inspiring Spirit of a Saviour who remains the same yesterday, to-day, and forever, would lead his spiritually minded followers directly back into them again? Or is not said lapse of time, to these, the offence of the cross has increased? and that, because less humiliating to the fleshly mind, such have yielded to conform with the current, rather than against it, withstanding the latter so marked the course of those sons of the morning whose testimonies they profess to have taken up, and whose name they bear?

Who can but see, too, how unfaithfulness in relation to the smaller tithe has led some step by step, till unfaithfulness in the greater has become painfully obvious. How true the testimonies: "He that contemneth all things shall fall by little and little."

"Whoso breaketh an hedge, a serpent shall bite him."

The extracts are these: "Dear Friends, it is our Christian and earnest advice and counsel to all Friends concerned, (so far as they are able, or may be capable) to provide school masters and mistresses, who are faithful Friends, to teach and instruct their children. And not to send them to such schools where they are taught the corrupt ways, manners, fashions, and language of the world: * * but to take care that you train up your children in the good nurture, admonition, and fear of the Lord, in that plainness and language which become truth. And parents and masters, &c., to be good examples to them, in a sober and godly conversation, and plainness of speech. And not suffer your substance to be bestowed upon your children to furnish them with such things as tend to pride, and to lift them up to vanity, or affect them with the vain fashions of the world."—1690.

"Being sensible how incident youth is to be corrupted, and how liable to corrupt and hurt one another by evil example and liberty, it is earnestly requested that all parents among Friends take all godly and Christian care in the education of their children, and be good examples to them, and not to allow them in anything that may gratify a vain mind, in immodest apparel, or foolish garbs, or other extravagancies, tending to their hurt, and reproach of our holy profession, and incurring God's displeasure and judgment, which stands against the pride of life and haughtiness; but sincerely to use their best endeavors to train them up in the nurture and admonition of the Lord, in sobriety, modesty, and plainness in apparel, language and conversation, as becometh our holy profession and Christian religion."—1692.

"This meeting, being under a deep sense that pride, and the vain customs and fashions of the world, prevail over some under our profession, particularly in the excess of apparel and furniture, doth earnestly recommend, that all, who make profession of the truth, take care to be exemplary in what they wear, and what they use; so as to avoid the vain customs of the world, and all extravagancy, in color and fashion; and keep themselves, in respect thereof, spotless and blameless; adorning their profession with all modesty and sobriety. And that all parents be watchful over their children; and careful not to suffer them to get up into pride and excess; but to keep them in that decent plainness which becomes the people of God: that the sin of the children may not lie upon their parents; nor they be exposed to ruin by their parents' neglect."—1703.

"Let not any lust after the vain fashions and glittering gayety of this fading world; for it will suddenly wither, as the mown grass before the sun. And if ye intend to be happy in this life, and that to come, thirst after righteousness, and let holiness be your habitation while on earth; so shall eternal glory be your crown hereafter."—1704.

"Forasmuch as, next to our own souls, our children are the most immediate objects of our care and concern, it is tenderly recommended to all parents or guardians of children, that they be diligently exercised in this care and concern for the education of those committed to their charge; that in their tender years they may be brought to a sense of God, his wisdom, power, and omnipresence, so as to beget an awe and fear of Him in their hearts (which is the beginning of wisdom); and as they grow up in capacity, to acquaint them with, and bring them up in the frequent reading of, the scriptures of truth; and also to instruct them in the great love of God, through Jesus Christ, and the work of salvation by Him, and of sanctification through his blessed Spirit. And also to keep them out of the vain and foolish fashions and ways of the world, and in plainness of language, habit and behavior; that being thus instructed in the way of the Lord when they are young, they may not forget it when they are old: or, however, that all concerned may be clear in the sight of God, that they have not been wanting in their duties to them. And that the labor and travail of Friends therein may be more effectual, it is our tender desire, that seasonable opportunities may be taken to wait upon the Lord, with your children, in your families, for the manifestation of his blessed power, to make them sensible of his witness and seed of life and grace in their hearts, in order to beget them into a living knowledge and love of the truth as it is in Jesus."—1706.

"And dear Friends, brethren and sisters in Christ, we desire your godly care for the due education and safety of your children within the bounds and limits of Truth in all respects, may be continued and increased among you; and that parents be exemplary to their children, in keeping out the vain fashions, customs, and pride of the world, by adorning themselves modestly and in plainness, according to the simplicity of Truth received by us in the beginning. And that you may be carefully and zealously concerned for our ancient Christian testimony against mixt marriages; that none of your children may be corrupted and alienated from Truth thereby."—1708.

"That nothing be wanting in Friends' care towards their children, let all be concerned to see that they do not only watch over them for good, but that they also rule over them in the fear of the Lord; and none, in the fondness of affection, lose the authority wherein the Lord has set them for their children's preservation. And let all be examples to them, in wisdom, moderation, and plainness, in language and habit; and not examples only, but also to restrain them from anything that might be their hurt, either inwardly or outwardly; neither providing for them costly and gaudy attire, unbecoming godliness, nor letting them have money to gratify themselves therein."—1709.

"You who are parents of children, labor fervently in spirit, with secret supplication unto the Lord, that He may give them an inheritance in the Truth, wherein they may be enabled to stand up in their generation after you to his praise and glory, rather than labor to get great inheritances for them in this world; which have proved a snare and temptation to some to shun the cross, and embrace the glory of this present world."—1725.

For "The Friend."

Robert Proud.

THE LOYALIST.

The stormy period of the Revolution brought with it many exercises and trials to the consistent members of the Society of Friends in America, and in these Robert Proud appears to have shared. Their views and feelings are clearly set forth by the late Nathan Kite in the first of an admirable series of articles headed "Thomas Scattergood and his Times," which were commenced in the 10th mo. of 1847. He says:—

"The members of the Society of Friends had generally been opposed to the usurpation of the British Parliament in its far-famed Stamp Act, and duty on tea; and prominent men amongst them in Philadelphia had been the most earnest, faithful and efficient protesters and petitioners against these measures of the ministry which finally involved England and America in war. They would not silently submit to the infringement of their rights as citizens, performed under order of priest, magistrate, or by authority of an act of parliament. But their voice went forth clothed with argument, with demonstration of right, not with threats of revenge. When called on to join in plans of opposition to the mother country, which tended to warlike measures, and which pointed towards a termination of blood, they drew back. It was not at the whispers of fear,—it was at the prompting of principle. . . . They knew that all wars were done away to those who were fully come under the government of Christ Jesus, the Prince of Peace, and therefore, like the early Christians, they could not fight. Yet like them they were prepared to show by the patient endurance of suffering, that the weakness of fear was no principle in their actions.

"Soon came the determination to throw off allegiance to the king. The true Quaker could unite in neither the one nor the other. He did not understand the nature of that allegiance to king or to commonwealth, which was abrogated by every act of oppression, by every royal or ministerial mistake, by every legal outrage or usurpation of right."

The duty of loyal submission to the government under which we are placed is clearly laid down in the Scriptures, and has ever been acknowledged by the Society of Friends. The adherence of our members to this principle subjected them to much suffering at the period of the Revolution. Not only were they compelled by their conscientious convictions to refrain from all participation in warlike measures, but they were also restrained from transferring their allegiance to the revolutionary governments, or doing any voluntary act inconsistent with their continued fidelity to the authority of the British crown. This naturally exposed them to much odium and misrepresentation at that stormy period. The records of the Society show the unremitting vigilance and exertion which were then exercised by those Friends on whom the burthens of the Church rested, to prevent their members from being entangled in any of the snares laid for their feet, to expose the false charges which were constantly circulated, and to assist those who were brought under suffering for conscience sake. Fines and imprisonment were the frequent experience of the faithful in those days. From the many illustrations which exist of this watchful care, we select the following:

At a Meeting for Sufferings held 1st mo. 20th, 1776, an address to the public was adopted, pleading for the continuance of efforts to amicably settle existing disputes, and reaffirming a declaration issued in 1676, that it is not our business to be concerned in any contrivance to set up or pull down the government under which we live. It says: "May we therefore firmly unite in the abhorrence of all such writings and measures, as evidence a desire and design to break off the happy connection we have heretofore enjoyed with the kingdom of Great Britain, and our just and necessary subordination to the king."

On the 30th of 6th month, 1778, the following minute was made—

"On consideration of what is necessary to be proposed to Friends in general on the subject of the declaration of Allegiance and Abjuration required by some late laws passed by the Legislatures who now preside in Pennsylvania and New Jersey, having several times met and deliberated thereon, we have the satisfaction to find we are united in judgment, that consistent with our religious principles, we cannot comply with the requisitions of those laws, as we cannot be instrumental in setting up or pulling down of any government, but it becomes us to show forth a peaceable and meek behavior to all men, seeking their good, and to live a useful, sober and religious life, without joining ourselves with any parties in war, or with the spirit of strife and contention now prevailing."

The diary of Christopher Marshall, which covers the period of time we are now considering, contains many entries which show some of the sufferings to which Friends were then exposed. He was a member of a revolutionary committee in Philadelphia which assumed and exercised arbitrary power. The following items are extracted from his book.

"Jan. 30th, 1776. At this meeting complaint was made against John Drinker, latter, for refusing taking continental money, who, being sent for, acknowledged he did, and that in point of conscience he refused it; upon which he was to be censured agreeably to the resolve of Congress published [Jan. 11th, 1776] but to be referred for one week, in order for him to consider well of it." Congress had ordained that persons refusing to receive Continental Bills of Credit should be published and treated as enemies of the country, and be precluded from all trade or intercourse with the inhabitants of the Colonies.

"Order of Council of Safety of Oct. 31st, 1776. John Baldwin, for refusing to receive Bills of Credit in payment, was declared an enemy to his country, and precluded from all trade and intercourse with the inhabitants of these States." "Resolved that the said John Baldwin be committed to jail, there to remain without bail or mainprise until he shall be released by order of this council, or some other person lawfully authorized so to do." P.

An epistle from the Meeting for Sufferings in Philadelphia to that in London, dated mo. 26th, 1778, says, "In the country of which the governments lately set up instead of our late excellent constitution exercise power, great finings, imprisonments and various other distresses, have been inflicted upon many, who cannot for conscience sake join their measures." A summary of these finings in the limits of Philadelphia Yearly Meeting drawn up about the close of the war, shows a total of more than £35,000.

In the MSS. of R. Proud, I find the following evidence of an attempt to impress upon his fellow-citizens the blessings of peace.

THE CONTRAST, &c.

The following Contrast, being written R. P., anno 1775, at the Beginning of Revolt of this Country from its Connection with Gr. Brit. was refused a place in Public News Paper, the Printer not daring to insert the same, in that Time of much boasted Liberty, &c.

"Pace nihil melius, nil pace salubrius orbi
Terrarum dominus, qui regit astra dedit,
Pace suas mercator opes, sua rura colonus
Possidet; absque metu carpit and hostis iter
Sabino

No greater Bliss doth God on Men bestow,
Than sacred Peace; from which all Blessings flow
In Peace the City reaps the Merchant's Gains;
In Peace flows Plenty from the rural Plains;
In Peace, thro' foreign Lands, the stranger may Fearless and safely travel on his way.

No greater Curse invades the World below,
Than Civil War, the Source of ev'ry Woe;
In War, the City wastes, in dire Distress;
In War, the rural Plain's a Wilderness;
In War, the Road, the City, and the Plain
Are Scenes of Woes, of Blood, and dying Men!

—"Nulla Salus bello." Virg.

In a somewhat similar paraphrase of a Latin poet, Claudianus, written 9th mo. 30th, 1776, R. Proud laments over "the violation of the Government and Civil Order, by an unwarrantable usurpation," &c.; and he refers to Milton who represents, in his Paradise Lost, the devils as "the first violators of order; i. e. Rebels," &c.

About the commencement of the war, entered into mercantile business in connection with his younger brother, John Proud. The success of the Revolution was unfavorable to his business prospects, and his commercial affairs went to ruin. John returned to England, and Robert resumed his school. Allusion to his losses is found in a poem, entitled "An Elegy," written on the 25th of 12th mo. 1782, which may be quoted as a specimen of his versification, and as showing the loyalty of his sentiment. In it, he represents his native country, Natale solum, as inviting him to return to its bosom.

"1. Distant from thy Country far,
On the Banks of Delawar,
Thou dost mourn;
Compass'd round by Rebel Foes,
Worn with Grief, and pressed by Woes,
Oh! Return!

2. Thee, thy native Soil again,
Welcomes from beyond the Main;
Come and see,
Once again before thy Death,
What thy native Country bath,
Good for thee.

3. Long, too long, in Troubles tost,
From thy Fr'ds, and Kindred lost;
Far from Home;
To relieve thy Grievs and Woes,
All thy Sorrows to compose,
Hither come.

4. In the Confines of these Bowers,
Pass thy yet remaining Hours,
Thou mayest have,
Here, at last, upon this Shore,
Where no Ill shall reach thee more
A peaceful Grave.

5. Peace and Plenty, yet a while,
Thou mayst have upon this Isle,
If thou flee
From the Idol of the Crowd,
And where Noise and Strife are loud, Seldom be.

6. If thy Intimates be few,
A few chosen Fr'ds will do,
Thou, with these,
Far from Rage, Revenge and Strife,
Mayst enjoy that Bliss of Life
Which will please.

7. Long enough, and Ah! too long;
Troubles thou hast been among!
From the Bad,
Of the Wages which are due
Only to a Rebel Crew,
Thou hast had!

8. Now thy former Fr'ds are gone,
Thou art valued there by None;
Robb'd of all*
By the infernal Powers assign'd,
There to punish human Kind!
Thee I call.

9. What hast thou to do with those,
Who embrace Rebellion's Cause?
Come away;
There to live is Death to thee;
Worse than their's thy Lot shall be,
If thou stay.

From the faithful and the true,
Separation why dost thou Longer try?
Here on Earth, while Pow'r is giv'n,
In an order nearer Heav'n
Live and die."

To this appeal, the poet prudently objects, owing to his long absence he was now gotten and unknown in his native country.
J. W.

(To be concluded.)

It is more to meet with one little touch of ever, to help a man against his corruption the deceit of his heart, than to meet with great descending of Power upon a man's it, to wrap him up into high enjoyments, to enable him to speak great things of the studies of God's kingdom; for it changes heart more, it helps him on his journey re, it prepares his spirit more for the Lord;
adds to his growth more than the other;
the other will hurt him, unless his spirit poised by the Lord, and made able to bear
But the still working of the power, which retly melteth and changeth the mind, reveing it (as it were insensibly) daily more more into the image, that is the safe, reious and profitable ministration of life."

Penington's Letters.

Up and down where I have been, sickness, liction, and trouble seem to have been the ans of spiritual instruction, by loosening strong bond of natural attachment to thy things.—Mary Capper.

"By Means of what was called the Revolution re, the Author was unjustly deprived of all his ldly Property; or had it thereby rendered entirely less to him!"

For "The Friend."

Westtown Boarding School.

In a former number, mention was made of the orchard north of the girls' grounds having been planted in 1838. This appears to be an error, that orchard having been planted previously, believed to have been under the superintendency of Philip Price, probably about 1825. Some apples were observed on one or more trees yet standing in it a few days since. The one planted in 1838, under Nathan Sharpless' superintendency, is on the west side of the road leading past the girls' grounds south, and towards West Chester on the north. It originally consisted of 180 trees, 172 are still standing, and about 160 more or less healthy and bearing fruit. The new one adjoining on the south, was planted whilst Aaron Sharpless was superintendent, probably about ten years since, and makes the fourth orchard of apple trees planted since the establishment of the school. The original one stood on the north side of the lane leading east from the school, bore apples as late as 1843, and totally disappeared about 1868.

From the report made to the Yearly Meeting in 1844, we learn that the average number of scholars during the year was 95 boys and 88 girls; and that two deaths among the pupils had occurred during the year. The committee were not exempt from trials and exercises at this period, as will appear from the following minute: "In their oversight of the school however, the past year, the committee have been brought under much exercise on account of the frequent disuse of the plain language among the scholars; repeated efforts were made to convince them of the impropriety of their departure, and to induce them to use the singular pronoun in speaking to one another; which the committee hope they have been to a good degree successful in accomplishing. The gradual and increasing evasions of plainness in dress which have appeared, have also been a subject of much anxiety; particularly in the color of the garments worn by some of the children, and in the cut and form of the coats and vests of the boys. We apprehend that unless parents and others who have the care of providing the clothing, are more vigilant and firm under a sense of religious duty in restraining them in these respects, that the Institution will be in danger of losing the appearance of a Friends' school, and great disadvantage will accrue to the minds of tender children, as well as a door be opened for increasing weakness in regard to the support of our testimony to simplicity of dress and manners. We would suggest whether it would not be proper to remind parents afresh, that the Yearly Meeting expects all the children to keep to our ancient and scriptural practice of using thou and thee in addressing a single person; that no coats or vests will be permitted to be worn at the school which are not plain in color and form; and when any of objectionable shape are sent there, they will be altered, as well as any other garments that are not conformable to plainness; also that the introduction of unsuitable or gay colored clothing be altogether disallowed."

"6th mo. 14th. It being represented that the school building is imperfectly warmed and lighted during winter, Thomas Kimber, Samuel B. Morris, Solomon Lukens and Jos.
Snowdon were appointed to have such improvements made in these respects as may,

on careful examination, appear necessary."

The care of the committee to avoid the needless expenditure of money, is manifest from the following minute: "By a minute from the committee on instruction it appears to be their judgment that with the present number of scholars, the services of one teacher in the boys' school could be dispensed with, which being concurred with, the subject is referred to the committee with authority to carry out this arrangement, and, in conjunction with the superintendent, to make such further reduction in the expenses of conducting the institution as its reduced resources may seem to require, and as they think can be adopted without disadvantage."

At a meeting of the committee, 10th mo.
4th, 1844, an extract from the will of Jno.
Paul was read, which directed that after the decease of his wife, Hannah Paul, the sum of $1000 should be paid by his executors to Thos. Evans and Thos. Kimber, in trust, "the interest or income thereof to be appropriated to supplying such children as may be admitted to partake of the funds for schooling those not in circumstances to pay for their education * * with suitable books, stationery or other necessities not furnished by the institution, at the discretion of the committee, to enable such pupils to prosecute their studies without being a burden to their friends, or a charge to the institution." This legacy has been very useful. The committee on warming and lighting, "proposed the use of gas as a safe and efficient means of lighting the building; and reported the result of some inquiries in relation to the best apparatus and materials for producing it." They were continued to give further attention to the subject.

The Father of a Thousand Children.—An old man has just died in Vienna whose name deserves to be chronicled in all land for the singular goodness of his life. Ferdinand Reidt has been known in his own city as the "Father of the Orphans" for nearly half a century.
He was a man of considerable means, and was happily married, but it was a great grief to him and his wife that they continued to be childless. Herr Reidt said to his wife: "Since we are not to have children of our own, can we not be parents to some of those who are fatherless and motherless?" He was a man of action, and began at once to carry his conception into practice. He commenced with taking fatherly charge of two or three orphans, but his zeal and repute increased to such an extent that, at the time of his death, he was the legal guardian of more than a thousand fatherless children. Those whom he adopted in this manner were not fitfully taken up and then let drop, but he kept conscientious watch and ward over them, from their early education until their marriage, or their start in adult life at the close of their apprenticeship. He never sought fame or publicity, and took no credit to himself for his devotion to those who had no natural claim upon him. Now that he is departed however, every one speaks of his singular life, its quietness, and yet restless energy, its conscientiousness and severe fidelity to his self-imposed obligations. He began by asking as a favor to be accepted as the "honorary guardian" of two or three orphans, and the calling,
which he had thus taken up for his own satisfaction, as he put it, was in time regarded by many of his fellow-citizens as a sort of official occupation which he was bound to fulfil.—London Globe.

George Washington's Slaves.

By a clause in his will, Washington provided for his slaves. I give it here entire, because it is a remarkable example of his thoughtful care for the comfort of others. The will is in the handwriting of the General, and is dated July 9, 1799—only a few months before his death. The following is the clause referred to:

"Item.—Upon the decease of my wife, it is my will and desire that all the slaves whom I hold in my own right, shall receive their freedom. To emancipate them during her life would, though earnestly wished by me, be attended with such insuperable difficulties on account of their intermixture by marriage with the dower negroes, as to excite the most painful sensations, if not disagreeable consequences to the latter, while both descriptions are in the occupancy of the same proprietor; it not being in my power, under the tenure by which the dower negroes are held, to manumit them. And whereas, among those who will receive freedom according to this desire there may be some, who, from old age or bodily infirmities, and others, who, on account of their infancy, will be unable to support themselves, it is my will and desire, that all who come under the first and second description, shall be comfortably clothed and fed by my heirs while they live; and that such of the latter description as have no parents living, or, if living, are unable or unwilling to provide for them, shall be bound by the Court until they shall arrive at the age of twenty-five years; and in cases where no record can be produced, whereby their ages can be ascertained, the judgment of the Court, upon its own view of the subject, shall be adequate and final. The negroes thus bound are (by their masters or mistresses) to be taught to read and write, and to be brought up to some useful occupation, agreeably to the laws of the Commonwealth of Virginia, providing for the support of orphan or other poor children. And I do hereby expressly forbid the sale or transportation out of the said commonwealth, of any slave I may die possessed of, under any pretence whatsoever. And I do, moreover and most pointedly and most solemnly enjoin it upon any executors hereafter named, or the survivors of them, to see that this clause, respecting slaves, and every part thereof, be religiously fulfilled at the epoch at which it is directed to take place without evasion, neglect, or delay, after the crops which may then be on the ground are harvested, particularly as it respects the aged and infirm; seeing that a regular and permanent fund be established for their support, as long as there are subjects requiring it; not trusting to the uncertain provision to be made to individuals. And to my mulatto man, William, calling himself William Lee, I give immediate freedom, or, if he should prefer it (on account of the accidents which have befallen him, and which have rendered him incapable of walking, or of any active employment) to remain in the situation he now is, it shall be optional in him to do so; in either case, however, I allow him an annuity of thirty dollars during his natural life, which shall be independent of the victuals and clothes he has been accustomed to receive, if he chooses the last alternative; but in full with his freedom, if he prefers the first, and this I give him as a testimony of my sense of his attachment to me, and for his faithful services during the Revolutionary War."—B. J. Lossing in S. S. Times.

LINES ON A SKELETON.

Selected.

[Sixty years ago, the London Morning Chronicle published a poem entitled, "Lines on a Skeleton," which excited much attention. Every effort, even to the offering of fifty guineas, was vainly made to discover the author. All that ever transpired was that the poem, in a fair, clerical hand, was found near a skeleton of remarkable beauty of form and color, in the museum of the Royal College of Surgeons, Lincoln's Inn, London, and that the curator of the museum had sent them to the editor and proprietor of the Morning Chronicle.]

Behold this ruin! 'Twas a skull
Once of ethereal spirit full;
This narrow cell was Life's retreat,
This space was Thought's mysterious seat.
What beauteous visions filled the spot,
What dreams of pleasure long forgot?
Nor hope nor pleasure, joy nor fear,
Has left one trace of record here.

Beneath this mouldering canopy
Once shone the bright and busy eye;
But start not at the dismal void,
If social love that eye employed,
If with no lawless fire it gleamed,
But through the dews of kindness beamed,
That eye shall be forever bright
When stars and suns are sunk in night.

Within this hollow cavern hung
The ready, swift, and tuneful tongue;
If falsehood's honey it disdained,
And, where it could not praise, was chained;
If bold in virtue's cause it spoke,
Yet gentle concord never broke,
This silent tongue shall plead for thee
When time unveils eternity.

Say, did these fingers delve the mine?
Or with its envied rubies shine?
To hew the rock, or wear the gem,
Can little now avail to them.
But, if the path of truth they sought,
Or comfort to the mourner brought,
These hands a richer meed shall claim
Than all that wait on Wealth and Fame.

Avails it, whether bare or shod,
These feet the path of duty trod.
If from the bowers of Ease they fled,
To seek affliction's humble bed;
If Grandeur's guilty bribe they spurned,
And home to Virtue's cot returned,
These feet with angels' wings shall vie,
And tread the palace of the sky.

Selected.

THE NIGHT-BLOOMING CEREUS.

BY MARY D. JAMES.

Oh, beautiful Cereus,
How welcome thy bloom—
Thy grand coronation—
How rich in perfume!
How wondrously charming—
So queenly, so chaste!
We mourn thy sweet flowers
Should fade in such haste.

Beholding with rapture
The exquisite sight,
We wonder thy glories
Are kept for the night.
In darkness to lavish
Their beautiful bloom,
And give their rich odors
To midnight's deep gloom!

Some sister plants close up
Their petals at night,
And open them only
To greet morning light.
Thy charms are unfolded
When nature's asleep;
As angels night-vigils
So lovingly keep.

So Faith comes in darkness,
And blooms in the night;
To soothe in affliction,
In danger, in blight.
When sources of comfort
All fail and depart,
Faith brings sweetest solace
To cheer the sad heart.

And night-blooming flowers
Bring lessons of Love,
As messages coming
From regions above.
We too have a mission—
In darkness and grief,
To bring the afflicted
And suffering relief.

To be to the feeble,
The sinful, the poor,
Sweet love-plants, all blooming
With charms that endure.
To shed on the lowly
In earth's deepest gloom,
The fragrance of kindness;—
Most blessed perfume!

The way of salvation
To show to the lost,
Which Jesus provided
At infinite cost;
To help struggling spirits
To gain heaven's bliss;
What service so hallowed,
So Christ-like as this!

—S. S. Times.

For "The Friend"

Our Yearly Meeting now having a large committee to attend the subordinate meetings, it was thought that it may be appropriate to publish in "The Friend" the following letter from Dr. John Fothergill, copied from vol. 9th of "Friends' Library," page 2:

In the year 1776, Dr. John Fothergill was nominated one of a committee appointed at the Yearly Meeting, to make a general visit to the meetings throughout the nation. On this occasion he wrote the following letter "To the Friends nominated at the late Yearly Meeting, to visit the Quarterly and Monthly Meetings, &c., and to the members of our Society in general:"—

"Dear Friends,—Having been nominated on this service, I accepted of it with reluctance, from an apprehension of my unfitness as well as from the confining nature of my employment. But being desirous to acquire myself to the best of my ability, I could not avoid considering, with much and deliberate attention, the proposal made to the meeting both in respect to the manner of it, the nature of the service and its object; all of which I claim my hearty concurrence. That it arose from the simple movings of Truth, I am fully persuaded; the prevalence of a holy influence over the minds of many, when it was delivered, was generally felt and acknowledged. The nature of the service is to render us helpful one to another, in promoting the growth and prosperity of every individual in the truth, and by this means to advance the great end of true religion, the glory of Him who created us, and the comfort and happiness of all. The complaining language of many counties having deeply affected the minds of Friends, fervent desires were raised that the life of religion might be renewed in the churches.

help in the maintenance of pure, unedged piety. And it pleased Divine Providence to open the way to a fresh labor of love amongst his people, and to make many willing to engage in this service; and oh! may it be blessed, so as to make it a memorable season of Divine refreshment, from the great store of our assemblies. A desire to contribute my mite to this great and useful labor, prompts me to throw before my brethren the following reflections, hoping they will be regarded as the fruits of a mind cordially disengaged, in the first place, to build up its own churches, and in the next, to join in repairing the which the enemy has made in the walls of our Zion.

I would wish to apply to my brethren engaged in this service, and to recapitulate some of the wise, important, heavenly counsel communicated to you, during your deliberations on this subject, by many concerned brethren; that as you have given up your lives, and that with a willingness that betokens your zeal for the cause of Truth, and prosperity among the people, you will let the weight of the work take possession of your minds. Let it be your fervent prayer, that you may be made deeply sensible of its importance, as well as of the time and manner in which you are to proceed. These considerations were earnestly pressed upon you, as you keep them in humility and fear before you, way will be opened for your accomplishing the work, to the churches' benefit, your own growth and experience in righteousness and Truth. Let it be your care, in this service, to look to that Arm of power which gathered us to be a people, and has hitherto, in a good measure, preserved us one in faith and practice. Wait for a degree of wisdom which led our ancestors to establish a most wholesome discipline amongst us for our preservation; and be it your chief care, in much brotherly love, to strengthen the weak, and bring back the scattered, and set on an awful labor, to awake them to a sense of the holy principle of light, life and grace, an obedience to it, to a knowledge of its blessed effects; this is the one thing needful; oh! that they may wrestle and prevail, as Jacob did, and obtain the blessing for yourselves and for the whole heritage of God.

And you, my dear friends, who are the objects of the churches' care, and amongst whom I rank myself, surrounded with many weaknesses, much imperfection, far short of the excellency that adorned our predecessors, struggling in hope after a better life, freed from entanglements, more love to God in his truth; yield to the word of exhortation; receive this visit as a fresh renewal of love of God, and of help administered in needful time. Let us embrace the hand lent out to help us, kiss the rod we may have deserved, and give thanks to God for his mercy and loving-kindness, in thus exciting our concern in the church for the restoration of individuals. Let us prepare ourselves, in sincerity, to receive the word of exhortation in meekness and humility; so that all we be made partakers of the benefits indeed, feel our strength renewed to run with integrity the race that is set before us, be made helpful to others in their progress, and having shed our course with joy, leave a bright example to those who follow after us.

Under a sense of the great need we have been afresh roused up to diligence, I found a willingness to throw these few hints before my brethren, as a testimony of my full unity with the proposition, and my desire that it may be rendered effectual to the help of many, and the general edification of the churches.

JOHN FOTHERGILL."

The High Places in Egypt.

BY EDWARD A. VAN DYCK.

In a corner of the small open space near the Hotel d'Orient, at Cairo, Egypt, there takes place, once every lunar year, a most interesting ceremony. A number of Moslems set up a long wooden pole, around which, for three days, a large crowd of men is to be seen from about 9 o'clock in the morning till sundown, gathered in a circle, all facing toward the pole, and crying out incessantly, "Ya Allah! Ya Allah!" which means "O God! O God!" They bow, and wave their arms from down upwards and inwards toward the pole. Sometimes not more than eight or ten men are to be seen performing this ceremony: at others, the number must be at least three or four hundred.

The site where the pole is temporarily erected—for three days in succession only—is the spot where a holy man died.

This—and, indeed, any pole or mast—is called in the Arabic of to-day a Sâri, and in the high Arabic of by-gone days it is called a Sâriah,—having the feminine form ending in "h."

Pompey's Pillar, at Alexandria, is to this day called by the natives 'Aamûd es-Sawâri, that is, the "column of the poles;" or, in other words, "The pillar of all other pillars."

How often we read in the Old Testament of "cutting down the high places." In Deuteronomy, chapter 16: verse 21, we read: "Set not up for thyself an Asarah [pole] of any tree by the side of the altar of the Lord thy God that thou shalt make for thyself; and put not up for thyself an upright—the thing which the Lord thy God hateth."

The time for beginning these unceasing cries of "Ya Allah!" is about halfway between sunrise and mid-day, the so-called Daha; that is, the hour for the morning sacrifice—the hour when Abraham was about to sacrifice his son Ishmael, according to the Moslem tradition. And precisely at sunset the cries stop, to be again taken up the second and third days, as already remarked above. Thus it is that we read of the prophets of Baal who cried from morning until evening to Baal to burn the sacrifice they had prepared; and when, at sundown, they ceased, the prophet of the God of Israel laughed at them, and said, "Perhaps your God is asleep, and hears you not."

It is indeed wonderful to see how, among the masses of the people even of this Semitic race, and of the eminently monotheistic religion of Islam, this "high place" or, more properly speaking, this "pole" ceremony still holds its own through the many ages. The Koran, and its doctrine of a single, unique God, has not been able to root out the custom of worshipping around a pole, or upright beam,—a remnant of the old worship of Astarte, or Ashtaroth; and what was most emphatically forbidden in the Mosaic books (and in the verse quoted above) is to-day practised upon the banks of the Nile by a people who abhor any worship other than that of THE GOD who sent Mahommed to teach men the right way and the true worship.—S. S. Times.

Selected for "The Friend."

"1st mo. 1858.—These are days of tribulation and sorrow; yet it is a comfort to remember, that the Lord's arm is not shortened that it cannot save, neither is his ear grown heavy that it cannot hear the cries of the poor and the sighings of the needy soul. I am a little encouraged at times in the hope that the work is on the wheel. Is there not cause to hope that some things which are developing may have a tendency to raise serious reflection in the minds of some? Oh! how much there is which has a tendency to scatter and divide instead of healing and binding up! The desire of my poor feeble mind at times is, that each one may do with their might what their hands find to do, in order for the repairing of the walls which are so lamentably broken down; and as these honestly endeavor to go forth in humility and godly fear, I trust the work will prosper, though they may have, as it were, to work with one hand, while they hold a weapon of defence in the other. I trust there are in different places a tribulated, suffering remnant, who as they endeavor to keep the faith and the patience, will in the Lord's time know Him to arise for their help, remembering the encouraging language—'Fear not, little flock, it is your Father's good pleasure to give you the kingdom.'

"Desires are raised that we may not be suffered to cast away our confidence in the unfailing arm of Israel's Shepherd. I think I often see our standing to be as on a sea of glass; wherein great is the necessity of watching unto prayer. Here there is no time to be idle, lest, as formerly, while men sleep the enemy sow tares. Truly it is a day when he is very busy striving to draw the mind away from the pure and simple truth as it is in Jesus, and persuading the unwary that there is an easier way to the kingdom of heaven than by self-denial and the daily cross. Oh! may such be given to believe that the enemy of all righteousness was a liar from the beginning, and continues to be so. May these have their minds drawn to that foundation which standeth sure; against which the gates of hell shall not be able to prevail."—Hannah Gibbons.

Early Home-protection.—Bishop Bowman, in an address at a great temperance meeting during the session of the British-Wesleyan Conference, 1878, referred to an important decision by his parents, as follows:

"When I was a little boy, I slept on a truckle bed in my mother's room, and one night, when, no doubt, she thought me asleep, I heard her say, 'I am getting very uneasy about our only son carrying the liquor to the work people.' Father made answer, 'What shall we do, then?' 'Well,' said mother, 'I will make strong coffee, and supply them with it while at work, and at the close of the day give one shilling to each of the forty employed.' I carried out the coffee, and that day all hands were content, and not a bad word was used. Father gave mother permission to pull out the tap, and let the liquor run away. She quickly did so, praying all the time."—Selected.

"The heights of earthly promotion and glory lift us no whit nearer Heaven. It is easier to step there from the lowly vale of humiliation and sorrow."

"And there shall be a great cry throughout all the land of Egypt, such as there was none like it, nor shall be like it any more."—Exodus xi. 6.

This is the declaration which God, by Moses, added to the prediction of the last of the ten plagues which He sent upon Pharaoh and the land of Egypt—the prediction of death of all the first-born of the land. And when the plague came, and "the Lord had smitten all the first-born of the land, from the first-born of Pharaoh on the throne to the first-born of the captive in the dungeon, and all the first-born of cattle," then it is added, as in fulfilment of the prediction, "that there was a great cry in Egypt," such as never was heard before, and never would be heard again.

Now this, of itself, seems a very strong expression. But when we turn to Herodotus, we find he says, that the Egyptian way of mourning was this: When there was a death in any family, all the surviving members of the household, rushed out of the dwelling, as we would say, to the side-walk, and there howled and screamed out their lamentations.

Now when we bear in mind that Egypt, at that time, was the greatest kingdom on the face of the earth, and that there was a dead one in every house in the kingdom, so that the whole nation rushed forth from their dwellings to howl and scream forth their lamentations, we may well understand that there was a great cry in Egypt, such as never was heard before and never would be heard again!—Nat. Baptist.

Prince Albert and his Son.—The young Prince of Wales was standing one day in one of the long windows of the Royal Palace, studying his lesson. But his eyes wandered constantly from his book towards the lovely grounds outside, and with his fingers he was drumming on the window. His governess, the gentle and pious—Hillyard, observing his behavior, asked him kindly to study his lessons attentively. The young prince answered: "I do not want to." "I will have to place you in a corner," replied the teacher. "I will neither learn nor stand in a corner, for I am the Prince of Wales," and saying this he knocked his foot through the window pane. Leaving her seat and walking up to the Prince, she said: "You must study your lesson; or I will be obliged to put you in a corner." "I will not," he repeated, and the foot went through another pane. The lady now rung the bell, and sent for Prince Albert, requesting his Royal Highness to come immediately to the room, since she needed advice. The faithful father came, and after hearing of the disobedience of the young scholar, turning to him and pointing to a low seat, said: "Sit down there till I come back." Fetching a Bible from the adjoining apartment, and seating himself near the son, the father said: "Listen now what Paul says to you and other children of your rank." Then he read Gal. iv. 1, 2: "Now I say, that the heir, so long as he is a child, differeth nothing from a servant, though he be lord of all; but is under tutors and governors until the time appointed of the father." Then he added: "It is true, you are the Prince of Wales, and if you conduct yourself properly you may become a great man; yes, you may become King of England after the death of your beloved mother (whom may God long preserve to us). But now you are a little boy under governors and tutors whom you must obey. And again, Solomon says, Prov. xiii. 24: "He that loveth his rod hateth his son; but he that loveth him chasteneth him betimes." Thereupon, the father took the rod, and punished the heir-apparent of the mightiest kingdom of Christendom in a manner which he felt. Then placing him in the corner, he said: "Here you will remain standing and learn your lesson until—Hillyard gives you freedom; and never forget that you are now under tutors and governors, and always under the law of God."—From the German.

For "The Friend."

Natural History, Science, &c.

Ingenuity of an Elephant.—The following account of an elephant's ingenuity in extricating himself from a quicksand was sent by the gentleman who witnessed the occurrence, and was one of the party.

"It was at the close of a 'pig-sticking' meet on a large island in the Ganges, opposite Cawnpore, in June, 1873, that an event occurred which excited my admiration. With three friends I had been riding hard all the afternoon, and, feeling very tired, we determined to go home on the elephants.

"We had travelled some way, and were nearing the river, when one of us noticed that the ground looked rather unsafe, and that the elephant seemed to become uneasy. So we all decided to dismount and walk to the river, previously instructing the mahout to take the elephant by a short circuit, so as to avoid the soft ground. The man, however, evidently considered that he knew better than we did; and we therefore went straight on, not thinking of looking round.

"We had not proceeded far when we heard the elephant trumpeting (a well-known signal of distress or danger), and on looking round saw that the poor beast was in a quicksand, and that the mahout had dismounted and was making the best of his way out of reach of the animal. I may here mention that to be on an elephant's back or within his reach under such circumstances is certain death: he is sure to take hold of a man and place him under his feet, so anxious is he to get something solid to stand upon.

"We were then about fifty yards from the river and it was rapidly getting dark. The elephant was making frantic efforts to escape out of his difficulties, and the ground heaved all around him. How to help him we did not know; for he was sinking deeper and deeper, and so near him we dared not.

"As good fortune would have it, there happened to be at hand a number of large planks which had been left by some villagers. We went as near the elephant as we dared, and threw the planks within his reach. The clever animal seized them in his trunk, drew them to him, and laid them one upon the other in front of him. When he thought that he had enough, with one gigantic effort he got his fore legs out of the quicksand, and in a short time he had managed to extricate himself, and was standing safely on the planks, though trembling all over.

"He had still some fifty yards to go before he could reach the river, and the intelligent beast never moved a step till he got a plank and placed it in front of him. He thus moved on step by step, until he reached the river. The mahout then remounted him, and he crossed the Ganges in safety. This was small relief to our feelings; for the loss of elephant would not only have been a very costly business, but the mode of his death would have been inexpressibly painful."—G. Wood—Man and Beast.

Poisonous Leaves.—Some of our most admired flowers, which we should least willingly banish from cultivation, are associated with green leaves of a very poisonous character. The narrow long leaves of the daffodil act as an irritant poison; the delicate compound leaves of laburnum have a narcotic and acrid juice which causes purging, vomiting, and has not unfrequently led to death. The narrow leaves of the meadow saffron, or Autumn crocus, give rise to the utmost irritation of the throat, thirst, dilated pupils, with vomiting and purging. The dangerous character of aconite, or monkshood leaves, is doubtless well known, but each generation of children requires instruction to avoid above all thin those large, palm-shaped leaves, dark-green on the upper surface. Leaves of coarser weave provide an abundant quota of danger, but frequently their strong scent and bitter nauseous taste give timely warning against their being consumed. Of all our British orders of plants perhaps the umbelliferous order contributes the rankest and most widespread elements of danger. The tall hemlock is everywhere known to be poisonous, and is one of the most abundant occupants of the hedge. A peculiar "mousey" odor can generally be recognized on squeezing the leaves which are deep green in color and treble compound, the small lobes being lanceolate and deeply cut. It is said that the mouse smell can be detected in water containing more than a fifty-thousandth part of the juice. Hemlock is both an irritant to a sore place and a general narcotic poison, introducing headache, imperfect vision, loss of power to swallow, and extreme drowsiness with complete paralysis of voluntary muscles and muscles of respiration. The water dropwort, too, a flourishing ditch-plant; the water hemlock, fool's parsley, must be ranked among our most dangerous poisonous plants, belonging to the umbelliferous order. The fool's parsley leaves are sometimes mistaken for genuine parsley, but their nauseous odor and darker leaves should prevent this. The nightshade order is another, with dangerous and often extremely poisonous leaves. Indeed, a nightshade can be regarded as safe; while the deadly nightshade, with its oval, uncut leaves, soft, smooth and stalked, are in the highest degree to be avoided. Henbane and thorn-apple again, with their large and much-indented leaves, are conspicuous members of the "dangerous classes." Holly leaves contain a juice which is both narcotic and acrid, causing vomiting, pain, and purging. Even elder leaves and privet leaves may produce active and injurious irritation when eaten. With regard to treatment in cases of poisoning by leaves, if no doctor is at hand, produce vomiting till all offending matter is expelled, and when considerable sleepiness or drowsiness has come on, give strong tea or coffee, and again bring on vomiting; then stimulate and rouse the brain in every possible mode.—Land and Water.

God will never compel us to become Christians, but his Spirit will make us feel that we are sinners.

List of Agents.

I append herewith a list of Agents to whom applications may be made and who are authorized to receive payment for "The Friend."

PENNSYLVANIA.

Trimble, Concordville, Delaware Co.
T. Ballinger, West Chester.
M. Harvey, West Grove, Chester Co.
George Sharpless, London Grove, Chester Co.
Amin Gilbert, Yohoghany, Westmoreland Co.

Ben Battin, Shunk P. O., Sullivan Co.

NEW JERSEY.

Stokes, Medford, Burlington Co.
Wilson, Rahway.
Carpenter, Salem.

NEW YORK.

Knowles, Smyrna, Chenango Co.
King, Aurora, Cayuga Co.
Haight, Somerset, Niagara Co.

MASSACHUSETTS.

B. Oliver, Lynn.

NORTH CAROLINA.

P. Brown, Woodland Post Office, Northampton Co.

OHIO.

George Blackburn, Salem, Columbiana Co.
Michael Williams, Flushing, Belmont Co.
Garretson, Barnesville, Belmont Co.
H. Brantingham, Winona, Columbiana Co.

R. Kite, Pennsville, Morgan Co.
Isaac Huestis, Chester Hill, Morgan Co.
Ker Hall, Harrisville, Harrison Co.
L. Kite, Damascus, Columbiana Co.

H. Blackburn, East Carmel, Columbiana Co.

S. Fowler, Bartlett, Washington Co.
Shaw, East Fairfield, Columbiana Co.

INDIANA.

Woody, Thorntown, Boone Co.
Maulsby, Danville, Hendricks Co.
Stanley, Plainfield, Hendricks Co.

IOWA.

erson Hall, West Branch, Cedar Co.
Place of Joseph Hall, Springdale, removed to Ohio.
Mas Emmons, Coal Creek, Keokuk Co.
er Eldridge, Muscatine.
nel W. Stanley, Springville, Linn Co.
ard Mott, Viola, Linn Co.

CALIFORNIA.

n Bell, San José, Santa Clara Co.

GREAT BRITAIN.

ph Armfield, South Place Hotel, Finsbury, E. C. London.

Agents and others sending the names of subscribers will please be careful to state the fact distinctly in their communications; in all cases of change of address, friends greatly oblige by giving the name of the person to which the paper has been sent, as well as that to which it is now to be forwarded.

My small experience has taught me that in this best of schools, the Divine Teacher instructs in stillness, and leads gently; and the docile learner scarcely perceives the progressive steps of attainment. The heart of offending wilfully in thought, word, or deed, predominates as a check to evil, and as an obstacle to obedience. Hold fast the knowledge of power than has received; and when thou art sensible of coming very short of the standard of Truth; in lowliness, in quietness, and in patience, wait the return of increased faith and power. There is forgiveness and mercy in Him who knoweth us altogether.—M. C.

To Young Housekeepers.—Be satisfied to commence on a small scale. It is too common for young housekeepers to begin where their mothers ended. Buy all that is necessary to work skilfully with. Adorn your house with all that will render it comfortable. Do not look at richer homes, and covet their costly furniture. If secret dissatisfaction is ready to spring up, go a step further, and visit the homes of the suffering poor; behold dark, cheerless apartments, insufficient clothing, and absence of all the comforts and refinements of social life, and then return to your own with a cheerful spirit. You will then be prepared to meet your husband with a grateful heart, and be ready to appreciate the toil of self-denial which he has endured in the business world to surround you with the delights of home; and you will co-operate cheerfully with him, in so arranging your expenses that his mind will not be constantly harassed lest his family expenditures may encroach upon public payments.—Extract.

Lieutenant Danenhower has given to a reporter of The Washington Star an account of Alexy, the hero of the Jeanette expedition, whose name was little known until found penned so often in the sad journal of Commander DeLong. During all that march to death in the Lena delta, it will be remembered, it was Alexy who went on ahead to explore the way, it was Alexy who secured for the wanderers their meagre supply of food, it was Alexy who gave his coat to save DeLong from freezing, and it was Alexy who, faithful to the end, at last succumbed and lay down to die among the latest survivors. This brave man was an Alaskan Indian from St. Michael's Norton Sound. He was finely proportioned, with small, delicate-looking hands and feet. Among the Jeanette's crew he was a general favorite on account of his polite manners and readiness to help in any work. He learned the English alphabet, became an expert at stuffing birds, and also learned to draw. He often amused the crew by illustrations of Indian war-dances. He was very fond of his family, and at times became home-sick, fearing his wife and little boy would not have sufficient clothing while he was away. Before sailing he had made arrangements to have his pay all given to his wife. She will not know of his death until next spring, and it is thought that some arrangement will be made by which she will receive his pay up to that time.

THE FRIEND.

NINTH MONTH 30, 1882.

For the encouragement of those faithful members of the militant church, who are at times depressed in spirit by the weakness that prevails in our own Society, and who long that its light may more conspicuously shine forth to the glory of its Holy Head; we publish an extract of a letter recently received.

The writer of it thinks there is evidence that many people in different parts of the country are "glad of the privilege of attending meetings held after the ancient order and practice of Friends; and that the doctrines of the Gospel should be again held forth, as they were believed in, proclaimed and practised by those bright sons of the morning who were instrumental in gathering our beloved Society in the beginning—George Fox, William Penn, Robert Barclay, and a host of others in that day.

"The power that gathered them remains to be the same; the Gospel light, life and power changeth not; and therefore the sons of Jacob are not consumed, the foundations are not destroyed; and after man has wearied himself in bringing in changes and innovations in principle and in practice, endeavoring to find an easier path to walk in, an easier way to climb up to Heaven than the way of the cross, it will be found that the foundation of God standeth sure, having this seal—the Lord knoweth them that are his—and that other foundation can no man lay than that is laid, which is Jesus Christ; and that to build on this foundation, the carnal mind must be slain, the old man with his deeds put off, and the new man (created anew in Christ Jesus) put on; which is not an imaginary work, but a real work, an experimental, heart-changing work, through the powerful operations of the Holy Spirit purifying and sanctifying the soul, not only fitting and preparing it for the mansions of eternal blessedness in the world to come, but also for an habitation for his Holy Spirit to dwell in, whilst we as strangers and pilgrims, are journeying through this wilderness world. [It] is a light to our feet, and a lantern to our paths, and is the true Comforter, whom Christ said 'the Father will send in my name, even the Spirit of truth whom the world cannot receive, because it seeth Him not, neither knoweth Him, but ye know Him, for He dwelleth with you and shall be in you. I will not leave you comfortless, I will come unto you.'

"After this time of great shaking, treading down and destroying, my faith remains firm, that there will be again a time of gathering, a time when the voice of the true Shepherd will be more and more heard in the land—for there shall be one fold and one shepherd. The Gospel truths proclaimed by our worthy predecessors in the beginning are as unchangeable as their Author; and however they may be despised, rejected and trampled under foot for a time, yet they will arise again in greater brightness and beauty, and must gradually spread over the whole earth, until the kingdoms of this world become the kingdoms of our Lord and of his Christ.

"This blessed hope is animating, and should encourage every one to faithfulness, watchfulness and diligence, that we may be found in our allotments at the end of the days. Having fought the good fight, finished our course and kept the faith, there will be laid up for us a crown of eternal life in the world to come."

SUMMARY OF EVENTS.

UNITED STATES.—On Fifth, Sixth and Seventh days of last week, a remarkably heavy rainfall occurred in Philadelphia, amounting according to the statement of the U. S. Signal Office to 10.09 inches, viz., on Fifth-day, 1.72 inches, on Sixth-day, 4.65 inches, and on Seventh-day, 3.72 inches. A very great amount of damage was done in the city by the bursting of culverts, the washing out of streets, embankments and bridges, and the filling up of cellars.

The storm began off the coast of North Carolina, and extended, chiefly along the coast, to Portland, Maine. The greatest amount of rain appears to have fallen in and near Philadelphia. The following is stated to have been the amount in other cities during the period of 72 hours, from 11 o'clock P. M., on the 20th, to 11 o'clock P. M., on the 23d, viz., at Norfolk, .30 inches; Baltimore, 2.45 inches; Barnegat, N. J., 2.62 inches; New York, 7.39 inches; Boston, 4.94 inches; Portland, 2.49 inches.

The continuance of rain in northern New Jersey on the 25th, has resulted in great damage to Trenton, Paterson, Newark, Jersey City, and other cities and towns in northern New Jersey.

Vast prairie fires are ravaging the table lands in western Nebraska, between the Platte and Republican rivers. The town of Indianola has been threatened, and serious results were feared if high winds should occur.

There were 316 deaths in Philadelphia for the week ending 9th month 16th, as compared with 375 for the previous week, and 345 for the corresponding week of last year. Of these deaths, there were caused by cholera infantum, 16; consumption of the lungs, 33; diphtheria, 22; heart disease, 14; typhoid fever, 11, and marasmus, 16. For the week ending 9th mo. 23d, there were 350 deaths. The main causes were: Cholera infantum, 23; consumption of the lungs, 39; diphtheria, 26; heart disease, 10; typhoid fever, 11; marasmus, 32.

The experiment of lighting passenger cars with electricity has lately been tried by the Pennsylvania Railroad Company successfully. Thirty cells of Faure's battery, taken on the cars at Jersey city, supplied the electricity to six of Edison's lamps suspended from the ceiling of the car. With the light thus furnished, fine print could be read with ease.

The U. S. Judge at Fort Smith has released Captain Payne and his associates, arrested for the invasion of the Indian Territory. Suits have been entered against them to recover the penalty of $1000 imposed by law for their offence, and they have been cited to appear at the 11th mo. term of Court.

Two trains on the New York Central Railroad collided in the tunnel at Fourth Avenue and 86th street, New York, on the 22d inst.; four deaths have occurred from it, and several persons sustained slight injuries.

Cotton picking is said to be progressing rapidly in the river districts above New Orleans, and the crop promises to be the largest gathered for many years.

A comet has lately been visible near the sun before its rise, the elements of which nearly resemble those of 1843 and 1880. It was computed to pass on the 22nd inst., about 800,000 miles from the sun, or less than the diameter of that body from it.

The recent election in Maine indicate the election of Robie, the Republican candidate for Governor, by a plurality of 8,798 over all others. An election in Arkansas resulted in favor of Berry, the Democratic candidate, by 37,181 majority.

In Massachusetts, Benjamin F. Butler was recently nominated as the Democratic candidate for Governor. In the Convention a resolution in favor of woman suffrage was set aside by a small majority.

The population of the United States in 1880, is stated to have been 50,155,783—the foreign born, according to the census, numbered 6,679,943. Of these, 2,772,169 were natives of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland, 1,966,742 of the German Empire, 717,084 of British America, 194,337 of Norway, 181,729 of Sweden, 106,971 of France, 104,541 of China, "and the remainder represents all the countries of the earth."

The iron workers' strike in the Pittsburg, Youngstown and Wheeling districts is at an end. The strikers will return to work at the old rate of $5.50. It is estimated that the loss to the men of the above districts in wages by the strike, which lasted 116 days, amounts to about $9,000,000.

The National Distillers' and Spirit Dealers' Association of the United States met recently in Cincinnati. About fifty members were present, and the session was secret. The call for the Convention says that, in addition to disappointment concerning Congressional action for the relief of the whisky business, "dangers are arising at the hands of a misguided and irrational class of our fellow-citizens who are, with fanatical zeal and persistence, seeking the destruction of our business through restrictive and prohibitory State legislation." The call suggests the reorganization of the association "on an enlarged and practical plan."

At a recent Convention of friends of temperance held in Philadelphia, it was agreed to organize under the name of the Constitutional Prohibition League of Pennsylvania, and resolutions were adopted in favor of prohibiting the manufacture and sale of intoxicating liquors for use as a beverage in Pennsylvania, declaring that this can be most wisely and permanently done by an amendment to the Constitution of the State; and that the Convention will only support such candidates for the Legislature as shall be unequivocally pledged to support the submittal of such an amendment to the voters.

Markets, &c.—U. S. 3½'s, 100½ to 101; 4½'s, 112½ to 113; 4's, registered, 118½ to 119; 4's, coupon, 119½ to 120; currency 6's, 130 to 133.

Cotton.—Sales of middlings are reported at 12½ a 13½ cts. per lb. for uplands and New Orleans.

Flour is in fair request and steady. Sales of 2000 barrels, including Minnesota extras, at $6.50 a $6.75 for clear, and at $7 a $7.25 for straight; Penna. family at $5 a $5.12½; western do. do. at $5.50 a $6, and patents at $6.50 a $8.25. Rye flour is firm at $4.25 for Pennsylvania.

Grain.—Wheat is dull and lower. Sales of 7500 bushels red, in ear lots at $1.00 a $1.08, as to quality and location. At the open board, $1.05 was bid for 9th mo.; $1.05 for 10th mo.; $1.07½ for 11th mo., and $1.08½ for 12th mo. Rye is quiet at 72 cts. Corn is in limited request and lower. Sales of 9000 bushels, in ear lots at 72½ a 77 cts. At the open board, 70 cts. was bid for 9th mo., 71½ cts. for 10th mo., 69½ cts. for 11th mo., and 59 cts. for 12th mo. Oats are quiet. Sales of 10,000 bushels, including white, at 40 a 43½ cts., and rejected and mixed at 27 a 35 cts.

Beef cattle were in good demand, and prices were steady; 3500 head arrived on the 25th, and sold at the different yards at 4 a 7½ cts. per pound, as to quality.

Sheep were also in demand at former rates: 13,000 head arrived and sold at the different yards at 3 a 5½ cts., and lambs at 4 a 7½ cts. per lb., as to condition.

Hogs were firmly held: 3300 head arrived sold at the different yards at 11 a 12½ cts. per lb., as to quality.

FOREIGN.—Large bodies of the Egyptian troops are reported to have surrendered to the English, numbering on the 19th inst. 23,000 men.

A dispatch from Zizagiz states: The entire population of this part of the country have returned to their homes and are working in the fields. Every house and hovel floats a white flag. The forbearance of the conquering army has produced a most wholesome effect. All the native property has been left untouched.

In some places in the interior of Egypt some resistance continues to be made, and European houses and factories have been plundered, and murders have been committed.

The London Times of the 20th says, it understands that Sir Edward Malet, the British Consul-General at Alexandria, has been directed to inform the Khedive that no capital sentence passed on the Egyptian leaders must be carried out without the consent of Great Britain. Steps have been taken to obtain the services of a competent English barrister to defend Arabi Pasha and the other leaders of the late revolt.

A large number of natives have arrived at Alexandria from Cairo to do homage to the Khedive. Among them are many who were openly compromised in the rebellion, and these the Khedive has refused to receive.

The Khedive reached Cairo on the 25th, accompanied by the Egyptian ministers and English officers. Many thousand of the inhabitants gathered along the route giving him a friendly welcome.

Seeing the manner in which the British treat their prisoners and the wounded, Arabi says they are a great people, and he is heartily sorry he fought them. He asserts that he never thought the English would send a large army to assist the Khedive, and so was led into the war. He denies that he had any communication with the Sultan during the war.

A dispatch from Dublin states that at Swineford, County Mayo, a thousand ejection decrees are posted at the Court House at the suit of Lord Dillon. No rent has been paid on Lord Dillon's estate since 1879.

The military and police of County Mayo have evicted fifty families during the last few days in the Barony of Erris, and the people have been ordered not to shelter them.

A contract has been signed by the Portuguese Government for the laying of a cable between Lisbon and the United States, touching at the Azores.

Emperor William, of Germany, has written a letter to the King of Saxony in regard to the recent organization of a Saxon army corps, in which he says that it affords him sincere satisfaction to again assure himself how entirely the king's views coincided with his own respecting the immense importance of keeping the troops in a state of readiness for war.

The steamer Alaska of the Guion Line, from New York to Liverpool, lately made the voyage to Fastnet in 6 days 15 hours and 19 minutes, which is the fastest trip ever made between America and Europe. The same vessel also made the fastest trip previously recorded.

The Czar of Russia and Czarina have lately gone to Moscow, it is supposed, in order to be crowned. They were received with great manifestations of loyalty and enthusiasm. Secrecy is maintained in regard to the day upon which the coronation will take place.

News has been received that an offensive and defensive alliance has been concluded between Russia and Montenegro.

Terrible inundations have occurred in the Tyrol and North Italy. Many towns are flooded and large tracts of country are without other communication than afforded by boats. The towns of Trient, Villach and Bruneck are partly destroyed and the damage is great.

RECEIPTS.

Received from Sallie Haley, O., $2.10, vol. 56; from Daniel B. Price, Pa., $2.10, vol. 56, and for Hann Child, N. Y., $2.10, vol. 56; from Amos Buzby, N., $2.10, vol. 56; from Lindley H. Holloway, Io., $2.10, vol. 56; from George Standing, Io., $2.20, vol. 56, a Postage on vol. 55; from James Heald, Io., for Levi J. Heald, $2.10, vol. 56; from Eliza Wilson, O., $2.10, vol. 56; from Anne W. Boone, Canada, $2.10, vol. 56; from Joshua Brantingham, Agent, O., for Ellen Straton, Mary L. Test, Lewis B. Walker, Barclay Stratton and Joshua Gilbert, $2.10 each, vol. 56; from Robt B. Hanson, R. I., $2.10, vol. 56; for Greenbury Wood, $2.10, vol. 56; from James C. Chappell and William Lamb, N. C., per Josiah Nicholson, $2 each, vol. 56; from Price Z. Supplee, Pa., $2.10, vol. 56; from Steph Wood, Jr., L. I., $2.10, vol. 56; from Henry Newton England, 10 shillings, vol. 56; from Benjamin Shalless, Pa., $2.10, vol. 56; from Pearson Hall, Agent, I., for Abraham Cowgill, Samuel Cowgill, Israel Heald, John Oliphant, Joseph Armstrong and Aaron Robie, $2.10 each, vol. 56; for Eli Hadley, Ind., $2.10, vol. 56; for William Harvey and David Haworth, Ind., $2 each, vol. 56; from Richard W. Hutton, Westtown, to No. 6, vol. 57; from Sarah T. Smith, Cal., $1, to No. 34, vol. 56; from Joseph S. Heald and Edwin T. Heald, Io., per Tilman Patterson, $2.10 each, vol. 56; from James Woody, Agent, Ind., $2.10, vol. 56, and for Isaac Hall and Isaac N. Coffin, $2.10 each, vol. 56; from Isaac Craft, Fkfd., $2.10, vol. 56, and for Marian Eastburn, N. J., $2.10, vol. 56; from William Marshall, Pa., $2.10, vol. 56; from Benjamin Hayes, Pa., $2.10, vol. 56; from Elizabeth Russell, City, $2, vol. 56; from Thomas Emmons, Agent, Io., for Thomas W. Joseph Edgerton, Albert Emmons, John Q. Spencer, Thomas Blackburn, John Hogue, and George W. Moore, $2.10 each, vol. 56; from Anna T. Hancock, City, $2.10, vol. 56; from Owen Evans, Del., $2.10, vol. 56; from Job Bacon, N. J., $2.10, vol. 56; from James Meloney, Pa., $2.10, vol. 56.

WESTTOWN BOARDING SCHOOL.

The WINTER SESSION begins on Second-day, Tenth month 30th, 1882. Parents and others intending to send pupils, will please make early application to JONATHAN G. WILLIAMS, Supt., address Westtown P. Chester Co., Pa.; or to CHARLES J. ALLEN, Treasurer, 304 Arch St., Philadelphia. Terms, $80 per session.

THE CORPORATION OF HAVERFORD COLLEGE.

A Stated Annual Meeting of "The Corporation of Haverford College" will be held in the Committee-room of Arch Street Meeting-house, Philadelphia, on Thirtieth day, Tenth month 10th, 1882, at 3 o'clock, P. M.

EDWARD BETTLE, Jr., Secretary

WANTED,

A woman Friend, as teacher in the Boarding School for Indian children, at Tunesassa; also one to assist the matron in care of the household. Apply to Jos. S. Elkintou, 325 Pine street, Philada., John Sharpless, Chester, Delaware Co., Pa., Ephraim Smith, 1110 Pine street, Philada.

WANTED,

Teachers and assistant teachers for the Evening Schools for Adult Colored Persons, men's and women's departments. Apply to Ephraim Smith, 1110 Pine St., Philadelphia; Thomas Elkintou, 400 S. Ninth St., " Thomas Woolman, 858 Marshall St., " Finley Hutton, 400 Chestnut St., "

FRIENDS' ASYLUM FOR THE INSANE, Near Frankford, (Twenty-third Ward,) Philadelphia. Physician and Superintendent—JOHN C. HALL, M. Applications for the Admission of Patients may be made to the Superintendent, or to any of the Board Managers.

DIED, on 5th of 8th mo. at his residence in Mooretown, N. Jersey, CHARLES LIPPINCOTT, a member Chester Monthly Meeting of Friends, N. J., in the 8th year of his age.

THE FRIEND.

A RELIGIOUS AND LITERARY JOURNAL.

OL. LVI.

SEVENTH-DAY, TENTH MONTH 7, 1882.

NO. 9.

PUBLISHED WEEKLY.

if paid in advance, $2.00 per annum; if not paid in advance $2.50; 10 cents extra is charged for Postage on those sent by mail.

Articles designed for insertion to be addressed to
JOSEPH WALTON,
MOORESTOWN, BURLINGTON CO., N. J.

Subscriptions, payments and business communications, received by
JOHN S. STOKES,
NO. 116 NORTH FOURTH STREET, UP STAIRS,
PHILADELPHIA.

For "The Friend."

Robert Proud.

THE HISTORIAN.

The history of Robert Proud had its origin in a concern which was early felt by the Society of Friends in these parts to preserve a record of the establishment of its meetings and of the leading facts connected with the movement of Pennsylvania and New Jersey members.

In the minutes of the Yearly Meeting for 1774, it is mentioned that John Kinsey, the clerk, was continued to collect materials for the history of these provinces. And from that time forward the subject is frequently mentioned. John Kinsey having died, in 1750, Samuel Smith, of Burlington, was requested to take the papers and continue the work.

In 1755, Samuel Smith had so far progressed in his labors, that he placed the proposed history in the hands of the Overseers of the Press for examination. These were officers of the Society, whose business it was to examine, and publish, treatises written by our members and affecting the doctrines and interests of the Society. It is probable their work may have been delayed by the difficulties in which Friends were then placed, owing to the development of a warlike spirit in the minds of the people, and the Indian wars, which led to the general withdrawal of our members from the administration of the government, in which they had previously held influential or controlling position. In 1757 the Overseers reported that they would make suggestions to Samuel Smith, as to the condensation of certain portions of the narrative.

About that time the Meeting for Sufferings was established, whose original business was, chiefly, to care for those Friends who were caught under suffering by Indian wars and military operations, and whose cases it required prompt assistance. Other duties, from time to time, were devolved upon a body representing the Society during intervals between the annual gatherings of members. The preparation of the History was placed under its care—as is shown in the following minute of the Yearly Meeting 1771—

By the minutes of the Meeting for Sufferings it appears that although they have had under their notice the recommendation of the meeting last year respecting the proposed history of the settlement of Friends in these two provinces; nothing has been done therein of late, and it being the desire of many Friends that this work may be completed, it is recommended to the Meeting for Sufferings and the Overseers of the Press to use the further necessary endeavors towards fulfilling what has been repeatedly requested by this meeting."

At a Meeting for Sufferings held the 15th of 9th mo. 1774, the committee "for the revision of the history of the settlement of Friends in these two provinces," reported that "having most of them met several times and considered the essay, and apprehending additions and alterations may yet be made thereto," they had "communicated their mind to our friend, Samuel Smith, who agrees to take some remarks into consideration, and also acquaints the Friends that he hath collected some further materials which may be useful, and he proposes to add."

Samuel Smith died not long after this time, and the history appears not to have been fully completed. The papers which had been entrusted to him were returned to Friends, and subsequently placed in the hands of Robert Proud. This was about the year 1777.

The stormy period of the Revolution was not very favorable to peaceful literary labors, and several years elapsed before the history again makes its appearance. In the 11th mo. of 1784, the Meeting for Sufferings deputed some of its members to confer with R. Proud, "in order to know what progress has been made therein, and how far the design of promoting such a history is likely to be answered, and what expectation R. Proud has of completing it."

To this committee, Robert Proud gave a sketch of the plan he had followed in preparing his work, on which he had bestowed considerable labor. He stated that it was a Civil history of the settlement of Pennsylvania, and the transactions to 1733, with some sketches of subsequent events; but it was not an Ecclesiastical history, or an account of the Society of Friends as to its religious state; and therefore he thought it did not properly come under the cognizance of any body of men in a religious capacity.

However valuable R. Proud's production might be, it was clearly not of the kind which he had been engaged to prepare, and not one which it was proper for the Society officially to sanction and publish. The committee to confer with him accordingly made a report to the Meeting for Sufferings in the 1st mo. of 1785, "from which," says the minute of that body, "it appears that the work engaged in and carrying on by Robert Proud doth not fully answer what we apprehend was intended by the Yearly Meeting." They judged the work to be informing and really useful, but thought it would be most proper when published to appear as his own performance. In accordance with another recommendation of the committee, it was agreed that a transcript of the papers collected by Samuel Smith, relating more particularly to our religious Society, should be sent to John Gough, of Ireland, who was then engaged in compiling a History of Friends.

Proud's History was not published till the year 1797-8. It is valuable as a reliable record of historical facts, but it was not successful as a business venture. Thomson states, that instead of yielding him any pecuniary reward for the labors of authorship, the necessary expenses of publication were not reimbursed. Under these circumstances, Robert Proud applied to the Meeting for Sufferings for relief. A committee of that body made a report in the 3d month of 1804, giving an outline of the concern of the Society and the steps taken from 1747 downwards. They were evidently kindly disposed towards their aged friend, and on their recommendation it was agreed to make him a payment of $500. To this report are appended the names of Nicholas Waln, Henry Drinker, Jonathan Evans, Thomas Stewardson, and other prominent Friends.

In the latter years of his life, Robert Proud seldom went abroad, but lived in much seclusion. Much of his time was employed in reading and writing, sometimes in translations of various Latin authors, and sometimes in compositions of his own. His closing days were passed in tranquillity and peace, and he quietly passed away from this stage of existence on the 7th of 7th month, 1813, in the 86th year of his age.

C. W. Thomson, writing in 1826, says: "Robert Proud was in person tall—his nose was of the Roman order, and overhung with most impending brows." I remember having seen him when I was quite a small boy; his appearance was striking, and could not readily be altogether forgotten. I well remember the imposing effect which the curled gray wig, the half-cocked patriarchal-looking hat, and the long ivory-headed cane, had on my boyish imagination. I believe Proud was one of the last of the old school—I mean those who adhered faithfully to the dignified dress of our ancestors. One by one they have dropped away, and with them has departed almost every trace of the olden time.

"The character of this venerable relic of honest worth may be summed up in a few words: I give nearly the language of one who knew him well. He was a zealous advocate for useful learning, a man of regular habits and great temperance, and in his manners the model of a gentleman.

"Requiescat in pace.—No proud mausoleum lifts its head to celebrate his praises; his nameless grave owns no memorial but the green sod with which Nature has adorned it; but many an one is yet living, who, in the grateful recollection of his worth and virtues, can sanctify the memory of DOMINE PROUD."

J. W.

Condensed from "The British Friend."

Sundry Observations on America,

MADE BY GEORGE PITT IN A RECENT VISIT.

In a letter preceding receipt of these observations, the author informs us that on the 29th of 7th mo. himself and wife arrived home after a three months' trip to America. After a most delightful and successful journey in every particular, he says—"My motive and object in the back-ground was to go among Friends of different sections, and feel how it was with them—whether the Seed of Life was over all, mixed with all, or under all. Being as it were partially deaf and dumb, I could not have managed this without my wife, who enjoys society and served as an ear and a mouthpiece for me. We accomplished all I designed and more.

Being a bad sailor, and having in common with most a dread of sea dangers, I hesitated many years before venturing to cross the great waters; but after crossing four times in summer weather, I have proved that there is in these voyages very little to dread or fear, while there is so much to desire, it can hardly be praised too strongly.

The pure, cool, bracing sea air produces such a change and vigor in the system, as, perhaps, nothing else would effect. Country scenes, or hills, or even sea-side resorts fail to yield the same benefit.

There are no daily budgets of letters to open, consider, and reply to—no newspapers with their events, opinions, politics, or market prices to disturb, or occupy a place in the mind. There is no constant stream of callers to distract or engage the attention with their business or their troubles. Even telegrams cannot reach you, and letter-writing is of little use because you cannot post. Thus entirely relieved of all cares and daily round of duties, you have the opportunity for thorough rest, you can read, study, or reflect.

The first thing to rivet my attention on landing in America, was the peculiar characteristic appearance of the people, especially the men—mostly lanky, or tall and thin, with long wrinkled faces, sallow complexion, and a tuft of hair on the chin. I concluded the caricature pictures we see in England of the "cute Yankee" are founded on facts. The word "cute" also conveys a fair impression of the general American physiognomy—an intelligent, knowing, restless, self-satisfied look, indicating a keen desire and swift race after the "almighty dollar," as they call it—in any legal shape or form. The English are fast enough in the race for wealth, but they appear milder—features less sharp, less shrewd, and much fairer and plumper. The American girls are tall and graceful, sprightly, modest and fair, giving them a pretty and attractive appearance. The fashion of tight-fitting corsets prevails more generally than in England.

New York is the grand centre for foreigners to land at. It is the London of America—the empire City and State of the Union. A vast and busy metropolis on a long and narrow island, averaging 13 miles long and over 1½ miles wide, in the middle of a river 18 miles from the ocean, and as you approach it is viewed edgeways, the first part narrowing almost to a point, called the Battery or Castle Garden, famous as Washington's head-quarters in revolution time.

About 250 years ago this island was a wilderness, and was purchased of the natives for 24 dollars, or their equivalent. Two hundred and eighteen years ago our King Charles II. took possession of the city from the Dutch, and gave it and the entire territory to his brother, the Duke of York, calling it "New York."

Its population then was 1500; now, with its surroundings, it numbers about two millions, and its real estate is valued at over one thousand million dollars. It is one of the three great commercial and financial centres of the world. Yet it is within the last 50 years only that it has increased so marvelously, and assumed its metropolitan character. It has a bay and harbor where the navies of the world might find a resting place, and where more than 100 ocean steamers ply to and fro to Europe and other countries.

Most of their river steamers are shallow, with almost flat bottoms, worked by paddle-wheels; and so, instead of sinking the machinery under deck, as we do, they work it up in the air; and nothing strikes the stranger on arriving, as a curiosity, more than these large steamers, with their tall iron beams supporting long cylinder rods, stretching their giant arms out and back, up and down, elevated above other parts of the boat.

The Americans believe in the biggest of all big things. They call it "whipping creation." So they build hotels making up a thousand beds. They have ships to convey railway trains, laden with passengers and freight, locomotive and all entire, across the lakes or rivers, shunting them bodily on to the rails on the other side of the water. They have steamboats which may truly be called "floating palaces"—there is nothing in our country to compare with them. They are magnificent and sumptuous in the extreme. Saloons, nearly the length of the ship, elegantly fitted and furnished. The best velvet pile carpets, sofas and chairs fit for royalty, splendid chandeliers, polished and elaborately carved posts and rails, with hundreds of state rooms in luxurious style.

Again, at Niagara Falls, they have the longest suspension bridge in existence, from the Canadian to the American side of the Niagara River—a stretch, without support, of about 1200 feet, and 250 feet above the water. But even that is being outrivalled by a suspension bridge across the East River from New York to Brooklyn. It has been many years in course of erection, and is to be opened next year, costing many millions of dollars, and so elevated that a large ship with its masts and sails full set can pass under it without touching. It will outdo every bridge in the world.

New York is all bustle and drive, a go-ahead business city, and, like London, anything rather than beautiful—you soon long to be out of the noise and strife. It has a "Central Park," in which art has triumphed over nature, converting a barren rocky waste into a lovely and grand recreation ground, well studded with trees, plants, and flowers, forming in its variety charms said to be unequalled anywhere.

It shocks the eyes of English people to see the Elevated Railways in New York. Seven years ago there was but one; now they run up several of the leading avenues and are intensely ugly. Paying well, they are multiplying fast, and are formed of the lightest materials, supported by iron columns. They run in the middle, or sometimes both sides of the roadway, where considerable traffic passes, making the shops and everything dark and dismal. The trains run every minute or so, and cause a continual noise, as well as be within a few feet of, and on a level with first or second floor windows of the houses, they overlook all that is going on.

In England, were such a thing attempted, they would have as many law suits for depreciation of property as there were owners of property on the line—and so they would in New York if the railway were a private concern; but being the work of a corporation they do as they like.

Electric lighting is much more common in New York than in London. In the Times Avenue every other shop has it, and it gives a whiter, steadier light than we get. The light in the shops is more intense than daylight and has not the blue ghastly shade of gas.

The extreme lightness of the carriage in America is a thing which rivets the attention of English visitors. In the Central Park, which corresponds with our Hyde Park, where the gentry drive out of an afternoon for amusement or airing, their carriage various shapes look like skeleton or spider conveyances, or like a number of velocipedes. The wheels especially are so thin—the felts about an inch square, and spokes thinner than a pin. You feel afraid to venture in them, lest they should collapse; but they are safe enough being made of the best seasoned hickory, with the best workmanship, and unpainted. They wear well. The bodies of the carriages are light to match. A four-wheeled conveyance, carriage or brougham, to hold four or six persons, and to run with a pair of horses, a strong man could easily lift.

Three remarkable men have not long since died in New York, who, from poverty or insignificance, realized fortunes equal to millions of dollars, or ten million pounds each. One was John Jacob Astor, who emigrated from Germany with a few flutes to sell, became a furrier, purchasing furs of the Indians at the close of the last English war with America, at a nominal price, and selling at high prices. After accumulating wealth, he foresaw the extension of New York, bought up in a panic, large quantities of lots at trifling prices, and selling them afterwards at fancy prices, realized his enormous fortune.

Another man was Commodore Vanderbilt, an American farmer who had a taste for speculating, and borrowed money to get a steamship. Perceiving a great future for steamships, when they were first invented he contracted for them, realizing great gains. Then he speculated in railways, and owned the New York Central, and the Hudson and Delaware Lines, ending as a great millionaire.

The third man was A. T. Stewart, a Scotchman, who, shrewd and industrious, opened a Dry Goods or Drapery Store, studied the wants of his customers, kept a good article at one price only, and would not puff his goods. He bought largely at sales, and succeeded so well that at last he built a new store on Fifth Avenue, without doubt the largest in the world, occupying an entire square block equal to 100 houses, facing two avenues and two cross streets. He also built himself a private marble mansion, cost two million dollars, besides owning other similar buildings.

s in Vanderbilt's case, after death, relas fought at law for his wealth; and as a al and commentary on the vanity of es, the body-snatchers stole away his hly remains; and his drapery store, when as gone, did not thrive, and was closed
e we were in America.

f course every foreign traveller visits ara Falls. We spent ten days there. It e of the world's natural wonders, and a ming place, 450 miles from New York, in N. W. corner of New York State, and is ormed: Lake Erie, containing 150,000 re miles, whose waters are on 334 feet er level than those of Lake Ontario, is rated at its extremity from it, by a neck and some 30 miles wide; the overflow of e Erie finding an outlet to Lake Ontario a river called Niagara, an Indian name ning "Thunder of Waters."

he waters on leaving Erie for some miles erve their level, but about a mile before hing Niagara Falls, the bed of the river s some 50 feet, and the waters rushing a torrent over the rough stone bottom, called the Rapids. Then a hill beyond, idding its straight course, makes it turn arp corner, forming a horse-shoe curve, then drops down some 200 feet at one into a much narrower channel, at the rate hundred million tons an hour, producing e wonderful falls.

(To be concluded.)

For "The Friend."

has ever been a cause of discouragement he right-minded when many turn back walking in the truth. "The ways of do mourn because none come to the nn feasts," was an ancient lamentation.
a greater or less extent the same wail may ken up on behalf of the Society of Friends, any places, at the present day. But it is to guard against an undue depression;
each in their own particular to endure as Lord's burden-bearers.

the proneness of the human mind to rethe will of God and follow the allure-ts of sinful pleasures, is a fruitful source il. Those who have been enabled through ne grace to overcome evil, have known y struggles between their own wills and will of God, as they, through the deceitworkings of the enemy have tried to evade cross of Christ. In the work of regenera-those who have witnessed the new birth e known these conflicts in a greater or degree. Although Satan, by his trans-ations, may present himself as an angel ght, and profess to be a helper in religion is ministers, he is the same serpent that ced the enmity to the law of God in our parents; and he does now stimulate in minds of the disobedient a dislike to the ipline of the cross. He presents an easier by substituting the sufferings of Christ he cross for that which men have to bear he work of regeneration; holding to view the atonement made for sin, finished the k of man's salvation. Such is the pro-ed theory of many who call themselves
nds. In order to secure such a belief inst the conviction of the Spirit of God, deny that the Holy Spirit operates in s hearts before conversion; and they that feeling is no evidence of acceptance y God. These ideas are popular with the ral man.

Friends have practically recognized Divine guidance and a consequent separation from the spirit of the world, more fully than any other religious body, and have been led into testimonies peculiar to themselves; testimonies that professing Christendom very much need.
This high Christian standard is only attained through Him who saves to the uttermost all that come unto God by Him. As I understand it, Friends have ever held and clearly set forth the doctrines of the atonement made for man, and the work of regeneration in man, as both essential to a complete reconciliation between God offended and man the offender.
It is strange that any should wish to retain their membership with Friends, and indistrictly propagate, in the name of the Society, one sided views, by enlarging on the atonement, and substituting simple faith, or belief, for the work of regeneration. But these things are forming a chapter in the history of the day. There are persons who appear ambitious of converting the world to their way of thinking; and claim that they are bringing souls to Christ. They do manage to bring an influence to bear upon the minds of the people, that, without right religious discernment, will lead astray. They do not hesitate to use questionable means. They misrepresent the teachings of Friends, holding them up to ridicule at times, and often present their own views in a blind way, using terms such as "Hiding behind the cross,"
"Taking shelter under the cross," and ignore self-denial and the daily cross as useless; as being something of man's own making. These and other similar teachings, together with the use of appliances in order to get up excitements, with their boast of doing much good, have a great influence upon the inexperienced. And any attempt to correct such gross abuses have been rejected by them as the result of a want of charity, and a desire to hinder the work of the Lord. Not a few who appeared to be established in Friends' principles, have been drawn into the snare, and become advocates of the things that they aforetime disapproved. Therefore the young among us have a claim to much sympathy and care; yet there is nothing but the light of the Lord that can effectually open their understandings to right and wrong. "Except the Lord build the house, they labor in vain that build it; except the Lord keep the city, the watchman waketh but in vain." We are assured that "God is good to Israel," and that there are both laborers and watchmen. Oh for a supply of trustworthy servants who can discern the difference "between the clean and the unclean," who watch and labor right over against their own houses, and who are faithful to the call of duty in ministering to the help of others.

We thankfully recount the labors of the worthies who have gone to their rest—some of whom we have known personally. We remember their warnings, which we now look upon as prophetic. We admire their faithfulness. Is the Lord's hand shortened that He cannot qualify servants for the day and the emergency? It is no time to dwell in ceiled houses and neglect the duties of the Lord's house.

A word of affectionate counsel to the young:
You have been privileged with the true Light which lighteth every man that cometh into the world. Your fathers had the same light.
Those who were faithful to the light were in their measure like the Master, "meek and lowly in heart." As you obey the Light and walk in it, you too will be meek and lowly;

will be preserved from being heady and high-minded, and will not think yourselves wiser than your elders. Beware of that which puffeth up; it is dangerous ground. As you are preserved in humility you will grow in grace. But you will have your trials, even sore besetments and discouragements. In these times of proving, "cast not away your confidence, which hath great recompense of reward." Keep near the Divine counsel. Be not in haste in opening your condition to others; they may prove to be miserable comforters. Submit to be weaned from an undue dependence upon men; but seek to have your minds directed into the love of God, "and into the patient waiting for Christ," and He will fit you for a place in his spiritual building, as lively stones "to offer up spiritual sacrifices acceptable to God by Jesus Christ."

A. S.

Ontario.

Some two years ago, in New York, a lady who had been teaching little girls household duties through the use of the kitchen garden system, asked herself, Why cannot this idea, in a modified form, be used in training older girls and women? She found and took for one evening a week, a bright, cheerful room in a central locality, and by means of cordial invitations extended, gathered around her a large class of working girls: all poor, yet self-supporting. Several came from factories, some from dressmakers' and millinery establishments, others from smaller and larger shops. The first evening over fifteen were present, and as there was a bright fire burning in the grate, it was chosen for the subject of discussion. Taking up coal and wood, the teacher told how they came into the present form. Then the lesson became more practical; how to prepare for, build, and light a fire was thoroughly explained. To the teacher's surprise, several acknowledged that they always used kerosene to light the fire more quickly. Wood was taken up, and for half an hour it held the girls' attention.
From this simple beginning, followed a course of evenings very interesting to the teacher, but more so to the girls. One evening, "The home, what it should be, and how we can make it," was the subject; then followed several meetings devoted to household work
—the kitchen, washing, ironing, and how to make an attractive table; the bedroom, &c.; during them all, questions were freely asked and answered, when possible; if not, the information was found and given the next week.

Then came several evenings devoted to personal and home hygiene. Here the interest of the girls became very intense, and it was with difficulty the teacher could get them to go when it reached half-past nine.
One evening will long be remembered. The talk was upon personal health. Hanging on the wall there was a chart of the human body. How the girls lingered over it with surprise and pleasure; how they took home to themselves the plain words which were spoken! One, a bright girl, who worked all day at a dressmaker's, and went home at night to a small room on the top story of a First Avenue tenement, looked up at last, and said, "Miss —, why did we not know these things before?" When the answer was given, of "I do not know, I've—" she quickly said, "But, Miss —, I think we ought to have known them; we should have been taught them at school." The earnest, longing look in her face spoke of deeper feelings than could have been expected. What to do in emergencies and sudden accidents was then taught, and the girls learned of presence of mind and immediate action. Plain directions for sick-nursing interested them greatly, as did also similar hints on the care of children, economy, system, plain sewing, what to read, and how to maintain womanhood in its full dignity.

Throughout the lessons, Christ's love for us, and his interest in our every-day life, were freely spoken of; the dignity of household labor, the value of knowing how to do and act, was impressed. The attendance was good, and the interest was well kept up.—S. S. Times.

For "The Friend."

Ancient Testimonies and Advices.

IN RELATION TO SUITABLE CONNEXIONS IN MARRIAGE.

"Being given to understand, that in divers places there are some who profess the Truth with us, who deviate from the way thereof, by contracting marriages with such as are not of our Society, contrary to the repeated advice of this meeting, to the dishonor of our holy profession, and the hindrance of Truth's prosperity; in order therefore that a stop may be put to an undue liberty in such marriages, and the evil consequences thereof, we do hereby tenderly advise and desire that all parents and guardians of children do take especial care, as much as in them lieth, to prevent their children from running into such marriages: and that Friends of each Particular Meeting, as also of the Monthly Meetings, to which such persons belong, do, in the wisdom and power of Truth, use their endeavors to put a stop to the said evil, by admonishing such as attempt to marry as aforesaid, to desist before they accomplish the same. But if they refuse to take counsel, or privately go on to marry as aforesaid, that then such persons be dealt withal according to the good order of Truth, and judgment fixed upon all such as take such an undue liberty."—1719.

"Parents who have children to dispose of in marriage, are tenderly advised not to make it their first or chief care to obtain for them large portions and settlements of marriage: but rather be careful that their children be joined in marriage with persons of religious inclinations, suitable dispositions, temper, sobriety of manners, and diligence in their business; which are things essentially necessary to a comfortable life in a married state; and carefully to guard against all mixed marriages, and unequal yoking of their children therein."—1722.

"As parents have a natural right to approve of, and consent to, the marriage of their children; so this meeting doth earnestly desire that Friends' children would consult and advise with their parents and guardians in that great and weighty point, so essential to their happiness and comfort, before they let out their minds or do entangle their affections; the too frequent examples that have happened to the contrary hereof, have caused lamentation in honest parents, and great affliction to themselves."—1723.

"We tenderly recommend to all parents, and such as may have the care of children, that they do, as far as in them lies, prevent unsuitable persons in their endeavors to entangle the affections of our youth in relation to marriage; the unhappy disobedience of some therein having frequently brought deep affliction on their tender parents, and misery on themselves."—1724.

"Dear Friends, amongst the many hurtful things those are liable to, who live not in due subjection to the light of God's Holy Spirit in their own consciences, let us revive in your view at this time, that of mixing in marriage with those of different persuasions in religion.

Marriage being a Divine ordinance, and a solemn engagement for term of life, is of great importance to our peace and well-being in this world, and may prove of no small consequence respecting our state in that which is to come; yet it is often too inconsiderately entered into, upon motives inconsistent with the evident intention of that Unerring Wisdom by which it was primarily ordained; which was for the mutual assistance and comfort of both sexes, that they might be meet-helpers to each other, both in spirituals and temporals, and that their endeavors might be united for the pious and proper education of their children, in the nurture and admonition of the Lord, and for suitably qualifying them to discharge their duty in their various allotments in the world.

Marriage implies union and concurrence, as well in spiritual as temporal concerns. Whilst the parties differ in religion, they stand disunited in the main point; even that which should increase and confirm their mutual happiness, and render them meet-helpers and blessings to each other. Where it is otherwise, the reciprocal obligation they have entered into becomes their burden; and the more so, as it may not be of a short and transient duration. Whatever felicity they might expect or flatter themselves with in the beginning, they have found themselves disappointed of, by the daily uneasiness accompanying their minds, and embittering their enjoyments.

The perplexed situation of the offspring of such alliances is likewise to be lamented. Attached by nature to both parents, the confusion they are in often renders them unfixed in principle, and unsettled in practice: or if, as it is usual, the sons go with the father, and the daughters with the mother, brothers and sisters are trained up in lines of conduct diverse from, and, in some cases opposite to each other. Thus, differing in principle, they are frequently divided in affection, and though so nearly related, are sometimes at the greatest distance from that love and harmony which ought continually to subsist between them.

To prevent falling into these disagreeable and disorderly engagements, it is requisite to beware of the paths that lead to them—the sordid interests, and ensnaring friendships of the world—the contaminating pleasures and idle pastimes of earthly minds; also the various solicitations and incentives to festivity and dissipation. Let our dear youth likewise especially avoid too frequent and too familiar converse with those from whom may arise a danger of entanglement, by their alluring the passions, and drawing the affections after them.

For want of due watchfulness, and obedience to the convictions of Divine grace, many amongst us, as well as others, have wound their own souls, distressed their friends, jured their families, and done great dissery to the church, by these unequal connexions which have proved an inlet to much generacy, and mournfully affected the minds of those who labor under a living concern for the good of all, and the prosperity of Truth upon earth."—From the London Epistles, 17

A Precious Pillow.

Dr. Judson, one of the earliest missionaries to Burmah, completed the translation of the New Testament in 1823. The manuscript was destined within a year to enter of strange history. The Judsons went to A the capital of the empire, very hopeful doing effective missionary work there. W however, broke out between England : Burmah, and all foreigners were soon regarded with great suspicion. Dr. Jud was apprehended, and with cruel violence and gross indignity was cast into the debt prison. In a few days, through a mor payment, he and other prisoners were moved from that awful place to an open space within the prison bounds. There they were with irons upon their limbs. When her husband was thrown into prison, one of the facts of E. Judson was to bury the manuscript of the New Testament under the house of the soil, lest it should be found and destroyed by their persecutors. When Dr. Judson was permitted to receive a visit from his wife, and they could speak together a little naturally, one of his earliest inquiries related to the safety of the work which had cost him so much time and toil. The rains had set in, and the manuscript would be destroyed if it remained long in the ground. A plan for the preservation of this priceless treasure was soon devised. E. Judson sewed it up in some cotton stuff, which she further encased with matting, thus making a pillow for her husband, so unsightly and so hard, that she supposed no one would care to take it from her.

After about seven months had passed, the prisoners were suddenly thrust again into the inner prison and loaded with extra fetters. The few poor mattresses and pillows, which had scarcely seemed to ease their aching bones, were taken from them, and among these the rough bundle on which Dr. Judson was wont to lay his head. The first night of this new misery the prisoners expected speedy execution, and Dr. Judson's thoughts dwelt a good deal on the contents of the strap pillow he had lost. He thought of passing in that New Testament which might be perfectly translated. He wondered what future of the manuscript would be. Would in some future year be found, and be a source of light and blessing to the benighted heath of Burmah? The jailer, however, to whom he shared the pillow fell, found it so uncomfortable, and apparently so worthless, that he flung it back into the prison. Tastes were offered, and if the prisoner liked that sort of thing to rest his head upon he might have for all the jailer cared. Presently came a day when the prisoners were stripped of nearly all their clothes, "tied two-and-two and driven barefooted over sharp gravel and burning sand to a wretched prison some miles away. When, on that occasion, the five Burmans were seizing all the spoil they could, the mat was unfastened by one of them from Dr. Judson's pillow, and as the hard st in seemed to be of no value it was thrown away. A Christian convert picked it up as he who he feared he would never see. Little did he imagine what the meaning cotton roll contained. Months afterward, when the troubles were over, and the sons were free again for their loved work, New Testament was found no worse for perils through which it had passed. In time it was all printed, and to-day the men and women of Burmah read in it "the wonderful works of God."

DAY BY DAY.

Selected.

Day by day the manna fell;
Oh, to learn this lesson well;
Still by constant mercy fed,
Give me, Lord, my daily bread.

"Day by day" the promise reads;
Daily strength for daily needs;
Cast foreboding fears away:
Take the manna of to-day.

Lord, my times are in thy hand;
All my sanguine hopes have planned
To thy wisdom I resign,
And would make thy purpose mine.

Thou my daily task shalt give;
Day by day to thee I live;
So shall added years fulfil,
Not mine own, my Father's will.

Fond ambition, whisper not;
Happy is thy humble lot:
Anxious, busy cares, away;
I'm provided for to-day.

Oh, to live exempt from care,
By the energy of prayer:
Strong in faith with mind subdued,
Yet elate with gratitude!

—Jos. Conder.

Selected.

THE PILGRIM'S WANTS.

That adorning divine
Thou only, my God, canst bestow—
Not in those beautiful garments to shine,
Which distinguish thy household below.

At every moment to feel
That thy Spirit resides in my heart;
His power is present to cleanse and to heal—
And newness of life to impart.

Oh, I want to attain
Thine likeness, my Saviour! to thee,
Longed-for resemblance, once more to regain;
My comeliness put upon me!

Not to be marked for thine own,
My seal on my forehead to wear,
Receive that "new name" on the mystic white stone,
Which none but thyself can declare.

Not thine own hand to unbind
Each tie to terrestrial things—
Tenderly cherished, too closely entwined,
Where my heart too tenaciously clings.

Not by my aspect serene,
My actions and words to declare—
My treasure is placed in a country unseen,
That my heart's best affections are there.

Not as a traveller, to haste
Rait onward, nor pause on my way—
Forethought nor anxious contrivance to waste,
The tent only pitched for a day.

Not, and this sums up my prayer,
To glorify thee till I die;
To calmly to yield up my soul to thy care,
And breathe out in faith my last sigh.

—Anon.

Through all the depths of sin and loss
Drop the plummet of thy cross!
Never yet abyss was found,
Deeper than that cross could sound.

—J. G. Whittier.

LEAD THEM HOME.

Selected.

Lord, we can trust thee for our holy dead,
They, underneath the shadow of the tomb,
Have entered into peace; with bended head
We thank thee for their rest, and for our lightened gloom.

But, Lord, our living—who, on stormy seas
Of sin and sorrow, still are tempest-tossed!
Our dead have reached their haven, but for these—
Teach us to trust thee, Lord, for these, our loved and lost!

For these we make our passion-prayer to-night,
For these we cry to thee through the long day,
We see them not, oh, keep them in thy sight!
From them and us be thou not very far away.

And if not home to us, yet lead them home
To where thou standest at the heavenly gate;
That so, from thee they shall not further roam;
And grant us patient hearts thy gathering time to wait.

For "The Friend."

Natural History, Science, &c.

Sympathy in a Dog.—Dr. John Brown of Edinburgh relates the following anecdote: "I was walking down Duke Street, when I felt myself gently nipped in the leg. I turned, and there was a ragged little terrier crouching and abasing himself utterly, as if asking pardon for what he had done. He then stood up on end, and begged as only these coaxing little ruffians can.

"Being in a hurry, I curtly praised his performance with 'Good dog!' clapped his dirty sides, and, turning round, made down the hill; when presently the same nip, perhaps a little nipper—the same scene, only more intense—the same begging and urgent motioning of his short, shaggy paws. 'There's meaning in this,' said I to myself, and looked at him keenly and differently. He seemed to twig at once, and, with a shrill cry, was off much faster than I could. He stopped every now and then to see that I followed. This continued till, after going through sundry streets and bye-lanes, we came to a gate, under which my short-legged friend disappeared. Of course I couldn't follow him. This astonished him greatly. He came out to me, and as much as said, 'Why don't you come in?' I tried to open it but in vain. My friend vanished and was silent. I was leaving in despair and disgust, when I heard his muffled yelp far off round the end of the wall; and there he was, wild with excitement. I followed, and came to a place where, with a somewhat burglarious ingenuity, I got myself squeezed into a deserted coach-yard, lying all rude and waste.

"My peremptory small friend went under a shed, and disappeared through the window of an old coachbody, which had long ago parted from its wheels." In this retreat the benevolent doctor found a pointer and brood of puppies almost starved to death, on whom the sagacious terrier had taken compassion, and brought him there to relieve. The terrier found a home with the doctor, as he deserved, and lived to the age of 16, "healthy, and happy to the last." The pointer proved to be a valuable dog, and she and her pups sold for high prices.

New and Stale Bread.—The famous Leipzig physician, Prof. Reclam, has ventured to say a good word on behalf of newly baked bread. The majority of the old people, dyspeptics and hypochondriacs, he observes, say that they can only eat stale bread; they find new bread too indigestible. The virtue, he tells them, is not in the staleness of the bread, but in the care and thoroughness with which they are compelled to masticate it, on account of its hardness. The tongue not only deceives the human race in speaking, says the learned physician, it is a great deceiver in eating. As soon as the tongue perceives that any morsel in our mouth is soft and yielding, we are persuaded that it may safely be swallowed. No time or labor is spent upon its mastication.

Stale bread and hard biscuit, on the other hand, are not of themselves inherently so very digestible; but they give the eater so much trouble to soften them, that they are not swallowed until they have been reduced into a fit condition for that process. Hence the stomach has not that trouble with them which it almost invariably has with the softer and more delicate food, which has never received more than two or three turns with the teeth. Rapid eating and insufficient chewing are the two worst foes of the majority of dyspeptics and hypochondriacs, says our authority, and he advises such persons to transfer to their own carelessness and idleness nine-tenths of the blame which they are in the habit of laying upon their food, or upon their cooks.—London Globe.

Human Spittle Poisonous.—Dr. Claxton of Philadelphia, experimented on human saliva, by injecting portions of it under the skin in rabbits. In numerous instances it caused the death of the animal. The symptoms and appearances after death were similar to those produced by inoculating the rabbits with the saliva of a mad dog.

This virulence of the saliva is supposed to be due to the presence of minute living organisms, which multiply in the infected tissues, and poison the blood. They can be removed from the saliva by thorough filterings, and can be destroyed by boiling or by the use of carbolic acid.

The saliva of all individuals is not equally poisonous. The virulence is especially great in those whose occupation brings them much in contact with decomposing substances, in the residents of tropical countries, and in negroes as a race.

These experiments throw light on the cases recorded in surgical works, where a slight wound effected by the teeth has been followed by very serious results. Prof. Gross relates the case of a distinguished priest who struck a man upon the mouth, wounding his finger slightly against his teeth. Erysipelas supervened, and the hand had to be amputated; subsequently the disease reappeared in the stump, and necessitated the removal of the arm. A second case was in the person of a lady, of middle age, always in good health, who struck the back of her hand against the tooth of a servant girl, producing the merest scratch of the skin over the knuckle of the right index-finger; the part bled only a few drops, and caused hardly any pain at the time. Within two hours afterward, however, it began to throb and ache, the pain extending up the hand, and thence gradually up the limb as far as the armpit, where considerable enlargement of the glands soon took place. The forefinger swelled rapidly, and to an enormous degree; the hand and arm were also much tumefied, and a deep red line was seen passing along the limb. Great constitutional disturbance came on, attended with loss of sleep and appetite; a large abscess formed in the finger, with destruction of one of the bones, and welding together of the remaining bones of the finger. Upward of a year elapsed before the re-establishment of the general health.

THE FRIEND.

TENTH MONTH 7, 1882.

OHIO YEARLY MEETING.

The Yearly Meeting of Ministers and Elders and the Meeting for Sufferings convened on Seventh-day, 9th mo. 23rd.

In the Meeting for Sufferings a concern was opened to encourage the members of the Yearly Meeting to a more general acquaintance with the approved religious writings of our Society, to discourage the reading of doctrinal works which had not been officially sanctioned, and might contain a mixture of truth and error, and to caution against a tendency to speculative inquiries into religious subjects, which have often been a means of leading persons away from the Truth. The natural man knoweth not the things of the Spirit of God, neither can he know them, because they are spiritually discerned. We need, therefore, the openings of Divine Grace to give us a true conception of spiritual truths; and those who rely on their own intellectual powers in interpreting the Scriptures, and building up a doctrinal edifice, are building on a sandy foundation. The result of the concern was the appointment of a committee to prepare a minute of advice on these points, to be sent down to the members, if it should be approved by the Yearly Meeting.

The meetings for worship held in the morning and afternoon of First-day, 9th mo. 24th, were exceedingly crowded—not only with Friends, but with many others from the surrounding country, who assembled on this occasion. There were probably 1500 persons in the house, and perhaps 2000 in all about the premises, including those who could not find room in the building. The continued arriving of new comers, and the difficulty in finding seats for them, necessarily prevented the meeting in the morning from becoming soon settled. A large number of those in attendance had brought provisions with them; and during the interval between the morning and afternoon meetings they might be seen scattered about on the grass among the trees, partaking of their refreshments. It was a curious and interesting scene. Though some of these strangers may have regarded the occasion somewhat as a picnic, or may have been induced to come through curiosity, yet it is to be hoped that good impressions were made on the minds of some. This hope probably enables Friends to bear with more willingness the burthens and unsettlement which are inseparable from the presence of such crowds.

The close proximity of the Yearly Meeting school-building, which is used at this season as a boarding-house, proves a great convenience. A large number of Friends are entertained there during the week at a moderate expense; and the opportunity is thus given for a cultivation of social intercourse, the revival of former friendships, and the formation of new ones. A concern appeared to rest on Friends that this unbending of the mind should not be carried so far as to unfit for the right performance of the duties for which they were assembled.

Second-day, 9th mo. 25th.—The general meeting for business commenced at 10 A. M., and the opening was favored with a quiet solemnity, under which tender advice was extended to the younger members, that they might dwell under an exercise of spirit for the right performance of the business of the Church, and thus be instrumental in supporting those on whom the burthens principally fall. Their quiet settlement and abiding in their proper places would tend to preserve the dignity of the meeting, and they would be under preparation to take the places of those who were being removed from the church militant.

An appeal from the judgment of one of the Quarterly Meetings was taken up and the appellant being invited in, a committee of four from each of the Quarters, except that to which he belonged, was appointed to examine into the case. At a subsequent sitting they reported in favor of confirming the judgment of the Quarterly Meeting.

The report from Pennsville Quarter contained a reference to the subject of secret societies. It stated, that it was a violation of the principles of our Society and of the spirit of the discipline, for members to join with Odd Fellows and take part in their proceedings; but, as that organization was not mentioned by name in the Discipline, they desired that the Yearly Meeting would take such action as would remove any uncertainty as to the application of the discipline to such cases. Remarks were made by many Friends discouraging any connection with secret societies as injurious in its effects upon our members. There appeared also a feeling of tenderness towards those who had been caught in this snare; and a desire was expressed that the younger members might not think that a disposition existed to draw the line too closely, or to restrict their liberties more than was prompted by a wisely directed desire for their real welfare. The whole subject of secret societies was referred to a large committee, who were authorized to prepare and submit to the Yearly Meeting some modification of the existing clause of the discipline on that subject.

The clerk stated that a paper had been put in his hands purporting to be from a Yearly Meeting held in Iowa. As directed by the discipline in such cases, it was given to a few Friends, verbally nominated, for examination. In accordance with their report, the epistle was read at the close of the meeting. It was a brief document, which stated that they wished to convey to Ohio Yearly Meeting official information of their existence as a body—that they had long been under oppression, and that since they had met separate from those with whom they were formerly in connection they had been astonished to find how much they had been kept in the dark as to the principles involved in the movements that had been going on in the Society.

Third-day, 9th mo. 26th.—The Meeting of Ministers and Elders convened at an early hour. A lively exercise spread over it that the members of that meeting should be faithful in the training of their children and families. The necessity of properly restraining, as well as of advising and persuading them, was plainly and pointedly expressed; and the sound and wholesome doctrine was pressed on the attention of those present that no advice was likely to be very effective, unless heads of families were themselves redeemed from a worldly spirit, and were seeking kingdom of Heaven and the righteousness thereof above all other considerations.

A concern for the promotion of unity the subordinate select meetings and for strengthening and encouragement of the members in the performance of their duty took strong hold of the meeting, and led to the appointment, with much unity, of a committee of men and women to visit and labor in those meetings as way might open there. The business of the meeting was transacted with weight and dignity.

The general Yearly Meeting came together at 11 o'clock, and the state of Society, shown by the answers to the Queries, passed under review. Much religious exercise prevailed, and judicious advice and exhortations were given, mostly in a condensed and weighty manner. So that it was generally felt to be a very favored sitting.

Sympathy was expressed with those who are constitutionally liable to drowsiness; and they were encouraged to persevere in the struggle against this infirmity, looking to the Lord for help and strength, and endeavoring to maintain a lively and fervent spirit while assembled for Divine worship. It was suggested also that it would be judicious for some on the mornings of meeting days to avoid exhausting their bodily energies by excess of labor, or partaking too largely of food, which sometimes tends to produce drowsiness.

The nature of our testimony to pure spiritual worship was brought to view, and the consistency therewith of attending at places of worship where a stated ministry is exercised; and religiously concerned Friends were encouraged privately and tenderly to advise such of our members as were in danger of violating this testimony, and to point out to them the inconsistency of such a course with our views as to the nature of true Gospel ministry, which can only be exercised under the fresh anointing and command of the Holy Spirit of the Church.

The flowing of Gospel love towards the younger members was abundantly manifested, seeking to draw them into the safe enclosure of the Heavenly Shepherd. Such of them as had not yet seen for themselves the importance of our testimony to plainness and simplicity were reminded of the duty of honoring their parents by submission to their advice, of honoring the religious Society which they were members by obeying counsels, and of walking in the footsteps of the flock of Christ's companions.

The bell for evening collection at the school-buildings rings about 8 P. M., when the families assemble in the collecting room; a chapter from the Bible is read, and a time of silent follows, which is sometimes broken by the expression of counsel or concern. These opportunities are often instructive—and by 9 P. M. most of the inmates have retired to their rooms.

One of the interesting features of the present annual gathering has been the presence at it of several persons who had been members of the Binns' Meeting, but who had believed it right for them to join a body where the meetings are conducted more nearly in accordance with the principles of Friends than among those persons with whom they had before been connected. This was the Yearly Meeting some of these had attended, since becoming members. It was pleasant to notice the satisfaction and enjoyment which they derived from thus mingling with Friends, and being at meetings where the gospel doctrines upheld by our Society in the beginning were proclaimed afresh with a mixture of error. One of them in simple language said in the meeting, that he had been from home, wandering as in a wilderness, and he rejoiced in feeling that he had more found a home.

The doctrine preached in the meeting for the night on Fourth-day morning was sound, well-balanced, bearing full testimony to the atonement and divinity of our Saviour Jesus Christ; and to his coming in the heart of man by the Spirit to redeem man from sin and to bring him in the way of righteousness. It was satisfactory to hear this latter part of the text of man's redemption clearly set forth, and to see there has been a tendency in some of our churches (though not so far as we have heard, among Friends of Ohio Yearly Meeting) to gain, as referring to a second personal appearance in the world of our Saviour, those passages of Scripture which have heretofore been regarded by the Society of Friends as affirming the essential doctrine of his coming by the Spirit into the hearts of all men, there to carry out the work of individual redemption and sanctification. It is to be a perversion of the work of a Gospel minister, for a preacher to amuse his audience by disquisitions on a second outward coming of our Saviour; while he neglects to draw their attention to the inshining of his light in their hearts, which is a practical and of vital importance to every individual. At the meeting on Fourth-day afternoon the first business that claimed care was the report of the committee appointed a year ago to take into consideration the condition of the scattered remnants of Society. This committee had met several times and been brought into sympathy with those who had been endeavoring to maintain our doctrines and testimonies. They proposed that a conference on this subject should be continued by the Yearly Meeting, with permission to visit Friends and their meetings wherever they were, so that they might obtain more information concerning them and their situation; and report the result to the Yearly Meeting next year. This proposition was fully united with—and the same conference continued under appointment with the nomination of one name.

It was then concluded to make no minute book any action at the present in reference to the epistle from Iowa which had been read at the previous session.

Observing the remarks made in the meeting when this subject of the scattered remnants of our Society was under consideration, and in listening to the conversation of some of the members at other times; it was evident that many felt the importance of being wisely directed in their course in this matter. The feeling of sympathy with those who profess to be contending for some precious doctrines opens the heart (as it is right it should) towards all such; and under the influence of this feeling it is probable some might be willing at once to lend the right hand of fellowship, and an official recognition of the organizations with which they are connected. But the course taken by the meeting in avoiding any such recognition at this time, and giving its committee permission to visit and inquire into the condition and circumstances of Friends elsewhere, showed the prevalence of a wise and prudent spirit. As was said by some, they had too little knowledge of the real situation of the Friends towards whom their minds were drawn—of the questions of discipline which might be involved in their organization,—of their views in regard to some subjects of practical importance, such as First-day schools, and other benevolent movements—of the spirit by which they were actuated, &c.

The visits and labors of such a committee as that appointed by Ohio Yearly Meeting, if performed under Divine direction, can scarcely fail to be widely useful in removing the ignorance which exists in many places, and encouraging to a steady adherence to the principles of Friends. It may ultimately be found, that its service in this direction may be of greater importance than in the obtaining of information for the use of Ohio Yearly Meeting; and even that it may be helpful to many who belong to meetings which have affiliated with the Binns' body, in strengthening them to bear a faithful testimony for the Truth and against error.

Fifth-day, 9th mo. 28th.—The business was finished in one lengthened sitting.

The Boarding School report showed that the expenditures for the year had exceeded the income by about $20, a very small sum considering that the number of scholars had been less than 60 in the Winter Session, and considerably smaller in the Summer Session. It was stated that the "Benevolent Fund," for the gratuitous education of children, was applied only in cases where one-half of the cost was defrayed from other sources. To relieve a class of children, whose parents were unable to pay any part of the expense of their education at the Boarding School, the meeting directed $300 to be raised and placed in the hands of the committee.

Much interest was manifested in the right training of children (of whom it was reported there were 718 of school age), and especially in their education under the tuition of members of our own religious Society.

To the committee charged with the circulation of the approved writings of Friends, the sum of $100 was appropriated.

One of the Quarterly Meetings sent up on its report a reference to the low state of its answers, especially to the Second Query. The minute of advice sent down in reply was a model of sententious brevity—being, as nearly as can be recollected, as follows: "Keep low before the Lord, and avoid controversy, tale-bearing and detraction."

The minutes of the Meeting for Sufferings contained an Address to the members of the Yearly Meeting, cautioning them against reading a work entitled "Salvation by Christ," lately reprinted in England, on the ground that it had been originally published contrary to the discipline of the Society, and after having been examined by the Meetings for Sufferings of three Yearly Meetings, and by them deemed unsuitable for publication. Friends were advised in the address to read the Journals of our members as contained in 'The Friends' Library'; and avoid speculative discussions on doctrinal subjects; and to be diligent in the perusal of the Holy Scriptures with a mind turned to the illuminations of that Divine Spirit, which only would enable them fully to comprehend the spiritual truths contained in them.

Some extracts from the writings of Robert Barclay and Joseph Phipps were introduced into the Address, showing the belief of the Society of Friends in the great doctrine of the Atonement.

The Address was united with by the Yearly Meeting and directed to be published.

The committee on the subject of Secret Societies proposed so altering the present discipline against Free Masonry, as to include in it a prohibition of Friends joining in similar secret organizations and associations. The proposal was adopted.

Report was made that the debt on the Boarding School buildings had been fully discharged, and it was concluded that the subscriptions yet unpaid, as they were received, should be added to the fund for the gratuitous education of children at the school.

Two hundred dollars were placed in the hands of a committee to assist in providing for the education of children under the care of teachers in membership with us.

At the meetings for business (which are restricted to members) there were about one thousand persons in attendance, perhaps nearly equally divided as to sex.

SUMMARY OF EVENTS.

UNITED STATES.—The Secretary of the Interior has decided to reopen for settlement a tract of about 10,000,000 acres of agricultural lands in Northern Dakota, which were withdrawn from settlement several years ago by Secretary Schurz. The lands, which once formed part of the great Sioux reservation, were withdrawn from the settlement pending the consideration of a claim to their occupancy by a roving band of Chippewas. This claim is now decided to be invalid.

The lands of the Florida Improvement Company, nearly four millions of acres, it is stated will be offered this week for sale at $1.25 per acre, the Government price.

The Chief of the Bureau of Statistics reports that the values of the imports of merchandise into the United States during the twelve months ended 8th mo. 31st, 1882, were $741,983,917; and for the corresponding months of the preceding year, $643,248,555, being an increase of $98,735,362 for the year ended 8th mo. 31st, 1882. The values of the exports of domestic and foreign merchandise from the United States during the twelve months ended 8th mo. 31st, 1882, were $737,038,772, and for the twelve months ended 8th mo. 31st, 1881, $894,717,454, a decrease of $157,678,682 for the twelve months ended 8th mo. 31st, 1882.

Six steamers cleared from New Orleans on Seventh-day last week, with 359,935 bushels of wheat, the largest shipment ever made from that port in one day.

The steamer Belgie arrived at San Francisco from China and Japan. Her advices confirm the previous reports that on 8th mo. 30th the Korean Government acceded to all the Japanese demands. It pledged itself, first, to arrest the insurgents within twenty days, and duly punish them, Japanese delegates to be present at the trial. Second. To properly bury the bodies of the murdered and pay 50,000 yen to their families. Third. To pay Japan 500,000 yen indemnity for expenditure, &c., in five yearly instalments. Fourth. To allow Japanese troops in Seoul, for protection of the Legation, and to provide accommodations for them. Fifth. To send apology by special embassy to Japan. Sixth. To gradually extend privileges to the Japanese residents and traders. Seventh. To afford conveniences for travel throughout Corea for the Japanese officials. While the negotiations were going on the Chinese Envoy suddenly brought his troops to Seoul, the capital, and seizing Tai-on-Kun, the king's father, the chief rebel and assassin, placed him on board a vessel and carried him to Tientsin. It is probable that this was done to maintain the Chinese theory of sovereignty over Corea. U. S. Minister Young arrived at Peking about the middle of 8th month, and his first important act was to cause the war ship Monocacy to go to Corea to watch events. It is said his action "was intended, in a large degree, as an expression of moral sympathy toward Japan."

The total debt, less cash in the Treasury 10th month 1st, was $1,644,120,223, a decrease during 9th month of $14,805,948.

The Tariff Commissioners have been in session the present week in New York city.

Joseph K. McCammon, Assistant Attorney General for the Interior Department, has returned to Washington from California and Montana. While in Montana he visited the Flathead reservation and negotiated an agreement with the Flatheads to allow the Northern Pacific Railroad to be built through their reservation, a distance of fifty-three miles. They are to receive $23,000 for the concession.

St. Louis and its vicinity were slightly shaken by an earthquake at 18 minutes past 4 o'clock on the morning of 9th mo. 27th. The shock lasted about 15 seconds. In the centre of the city "a rolling even noise" was noticed, followed by twelve distinct vibrations at apparently regular intervals, the first vibration being the strongest. Earthquake shocks were felt at Centralia and Springfield, Illinois, at nearly the same time. At Centralia the shock was accompanied by rumbling sounds, and awoke "nearly all sleepers." The earthquake was also felt at Vincennes, Indiana, where it "rattled windows and lasted three minutes."

In Southern New Jersey the destruction of incoming crops has been heavy throughout the district swept by the rain. Large fields of corn which had been nearly prostrated by a previous storm, were beaten down by the rain in consequence of the ground becoming moist and soft, and in some low places the ripening ears are buried in mud and water. Potatoes are washed out, and buckwheat fields are nearly ruined.

Farmers, however, have sown but little grain for next year's crops, thus saving the seed from rotting. It is thought that the storm will also cause the loss of considerable of the cranberry crop, as the bogs are so flooded as to interfere with picking. Grapes have been injured to some extent, the excess of rain causing them to lose their sweetness.

The steamer Robert E. Lee was burned on the Mississippi river, about thirty miles below Vicksburg, early on Seventh-day morning, and twenty-one passengers and hands are believed to have perished. The Lee was a large side-wheel steamer, of 1479 tons burthen, and the loss on the vessel and cargo is estimated at $175,000.

Yellow fever continues to prevail at Pensacola, Florida.

The deaths in Philadelphia for the week ending 9th month 30th, numbered 438, as compared with 350 for the previous week, and 404 for the corresponding week of last year. Of the whole number, 187 were males and 161 females: 60 died of consumption; 30 of diphtheria; 19 of marasmus; 19 of old age; 14 of typhoid fever, and 9 of croup.

Markets, &c.—U. S. 3½'s, 101; 4½'s, 113; 4's, registered, 118½; coupon, 119½; currency 6's, 133.

Cotton.—There was no essential change to notice in price or demand. Sales of middlings are reported at 12½ a 13 cts. per lb. for uplands and New Orleans.

Petroleum.—Standard white, 7½ cts. for export, and 8½ cts. per gallon for home use.

Flour continues dull, but prices were unchanged. Sales of 225 barrels low winters at $3.25; 350 barrels sour springs at $4.50 a $5; 350 barrels Minnesota bakers' extras at $6.75; 300 barrels do. do. straight at $7.25; 275 barrels Pennsylvania extra family, medium, at $4.87½; 400 barrels, do. do. good, at $5; 200 barrels do. do. fancy at $5.10; 125 barrels Ohio do. do., choice, at $5.75; 175 barrels do. do., fancy, at $6; 125 barrels Southern Illinois do. do. at $5.75; 125 barrels Ohio patent at $6.50; 125 barrels do. do. fancy, at $7.25; 125 barrels Minnesota do. do., fair, at $8; 125 do. do. choice, at $8.25; 175 barrels do. do., fancy, at $8.50, and 750 barrels City Mills family on private terms. Rye flour was scarce and the market was firm.—Pennsylvania, $4.25 a $4.37½. Corn meal was nominally quoted at $4.50 per barrel for Brandywine. Bran.—Winter wheat sells at $17 a $17.50, and spring at $16 a $16.50 per ton.

Grain.—Wheat was a fraction higher. Sales of 4000 bushels Delaware longberry, track, at $1.07 a $1.08; 3200 bush. Delaware, red, track, at $1.04; 4700 bush. No. 2 red, in elevator, at $1.04½; 3200 bush. rejected, at 85 a 90 cts. In rye there was nothing doing. Corn was firmer. Sales of 3000 bush. sail yellow, in grain depot, at 71 cts.; 3900 bush. sail mixed, in grain depot, at 70 cts., and 4800 bush. steamer, on track at Richmond, at 69 cts. Oats were unsettled. Sales of six cars rejected mixed at 27 a 28 cts.; four cars not rejected, white, at 26 a 27 cts.; two cars fair do. at 32 cts.; five cars good do. do. at 50½ cts; two cars No. 4 mixed at 34 a 35 cts.; two cars ungraded white at 40 cts., and three cars low No. 3 do. at 40 cts., with No. 2 do. in grain depot and elevator quoted at 40 a 43 cts.

Hay and Straw Market, for week ending 9th mo. 30th, 1882.—Loads of hay, 275; loads of straw, 35. Average price during the week—Prime timothy, $1.00 to $1.10 per 100 pounds; mixed, 95 cts. to $1.05 per 100 pounds; straw, 70 to 80 cts. per 100 pounds.

Beef cattle were in demand, at about former rates: 4400 head arrived and sold at the different yards at 4 a 7½ cts. per pound, as to condition.

Sheep were in fair demand, but prices were a fraction lower: 15,000 head arrived and sold at the different yards at 3 a 5½ cts., and lambs at 4 a 7½ cts. per lb., as to quality.

Hogs were steady: 3800 head arrived and sold at the different yards at 11 a 12½ cts. per lb., the latter rate for extra.

FOREIGN.—A hurricane prevailed in Ireland on the 1st inst. At Cork more damage was done on land than had been caused by any previous storm for twenty years past. The American ship Harry Mills, from Liverpool for New York, lying at Queenstown, was driven ashore, and several yachts were sunk in the harbor. At Newry, a large number of houses were greatly damaged, and the town was flooded. At Limerick, twenty feet of the spire of a Catholic church building was blown down during the service, causing a panic among the congregation, which was, however, quickly allayed. The County Jail was damaged.

Henry Fawcett, Postmaster General, speaking at Hackney recently, said: "England had no selfish object. Her chief concern is to secure to the Egyptians the best government and the greatest amount of liberty possible. The abuse connected with the late control will be avoided in future. The Egyptians will not have to submit to the injustice of an unduly large part of their revenues being appropriated by foreign officials."

Marshal Serrano, one of the Liberal leaders in the Spanish Cortez, announces his intention, upon the re-assembling of the Senate, to declare for the Constitution of 6th mo. 1st, 1869, which made the king inviolable and irresponsible, and placed all responsibility upon Ministers. The Ministry and their supporters have resolved to oppose it.

Sir Edward Malet, the British Consul-General at Cairo, thinks that an army of 10,000 men will be required in Egypt as a permanent garrison. Clothing for that number is being landed at Alexandria.

The Times, in a leader, says it has been decided to retain, for the present, 12,000 men in Egypt to carry on and consolidate the work for which the suppression of Arabi Pasha does little more than clear the way.

The Daily Telegraph's despatch from Cairo, referring to the explosion of an ammunition train there on the 27th ult., says: A train from Benha had arrived with the Sixtieth Rifles, when an ammunition wagon in the station exploded, killing a doctor, who was in the train with invalids, and some men. The train was ignited and the fire spread to the railroad depot, which was quickly burned. The flames next reached the Commissariat depot, adjoining, and thence extended to some of our magazines, which exploded. Subsequent to the first explosion, two Arabs were seized in the act of firing trucks; a third escaped.

Five battalions of troops have been despatched from Constantinople to the Hedjaz, Arabia, where an outbreak is reported. The outbreak is probably connected with the recent deposition of the Grand Shereef of Mecca.

It is semi-officially announced in Berlin, that the Powers expect a communication from Great Britain within a few days soliciting an expression of their views upon the state of affairs in Egypt.

De Lesseps, writing to the Times says, regarding the proposed second canal, his company possesses for ninety-nine years the exclusive privilege of maritime communication between the Gulf of Pelusium and the Bay of Suez. The Times says it entertains grave doubts of the validity of this claim.

In strong contrast with Gen. Drenteln's recent speech against the Jews, Gen. Todleben, speaking at Wilna, has publicly expressed his belief in the impartiality and disinterestedness of the Jewish members of that municipality, and the hope that their advice would be taken as readily as that of Christians.

According to the budget of the financial department for 1883, the Russian revenue from indirect taxes for the financial year of 1882 exceeded the estimate by 9,778,000 roubles.

The report of the settlement of the Turko-Greek frontier question by the surrender to Greece of the whole frontier fixed by the International Commission is officially confirmed. The Porte has promised Greece that it will order the Turks to evacuate all the points on the frontier without delay.

The floods in the Tyrol have reduced hundred wealthy landowners to poverty. The laboring class in terrible distress. The approach of winter greatly aggravates the situation.

Recent advices from Presburg report the occurrence of anti-Jewish riots at that place. The mob broke windows of many houses occupied by Jews. The military finally restored order after making forty arrests. The military are confined to their barracks. The nistry have placed the Presburg district under martial law. Six hundred Jewish families have left the on account of the riots.

Three members of the Salvation Army, who recently arrived in Calcutta, have been arrested in order to prevent a riot which was imminent. Only one of the contingent which arrived there a short time ago is now liberty.

Small-pox is spreading at Cape Town, Africa. A tewayo has arrived there from England.

The Mexican Congress has adopted a constitutional amendment providing that "in the event of the death or removal of the President his successor shall be Senator who presided over the Senate during the month preceding the vacancy. When the Senate is not in session the President of the Permanent Committee, is alternately a Senator or a Deputy, is to succeed. The case of a permanent vacancy the electors are to convene immediately." The Chief Justice has hitherto been an ex-officio Vice-President.

An epidemic of cholera, or cholera morbus, prevails in portions of the Mexican State of Chiapa. Two eight deaths in one day have been reported in Uxltown of 5000 inhabitants. A quarantine has been established by the Government. It is said that "a similar disease, but less violent, appears in that region every year, caused by cutting dye wood."

A telegram from Montreal says that the Island Anticosti, in the St. Lawrence, containing over 2,000 acres, is to be sold by auction to settle a law-suit.

WESTTOWN BOARDING SCHOOL.

The WINTER SESSION begins on Second-day, Tenth month 30th, 1882. Parents and others intending send pupils, will please make early application JONATHAN G. WILLIAMS, Supt., address Westtown Philadelphia Co., Pa.; or to CHARLES J. ALLEN, Treas. 304 Arch St., Philadelphia. Terms, $30 per session.

THE CORPORATION OF HAVERFORD COLLEGE.

A Stated Annual Meeting of "The Corporation of Haverford College" will be held in the Committee-room of Arch Street Meeting-house, Philadelphia, on Thid day, Tenth month 10th, 1882, at 3 o'clock, P. M. EDWARD BETTLE, Jr., Secretary.

WANTED,

A woman Friend, as teacher in the Boarding School for Indian children, at Tunasassa; also one to assist the matron in care of the household. Apply to Jos. S. Elkinton, 325 Pine street, Philadelphia, John Sharpless, Chester, Delaware Co., Pa. Ephraim Smith, 1110 Pine street, Philadelphia.

FRIENDS' ASYLUM FOR THE INSANE, Near Frankford, (Twenty third Ward,) Philadelphia.

Physician and Superintendent—JOHN C. HALL, M. D. Applications for the Admission of Patients may be made to the Superintendent, or to any of the Board Managers.

MARRIED, at Friends' Meeting-house, Media, Delaware Co., Pa., on Fourth-day, the 13th of Ninth month 1882, JOSEPH J. WALTON, of Philadelphia, and MARY M., daughter of Clarkson Sheppard, of the former place, at Friends' Meeting, Wilmington, Del., Fifth-day, Ninth month 28th, 1882, WILLIAM PE EVANS, of Malvern, Pa., to MARY, daughter of John and Lucy R. Tatum, of Wilmington, Del.

DIED, on the 26th of First month, 1882, MARMADU JAY, son of William and Rachel Jay, aged 70 years months and 7 days, a member of Salem Monthly Meeting of Friends, Iowa. He was born in Warren county Ohio, 19th of Tenth mo. 1811. For the last twenty years he was much concerned for the safety of the city of Friends; often was engaged in exhortation to council, in which he was favored with an excellent

WILLIAM H. PILE, PRINTER,
No. 422 Walnut Street.

THE FRIEND.

A RELIGIOUS AND LITERARY JOURNAL.

OL. LVI.

SEVENTH-DAY, TENTH MONTH 14, 1882.

NO. 10.

PUBLISHED WEEKLY.

if paid in advance, $2.00 per annum; if not paid in advance $2.50; 10 cents extra is charged for Postage on those sent by mail.

Articles designed for insertion to be addressed to
JOSEPH WALTON,
MOORESTOWN, BURLINGTON CO., N. J.

Subscriptions, payments and business communications, received by
JOHN S. STOKES,
NO. 116 NORTH FOURTH STREET, UP STAIRS,
PHILADELPHIA.

Condensed from "The British Friend."

Sundry Observations on America.

(Concluded from page 67.)

After visiting the lively States, Canada appears rather flat and uninteresting.

I have twice visited New England, comprising States on or near the ocean, viz: Maine, Massachusetts, Rhode Island, Connecticut, Vermont, and New Hampshire. All put together, they would not be so large as some of the States in the west, but the people are more enterprising there than anywhere. Stories of all descriptions abound, because of the abundant water-power they afford, and the convenience of access by waterway.

That the American people are industrious and enterprising beyond all other people in the world, I have no doubt. Take as an instance Chicago, a city nearly 1000 miles from New York, in Illinois State, at the corner of Lake Michigan.

In 1830 it had a population of 100 only; ten years after it had become the metropolis of the north-west, and the greatest railway centre on the Continent, as also the greatest grain market in the world.

Its present population is about half-a-million. Many of its streets are seven miles long, and it contains over 700. To facilitate drainage, about 1857 they raised the business portion of the city from three to eight feet, raising the largest houses bodily.

In the autumn of 1871 a fire occurred there, the most terrific of modern times. It raged with an incredible fury for two days and nights, and a great storm alone stopped its progress. It destroyed the best buildings in the city—30 hotels, 1600 stores, and 17,450 houses. The total area destroyed was three and a half square miles.

I puzzled me how fire could destroy magnificent churches (so-called), built with masonry and stone; but when I viewed it, I was astonished to find they were as much ruins as the houses; the fire had charred and crumbled the stone, that they fell or were wrecked. A hundred million dollars' worth of property was destroyed in that fire. Merchants and millionaires were fed on government rations.

They could not rebuild until the frost broke next spring, and then within seven months, in 100 working days of eight hours, they had rebuilt and completed 1600 warehouses of the most substantial kind in iron and stone, five stories high, 50 to 100 feet frontage, or one foot for every working hour of that time. There is no precedent in the world's history, of such bravery and indomitable energy.

We were often asked how we liked America? and I answered, "If I were not an Englishman I would be an American." With all the recommendations of the States (and they are many and vast), I prefer England first and best.

Life and property are more secure at home. Liberty, all things considered, is equal. Law, order, and justice, deficient as we may be, are better observed in England. A sovereign will buy more in England than thirty shillings in America, while luxuries are as two to one in our favor.

I do not wonder that English farm laborers emigrate there, and do well. They get land for next to nothing. They have worked hard and they mean to work; and it is odd if they cannot cultivate fertile ground and grow crops sufficient for their necessary existence, with a balance to the good besides, in a few years. They are slaves at home as to work; they are slaves there; yet, being volunteers, they are worth three press-men, having an eye to emancipation, when after steady years of toil they pay for their land, build themselves a farm, and sell their surplus crops. Then being free men, they can employ laborers, and rest their weary bones.

If you take the leading American paper, the New York Herald, and the leading English one, the Telegraph, and notice for a week the number of murders, shootings, assaults, suicides, and robberies, reported in each, it will soon prove what I say, that law, order, justice, life, and property, are far ahead in dear old England.

Yet the prosperity of America is marvellous, and I believe is likely to be more so. They move with rapid strides, eclipsing all precedents. Everything conspires to favor their development into the most prosperous nation on earth. They must succeed in spite of themselves, but if they help with good laws and Government, they will outstrip every country with rapidity.

Their isolated geographical position between the Atlantic and Pacific Oceans, excludes them from the alarms, rivalries, and jealousies of foreign continents, with their large standing armies, monster guns, balance of powers, wars, and preparations for wars, so ruinous in expense and demoralizing to the people.

They have a square, compact country of 38 States and some Territories, extending from ocean to ocean, containing millions of acres of rich and fertile land, not a quarter of which is yet cultivated. Their climate, though hot, is healthy. Railways intersect all parts of the States, and rapidly multiply.

Emigrants arrive in prodigious numbers from Germany, Ireland, Norway, Russia,

Holland, and all parts. They are the cream skimmed from all countries—the bone and muscle, the sinew and sinew of nations—honest, healthy, willing toilers, constituting the wealth, energy, vitality, and prosperity of a country—for labor is wealth; money is only its representative.

In New York alone, while we were there, these emigrants were arriving at the rate of 2000 a day—a quarter million in the last six months, and four millions in the last ten years.

The population of America is now about 54 millions, against 36 millions in Great Britain. America has doubled its population in 25 years, while we have only increased one-fifth. In round numbers, America for 30 years past has increased in numbers at the rate of a million a year, or more than the increase in Great Britain, France, Germany, Austro-Hungary, and Italy put together.

Free from wars and rumors of wars, free from conscription of the army, free from taxes to support an unproductive army to alarm their neighbors,—with a teeming and industrious population, earnestly engaged in useful and reproductive pursuits, blessed with peace and favored with good trade, I ask, What can prevent their becoming the most prosperous nation? They may delay it by selfish laws; but without unforeseen events they cannot prevent its consummation.

But the Americans, though isolated from Europe and the world, have not been without their big wars. The War of Independence a century ago, lasting 8 years, was a heavy burden. They obtained their object, however, and recovered again. In 1812 they declared war against England, and fighting lasted two years without much glory. They recovered from that and grew prosperous, when the question of holding slaves in bondage produced a civil war between the Northern States, who had liberated their slaves, and the Southern States, who lived by their slaves' labor. This occurred in 1861, and lasted four years, a fierce, terrible civil war. They were then the dis-united States. The South, fighting for their livings (as they thought), fought desperately, and prevailed for a long time. Nothing could stand against their firmness and fury; but they were poor and far less numerous, and so in four years they were thoroughly exhausted. Slavery was abolished. The States were again united. The South are able to live quite as well without their slaves, and the breach is nearly healed.

Previous to the War, the States had no "National Debt," and therefore no interest to pay on it. But to support the war, they had to borrow money at such a high rate, and in such quantities, that their "National Debt" at its close, was about £550,000,000, or two-thirds the amount of ours. It was almost a question of bankruptcy, but the enormous find of gold in their mines in California at that time assisted them to tide over the emergency. In a few years they received from these mines £250,000,000 in gold.

Taking a leaf out of our noble Gladstone's book, they decided that the present generation should pay for the war, and posterity should not be burdened and saddled with the expense of wars fought for their pleasure. So they put a heavy protective duty on most imported articles, the staples as well as the luxuries of existence, and by that means they pay, not only the interest, but also from 20 to 30 millions of pounds annually off the principal sum of their National Debt. In the 17 years since the war they have reduced the amount of debt by near £200,000,000, besides lowering the interest considerably.

They adopt Free Trade in their postal system. A halfpenny post-card or a threehalfpenny letter may go three thousand miles. Like us, they find such liberality pays well; it is self-supporting, besides adding to the revenue.

Their railway fares are dearer than in any other part of the world I have travelled in. In Germany, France, Austria, Italy, Norway, Sweden and Denmark, as well as in England, you can travel, on an average, for about half the price. Take an instance: The fare between New York and Philadelphia, the two largest mercantile cities in the United States, is 10s. 6d.—a distance of only 87 miles. The rails run over almost a dead level. The land was inexpensive, and the trains, as in most parts of America, run along the main streets of towns on their way, without any fence or enclosure whatever—all for cheapness—and yet they charge such exorbitant and uncivilized fares. They will, I daresay, presently see beyond these barbarous customs. The railway carriages are on the saloon principle—doors at the end instead of the sides. So you can walk from carriage to carriage, and from one end of the train to the other, while in motion. In each carriage, they have a cistern of ice drinking water, with cups, a W. C., and in cold weather, two stoves to warm with. They collect and punch tickets as you travel, to save time. They are often elegantly fitted; but, to my mind, our English plan and carriages are preferable.

It cannot be denied that the Americans are clever and very ingenious. The shops in London exclusively devoted to the sale of Yankee notions will prove this. Their inventive faculties are of a high order; but, on inspection, it will be found there is little finish about their goods. Their many novel inventions are labor-saving appliances. That is the main design in all; and in discovering these improvements, they seem to abjure all rules and conventions, and apply sound common-sense to their object in view, and with the result of astonishing us with their simplicity and usefulness.

I will sum up the matter, and conclude by repeating my assertion, that I would be an American if I were not an Englishman.

GEORGE PITT.

Mitcham, Surrey, 12th 8th mo., 1882.

It is a true conception of Horace Bushnell, that

"Preaching is nothing but the bursting out of life, which has first burst in or up from where God is, among the soul's foundations."

How much then that passes for preaching is utterly unworthy of the name.—Ep. Recorder.

For "The Friend."

Religious Views and Tenets.

If we, in our meetings for worship, speak or read or pray or sing in our own strength, it amounts to nothing higher than an act between man and man; and should not claim to be true worship. For "God is a spirit; and they that worship Him must worship him in spirit and in truth." Yes in truth, not in imitation of the truth. For God under the old dispensation forbid all manner of similitudes. "He that speaketh of himself (without the constraining power of the Holy Spirit) seeketh his own glory. But he that seeketh the glory of Him that sent him, the same is true, and no unrighteousness is in him." Then "he that glorieth, let him glory in the Lord." For

"If self employ us whatso'er is wrought,
We glorify that self, not Him we ought."

Although Paul was a man of learning, yet when he was sent out to preach the gospel, it was "not with wisdom of words, lest the cross of Christ should be made of none effect." For he says he "came not with excellency of speech or of wisdom declaring unto you the testimony of God." And he says he "was with them in weakness and in fear, and in much trembling. And my speech and my preaching was not with enticing words of man's wisdom, but in demonstration of the spirit and of power, that their faith should not stand in the wisdom of men, but in the power of God." And here let me in all sincerity ask, Is it not one of the great evils of our day, that the faith of so many now who are seeking the way to Zion, stands more in the wisdom and eloquence of men than in the power of God?

How was it with Apollos? He was an eloquent man, and mighty in the Scriptures, and was instructed in the way of the Lord; and being fervent in the Spirit, he spake and taught diligently the things of the Lord, knowing only the baptism of John. Yes; knowing no deeper baptism than that of John, which was only a superficial and elementary work; designed to prepare the way of the Lord; yet he began to speak boldly in the synagogue. But when he had the way of God expounded unto him more perfectly, in a deeper work, he went on in his ministry, and helped them much which had believed through grace. For he mightily convinced the Jews, and that publicly, showing by the Scriptures that Jesus was Christ. "But not many wise men after the flesh, not many mighty, not many noble are called." "That no flesh should glory in his presence."

It is said of Peter and John that they were unlearned and ignorant men, insomuch that the Jews " marvelled and took knowledge of them that they had been with Jesus." And yet it appears that at one time there were added unto them about three thousand souls. And a little further on it is said that under the ministry of those who were called unlearned and ignorant as to the wisdom of this world, the number of the men that heard the word and believed, came to be about five thousand. "So mightily grew the word of God and prevailed." But it was not under the ministry of learned or eloquent men who receive honor one of another, but under the power and Spirit of God. So our great need as a church is a deeper work of grace—a deeper baptized ministry,—and a deeper baptized membership. We want "a closer walk with God; a more calm and heavenly frame" of mind. We want to be clothed with more humility, and to have less of self. The Lord has said: "this man will I look, even to him that is poor and of a contrite spirit, and trembleth at my word." And it is such as have the Spirit of the Lord God upon them, that He anoint "to preach good tidings unto the meek" ("unto the haughty"), and that He sends "to bind up the broken-hearted and to proclaim liberty to the captives," or to those who bound in sin. And to comfort all that mourn to give unto them the oil of joy for mourning and the garment of praise for the spirit of heaviness, that they might be as trees of righteousness, the planting of the Lord, bearing fruit to his name, that He alone might be glorified.

What are all our pretensions to religion without holiness of heart? What is human reason, unassisted by revelation? What human nature unsubdued by divine grace? What are all our pretensions to ministry without gospel power? If we do not believe in the sufficiency of the grace and power of God to bring salvation, and attend to its teachings, by becoming willing learners, we can never become proficient in the school of Christ.

We may have a keen-eyed vision toward the things of this world and the kingdoms of men; but if our spiritual eyes are not anointed with the "eye-salve" of the kingdom, we can never see into heavenly things: nor into the mysteries of the heavenly kingdom. Man, by the spirit of man that is in him, may know the things of men, or the things belonging to this world, but the things of heaven we can never know nor see, only we are enlightened by the true light shining in our dark hearts from the Spirit of God, from him who is the light of men. And if we have not the Spirit of Christ, and if we do not receive life and light from Him, we can never advance the cause of the heavenly kingdom. For the world by its wisdom knoweth not the things of God, neither can it know them because they are spiritually discerned. And the Spirit searcheth all things, yea the deep things of God. "Out of the abundance of the heart the mouth speaketh." And the heart abound with evil or earthly things, or if it hold heavenly truths in unrighteousness, how can a pure gospel stream flow from it? We may imitate and deceive the renewed man, but God is not mocked, "all things are naked and opened unto the eyes of Him with whom we have to do."

We have to submit to be buried with Christ into the likeness of his death, before we need expect to be raised with Him into newness of life. We have to "abide the day of coming" when He comes "as a refiner and purifier." We must be crucified with Christ until that flesh and blood (or life) which cannot inherit the kingdom of heaven, is mortified and slain. He bore the cross for us, and we must bear the cross for Him if we would reign with Him in glory. He suffered contradictions and persecutions of sinners, and all that will live godly in Him shall suffer persecution. For unto the true disciples Christ "it is given not only to believe on Him but also to suffer for his sake." So be of good cheer, for He says, I have overcome the world.

D. H.

Dublin, Ind., 9th mo. 15th, 1882.

Prayer is the vital breath of faith.

For "The Friend."

Messages from the Life and Writings of William Penn.

At the last meeting of the Meeting for Sufferings, 200 copies of the above work were voted by the Executors of the late Ruth Cope, for distribution through the Book Committee of that body. The book having been previously examined to a greater or less extent by many members, if not by all, and a vote being adopted which stated that all doctrinal passages had been taken from works that had previously received the sanction of the Meeting for Sufferings, the donation was accepted and its circulation approved. The writer has had the opportunity of reading only a portion of the work, but so far as read, the impression has been made on the editor has been favored in making selections calculated to illustrate clearly and briefly as well can be done, the peculiar principles which distinguish the Society of Friends from most other religious professors, so smoothly joined together as to present an unbroken, interesting and instructive narrative.

This publication at this time is thought to be judicious and a wide circulation is very desirable, in order that the clear and sound views of Wm. Penn on Christian doctrine, especially on that of the atonement, may be better understood and it is hoped more appreciated by all who claim the name of Friends. On page 109, he briefly states, "I am constrained, for the sake of the simple-hearted, to publish to the world of our faith in God, Christ and the Holy Spirit.

We do believe in one holy God Almighty, who is an Eternal Spirit, the Creator of all things. And in one Lord Jesus Christ, his only Son, and express image of his substance, who dwelt upon him flesh and was in the world; in life, doctrines, miracles, death, resurrection, ascension and mediation, perfectly did what he does continue to do the will of God; to give us holy life, power and mediation and redemption, redemption and perfect salvation. And we believe in one Holy Spirit that proceeds and breathes from the Father and the Son, a measure of which is given to all to use it with; and he that has one, has all: for the Father, the Son and the Holy Spirit are one, who is the Alpha and the Omega, the First and the Last, God over all, blessed for ever. Amen."

Deliverance from Sin—Salvation.

Many are the devices of Satan, and great is the subtlety which he furnishes his children withal, by which he seeks to uphold his kingdom, pleading now a right to which he got by subtlety; and has taught the whole family that it is impossible for any man to be freed from under his service, even as if men that are created of God, were created in the service of the devil; and although he make no man, yet that he is able, after men are made, to keep them in his service; although their Maker calls them to serve him.

Now let us examine a little what reason there is for this great mistake:

First, they say, that sin is rooted and seated in the nature of man; yea, so that a man must cease to be a man, before he can be freed from being a sinner.

Answer. That man in his natural state is so united with sin, as that he thereby is separated from God, I do not deny; and also that there is a natural inclination in man to commit sin, is also true; to wit, as long as they remain in their natural state and condition. If these champions for the devil's kingdom had blotted out of that which they call their rule, all those precious sayings, that make mention of a state of grace, of being under grace, of being changed or translated, of being redeemed and made free, of being washed, cleansed, and sanctified perfectly in soul, body and spirit; and many more such places; then they had had a plea for their prince. But seeing there is such a large testimony of the mercy and goodness of God, and of his power and all-sufficiency to redeem and save; therefore it is worthy to be pleaded before we allow the devil such an unlimited power in and among you, yea, over all the sons and daughters of men.

Therefore, as concerning the first part of this objection, to wit, that sin is rooted in the nature of man, how came it to be rooted there? Whose work was it to make it so? Was it the work of God? Or hath He ordered it, that it should be so? If so, why is any man or woman punished or condemned for its being so, seeing it could not be otherwise? But none else but such as are wholly blind from the true sense of God, will dare to say so: for then the manifold calling of sinners unto repentance, to wash them, to cleanse them, to put away the evil from them, to cease to do evil, &c., must all be against his will and ordering, and so consequently but a mockery. But God forbid that any man should say or think so. Well, if it was not by the ordering or appointment of God, but that God has made man righteous in his nature, will and affections; yea, in the image of God He created him; then it must needs be another that has wrought this great work, to plant sin in his nature. When it is examined, it will appear that it is the work of a cursed oncast, an unclean, lying, treacherous spirit, who was rejected of God, and had no place in the whole creation; but by framing a lie, he brought a poor woman from her integrity and obedience; and so from that, came a great alteration to be in her, and a ground or foundation was laid for the devil to build upon; and from that time he has always had a rule in the hearts of the children of disobedience.

The second pleading is, that never any man was freed from sin, since sin first entered into the world; and that therefore it is presumption to expect such a thing in this life.

Answer. If this position were true, that there was never any man freed from sin, yet it would be presumption to say, that God should not be able to do that which He never did; and it is also presumption to conclude, that never any man was freed. But if this position be false, then not only the consequence is false, to wit, that none can be freed, but also the argument itself is proved to be a lie, and so is swept away, and a door is opened unto all, that have more love to righteousness than to sin; both to hope and to expect, that the same work should again be wrought in and for them, without presumption.

That all men are sinners by nature, is evident; and that some were changed out of that natural state, is as evident; so that the question is only, whether those that are translated out of that sinful nature, remain sinful; yea, or nay? Which if it be so, what advantage have they beyond others, if after they are translated, they must remain unfreed? But I answer with the words of the apostle, He that hath suffered in the flesh, hath ceased from sin. Here he spoke of such as were yet in the body, but had suffered with, and were made partakers of the sufferings and death of Christ, by a dying to sin; through which every one must pass before they can come to the resurrection that is in Christ, by which, said Peter, they obtained the answer of a good conscience in the sight of God, which he calls the baptism that saves. Now some having been partakers of that death, baptism, and resurrection of Christ, by which they came to cease from sin, and to have an answer of a good conscience, without offence either to God or man, which none that sin can have, then may some lawfully expect to come to the enjoyment of the same state of freedom and clearness, as well now as formerly, without presumption.

The faith of God's elect is but one in all ages; and that faith has purified the hearts of many in former ages, and has taught them to walk with God. As, for instance, Enoch walked with God, several hundreds of years, and it would be a horrible thing to say, that he walked with God when he walked in sin; as if God walked in a sinful way; for the prophet said, the bloody man, or the worker of iniquity, dwells or walks not with the Lord. But Enoch dwelled and walked with the Lord, and did not iniquity; for if he had, he should not have obtained a testimony that he pleased the Lord; for sinners and evil-doers do not please Him. By faith Noah walked with God, and was a preacher of righteousness in the old world. By the same faith the prophets were chosen vessels of God, and were upheld in their testimony for God, till they came to obtain that testimony that they were the men and servants of God, which they could not have been, and withal servants unto sin. And the Scripture beareth record of Zachariah and Elizabeth his wife, that they were both righteous before God, not by an imagined righteousness, but in regard to their conversation, walking in all the commands and statutes of the Lord unblamable. But if they had been under the power of sin, and not freed from it, they had been neither unblamable nor righteous; but must at least have transgressed some of the commands of the Lord, or else they could not be sinners.

(To be concluded.)

Water is Life in the Desert.

BY EDWARD L. WILSON.

Last September I read, with more than usual interest, Dr. Trumbull's article in The Sunday-school Times, entitled "Is Wine Safer than Water?" I had always advocated total abstinence, but I was then anticipating a journey in the Sinaitic Peninsula, and the water question was one which had to be thoughtfully considered. Part of the journey which I anticipated was the one which had been accomplished by the friend whom I have named, and although I had already made up my mind what I should try to do, the article referred to gave me no little comfort, for it proved that what I had already determined to try, I could without fear readily accomplish.

And now, having returned from my proposed longer travel of over a half a year, I desire to add my testimony, in these pages, to the truth of what Dr. Trumbull has said, and to state that water is not only the best drink for the traveller, but that water is life in the desert. During my absence, with three companions, I travelled thirty-five days on the Nile, another forty-five days in Egypt, thirty days on horses in Palestine, forty days on dromedaries in Arabia, thirty-four days on the sea, and was many days on the march. I lived and slept seventy-five nights in the tent, and during all this time not only was there no wine or intoxicating beverage taken along, but there was none absorbed by any of our quartette.

During those journeyings I had many interesting experiences, some of which I may report hereafter. That of which I now wish to speak particularly, is the fact which so impressed itself on me during all this travel, that water is pre-eminently life, in the desert; that without water there would be no life there. When I say this I refer particularly to the fact that wherever there is water there is more or less of grass and foliage as nowhere else. Such places, as it is well known, are called oases. They are found along the travelled ways of the desert, usually at about a day's journey from each other. The number of hours between them is greater between some than others; and again, a diversion from a straight line must be made in order to reach them for camping at night. To reach them is a necessity; because water in the desert is not only life to the products of the ground, but it is life to the camel and his attendant and to the traveller as well. It is true that there are bushes and thistles, and trees growing where no water can now be seen, but these are always snarly and snappy and ugly and are unfriendly to the touch. They do receive a little water in the rainy season, and nature provides them with a certain form of root which holds their supply until it is annually replenished; but they have no such loveliness as would attract one to them.

In some of my sea experiences I observed that as soon as port was left, and the vessel began to toss uneasily, passengers would flock to the little bar—always provided in a conspicuous place,—and swill brandy and whisky and other spirituous liquors. I observed, too, that such persons were generally more seasick than others, when they once got at it; but they would never agree that the liquor made them sick. I am satisfied, and I believe that my companions agree in this, that if we had depended upon wine or other liquors as our beverage, we neither could have endured the fatigue of our journey so easily, nor would we have been able to say that in all the six months' journeyings and roughing it, no one of us was delayed an hour by sickness. A healthier quartette, I do not think ever made such a journey; and I attribute it very largely to our entire absence from any drinking but water, or tea, and coffee, and milk.

I can join with Dr. Trumble in saying: "I have never found a place where it was necessary for me to drink wine or brandy, or where I deemed the native wine as safe as the native water, judging from the apparent effects on those who use the one or the other." Moreover, I have found this promise true when called upon to discuss the subject of drinking with others: "Ye shall not be afraid of the face of man for the judgment is God's."—S. S. Times.

For "The Friend."

OUR BIRTHRIGHT.

We may not trace our lineage down,
Thro' veins where royal blood has flowed,
Nor find our forefathers renowned
For valorous deeds, nor wealth of gold;
But greater than the emblazoned arms,
And crest that tells of noble birth,
Or trophied plume of war's alarms,
Our record of ancestral worth.

We wreath no hero's tomb with flowers,
Nor crown with laurel, nor with bay,
Yet never grander theme than ours,
For history's page or poet's lay.
The priceless heritage we claim,
By many a martyr's blood is sealed,
And Time can boast no prouder name,
Than Quaker, graven on his shield.

Why turn we from those tenets now,
And seek to find an easier way?
The strength to stem sin's tidal flow
Was ne'er more needed than to-day.
Still round our hearth on every side
The wily Tempter's baits are set,
The path grows not more straight nor wide
Among the meshes of his net.

We know that neither form nor creed,
The heavy-laden soul can save—
No ritual answers to our need,
No vesture brings the peace we crave.
But when we cross the billowy sea,
We choose a vessel staunch and tight,
Tho' knowing still our lives to be
In hands of One who ordereth right.

And sailing on life's ocean wave,
Oh! may our fathers' ship be ours,
The honored truths they died to save,
Be cherished as most precious dowers.
Cast not the smallest tithe away,
Nor let another wear our crown,
But down the ages gain for aye,
An added lustre and renown.

And with the letter of our faith,
O grant the spirit cometh too,
That we may prove in life and death,
The glory of our Israel true.
Thus anchored on the eternal Rock,
Our birthright will be ours indeed,
And neither wave nor tempest's shock,
Can move the bulwarks of our creed.

Selected.

PAUL DENTON'S REPLY TO WATT FOEMAN'S TAUNT.

Paul Denton, a Missionary to Texas, at one of his meetings, advertised that he would have a barbecue and plenty of good drink. This attracted a numerous crowd, among the rest a desperado by the name of Foeman, who, during service said to Paul, "Paul, your reverence has lied, we have plenty to eat, but where is the liquor?"

"There!" answered the missionary, in tones of thunder, and pointing his finger at the matchless double spring gushing up in two strong columns with a sound, like a shout of joy from the bosom of the earth, there!"

The following is his answer arranged in verse by E. M. SNOWDEN.

There is the liquor there! brewed for you by the hand
Of God, the Eternal! Well he loves the children of his land.

Not over smoky fires, not in the simmering still With poisoned gases, odors rank, doth He your draught
distil;

But in the grassy dell, where the red deer wanders free,
In the lowest valley down, and upon the wide wild sea,
Where the young child loves to play in the green and pleasant glade,

There the beverage cool and pure, hath He, our Father, made,—

Where the fountains ever murmur, and the rills forever sing,

Where the trees are always greener, and the flowers,
fairer spring,

Upon the highest mountains, where the granite in the stream
Of sunny rays doth glitter, with a bright and golden gleam.

Everywhere a thing of beauty! Singing in the summer rain,
Glittering bright within the dew drops, gleaming c
the verdant plain,
In the cataract madly leaping, in the glacier safe bound,
In the hail-shower see it dancing, falling lightly on the ground,
In the iris bow of promise, seeming like the ang
bowers,
By the mystic hand refraction, chequered with cele stial flowers.

The warp is made of raindrops, as they softly fall earth,
And the woof so warm and brilliant in the sunbea finds its birth.
In the fairy flakes descending through the air so cal
and slow,
The wintry world enfolding in a curtain of bright sno
And the trees no longer blooming in their sum garb arrayed,
It has turned to living jewels, in the prisoned light ar
shade,
Where the storm-cloud broods and lowers, and th
rolling thunders crash,
Where the big waves sweep the chorus, and the billow
madly dash,

There He brews life's blessed waters, gushing free b side your home,
No poison huddling in its brink, no madness in i foam.
No orphan child, no widow pale, leave in it burnin
tear,
Nor to its bound doth shrieking ghost of drunka wander near,
In despairing accents cursing the dread poison of t still
That with luring spell enticed him, a dishonored gra to fill.
Whilst the water springs so gleeful, like a joy-sho
o'er the brink,
Would you change the draught, health-giving, for t alcoholic drink?
Would you give the pure cold water, rolling from t depth below,
For the demon's drink of sin and death—as one the answered, No!

Contentment.—Contentment is not always a present enjoyment. It may be found in the deliberate choice of personal pain, as well as in the enduring of personal suffering when no choice is allowed one. A man who is conscious that a painless disorder is sapping his life-sources may prefer to seek the surgeon's knife, rather than abide in his dangerous repose. Then he would be contented under present suffering, in the hope it would bring to him of restored health and prolonged life. If a special emergency calls for the braving of peculiar perils, and for the mee-ing of unwelcome privations, in behalf one's loved ones, of one's country, or of great and vital truth, the truly noble man will be content to take those risks, and submit to those trials; and he could not be content to shirk them.

The true secret of contentment is in one's conviction that the place he is now in is his place now; that the work he is now doing the work that now needs doing, and that he ought to do now; that he is better situated at the present moment, for effort or for endurance that shall tend to his own higher good, and to the good of the persons and the interests dearest to him, than would be possible elsewhere in all the universe; that in fact, his present sphere, his present opportunities, and his present possessions, are those which above all others he ought to d and which he would desire, if he only enough about them and their tendings. Times.

For "The Friend."

Ancient Testimonies and Advices.

TALE-BEARING AND DETRACTION.

Friends and brethren, be careful and faithful against all whisperings, backbitings, tale-carrying, to the defaming of Friends, and to put a speedy stop thereto; pass righteous judgment upon all whisperers and backbiters, who aggravate matters to the backs of others, and appear instrumental of division and offences, contrary to peaceable truth and gospel we profess."

Dear Friends, let those just and ancient words of God be duly observed, viz:—Thou shalt not go up and down as a tale-bearer among thy people. Thou shalt not false report.' Wherefore in the fear of the Lord, stand against jealousies and evil sayings, as well as against all whisperers, tale-bearers and defamers, and endeavour to put a speedy stop thereto; for their practices and works of darkness tend to divide and discord, and greatly weaken our unity, and many times injure the reputation of the innocent; and the righteous God goes against both the authors and abusers thereof. And therefore, if you hear report of a Friend, be careful not to report it; but go to the person of whom the report is, and enquire if it be true, or not; and if true, then deal with such person for according to the doctrine of Christ, Matt. 18. But if false, then endeavor, as much as lies, to stop such reports."—Annual Meeting, &c., 1719, 1721.

The epistle of 1726 also commends the following taken from that issued in 1722:—We earnestly desire that all Friends will fully embrace the present opportunity of meeting in a very close and brotherly friendship one with another, in the Divine Word, and therein watch against all occasions of discord, or breach of unity, in any Quarterly, Monthly, or Particular Meeting; to the end you may continue a quiet habitation, the presence of God rest and remain in you, and the spirit and doctrine of the gospel be lived in and maintained; and then not doubt of seeing Truth prevail in the land in our days, and the glorious and spiritual kingdom of our blessed Redeemer established in the hearts of men."—1726.

Dear Friends, we think it highly necessary to renew with earnestness the former resolutions of this meeting, that all Friends do the utmost care guard against a practice of tale-bearing and private slander against persons and families, as being contrary to the doctrine of Christianity, and highly dishonorable to men."—1752.

Offer not, brethren, any infringement of the law of love, nor any root of bitterness to grow without earnestly and affectionately endeavoring to remove the cause; and be carefully to prevent the growth of differences in their first appearance, that all breach of unity, strife and discord may be kept out and excluded. And let all detraction or division, whispering and tale-bearing, be immediately discountenanced and reprov'd; let whisperers separateth chief friends, and let the words of a tale-bearer be as wounds. Let our obedience to the law of Christ, arises that stream of love to the brotherhood, which, if suffered to flow in our hearts with unobstructed course, would bear away all malice and guile, and cause all complaints of tale-bearing and detraction to cease in our borders. O, the precious care that attends the mind in which Christian charity is become habitual! Charity, saith the apostle, 'hopeth all things.' It divulges not the thoughts of others, because, in its unbounded hope, it desires their removal without exposure. For the mind in which it dwells, ascribes its own preservation, and the cleansing of its former sins, to the unbounded love of God in Christ Jesus; and it prays that all may partake of the same benefit. How opposite that disposition, which delights to report evil, and to accuse! Shun it, dear Friends, as the poison of asps. Even the sacred writings emphatically denominate the grand adversary of mankind by the name of 'accuser of the brethren.' 'Follow, therefore, peace with all men, and holiness, without which no man shall see the Lord; looking diligently, lest any man fail of the grace of God; lest any root of bitterness springing up, trouble you, and thereby many be defiled.'—1804.

"Be kindly affectioned one to another, watching over one another for good; and seeing 'the servant of the Lord must not strive, but be gentle unto all men,' let nothing be done through strife or vain glory; but seek peace and pursue it, that good order, union and concord may be preserved. Be not apt to take offence, and let each in his own particular, be more assiduous to guard against his own weaknesses and imperfections, than to pry into, or expose those of others. Let mutual forbearance and forgiveness have due place among you; for, saith our Lord, 'If ye forgive men their trespasses, your Heavenly Father will also forgive you. But if ye forgive not men their trespasses, neither will your Father forgive your trespasses.'"—From The London Epistles.

Anecdote of a Great Naturalist.—A good story is told of Agassiz, the great naturalist. His father destined him for a commercial life, and was impatient at his devotion to frogs, snakes, and fishes. The last especially were objects of the boy's attention. His vacations he spent in making journeys on foot through Europe, examining the different species of fresh-water fishes. He came to London with letters of introduction to Sir Roderick Murchison. "You have been studying nature," said the great man, bluntly. "What have you learned?" The lad was timid, not sure at that moment that he had learned anything. "I think," he said at last, "I know a little about fishes." "Very well. There will be a meeting of the Royal Society to-night. I will take you with me there." All of the great scientific savants of England belonged to this Society. That evening, toward its close, Sir Roderick rose and said: "I have a young friend here from Switzerland, who thinks he knows something about fishes; how much I have a fancy to try. There is under this cloth a perfect skeleton of a fish which existed long before man." He then gave the precise locality in which it had been found, with one or two other facts concerning it. The species to which the specimen belonged was of course extinct. "Can you sketch for me on that blackboard your idea of this fish?" said Sir Roderick. Agassiz took up the chalk, hesi-tated a moment, and then sketched rapidly a skeleton fish. Sir Roderick held up the specimen. The portrait was correct in every bone and line. The grave old doctors burst into loud applause. "Sir," Agassiz said, on telling the story, "that was the proudest moment of my life—no, the happiest; for I knew now my father would consent that I should give my life to science."

Self-denial.—John Wesley, arm in arm with another man on one occasion passed through a room in which stood a table laden with luxuries good enough for the Court of Babylon. The young man said to Wesley, "There is not much self-denial here," to which the preacher answered, "No, but there is a fine field for its exercise." My young friends, you will often find yourselves crossing that field; if you would have discipline, don't forget the exercise of self-denial. No man ever comes up into true nobility, into health and power of nature, without self-denial. You may have to toss many a gilt-edged invitation to the halls of gayety, splendor, and feasting into the fire: but if you have the liberty, the manhood to do it, you will have added pounds to your moral self, and have made your way to victory easier. You may have the king's wine and the king's meat, but you will be a slave, and you are made for something higher than the chains of a degrading captivity; only a little below the angels is where God would have you stand. I call you to your rightful sovereignty, to the freedom of immortal beings, on whose foreheads Jehovah has written his name; I call you to the bondage of that love that wept over Jerusalem and bled away its life on the cross; I call you to the glorious liberty of the sons of God, and to the sweet bondage of Him who "took upon Him the form of a slave, and became obedient unto death, even the death of the cross." "If the Son shall make you free, then shall ye be free indeed."—M. Rhodes.

The After-thought.—A soldier records a striking fact in regard to his experience in battle. In the wild exhilaration of the fight he was utterly insensible to the fact that his shots were carrying death to men. This was not thought of once in the mad intoxication of the storm of shot and shell. But when the surge of battle brought him to the place where the wounded enemy lay dying, then the awful reality came over him. "I had loaded and fired for hours," he said, "without compunction. But when I saw a dying soldier whom my shot had pierced, and when I beheld his life-blood ebbing out, I was utterly overcome, and fell at his feet and wept like a child."—Selected.

For "The Friend."

Religious Items, &c.

Instrumental Music.—The Presbyterians of Scotland who are opposed to the use of instrumental music in times of worship, have organized an Association to promote their views, engaged a man to lecture on the subject, and prepared a petition to the General Assembly or Synod, to be signed by the members of the church. This petition sets forth that, though instrumental music was part of the Temple service under the Old Testament, yet in the present more spiritual dispensation "all ritualistic and sensuous forms of worship were excluded."

"That no instrumental music was prescribed or practised by Christ and his Apostles under the Christian system."

"That for hundreds of years, no instrumental music was used in the Christian Church, it being introduced at length with the other corruptions of Romanism, and rejected with that system at the Reformation."

Salvation Army.—The rigid discipline of General Booth in London continues. A few days ago Captain Gipsy Smith, leader of the Salvation Army Corps in Hanley, accepted a gold watch and testimonial as a token of respect on his leaving the district. For receiving this the Captain has been discharged from the Army by General Booth, and two Lieutenants, who also received watches, will only be reinstated on giving them up to the Army. The circumstance has caused much comment.

Unholy Gains.—The proprietor of the Brighton Beach race-course announced that the proceeds of a certain day would be given to the (Roman Catholic) Church. A large crowd and considerable gate-money were the results. The receipts, amounting to two thousand dollars, in accordance with the pledge, were handed over to the priest. But when the facts came to the ears of Bishop Loughlin, he not only ordered the money returned to the donor, but suspended the priest. This fact is commended to the attention of those Protestant Christians who have dull consciences as to the sources from which they fill their church treasuries.

Canon Wilberforce's Denunciation.—At the great Crystal Palace fete of the Church of England Temperance Society, on the fourth of [7th mo.], Canon Wilberforce had the Christian hardihood to denounce the leasing of church property for saloon or public house purposes in the following strong language:

"Now I have something very disagreeable to say. I mean to say it, and I mean to ask the reporters to put it down. I have it here in print, and it is this, that this great Church of England, to which I belong, is the greatest owner of public house property of any corporation in the whole of England at this moment. It is stated that on the lands of the Bishop of London there is one public house called the 'Hero of Waterloo,' of which the returns are £10,000 a year. Where does it all come from? The hard-earned wages of the working classes; and if we as clergymen are commissioned to do anything at all it is to stand by the side of the working classes against the temptations that are put before them. It is asserted that when the lease of a public house falls into the possession of the Ecclesiastical Commissioners, they have it valued by a professional valuer to see whether the rental can be increased, and the church will also grant ground leases for the erection of a public house, as may be seen on the Paddington estate."

Later he has addressed a letter embodying these statements to the Archbishop of Canterbury, in which he says:

"I am not unaware of the difficulties of repairing the past. The sight of my own glebe studded, by consent of the Ecclesiastical Commissioners, with drink shops; the knowledge that some of the income of my own incumbency is derived from this very source saddens and humbles me; but the future is yet in our hands; the method which I have adopted with much blessing in the case of my own glebe is, that of refusing to sign any lease, whether approved by the Commissioners or not, without a rigorous clause excluding the sale of alcoholic drinks; and this action, so far from depreciating the value of the house property on the land, has rather enhanced it."—Law and Order.

For "The Friend."

Natural History, Science, &c.

Cheatery in Animals.—Captain Hall, author of Life Among the Esquimaux, gives the following anecdote of a dog.

"I have before mentioned some particulars of these dogs, and I now relate an anecdote concerning them during our passage across from Greenland.

"One day, in feeding the dogs, I called the whole of them around me, and gave to each of them in turn a capelin, or small dried fish. To do this fairly, I used to make all the dogs encircle me, until every one had received ten of the capelins apiece.

"Now, Barbekark, a very young and shrewd dog, took it into his head that he would play a trick. So that every time he received his fish he would back square out, move a distance of two or three dogs, and face himself in line again, thus receiving double the share of every other dog. But this joke of Barbekark's bespoke too much of the game that many men play upon their fellow-beings, and, as I noticed it, I determined to check his doggish propensities. Still the cunning and the singular way in which he evidently watched me induced a moment's pause in my intentions.

"Seeing my face smiling at his trick, he now commenced making another change, thus getting three portions to each of the others' one. This was enough, and it was now time for me to reverse the order of Barbekark's game by playing a trick upon him. Accordingly every time I came to him he got no fish; and although he changed his position three times he got nothing. Finding he could not succeed by any change of his position, he withdrew from the circle to where I was, and came to me, crowding his way between my legs, and looked up in my face as if to say, 'I have been a very bad dog; forgive me. Please give me my share of capelins.' I went the rounds three times more and let him have the fish."

J. G. Wood says: "One of my friends had a couple of little toy-terrier dogs. As is usually the case in such instances, though very fond of each other, they were jealous with regard to their master, and neither could endure to see the other caressed. It so happened that one of them broke its leg, and was in consequence much petted. Its companion, seeing the attention that was paid to the injured animal, pretended to be lame itself, and came limping to its master, holding up the corresponding leg, and trying to look as if it were in great pain."

"A curious and rather ludicrous instance of cheating, on the part of the dog, was observed by one of my friends.

"He has three little black-and-tan terriers, father, mother and daughter, which are great pets, and consider the house as their own property. Like most pet dogs, they have their favorite spots by way of couches; and as they all three generally take a fancy to the same spot, there is occasionally a difference of opinion and a slight loss of temper. The one pet spot of all is a soft cushion at the head of a sofa.

"One day the father and daughter got the room first, and according to custom n straightway for the cushion, on which t established themselves comfortably, occu ing the whole of its surface. Presently mother came in, and also went to the cush She tried to take her place on it, but ha retire.

"Presently she went to the farthest co of the room, and suddenly began to sera violently, barking, growling and sniffing she were digging out a rat. Up jumped others, all blazing with excitement, and a ous to have their share of the sport. As s as they had got their noses well down in corner, the mother ran to the sofa at speed, jumped on the cushion, curled her round, and was happy. However, she generous in victory, and made room for others as they came back to the sofa, cr fallen and humiliated."

Experiments with Antiseptics.—Prof. Le I after a series of experiments on the effec antiseptics in arresting putrefaction, arr at the following conclusions:

1. The disinfectant power of any antiseptic is weaker the older the putrefaction.

2. The strongest disinfectants appear to (in order) permanganate of potash, chloroform, sulphate of iron acidified with acetic acid, carbolic acid, and the glyceroborate of sodium and potassium.

3. There is no parallelism between disinfectant action and action on microbes, minute organisms.) Thus, permanganate of potash, so strong in the former respect, has no appreciable action on microbes; also, a strong preventer of microbes, is very weak as a disinfectant.

4. Nor is there parallelism between the power of preventing putrefaction and that of stopping it when it has arisen. Alcohol, carbolic acid, preservative agents par excellence, have little effect on putrefaction once commenced.

5. With exception of a very small number of substances that are strong poisons, (bichloride of mercury,) most antiseptics, notably carbolic acid, have very little action on bacteria.

6. There is no parallelism between the virulent power of a substance in putrefaction and the toxic power of volatile compounds given off by it; indeed, these properties seem to be even in inverse ratio. A frog is placed in an inclosure with some of the liquid. When putrefaction sets in a very fetid odor is produced, and the liquid swarms with bacteria, and is known to be very virulent if injected under the skin of an animal; but the frog, merely breathing the effluvia, takes no harm. After two months the liquid ceases to be virulent, but the animal breathes its volatile products is killed.

7. The very small quantity of product necessary to kill an animal by simple mixture with air proves these volatile alkaloids to be extremely poisonous. Prof. Le Bon ascertained that they are so to man.

8. The experiments explain the evils arising from bodies long buried, and prove that the atmosphere of cemeteries (contrary to what has been affirmed on the score of there being few microbes present) may be very dangerous. In connection with typhoid fever, and other affections, the volatile alkaloids produced by action of microbes on certain orga-ances are doubtless largely active.— ed.

Expansion of Rice.—Some time ago a vessels packed with rice put into port at East on, leaking badly, and an effort was to pump her out and unload her, but this could be accomplished the rice ed up until the sides of the vessel were open. It is not often, perhaps, that molecular forces get such full play as in case, but a good many cases of bad leak-caused by swelling cargoes have been ted. This force is so certain that it is times usefully employed in quarrying ations instead of the powder blast.— er.

THE FRIEND.

TENTH MONTH 14, 1882.

conducting the affairs of the church, the ty of Friends has always believed that, members, on whom the management discipline and business devolved, were iently inward and weighty in spirit, would be Divinely assisted in these im-tant concerns; and that in reference to onclusions so arrived at, they might use anguage of the assembled Church at Jerem formerly, when they wrote to the ile disciples that they were not to be ght into subjection to the Jewish rites ceremonies, "It seemed good unto the Ghost and unto us." George Fox ex-d his friends to hold all their meetings o Power of God. This is necessary to served in meetings for discipline, as well those for worship. For if the members ot practically recognize the headship of t in these assemblies, know their own brought into subjection, fervently seek ow and do the will of the Lord, and to pt in a humble, patient spirit, in which lace is given to the views and feelings ers; the true authority of these meet-will be lost, and they will gradually belittle more than business conventions, ged in a worldly manner and spirit; and will lose that Divine authority which is crown and beauty.

e following few extracts from many of a ur character contained in the epistles forth in ancient times by the Yearly ing of London, will show how fully the ous character of Meetings for Discipline recognized by our early Friends.

6. "Let all your affairs be managed in meetings, in the peaceable wisdom and of our Lord Jesus Christ; not striving, earing one with and for another; that ower of Christ may rest upon you, and n all your assemblies."

10. "Keep all your meetings, as well for good order, charity and Christian pline, as those set apart entirely for the ip of God, in his love, and in the name,
r, and peaceable spirit of his dear Son,
Christ, which is the alone true author-all our meetings; for without Him we o nothing."

13. "Our Monthly and Quarterly Meet-eing set up by the power and in the wis-of God, which is the authority of those ngs, all Friends are tenderly desired and ed, carefully to keep to and in that auty; and therein manage all the business affairs of the said meetings."

"And let the man's part and natural wisdom and attainments, be subject to the power and spirit of God."

1706. "So will all be done in a holy awe, reverence and humility, and none will intrude themselves into things too high for them, nor exalt themselves above their proper growths and stations in the church."

It is on this basis—of the religious character of our Meetings for Discipline, and the distinct recognition of the Headship of Christ therein,—that all our arrangements in connection therewith have been provided, or have grown up. The clerk who sits at the table, is not a presiding officer, in the sense in which the term is understood as to bodies differently constituted. He is the servant of the meeting, whose duty it is to record the decisions which have been dictated to those assembled by the Spirit of the Holy Head. In ascertaining what those decisions are, he is governed not solely by the numbers of those who have spoken in the meetings, but also by the superior authority due to age, experience and wisdom, and above all by the sensible evidence of the Divine influence which often accompanies words spoken in the fear of the Lord, and which impresses itself on the hearts of the hearers.

The practice which prevails in the synods and conferences of some religious denominations, of deciding questions which arise by a majority vote, is one that cannot be introduced into our Society, without a departure from the principles which have heretofore governed us. Such a change, we believe, will not only be an evidence of an incipient change in principle already accomplished, but greatly promote the spread of a worldly spirit in the transactions of our church business, and lead to results which few at the present time are prepared to believe.

Is there not need to revive the earnest language of Stephen Crisp to the church in his day: "It is no man's learning, or artificial acquirements; it is no man's riches or greatness in this world; it is no man's eloquence or natural wisdom, that makes him fit for government in the Church of Christ; all his endowments must be seasoned with the heavenly salt, and his gifts pass through the fire of God's altar, a sacrifice to his praise and honor, that so self being baptized into death, the gifts may be used in the power of the resurrection of the life of Jesus in him."

Isaac Penington clearly points out the propriety of recognizing the different degrees of growth, and the difference in authority and influence among the members of the Church, in the following passage in an epistle to Friends about Chalfont: "If God hath made a difference, and given degrees of life, and gifts different, according to his pleasure; what wisdom and spirit is that which doth not acknowledge this, but would make all equal?
Oh, my Friends! fear before the Lord; honor the Lord in his appearances, and in the differences which He hath made among the children of men, and among his people. He gave prophets of old, and the rest of the people were not equal with them. He gave evangelists, apostles, pastors, teachers, &c., and the other members of the church were not equal with them. He hath given fathers and elders now, and the babes and young men are not equal with them."

We have received a programme of the processions, and other ceremonies proposed to be observed on the occasion of the Bi-Centennial celebration of the landing of William Penn in America.

We are sensible of the difficulty there is in arranging any order of proceedings which shall be sufficiently attractive to meet the popular demand for an imposing display, and yet be at all in keeping with the religious views and principles of William Penn, who bore a very decided testimony against all pride and ostentation; and therefore we do not look at the work of the committee who have had charge of this matter in a critical spirit. Yet there are some of the features embraced in the proposed celebration, so manifestly in opposition to the character of the Founder of our Commonwealth, that we will briefly refer to them.

A grand military review seems strangely out of place in doing honor to a man whose government was founded on the principles of peace, who went unarmed among the Indian natives, and who rejected all wars and fightings as directly opposed to the teachings of our Saviour and his apostles.

A display of Knights Templars is scarcely more in good taste, when we reflect that the Society of Friends, of whose views William Penn was one of the ablest and most influential advocates, have always regarded such secret societies with disfavor, as inconsistent with that openness and sincerity of character into which Christianity leads its followers; and have discouraged their members from joining such organizations, as decidedly hurtful to their growth in religion.

A musical festival is to be one of the attractions. And yet, if William Penn were personally present, he could not countenance such an exhibition of what he would regard as time and talents wasted on mere amusement.

A life of William Penn, in a portable form, has recently been issued, and may be procured at the Book Store, No. 304 Arch Street.
It seems to be a suitable time to have such a work widely distributed, so that the public may know more of the real character of this truly great man, and of those sound views of Christian faith and practice, in the defence and promulgation of which he not only labored earnestly and long, but endured imprisonment and other sufferings. We hope our readers may be quick to embrace all right openings to circulate this work in suitable channels.

SUMMARY OF EVENTS.

UNITED STATES.—It is intimated at the Post Office Department that a surplus of about $2,000,000 will be left of the appropriations for the Star Route service during the last fiscal year.

The Secretary of the Interior has sent a letter to the Commissioner of the General Land Office respecting the claims of the Turtle Mountain Indians to certain lands in Dakota, lying north and west of Devil's Lake.
The Secretary says he is "of the opinion that the claim is not well founded; yet if it should appear, on a careful examination of the facts, that such a claim does exist, it will be the duty of the Government to make proper compensation to the Indians."

Indian Commissioner Price has sent out circulars to the Indian Agents directing them to give to their Indians the notice required by act of Congress,
"that while the Government is disposed to treat them kindly and even generously, and to extend to them every needed assistance to enable them to make a comfortable living for themselves and families, yet they must remember that there is now no treaty or other obligation on the part of the Government to support them, and that what they are now receiving is purely a gift, and that there must come a time when they will be expected to labor for their own support."

General Suter, of the Engineer Corps, in charge of the Missouri river improvements, has sent his annual report to the War Department. It shows an expenditure of $389,254 during the last fiscal year, and estimates that "$1,383,000 can be profitably expended during the next fiscal year in continuation of the improvements now in progress."

The Secretary of the Board of Agriculture of Ohio, has sent to Washington the following crop estimates, based on returns from all the counties of the State: Wheat, total bushels, 45,787,811; rye, 406,157; oats, 18,435,779; barley, 1,337,309; corn, 87,005,580; potatoes, 8,900,000; sweet potatoes, per cent. average crop, 100; tobacco do., 74; sorghum do., 92; corn do., 87; potatoes, 101. Yield per acre in bushels: Wheat, 16.7; rye, 15.8; oats, 28; barley, 19.9. The condition of pastures and live stock is excellent, except that hog cholera is reported in a few counties.

The Commissioner of Agriculture of Tennessee reports the following average of the crops in that State for 9th month: Corn, 172; cotton, 104; sorghum, 133; turnips, 105; tobacco, 117; millet, 114; late Irish potatoes, 131; sweet potatoes, 127; apples, 134; peaches, 106; grapes, 99; melons, 113; garden products, 137; buckwheat, 108; peanuts, 100; stock peas, 125.

The Board of Aldermen of New York have fixed the amount to be raised by taxation in that city at $27,684,427 and the rate at $2.25. Last year the rate was $2.62.

The steamer Durban sailed for the Cape of Good Hope on the 6th inst., from Southampton, England. She had on board Professor Newcomb and his party, sent by the United States Government to observe the transit of Venus.

The steamship Herder, which left New York on the 5th instant, for Hamburg, with 145 passengers, ran aground near Cape Race, Newfoundland, during a thick fog, on First-day night, 10th mo. 8th. The passengers and crew were all saved. The Herder was built at Glasgow, in 1873, was 3494 tons burthen, and valued at $500,000. Her cargo was valued at $100,000. She will probably prove a total wreck, but part of her cargo may be saved. All the mails and the baggage of the passengers were got ashore.

On the morning of the 5th inst., Barnard, at Nashville, and Professor Wilson, at Cincinnati, discovered that the nucleus of the comet had split into three unequal fragments, the largest estimated at 15,000 miles in length. The space between the fragments is estimated at 2000 miles. The nucleus had assumed the form of a long strip, not less than 24,000 miles in length and 3000 in breadth; but the disturbance makes no difference in the appearance of the comet to the naked eye. On the morning of the 9th, Professor Brooks, at Phelps, New York, took another observation of the comet, and detected "great changes in the head." "The nucleus was greatly elongated and clearly split into equal parts. A small crescent-shaped envelope was also being thrown in front of the head." A telegram from Rochester says: "The separation of the nucleus of Cruls' comet into three parts was again seen this morning by H. C. Maine, of this city. This observation bears out his theory that the fragments revolve about a common centre of gravity, alternately closing and separating. A separation was seen by Mr. Maine Sept. 30th. By October 2d the parts had nearly closed up. On the 5th Mr. Barnard saw a second separation. Again the parts were partially closed together. On the 8th Prof. Brooks saw a pear-shape nucleus, and on the 9th Mr. Maine saw a separation. The separations thus occur in periods of about four days."

Seventy-seven new cases of yellow fever and two deaths were reported at Pensacola on First-day last, and forty-eight new cases and five deaths on Second-day. Total cases to the last date, 1300; deaths, 112.

For the week ending 10th month 7th, there were 353 deaths in Philadelphia, as compared with 348 for the previous week, and 347 for the corresponding week of last year. Of the whole number, 170 were males and 183 females: 51 died of consumption; 24 of diphtheria; 15 of croup; 15 of marasmus; 17 of old age, and 9 of typhoid fever.

Markets, &c.—U. S. 3½'s, 100½; 4½'s, registered, 113; coupon, 112½; 4's, 118; currency 6's, 133.

Cotton.—There was no essential change to notice in price or demand. Sales of middlings are reported at 11½ a 12½ cts. per lb. for uplands and New Orleans.

Petroleum.—Standard white, 8 cts. for export, and 9 cts. per gallon for home use.

Flour is in fair local request and steady. Sales of 2900 barrels, including Minnesota extras, at $6 a $6.75; Penna. extra family at $4.75 a $5; western do. do. at $5.25 a $5.75, and patents at $6.50 a $8. Rye flour is firm at $4.25 a $4.37½.

Grain.—Wheat is in good request and higher. Sales of 8000 bushels red, at $1.10 a $1.13, as to quality and location; 70,000 bush. 11th mo. at $1.08½ a $1.09½; 10,000 bush. 12th mo. at $1.09½ a $1.10½, and 10,000 1st mo. at $1.10½ a $1.11½. Rye is steady at 68 a 70 cts. Corn is in good request and higher. Sales of 9500 bushels, in ear lots at 69 a 73 cts. At the open board, 75,000 bushels, 11th mo., sold 69½ a 70½ cts. Oats are in fair demand and higher. Sales of 12,000 bushels, including white, at 43 a 45 cts., and rejected and mixed at 30 a 37 cts.

Beef cattle were in fair demand this week, but prices were a fraction lower: 4500 head arrived and sold at the different yards at 4 a 7 cts. per lb., as to condition.

Sheep were rather dull, and prices were a fraction lower: 15,000 head arrived and sold at the different yards at 3 a 5½ cts., and lambs at 4 a 7½ cts. per lb., as to quality.

Hogs were in demand at full prices: 3500 head sold at the different yards at 11 a 12½ cts. per pound, as to condition.

FOREIGN.—The national debt of England on 5d mo. 31st, was reported recently to Parliament as amounting, net, to $3,645,280,514, the total funded debt to $3,547,492,738, and the gross amount of the debt $3,814,163,424. During the year ending at the same date the total reduction of debt was $37,242,227.

The returns issued by the Board of Trade show that during the month just past British imports decreased £55,000 compared with that month in last year, while the exports increased £22,000 compared with the same month in 1881.

Prof. Blackie and others are about to start a fresh land agitation in the Highlands. The movement is wholly independent of the Land League party.

In a speech at Glasgow on the 4th inst., Sir Stafford Northcote said he believed the Egyptian war was unnecessary and unjustifiable. Had the Government made a firm stand at the beginning, the war might have been averted.

Several cases of Asiatic cholera are reported at Modane, on the French side of the Mount Cenis Tunnel. All mail bags passing through that place have to be disinfected. A commission of physicians has arrived to investigate the source, character and extent of the disease.

The Paris Telegraphe reports that the French and English Directors of the Suez Canal Company, at a meeting on the 5th inst., came to a complete agreement in favor of the improvement and enlargement of the canal, in view of the expected increase of traffic.

Sultan Pasha, President of the Turkish Chamber of Notables, thinks that Turkish intervention in Egypt would mean anarchy, and maintains that the cost of the joint control is extravagant, and that £400,000 might be saved annually by the substitution of efficient natives for foreign officials. He admits that the mass of the population is unfit for a representative government.

The Sultan has called the attention of Lord Dufferin, the British Ambassador, to the fact that the note of the Porte inquiring when the British troops will leave Egypt remains unanswered. The Sultan declared that if Lord Dufferin did not reply he would address himself to the Powers.

The Cairo correspondent of the Cologne Gazette declares that the Egyptian wounded were murdered by the British in the trenches at Tel-el-Kebir long after all resistance had ceased. A letter from a non-commissioned officer of the Forty-second regiment, published in the Times, says the orders were to spare none of the enemy, and to bayonet every one of them, as they would shoot the soldiers treacherously if the latter passed them.

A despatch from Suez to the Exchange Telegraph Company reports a water famine there. What water remains in the canal is putrid. Many persons are sick with fever.

A despatch from Cairo, to the Times, says: Arabi Pasha demands a trial by Englishmen, saying he surrendered to them, and that he would have escaped if he had known he was to be tried by Egyptians, from whom he expects no mercy. De Lesseps has telegraphed to the President of the Court Martial, at Cairo, by which Arabi Pasha is to be tried, testifying that during the war Arabi exerted himself to maintain the neutrality of the Suez Canal, and that he protected the lives and interests of several Europeans in Egypt.

It is believed that the English counsel sent by Wilfrid Blunt to defend Arabi Pasha will be denied access to him, the Egyptian Government being of opinion that legal assistance from such a quarter will be of no avail, since the pleadings will be heard in Arabic.

Reports come from the Mexican State of Sonora, the Yaqui and Mayo Indians, numbering together 6000 souls, "are joining forces and preparing for a general outbreak." The Yaquis are under Cajeno, a who fought with the French during their occupation, and it is said "he has organized cavalry, infantry, artillery forces, with large supplies of ammunition." A despatch dated Buenos Ayres, 10th month says, peace negotiations between Chili and Peru have been broken off because of the refusal of Chili to any of her demands.

It is said that the Dominion Government has decided to create two new provinces in the Northwest. One to be Qu' Appelle, with Regina as its capital, the other is to be Saskatchewan, the capital for which has not yet decided upon.

The potato crop of Nova Scotia and Prince Edward Island are reported to be "exceedingly large" this season, and prices are expected to be very low.

New gold fields have been discovered in the Cariboo and Lilloet districts of British Columbia. In the Cariboo district, "Indians have brought in $4000 worth of dust from the Bridge river, some pieces weighing as much as $10." In the Cariboo district, the dig pay the miners $10 per day.

A Temperance Meeting, designed especially for Teachers in Friends' Schools in and near Philadelphia and members of Committees in charge of the same, to be held in the Committee-room of Friends' Meeting-house on Twelfth St., below Market, on Sixth-day mo. 13th, at 8 P. M. Others interested in the subject are invited.

On behalf of the Friends' Temperance Association,
THOMAS SCATTERGOOD,
Philada., 10th mo. 10th, 1882. Chairman

NOTICE.

I will answer, through "The Friend," the postal letters received in regard to sending clothing, & needy friends. We have many letters from the East and West, asking for plain clothing, plain bonnet shawls for winter, spring and summer; bedding partly worn carpets for old and afflicted; warming for rheumatic persons, who are unable to work for want of it; caps and handkerchiefs for old Friends shoes and stockings, &c., &c. All such things may be sent to Friends' Book Store, No. 304 Arch St., Philadelphia. Those packing bales and boxes are desired to make a list of the contents and forward it to me in advance, so that they may be marked and forwarded direct to the point where they are most needed without extra expense, and oblige

H. H. BONWILL, 912 Wallace St., Philadelphia.

WESTTOWN BOARDING SCHOOL.

The WINTER SESSION begins on Second-day, month 30th, 1882. Parents and others intending send pupils, will please make early application to JONATHAN G. WILLIAMS, Supt., address Westtown Chester Co., Pa.; or to CHARLES J. ALLEN, Treas., 304 Arch St., Philadelphia. Terms, $30 per session.

WANTED,

A woman Friend, as teacher in the Boarding School for Indian children, at Tunesassa; also one to the matron in care of the household. Apply to Jos. S. Elkinton, 325 Pine street, Philadelphia; John Sharpless, Chester, Delaware Co.; Ephraim Smith, 1110 Pine street, Philadelphia.

DIED, in this city, Eighth mo. 10th, 1882, S. LEWIS, daughter of the late Evan and Sidney Lewis, in the 58th year of her age, a member of Philadelphia Monthly Meeting.

—, Ninth mo. 1st, 1882, at her residence in den, N. J., AMY E. ALSOP, widow of the late W. J. Alsop, an esteemed member of Newton Park and Haddonfield Monthly Meeting of Friends, in 76th year of her age. Though this dear Friend unexpectedly called hence to be seen of men no yet her family and friends are comforted by the thought that she was prepared for the solemn change. In conversation with a relative a few weeks before the death and whilst in ordinary health, she said, "There was terror in the prospect of death—all was peace."

—, at her residence in this city, on Ninth mo. 2nd, 1882, SIDNEY HIBBERD, in the 84th year of age, an esteemed member of Northern District Monthly Meeting.

WILLIAM H. PILE, PRINTER,
No. 422 Walnut Street.

THE FRIEND.

A RELIGIOUS AND LITERARY JOURNAL.

OL. LVI.

SEVENTH-DAY, TENTH MONTH 21, 1882.

NO. 11.

PUBLISHED WEEKLY.

If paid in advance, $2.00 per annum; if not paid in advance $2.50; 10 cents extra is charged for Postage on those sent by mail.

Articles designed for insertion to be addressed to
JOSEPH WALTON,
MOORESTOWN, BURLINGTON CO., N. J.

Subscriptions, payments and business communications, received by
JOHN S. STOKES,
NO. 116 NORTH FOURTH STREET, UP STAIRS,
PHILADELPHIA.

For "The Friend."

Ancient Testimonies and Advices.

THE OBSERVANCE OF ALL OUR MEETINGS;
THE RIGHT EXERCISE OF MIND IN THEM.

Dear Friends, we tenderly advise and exhort you, that, in all your assemblies for worship of Almighty God, you wait to your hearts influenced by his power, and patience and humility possess your souls, depending upon Christ alone for instruction; whether immediately by his Spirit, or instrumentally by his servants, is the teacher is people himself; in whose Spirit only at our whole trust, expectation, and dependence to be. And as you are found humbly waiting for his teaching, without expectation from man, He will administer comfort to your souls, either immediately or instrumentally, as it shall seem good to Him, who never faileth those who put their trust in Him. And all such, from the experience of His blessings and the comforts they receive, have a due esteem and regard for those through whom they find them conveyed; as, nevertheless, the praise and glory of Him alone, whose instruments they are, and who, by his own power and Spirit, speaketh either with them, or without them, according to his good pleasure, in the various manifestations of his infinite wisdom and goodness toward the children of men. Beware, therefore, that you assemble not in a mere formal and customary manner; but both preacher and hearer labor to gather minds inward to the Lord, that every one may witness Him who is the Master of our assemblies to go before them, and put them in their respective services. The immediate teaching of the Holy Spirit is the foundation of all gospel worship and ministry; and we who depend entirely thereon, shall not be disappointed, through the failure or absence of instrumental means. Wherefore, we exhort you, wait in silence, with reverence and lowliness of heart, in all your meetings, that you may witness the incomes and refreshing influences of the Holy Spirit, by which you are 'strengthened in the inward man,' and enabled to grow and flourish as 'trees planted by the rivers of water,' which bring forth their fruit in due season."—1740.

Dear Friends, in all your meetings appointed for religious worship, wait with reverence and devotion of heart and soul for the power and life-giving presence of God, which is the crown and diadem of our assemblies. Take care, we beseech you, in this day of ease and liberty, lest a spirit of lukewarmness and indifference prevail over you, to the stopping up of the streams of the water of life, and rendering you like the barren heath in the desert, which knoweth not when good cometh. We entreat you to be especially watchful in this behalf, that an indolent and sluggish disposition appear not amongst you, to the stumbling of such serious enquirers as may attend our meetings, in expectation of that life and power, which the observation of your indifference and unconcernedness may give them too just cause to suspect that ye yourselves are strangers to."—1741.

"Dearly beloved Friends, as we become united to God, and one unto another, we shall experience the attracting power and force of Divine love, drawing and strongly inclining our hearts to a constant attendance at the appointed times and places for the public worship of God, who is love, 'and he that dwelleth in love, dwelleth in him.' This Divine love induced our worthy elders to maintain their religious assemblies with an invincible constancy; for they, following the call of Christ, their Heavenly Shepherd, resorted earnestly to those places of feeding where He [more largely on these occasions] ministered food to the hungry, and waters of life to those who were athirst; and filled with the consolations of his Spirit the souls of those who waited upon Him in sincerity and truth. The same spiritual comforts and advantages are to this day measurably enjoyed by those, who with the like ardent desires, and earnest breathings of soul, are humbly waiting to receive them. Let us therefore, brethren, as many of us as have been remiss in this great and necessary duty of religiously assembling together, be incited to double our diligence for the time to come, and with an holy awe and reverence bow before the Lord, and draw near 'unto the throne of his grace,' that we may obtain 'mercy, and find grace to help in time of need.'"—1752.

"We find ourselves, dearly beloved brethren, earnestly concerned to remind you of another token of degeneracy too visible among us; viz: a negligence in attending our appointed meetings for worship, both on the First-day and other days of the week. A neglect which calls for seasonable reproof, and a pressing exhortation, that a religious concern of attending all your meetings, and especially of your week-day meetings, may grow, increase, and become more general. This we recommend as the proper means of renewing your strength, and as suitable opportunities of abstracting your thoughts from the hurries and incumbrances of worldly affairs, and of habituating your minds to a serious meditation on heavenly things. And dear Friends, let not the smallness of your numbers discourage you from constantly attending those meetings, inasmuch as the words of Christ remain unchangeably true and steadfast: 'Where two or three are gathered together in my name, there am I in the midst of them.' And as your affections come to be set on things that are above, your delight will be in frequent retirement from the world, its trade and concerns, and your chiefest care will be to lay up treasure in heaven secure from the reach of corruption and disappointment; and then, where your treasure is, there will your hearts be also. But, on the contrary, it hath been justly observed, that where remissness and neglect of attending meetings of worship hath prevailed, it hath been too often an inlet to further declension, and an introducer to such other undue liberties as Truth and its guidance do by no means admit of."—1754.

"The due and constant support of their public assemblies appeared to our faithful predecessors of such consequence, that neither the severity of human laws, the violence of misdeed magistrates, nor the insults of an ignorant unthinking populace, could deter them from meeting together, at their usual times and places, for the maintenance of their Christian testimony. And now, it hath pleased Divine Providence to favor us with the removal of those cruel obstructions, is it less than an ungrateful abuse of such mercy and goodness, for any of us to suffer the ensnaring profits, the vain delights, the flattering friendships of a delusive world, or an indolent disposition of mind, to deprive us of these opportunities for improvement in things of eternal importance? It is not enough for us, to meet in order for public worship, when we find little or nothing else to do. The Lord Almighty requires the first fruits, the prime of our service, and will not accept the refuse, either of our time or talents. If we prefer worldly pursuits, or idle amusements, at times when we ought to be solemnly engaged in this great duty, may it not justly be said, that 'we follow after lying vanities, and forsake our own mercies?' The promise of the Saviour to be in the midst of the two or three gathered in his name, by implication invites us, not only to meet with one another, but, in so doing, with himself also. Shall the King of kings and Lord of lords, condescend to offer his Divine presence for our good, and shall we, his dependent creatures, set so light by his inestimable kindness, as, either wilfully or negligently, to let slip those precious seasons wherein we might receive his blessed assistance, so necessary to our help and salvation?"

"Shall the poor perishing gratifications of sense and self-love, or any inconveniences of a trivial nature, be suffered to prevent our dutiful attendance upon Him in whom alone stands our everlasting interest? Shall a cloudy sky, a little wet, a little cold, a little ease to the flesh, a view to a little earthly gain, or any common incident, furnish an excuse for declining this duty and thereby depriving ourselves of the blessed advantage, often vouchsafed to the faithful, of enjoying heavenly communion together in spirit, with the Lord of life and glory?"—1765.—From The London Epistles.

Home Training.

BY GERTRUDE W. CARTLAND.

The Society of Friends has the credit, and often justly, of particularly happy and attractive homes, where "the daily round of duty" is cheerfully and faithfully performed; but we must still confess to humiliating deficiencies. We can but note a practical ignoring on the part of many parents, of their high and holy duties—a want of the patient self-sacrifice, watchful care, and loving authority, which their sacred relations demand, and which are sometimes so beautifully exemplified in the home-life. Intelligent and well-meaning parents too often fail to appreciate the mutual loss sustained by themselves, and their children, in allowing so little time for personal and sympathetic intercourse. How frequently the mother, who is the natural teacher of her child, and who better than any other should understand its needs, and the avenues to its heart, even with ample time at her disposal, is found delegating to the kindergarten or the primary school, a care and instruction which rightly devolve upon herself, and thus, even from the nursery an estrangement commences, which robs the home of its greatest charm, and its most precious privileges.

Even our Bible Schools are of questionable benefit when they are permitted to separate parents and children, and to occupy perhaps the only unbroken hours in the week, which the father can spend with his family. One can but feel pained to notice this infringement of the school upon the private family communion, and also, in many cases, upon our meetings for worship; since the confinement to school is not infrequently regarded as a sufficient tax upon the child; and thus a habit of neglecting meetings is early acquired. Contrasting this state of things with Bible instruction in the undisturbed and free intercourse of the home-circle, its sacred truths impressed upon the young heart, as only a loving and devout parent can impress them, and then the diligent attendance with their parents on public worship, and we can hardly fail to see results in favor of the latter course.

It has become an admitted fact among our most enlightened educators, that the surest foundation for their work is laid at the domestic fireside, amid fostering home influences. Home is the native soil for the young plant, where it should be tenderly nourished, and the twig properly bent, that it may grow into a tree of symmetry, strength and beauty, and when circumstances require its early transplanting into foreign gardens, it is a necessity always to be regretted.

When children are accustomed from their infancy to look for instruction and amusement beyond the family circle, we cannot wonder that as young men and women, the home has often a weak hold upon their affections, and they learn to depend upon their own choice of pursuits and social enjoyments, which are not always the most profitable.

It was a remark of Leigh Richmond, who had experience in the education of a numerous family, that "a good school is better than a bad home, but a good home is the best of schools." Hence, no effort should be spared to make our homes the centres of intelligence and sweet Christian influences, and when the time arrives, as it does to most young people in this country, that they have outgrown the intellectual resources of home, and must be placed at school, how surely the discerning teacher reads in their attainments and tendencies, the record of their home training. Thus, the family helps to give the school its tone, and the school in turn reacts upon the family. With the careful instruction, the warm charities and refinements of a Christian home, children conform almost unconsciously to a correct moral standard, and acquire habits of clear thinking, of definite expression, of nice discrimination in the use of language, of kindness and courtesy in manner, and above all, habits of devout meditation, which abide with them, and affect their intellectual and social pursuits, and spiritual progress, long after they leave the shelter of the parental wing.

It is indeed but too true that many mothers, from their own limited or defective education, and feeble appreciation of their solemn responsibilities, are not prepared to direct the studies and training of their children, and under these circumstances, the value of a good school cannot be over-estimated. It has been said that "children are what the mothers are," and admitting the truth of this assertion, the education of our daughters should claim the earnest prayerful attention, and wisdom, of our most experienced minds.

"The sober comfort, all the peace which springs
From the large aggregate of little things,
On these small cares of daughter, wife or friend,
The almost sacred joys of home depend."

How then, are we to train the daughters? No question, it seems to me, presses itself with stronger claim upon our consideration, or bears more closely upon the object of our Association. What course of study and discipline is best suited to promote the culture of the whole being? Not to produce that which is weak, and superficial, and aimless, or mere machines, running in certain grooves of usefulness, but a living power for good, capable of adapting itself to the varied conditions and demands of life. I believe those who are laboring in the field, with a desire to obtain the best fruits, will become fully persuaded that those intellectual pursuits, those courses of study and reading which induce habits of application, and careful thought and research, are no less essential to our daughters, than our sons—that in respect to mental and moral development, the boys and girls may profit equally under the same school curriculum—that what is substantial and practical, and best for our sons, cannot be superseded by fashionable accomplishments, in the education of our daughters, without a loss not easily repaired.

In my early teaching a class of girls, few of whom were members of the Society of Friends, and many of them devoting two or three hours daily to their piano practice; and with my own predilections at that time, quite favorable to giving music a place in the course of study, I watched with interest the effects, and was not long in perceiving that, not only the time given to practice was so much taken from more important branches, but that it even tended to create a distaste for those branches; and the social entertainments into which their musical associations led, were so dissipating, as to interfere essentially with their school-work, and to place them at marked disadvantage, beside others of their class; and at a subsequent period, when called to a similar charge in a school controlled by Friends, I was ready to approve what seemed the wiser judgment, in excluding music from the list of studies.

Bishop Cleaves, of St. Asaph, as quoted Hannah More, speaks of the misappropriation of time as a common fault of good people, and instances two particulars of the evil—music and light reading; and in reference to the former, he makes the following statement: "Suppose your pupil to begin music at years of age, and to continue the average four hours every week-day,—a very low calculation,—until she is eighteen, it will give a total of 14,400 hours, or 1,440 working days of 10 hours each, equal to 4.8 years."

Can any reflecting and unprejudiced man contemplate nearly five years of this most precious season, thus occupied, or even that length of time, when the foundation being laid for the superstructure of a life, will not conclude that it would have been employed to far more useful purpose in gaining a knowledge of domestic affairs, upon scientific studies, and carefully-selected reading, in pursuits which lead to an acquaintance with nature, and appreciation of its beauties, and numberless ways which a competent and skilful parent or teacher can devise, for instruction and amusement? And such a conclusion would have sufficient confirmation in the testimony of thoughtful persons who have received a musical education; as one of our former pupils, with several children to educate, remarked to me, that she should never cease to regret not being placed earlier in 'Friends' School,' for the time previously voted to her music, in which she became proficient, she regarded as quite wasted, since it afforded her nothing which proved of good service in bringing up her family.

Perhaps there is no more difficult point for the conscientious parent or teacher to settle than what recreations are safe and beneficial for our children. Can we do better in this matter, and in the regulation of all that appeals to the æsthetic element, than to conform our teachings and practice to the Christian standard held up by the mother of Wesleys? "Whatever weakens your reason, impairs the tenderness of your conscience, obscures your sense of God, or takes off the relish of spiritual things, that thing is sin to you, however innocent it may be in itself."

It has doubtless been due to considerations like these, that so many, in the unfolding of their religious experience, have renounced music, and kindred amusements, which they have found usurping the place of important duties.

I have dwelt somewhat at length upon this subject, as I recognize a danger lest Friends by following too closely popular methods of education, should lose some of the strong and distinctive characteristics of our own,—that our family and school-life should suffer from the effect of experiments, which, however honestly made, may prove in the end serious mistakes. We cannot throw our children in the currents of worldly fashion and not expect them to drift with those currents.

A system of guarded education, in harmony with our religious belief, beginning in the family, and running through all the years of student-life, to the completion of a college se, should be our aim; and to secure this must have parents and teachers loyal to principles of Friends, and acting with the earnestness and moral courage of individual conviction. If our denominational schools are any worth, as such, it is because through our views of Christian doctrine and practice are faithfully inculcated and maintained.

But we must not lose sight of the truth ourselves, or neglect opportunities to impress it on the young, that however favored by nature, and however broad our culture may be, we alone can never lead us up to the heights of heavenly wisdom; the graces of the Spirit are not to be attained through intellectual culture, but through a full surrender of ourselves to the regenerating, moulding power of the Divine Master.

Neither can we with such an array of eminent examples before us count that a wasted life, rich towards God, has enjoyed few advantages for mental culture. The Society of Friends has recognized, from its rise, the Christian duty of its members rightly to improve all their talents, and with our educational system properly grounded and deepened, keeping faith and reverence as its cornerstone, and alive to improvement, ready to examine and appropriate all that is truly valuable in modern theories, may we not hope to see amongst us an increasing number of disciplined, well-informed young people: those, too, who under the special training of our Lord,—a training which no theology of schools can supply,—may be thoroughly prepared for Christian service.

Let us always bear in mind that the Keeper of the vineyard, who knoweth his work, has set for the humblest and most illiterate, as well as for the wise, the mighty and the meek. He still calleth from the receipt of the oil and from their fishermen's nets, as well as from the feet of Gamaliel, those whom he will use in his various holy ministries, and place them among his "bright and shining ones." Life is not a failure to any humble member in the school of Christ.—From Proceedings of Educational Conference.

For "The Friend."

"Faithful Mothers."

The editorial in the 6th No. of the present volume of "The Friend," page 47, so arrested my attention on reading it, and continues to do so with me, that I feel like calling the attention of mothers to it again with the following extract from the Memorandums of H. W. At the close of the Yearly Meeting, 1846, the mothers were affectionately addressed, praying their difficulties, 'watching by day and by night their infant charge,' feeling as very sad, as one formerly expressed, 'one out of mind;' yet if they were consoled faithfully to maintain their places in the Truth, and imbue the minds of their ten-charge with that which is good, they are doing equally as much for the cause as those who were going 'to and fro,' preaching the gospel; there were many ways to exalt the kingdom of the Redeemer; and for this and often closely proven class amongst us feel a tender sympathy—the seed thus sown in early life was often greatly blessed, and watered with tears and prayers of the loving mother."

11th mo. 8th, 1882.

For "The Friend."

Westtown Boarding School.

The following interesting report, relating to the farm, &c., appears in the minutes under date of 12th mo. 13th, 1844:

"The Farming Committee report, that they have through the aid of the teachers recently had the farm surveyed. It contains five hundred and ninety-nine acres, two rods and thirty-four perches: of which 59 acres and 3 rods is attached to the school; 1 acre, 3 rods and 6 perches to the infirmary; 8 acres, 2 rods and 10 perches to the grist mill; 182 acres, 2 rods and 20 perches is under timber, leaving 346 acres, 2 rods and 38 perches farm land. There is 55 acres, 2 rods and 39 perches of land, between the mill-race and creek, which is not suitable for tillage, being low and generally swampy; it is included in the above farm land, and being deducted will leave 290 acres, 3 rods and 29 perches of arable land. The timber land is estimated at 182 acres, 2 rods and 20 perches, exclusive of the boys and girls' woods, 32 acres and 4 perches of which is thicket, having been recently cleared, and 34 acres, 2 rods and 25 perches is young wood, leaving 116 acres and 11 perches now under ripe timber, which will average forty cords per acre; but if the timber suitable for sawing is left out of the estimate, it would cut about thirty-five cords per acre. The young wood is generally thrifty and may increase at the rate of three-quarters of a cord per acre for 40 years, dating from the period of its having been cut off. A part of the wood has been lately much improved, the superintendent having caused the underwood to be gathered up, and such parts of the standing timber as was not thrifty taken out, giving to the timber of value a much better opportunity for improvement.

The school now consumes annually about 80 cords of wood, the farm-house about 30, and the tenements about 20. The farm requires for the same period about 1200 rails, or 24 cords, making in the aggregate a consumption of 154 cords. From this estimate, which we think approximates the truth, our timber is evidently decreasing. In reference to the farm, many friends entertain the opinion that it is not as productive as it should be from the fact that the whole estate contains about 600 acres; but when we consider that not quite one half that amount (only) is productive land, it presents quite a different aspect."

It is understood that at the present time (1882), there is about 117 acres in timber, including the clearing near the northern boundary of the farm. Within a few years about 100 acres of swamp or wet lands have been reclaimed by a judicious system of draining, and that the whole annual consumption of wood for fuel is in the neighborhood of 50 cords. It is expected that some native forest or shade trees will be planted out this fall, and the desire is entertained by the committee at the present time, to increase rather than diminish the acreage in woodland.

At this meeting Joseph Evans was appointed on the Farming Committee in place of Pennock Passmore, appointed Superintendent.

From the report made to the Yearly Meeting in 1845, we learn that the average number of pupils in attendance during the past year was 162, viz., 86 boys and 76 girls, "That the instruction of the children in a knowledge of the Holy Scriptures and of our religious principles and testimonies continues to be attended to as heretofore, and we trust that the information thus imparted will prove of lasting benefit to many."

"The subjects of dress and language have engaged the attention of the committee, and considerable pains have been taken to promote the concern of the Yearly Meeting in these respects. It is satisfactory to be able to state that a manifest improvement has taken place in regard to the use of plain scripture language; but though the clothing of the children is in some respects more conformable to the simplicity which we believe Truth requires, yet there is still cause of uneasiness in the form and manner of wearing some of the garments, especially the boys' coats and vests; and the committee believe the subject ought to claim the close attention of parents, that the minute of advice issued last year by the Yearly Meeting may be more strictly observed."

The concern here manifested for plainness and simplicity in dress and address has lost nothing in its importance through the lapse of time, and the desire is strongly felt at this present writing, that the time may be far distant when a Friend may not be at once known and distinguished by his dress as well as address. It is a great privilege, and one it is feared not sufficiently appreciated, that of being freed from following the slavish and changeable fashions of the world by adhering in great measure to the simple, yet in every respect comfortable and healthful dress which was worn some 200 years since, when Friends first rose up as a distinct religious people, having peculiar and very important testimonies to bear before the world.

Some time since the writer was inquired of by one who occupies a high position in the world and who had had a birthright in the Society of Friends, but who had married out, whether it would be possible for him to have his children admitted to Westtown Boarding School to be educated? Adding, in substance, "that there was in the present day such a flood of folly and extravagance in the world, that he desired to place his children where they would be brought up with plain and simple tastes and habits." Of course the reply was in the negative, but it has been felt to be a striking and encouraging testimony from a very observant man.

That the cultivation of aesthetic tastes does not harmonize with plain and simple habits is quite an error of judgment, there is no doubt. In a recent conversation with a minister of another denomination, a man of cultivated tastes and observation, and who had travelled abroad, he remarked in regard to this subject, in substance, "that pictures and music were generally considered necessary to refinement, but he had pointed to the Society of Friends, who as a people discarded both, and yet who were remarkable for a high degree of refinement, and to whom he would go for examples of purity of tastes and habits;" thus may it ever be. The lavish expenditure of money in the purchase and adornments of our houses or grounds is not likely to produce permanent happiness, as the indulgence of artificial desires grows with what it feeds upon, and is never satisfied, whilst on the other hand the denial of the desire for superfluities has the effect of increasing the enjoyment of things that are really useful, and affords to the pure and cultivated mind a gratification in the beauties of nature and other simple and inexpensive pleasures, that the voluptuary knows nothing of.

Stick to One Thing.—"Unstable as water, thou shalt not excel," is the language of the Bible. Whoever expects to succeed in any undertaking, must enter into it with a hearty and earnest will to do his best. When a trade or profession is chosen, obstacles, be they large or small, must not be allowed to stand in the way of mastering that trade or profession. However much we may deprecate the old-time custom of indenturing apprentices, the system, in its practical results, operated almost always for the lasting good of the apprentice. Generally, it insured to him a good trade and a wholesome discipline that fitted him for success in business. At the present time, very many young men undertake to acquire a trade, and after a brief trial abandon it, because there are unpleasant duties to be performed and obstacles to be overcome. They consider themselves accountable to no one, and come and go at the bidding of caprice, or an unsettled, uneasy mind. The result of this is to send out into the world young men who have not half learned their trades, of unstable character, who drift from post to pillar, and who succeed in nothing but strolling along the high-ways of life, melancholy wrecks of men. We would earnestly entreat every young man, after he has chosen his vocation, to stick to it; don't leave it because hard blows are to be struck or disagreeable work performed. The men who have worked their way up to wealth and usefulness do not belong to the shiftless and unstable classes, but may be reckoned among those who took off their coats, rolled up their sleeves, conquered their prejudices against labor, and manfully bore the heat and burden of the day. Whether upon the old, worn-out farm, where our fathers toiled, diligently striving to bring back the soil to productiveness, in the machine shop or factory, or in the thousand other business places that invite honest toil and skill, let the motto ever be—Perseverance and Industry. The baby training of the nursery was good in its place, but it won't answer all the demands of an active life. This is not a baby world. We must expect to be knocked and jostled about in the stern conflict, and get run over, if we are not on the lookout and prepared to meet the duties of life with a purpose not to shirk them but to fulfil them. A young man with a good trade or honorable profession, as he goes forth into the world with his mind made up to stick to his trade or profession, is not obliged to ask for many favors. He will hew his way to success while the unstable and shiftless will grow tired, despair, and fail.—Zion's Watchman.

Complaints and Confessions.—There are few things which cause more real discomfort and unhappiness than the habit of complaining, and yet there are few habits more easily contracted and more difficult to abandon. We all know the habitual grumbler, the man for whom the weather is always too hot or too cold, too wet or too dry, whose clothes never suit him, whose food is never prepared to his mind, whose friends are inconsiderate or unkind, whose circumstances are always unfavorable, for whom, in fact, the world seems to wear a perpetual frown. Wretched in himself, he contrives to infuse a sense of wretchedness in all who are so unfortunate as to be near him.

There are real trials and disappointments, vexations and failures, which often appear to us to warrant open complaint or silent depression, and there are seasons when gloom seems to overwhelm us like a thick cloud, which all our powers fail to penetrate or chase away. One idea, however, that is common to all complaints, whether small or great, reasonable or unreasonable, is that something or some one else, is to blame for our unhappiness. If we could be convinced that we ourselves were the chief authors of it; that it sprung, not from outward events, or from the conduct of others so much as from something within our own breasts; that it was, in fact, chiefly our own fault, and not other people's, and was what we brought to the world, instead of what the world brought to us, our complaints would have but little force, and would soon give place to self-examination and self-discipline.

Probably nine-tenths of the complaints that now bring discord to the ear may be traced directly to this source. A quaint preacher once said that he was disposed to entertain a very ill opinion of misery in general. Perhaps, if we could see it in its true light, we should all hold it quite as censurable as it is pitiable, and the loud complaints we now endure would be softened into whispered confessions; for life is largely what we ourselves make it.

The outside world reflects to each one the world within. Social life, too, is a response to character. The selfish man is convinced of the selfishness of his neighbors, while the generous man sees only their kindliness. The cold heart thinks that humanity is barren of affection, while the loving spirit finds it overflowing all around him. Deceit is ever distrustful, while sincerity extends the cordial grasp of confidence. The passionate meet with violence and the rude with rudeness, while the gentle and courteous rejoice in the gentleness and courtesy extended to them. Each quality has a magnetic attraction by which it draws out its like in others; the bad eliciting what is bad, the good and pure drawing out and developing goodness and purity.

Not only nature and society, but even the conditions and opportunities of life will respond to the spirit with which we receive them. Poverty will discourage and break down one man, while in another it will build up self-reliance, industry and firmness of will. If this be truly so, if life is a mirror, reflecting, with tolerable fairness, our mental and moral features, or a structure of which we ourselves are the chief architects, it is quite clear that the complainer must lose all claim to the sympathy he craves. In truth, he is, by his murmurs, confessing his own weakness of will, or poverty of mind or moral deficiencies. He is taking the outward conditions of life and working them up with his own moods, qualities and feelings. If the result displease him he should seek for the hidden cause in humility and penitence. When complaints come to be fully recognized as confessions, they will neither be so loud nor so numerous as they are at present.—Public Ledger.

The luxury of luxuries is that of doing good.

Select

TIMES TAKINGS AND LEAVINGS.

What does age take away?
Bloom from the cheek, and lustre from the eye;
The spirits light and gay,
Unclouded as the summer's bluest sky.

What do years steal away?
The fond heart's idol, Love, that gladdened life;
Friendship, whose calmer sway
We trusted to in hours of darker strife.

What must with Time decay?
Young Hope's wild dreams, and Fancy's visions bri
Life's evening sky grows gray,
And darker clouds prelude Death's coming night.

But not for such we mourn!
We know them frail, and brief their date assigned
Our spirits are forlorn,
Less from Time's thefts, than what he leaves behind.

What do years leave behind?
Unruly passions, impotent desires,
Distrusts and thoughts unkind,
Love of the world, and self—which last expires.

For these, for these we grieve;
What Time has robbed us of we know must go:
But what he deigns to leave,
Not only finds us poor, but keeps us so.

It ought not thus to be;
Nor would it, knew we meek Religion's sway;
Her votary's eye could see
How little Time can give, or take away.

Faith, in the heart enshrined,
Would make Time's gifts enjoyed and used, while l
And all it left behind,
Of Love and Grace, a noble monument.

Select

BEHOLD YOUR KING.

Behold your King! Though the moonlight steals
Through the silvery sprays of the olive tree,
No star-gemmed sceptre or crown it reveals
In the solemn shade of Gethsemane.
Only a form of prostrate grief;
Fallen, crushed, like a broken leaf!
Oh, think of his sorrow! that we may know
The depth of love in the depth of woe!

Behold your King! Is it nothing to you
That the crimson tokens of agony
From the kingly brow must fall like dew,
Through the shuddering shades of Gethsemane?
Jesus himself, the Prince of Life,
Bows in mysterious mortal strife;
Oh, think of his sorrow! that we may know
The unknown love in the unknown woe!

Behold your King! With his sorrow crowned, Alone, alone in the valley is He!
The shadows of death are gathering round,
And the cross must follow Gethsemane.
Darker and darker the gloom must fall,
Filled is the cup, He must drink it all!
Oh, think of his sorrow, that we may know
His wondrous love in his wondrous woe!

—Frances Ridley Havergal

Spencer Compton tells of an experience sea that well sets forth the good that one can do with a little means, if its possessor only willing and quick-witted enough to make it of them. There was a cry on deck of "Man overboard!" S. Compton was in his cabin. He felt that he would be useless on deck, but thinking of what he could do, he seized upon the idea of holding his lamp close to the window, so that its light would shine out upon the sea. In a moment he heard the cry, "all right!" That timely light had shown the sailors where to cast the knotted rope, so that it reached the man struggling in the water. It was merely a little lamp, but what if he had not used it! Shine your light, and many may yet glorify your Father which is in heaven. steadily shining little lamp is better than unused electric light with a forty-foot reflector. S. S. Times.

For "The Friend."

lar of the Bible Association of Friends in America.

again calling the attention of Auxiliaries to the Annual Queries to be answered previously to the general meeting of the Association on the 1st of Eleventh month, the Corresponding Committee would press upon those who have been engaged in the distribution of the Holy Scriptures, the importance of furnishing full and accurate answers to the Queries, and of forwarding them reasonably to the Depository.

It may be recollected, that in making donations to Auxiliaries, the Board are guided in giving what number of Bibles and Testaments shall be sent to each, by the information given in its report. Hence those Auxiliaries that do not report in time, are liable to be left out in the distribution.

Specific directions should be given in every report how boxes should be marked and forwarded; and their receipt should always be promptly acknowledged.

Address John S. Stokes, No. 116 N. Fourth Street, Philadelphia.

CHARLES RHODES,
JAMES WHITALL,
JOHN W. BIDDLE,

Committee of Correspondence.

Philadelphia, 10th month, 1882.

QUERIES.

What number of families or individuals have been gratuitously furnished with the Holy Scriptures by the Auxiliary during the past year?

What number of Bibles and Testaments have been distributed by the Auxiliary within the past year?

How many members, male and female, are there in the Auxiliary?

What number of families of Friends reside within the limits of the Auxiliary?

Are there any families of Friends within your limits not supplied with a copy of the Holy Scriptures in plain type, and on fair paper; if so, how many? How many members of our Society, capable of reading the Bible, do not own such a copy, of the Holy Scriptures?

How many Bibles and Testaments may probably be disposed of by sale within your limits?

Is the income of the Auxiliary sufficient to suppose within its limits who are not duly furnished with the Holy Scriptures?

What number of Bibles and Testaments would it be necessary for the Bible Association to furnish gratuitously to enable the Auxiliary to supply each family?

What number would be required in order to supply each member of our religious Society, capable of reading, who is destitute of a copy, and unable to purchase it?

How many Bibles and Testaments are now on hand?

In plain terms, let us preach up the Gospel instead of trying to reason down the error. When the unbeliever assails all religious truth as incomprehensible, leave him with the assurance that such revelations must forever remain mysteries to the hearts that reject them. Many years ago a bold blasphemer spent an hour in the company, gathered for another purpose, in denouncing and ridiculing all that religious men hold sacred. There was one sincere Christian man present, but he made no reply. At last the infidel, who was disconcerted by his silence, turned upon him and demanded what he had to say to all this: "Simon," replied the believer, "that religion is the matter of experience. Those who have entered it, know that it is true; those who have never known nothing about it. You are only living in ignorance of a subject with which you are wholly unacquainted." Selected.

For "The Friend."

Preaching What and When we List.

It is recorded as the word of the Lord to Jonah, "Preach the preaching that I bid thee." Can it be believed, and especially by professed ministers of the gospel of Jesus, after nearly nineteen hundred years wherein "the new covenant" (Heb. viii.) has been in effect, of which He is the Mediator, that other ministry than such as is taught by Christ himself and is based upon obedience to his will can avail anything? Can that gospel, which Paul tells us he received not of or by man, but by the revelation of Jesus Christ, and to whom, as he adds, the "woe" must attach if he preached it not, ever become subject to human expediency or the beck of human authority? Does the query, "How shall they preach except they be sent;" or the command "Go thou and preach the kingdom of God;" with the testimony also, "They ceased not to preach Jesus Christ;" at all sanction any ministry short of that immediately authorized by, and derived through the revelation of the Spirit of Christ, our ever-present Helper, Lawgiver, and High Priest? Was it not obedience to an immediate mandate from on high that made Jonah's ministry effectual to the opening of the eyes of the Ninevites and caused both king and subject to put on sack-cloth and to cry mightily unto God that his fierce anger might be turned from, and they perish not?

These few hints have been penned because of information received, that in some localities the request is heralded round from post to pillar and from priest to minister, that every such one should on a certain day preach about William Penn. Now is this an invitation to preach like Jonah and Paul, because of "necessity laid upon them?" Did one preacher in those days presume to dictate to another what he was to preach about? Would William Penn himself in anywise have sanctioned such a course? Is it in the least in accord with his own expressed views, as follows?—"The Light, Spirit, and Grace that comes by Christ, and appears in man, was what the apostles ministered from, and turned people's minds unto, and in which they gathered and built up the churches of Christ in their day." Again he writes: "A dry doctrinal ministry, however sound in words, can reach but the ear, and is but a dream at the best: there is another soundness, that is soundest of all, viz: Christ the power of God. This is the key of David, that opens, and none shuts; and shuts, and none can open; as oil to the lamp and the soul to the body, so is that to the best of words. Which made Christ say, 'My words they are spirit and they are life;' that is, they are from life, and therefore they make you alive that receive them. If the disciples, that had lived with Jesus, were to stay at Jerusalem till they received it; so must we wait to receive before we minister, if we will turn people from darkness to light, and from Satan's power to God." Again he conveys: "We hold the truth in the Spirit of it, and not in our own spirits, or after our own wills and affections. They were bowed and brought into subjection, inasmuch that it was visible to them who knew us, we did not think ourselves at our own disposal, to go where we list, or say or do what we list, or when we list. Our liberty stood in the liberty of the Spirit of truth; and no pleasure, no profit, no fear, no favor could draw us from this retired, strict and watchful frame." Again, would not this great man say with his godly contemporary, George Fox, whom he honored in the Truth—"I am nothing; Christ is all."

10th mo. 17th, 1882.

Deliverance from Sin—Salvation.

(Concluded from page 75.)

Further, let us consider what these strong pleaders for sin have to fortify themselves withal. They say they have the Scripture to plead withal for sin, which certainly was never the intention of the Holy Spirit, by which it was given forth. But, say they, it is written in 1 Kings viii. 46: "For there is no man that sinneth not." Answer: This is very true. Neither do I plead that any man is free from sin all the days of his life (except Christ), but have confessed they are all sinners by nature until they be changed. Besides, there it is but spoken of a people that were under the law, of which the apostle says, that it made nothing perfect; but, said he, the bringing in of a better hope did. The law did not purify the corners thereunto, according to the conscience; but when the offerers had offered, there remained an evidence of sin in the conscience; but what is that to the Christians who are come to know a better hope, and the blood that purifieth the conscience? For that same apostle that said, the law made no man perfect (under which law Solomon was, as also that people concerning whom it was said, there is none that liveth and sinneth not), notwithstanding, the same apostle said that it was the bringing in of a better hope that did it. And what! are these fighters for sin and sinpleaders become so zealous that they will rather deny the better hope, than to cease from sin? If not, then there is a possibility to be made perfect by the blood of Christ, which the blood of bulls and goats could not do. Yet saith John to those that were thus washed, If we say that we have not sinned, we make God a liar. It is as much as if he would say, that even those that are saved must confess to the power of God, by which they have been judged for sin; and not to exalt themselves above it, as if they had never sinned, seeing that the witness of God testifieth in all that they have sinned and come short of the glory of God. So that now the understanding reader may see that John hath not written here of an impossibility of being delivered from sin, but absolutely the contrary; namely, that those that cannot say they are without sin may come by confessing their sins, to be cleansed and made free from it; yea, from all that which is unrighteous. Therefore I shall say this, that all those that feel themselves in bondage under this prince of darkness, in what manner soever it be, and are not willing to remain so always; believe but in Him that showeth you your bondage, and wait in his pure light in your own consciences, which discovers darkness and the prince of it—and then you will feel a hope to spring up in you that you may be delivered. This hope will lead to a daily washing and purifying, and to a daily crucifying and mortifying of the earthly members. And as this hope comes to work in thee, it will bring thee to an experience of being delivered in some particular things, and that will strengthen thy hope of being delivered from more; and so, at last, a faith will arise in thee perfectly and thoroughly to be made free from sin. When thou art made partaker of this faith, then the greatest and strongest bond of the devil is broken: for, through the unbelief of it, he keeps his kingdom in man and woman.

Another great plea which these sin-pleaders bring, is this: If people can come to perfection in this life, then they have no need of Christ to be their Saviour; as if the salvation by Christ and a perfect and pure life were inconsistent with one another. Ye fools and blind! know ye not that all good and perfect gifts come from the Lord, and that none can come to perfection but by his gift? And if God be the giver, is it not then by grace? Where are works then? But these pleaders for sin are as great strangers to the salvation which is in Christ Jesus, as they are to perfection, otherwise they would see their ignorance. When Christ said to his disciples, "Be ye perfect, as your Father which is in heaven is perfect;" that is as much as to say, according to explanation of these people—there is your command; when that is done, you have no need of Me. The apostle spoke wisdom among them that are perfect, but not such wisdom, or, rather, foolishness, as this, to persuade them that they have no need of Christ to be their Saviour, because they were come to perfection. On the contrary, he said that he could do all things; then he could be perfect, but not as of himself, but through Christ, that enabled him; and those that come to a perfect state know that their salvation is not of their works, how good and pure soever they may be, but merely by grace through Jesus Christ, and that in respect of these three following observations:

First. That it was the appearance of Christ Jesus, who is the power of God, that brought them off from their sins and imperfections; and that they have not left them off of themselves, but do own that it is the grace of God, as the apostle did. "For the grace of God, that bringeth salvation, hath appeared unto all men, teaching us that, denying ungodliness and worldly lusts, we should live soberly, righteously and godly in this present world. So here you may see that it is the appearance of the grace of God that leads to perfection; and this perfection is not yet a perfect salvation; for those that have it may fall from it again, and so not be saved; but those that endure to the end shall be saved.

Secondly. It is Christ who is the preserver and keeper unto the end, of those that trust in Him, and the apostles testify that those who were delivered from the corruption of this world must know Him to be their keeper that had gathered them out of the world. Therefore, said Jude, in his epistle, "Now unto Him that is able to keep you from falling, and to present you faultless before the presence of his glory, with exceeding joy," &c. Peter testifieth: "You are kept by the power of God through faith unto salvation, ready to be revealed in the last time." And Paul testifieth that the keeping is by Jesus Christ. So here you may see that the bringing to the state of perfection, and the keeping from falling from it again, are both the work of Christ; and yet, this is not a perfect salvation, for this does not put away the former sins.

Thirdly. Whoever comes to perfect salvation, he comes to know Christ to be an offering for sin, and to obtain reconciliation with God, and forgiveness of his former sins. For all the holy conversation and perfection of life can be counted no more but his duty; and therefore he cannot obtain remission of one of his former sins. But those that confess their sins, and forsake them, such come to forgiveness by Jesus Christ, and come to know his blood cleansing them from their former sins; and so they come to perfect salvation by grace, not by works, but by faith, that works in the love of God unto obedience, without which, faith is but dead, and makes no man saved. But those that have this true faith and hope in them, purify themselves as he is pure. He that has not this hope does not purify himself, neither does he believe that he can do it; and by this we know the true believers from the false; and by this sinners are made manifest that cannot stand in the congregation of the righteous. So, now, let all pleaders for sin stop their mouths forever, and let the devil stand for himself, and plead his own cause; and henceforth do not despise and revile the innocent that are travelling and striving after perfection, with a faith to obtain it, that they think to be saved by their own works. For we hope for no other salvation but that which is in and by Jesus Christ, the eternal Son of God, who is the first-born of every creature that brings many sons and daughters unto glory, but not by leaving them in their sins; but his name is Jesus, and he saves people from their sins.—Stephen Crisp.

Abuse of Reading.—There is scarcely a greater mistake in connection with the desire of knowledge, than in supposing that reading—the reading of good books, of instructive books—necessarily brings knowledge. Not the amount of good reading, nor yet the method of reading, but the proper limitation of reading, to begin with, and the use afterward made of that which is read, must settle the question of the gain or loss as a whole from reading. As a rule, the men and women who know most are not great readers. And, as a rule, the men and women who read very much do not know a great deal. "Had I read as much as others," said the philosopher Hobbes, "I had remained as ignorant as they."

Continuous reading stands in the way of earnest thought, and forbids that study to which almost every well-filled page would prompt a thoughtful mind. To read right on, hour after hour, book after book, without stopping to consider and to follow out the facts, or the principles, or the suggestions, brought before the mind in that reading, is like searching the beauties of a new country by whirling through it on an express train, never stopping to clamber a mountain, or to follow a winding stream, or to sit and watch a lovely bit of landscape in its changing hues. Go to any public library, and learn who of its visitants draw most books from its shelves. You will find that among the poorer-informed readers are the all-devouring readers. Those who really gain from reading are so busy making their former reading profitable, and reading over again what they have read before, that they have not the time to read much new material.

The man or the woman who can find time to read through a daily paper every day, and then to "keep up" with all the better current literature of the times, gives proof of that very ability of an inability to gain knowledge—without a change in method seeking knowledge.—S. S. Times.

I would sometimes read moral stories thinking good lessons might be learned from them; and I did learn some good lessons; but I did not stop with moral stories. Taste was formed for reading all kinds of stories. I have learned a double lesson of moral stories. They destroy the taste for religious reading. Sometime ago a paper, with a sermon in it, happened to fall into my possession and I resisted the temptation to read it for a few days, but finally yielded. I have concluded to burn such stories as soon as they come into the house; then I will not be tempted. If I had thought of that it would have been an easy matter to keep from reading this last story.—Selected.

For "The Friend"

Natural History, Science, &c.

Teasing Propensity of Birds.—In Hewick's Science Gossip there is a short account of a number of sparrows mobbing a cat. The cat evidently intended to make a meal of one of the birds, but was greatly mistaken for the sparrows dashed at him so fiercely that he soon turned tail and ran into his house, one of the sparrows actually pursuing him into the house. Poor Tommy ran up the stairs, and was found crouching in the under one of the beds. This happened in London.

An account of a somewhat similar adventure is given in the Dumfries and Gallop Standard. A number of "rooks" were the habit of assembling on a house, and it was thought that they had nests there. One day a cat came prowling over the roof, to the great discomfiture of the rooks, who assembled on the roof of a neighboring house to hold a consultation. This being over, they proceeded systematically to attack the cat, dashing at her in groups of three or four, flapping their wings in her very face, screaming dismally. The skirmish between this cat and the crows lasted fully half an hour. The cat finding it could neither hold of them nor their nests at length quietly descended.

In T. C. Jerdon's "Birds of India," there is an amusing notice of the habits of the Chukpartridge when domesticated. It is very tame and familiar, and sometimes becomes rather a nuisance on account of its habit of playing tricks on people. It has a special facility in discovering the most vulnerable spots, and inflicts sly peeks at the bare legs of the native servants as they move through the house. Its great amusement, however, is to find the man who pulls the punkah asleep, as is customary with these men; they rock backwards and forwards at this monotonous task. The little bird pecks the legs so fiercely and actively that he is quite unable to drive it away, and goes on with his work, and he is at last obliged to call for someone to rid him of his tormentor.

Thompson in his "Natural History of the Island" mentions a tame buzzard that has a way of flying after strangers, and knocking their hats over their eyes with a blow of the wing. It was so quick about it that, even when forewarned, its victim had some difficulty in evading the blows.

G. Wood says he was personally acted with a heron in which this form of r was largely developed.

The bird was allowed to run loose in a u, and was on the most affectionate of friendship with one of the men em- in its owner's warehouse. "It is beautiful to see the welcome which rd gives to the man, and to hear her loving gabble as she rubs her head against or takes his hand gently in her beak. us taught her several tricks, as, for ex- , to take off his hat at the word of com-

She is a beautiful creature. Unfor- ely, she has an unappeasable relish for cal jokes, especially against human s, looking quite soft and gentle till they ithin reach, and then driving her long beak at them with the rapidity of a at's stroke.

he garden in which she lives is also in- ed by a great number of aquatic birds, ally gulls and ducks, and they have a of laying their eggs in different parts of arden. One day, a learned and respected bor went into the garden, and, seeing ucks' eggs on the ground stooped down mine them. As he was thus engaged, eron stole up softly behind him, and de- l so tremendous a blow that she fairly ed him on his face. The heron mounted s back, and triumphantly maintained st there until assistance arrived, and she riven off."

et of Narcotics on the Blood.--A careful eopie observer has discovered that all ies--opium and its preparations, hash- &c., as well as tobacco--act in a pecu- nner upon the colored corpuscles of ood, producing the phenomenon styled ion; that is, the margin of the cor- , instead of possessing the absolute rity of margin noticed in the condition lth, presents a series of scallops some- irregular in their distribution. When d by oblique light under the microscope, ppearance is found to be due to the con- of the corpuscle into a minute sac, ning some hundreds of spherical bodies. ew hours the sac ruptures and the im- ed organisms escape into the surround- asma to form bacteria when the condi- are favorable. A few such crenated scles, in the proportion of one to three ed and fifty, occur in the circulation of s in normal health, not addicted to ies; but in the opium and tobacco , when of long standing, the ratio is imes as high as one degenerated cor- to ten healthy ones, and often attains ure of one to twenty-five or thirty. In ases the countenance is pale and almost tic; dark circles appear beneath the hich lack lustre and are deeply sunken, he respiration is weak and easily dis- l; while the heart palpitates violently very slight muscular exertion.

incident illustrating the sequel of this rance of the blood occurred a few months e office of a manufacturing optician city. As the professor of microscopy of our medical colleges dropped in, a man of evidently large wealth and ed intellectual culture was just leaving lee with a cigar between his lips. He wealthy amateur, and had selected a le microscope, using a drop of blood his own finger as a test object. The instrument was still adjusted and the slide still beneath the lens. The professor glanced at it; then moved the slide to and fro, so as to study one field after another; then counted a few fields, and made a rapid computation. The optician looked on in astonishment. "That gentleman is one of our best customers," he said; "buys more heavily than half a dozen professors." "And this is a drop of his blood?" inquired the man of science musingly. The purveyor of lenses assented. "Very well," replied the professor, "tell your best customer, if you can without impertinence, that unless he stops smoking at once he has not many months to live." But he did not stop. A few weeks later he went to Europe, thinking a sea voyage might recruit his wasted energies. In a few weeks more his death was announced by telegraph from Paris, where the doctors styled his disease a general breaking up.--N. Y. Times.

THE FRIEND.

TENTH MONTH 21, 1882.

It is difficult to see how those who accept the teachings of the New Testament, as the words of truth, which ought to be reverently received and believed, can reject the doctrine that our Blessed Saviour, Jesus Christ, was a propitiation for the sins of mankind. It is plainly set forth in many passages, as well as foretold by the prophets of former times.

The Scriptures declare that the natural man knoweth not the things of the Spirit of God, because these are spiritually discerned. From this it clearly follows, that those who undertake to comprehend the mysteries of religion, and to define them by the unassisted force of intellect, go beyond their depth. They may build up structures very beautiful to the outward eye; explain to their own satisfaction the character of the influences which have operated on the minds of holy men of old and led them to the use of certain forms of expression or of action; and may point out to others what they think should be accepted as consistent with their ideas of right reason, what should be rejected, and what should be explained away; but after all, they are but as blind leaders of the blind.

This dependence on the "pride of intellect," we believe has been the source of much of the Unitarian sentiment, which regards our Saviour merely as a high and holy example, as a man eminently gifted with spiritual graces. The intellect alone, when not enlightened by a Divine opening, cannot comprehend how He who walked among his disciples in an outward body, could have all power in Heaven and earth, and be Lord of all; nor how his death and sufferings should be a sacrifice for sin, and be an essential element (in the Divine ordering) in the salvation of mankind. Hence those who rely on their own reasoning powers are prone to reject these truths so clearly revealed in the Scriptures. The Scriptures themselves, they submit to the same kind of rationalistic treatment, accepting what accords with their own views and rejecting or modifying what is contrary thereto. Thus they use them as a builder does his material; hewing into the required shape what is fitted for the building he wishes to construct, and disregarding what is not adapted for his purpose.

We have been painfully impressed with the evidences of this tendency manifested in recent articles in some of our exchanges published in the interests of those who separated from us in 1827. They indicate that such views have a stronger foothold in that body of people than we had hoped was the case. While we would be rejoiced to see an increasing concern among them to receive the truth in the simplicity of little children, and to lay aside that worldly wisdom to which "Christ crucified" is as much of a stumbling-block now as it was to the wise Greeks in the days of the apostles; we are especially desirous that our own members should be preserved from the dangers that beset the path of those who walk more by the light of their own reason than by the revelations of Divine Grace.

A friend who has had long experience in the Lord's work, thus commented on an article of the kind above referred to: "To handle such deep mysteries by the intellectual powers alone is entirely unsafe. The Lord of Heaven and earth, who inhabiteth eternity, hath undoubtedly hid these things from the wise and prudent after the wisdom and prudence of this world, and reveals needful truths to the babes in Christ—who are fed by the sincere milk of the Holy Word and grow thereby and thus only. * * I want light in my dwelling and bread in mine house, rather than to feed on the tree of knowledge, or to be able to explain all mysteries."

The testimony of Robert Barclay as to his own conviction is in accord with these views. He says: "When I came unto the silent assemblies of God's people, I felt a secret power amongst them, which touched my heart; and, as I gave way to it, I found the evil weakening in me, and the good raised up, and so I became thus knit and united to them, hungering more and more after an increase of this Power and Life, whereby I might feel myself perfectly redeemed. And, indeed, this is the surest way to become a Christian, to whom afterwards the knowledge and understanding of principles will not be wanting, but will grow up, so much as is needful, as the natural fruit of this root, and such a knowledge will not be barren or unfruitful."

Would that mankind everywhere were more concerned to hunger after an increase of that Divine Power and Life, whereby they might partake of that salvation of which Christ Jesus is the author; and depend on Him for a living knowledge and understanding of the mysteries of his kingdom!

SUMMARY OF EVENTS.

UNITED STATES.--The Commissioner of the General Land Office, in his annual report, states that the lands now embraced within the limits of the public domain, including Alaska, number 900,000,000 acres. He recommends the repeal of the Pre-emption laws, as the Homestead laws cover all cases now arising.

The total number of patents, including reissues and designs, granted by the Patent Office in Washington during the last fiscal year, was 17,713. The number of trade marks registered was 1079; labels registered, 223. The receipts of the office were $279,144 in excess of the expenditures.

The Director of the U. S. Mint, in his annual report says the total coinage of gold during the last fiscal year was $89,413,447, or nearly $11,000,000 more than in any previous year. The silver coinage amounted to 27,772,075 standard dollars, and $11,313.75 in fractional coin, making a total of $27,783,388.75. Of the minor or base-metal coins, 46,865,725 pieces were struck, of the total value of $644,757.75. The number of 5-cent pieces struck was 4,400,775, the remainder of the minor coinage consisting principally of one-cent pieces. The Government made a profit of $3,444,877 on the coinage of the silver pieces. On 7th mo. 1st, 1881, the total paper and specie of the country amounted to $1,469,342,603, and on 7th mo. 1st, 1882 to $1,543,710,432, a gain of about $74,500,000, of which $28,500,000 was gold coin and bullion. Of the total increase "the Treasury received $15,500,000, the people gained $71,000,000, and the banks lost $11,500,000."

The corn crop of the United States this year is estimated by the Department of Agriculture at $1,600,000,000 bushels. The condition of the crop is rated very high in the South and comparatively low in the States of largest production. The oat crop is estimated at 480,000,000 bushels; rye, 20,000,000; barley, 45,000,000; buckwheat, 11,000,000, and potatoes, 160,000,000.

The Sioux Commission to negotiate for the cession of part of the Sioux reservation in Dakota, left Yankton on the 16th inst., for the Santee and Yankton Agencies. L. D. Hinman goes with the Commission as interpreter.

Charles Furber has arrived in Chicago in the interest of an English syndicate to buy 1,300,000 acres of land in Mississippi for timber and cotton purposes, and 4,000,000 acres in Texas.

It is reported that silver ore mixed with copper and assaying 75 per cent. of silver, has been discovered in the bed of Panther Creek, near Secor, 20 miles from Bloomington, Illinois, and that 1000 pounds have been already taken out.

The vineyards of the Los Angeles district, Cal., are laden with unprecedented stores of grapes this year. The crop is estimated at over 75,000,000 pounds, or 37,500 tons. These are worth nearly $1,000,000.

Henry Ward Beecher has delivered an address to the autumn meeting of the Congregationalist Association of Brooklyn and New York churches, announcing his withdrawal from them because of difference in regard to certain matters of faith. He especially rejects the orthodox doctrine of eternal punishment, and "the whole doctrine of original sin as found in the fall in Adam."

The Smithsonian Institution has been informed of the discovery by Schmitt, at Athens, on the 8th inst., of a comet four degrees southwest of the great comet, with the same motion in right ascension and declination. A telegram from Rochester says Dr. Lewis Swift says the Schmitt comet "is unquestionably a fragment of the great comet, broken off at its perihelion passage. This proves that the great comet must have grazed the sun, and hence passed through a terrible crisis. This is the second instance on record of a comet being disrupted, the first one being Biela's Comet of 1846."

Seventy new cases of yellow fever and three deaths were reported in Pensacola on the 16th inst., making a total of 1677 cases and 141 deaths to date. The fever is spreading in the northern and northwestern portions of the city, heretofore comparatively exempt. The Pensacola Board of Health have issued a pathetic appeal to their countrymen throughout the United States in behalf of the sick and destitute in that city. The appeal says the malignity of the epidemic seems to be on the increase; business and trade are paralyzed, and there is no work for hundreds depending upon their daily labor for daily bread. The appeal continues: "They cannot go abroad in search of it, for we are isolated from the world by a rigorous and impassable quarantine. The care of the sick and poor devolves almost exclusively upon this Board. Our own resources are exhausted. We are dependent upon the generosity of our fellow citizens abroad for the means of supplying the urgent wants of the sick, the dying and the destitute. It is not improper, under the circumstances, to say that our own services are rendered gratuitously. No member of the Board receives either fees or salary for his services as such. We have no personal interest in the matter, except the common interest of humanity. In that interest we need help, and need it promptly. R. B. S. Hargis, M. D., J. C. Whiting, M. D., D. G. Brent, W. F. Fordham, M. D., members present."

Diphtheria prevails to an alarming extent in Pittsylvania county, Virginia, nearly two hundred deaths from it having occurred within sixty days. Twenty pupils have fallen victims in one school district, and three children were lying dead in one farm house on First-day the 8th inst.

The deaths in Philadelphia for the week ending 10th month 14th, numbered 298, as compared with 353 for previous week, and 359 for the corresponding week of last year. Of the whole number, 155 were males and 143 females: 40 died of consumption; 25 of diphtheria; 17 of marasmus; 13 of old age, and 12 of typhoid fever.

Markets, &c.—U. S. 3's, 102; 3½'s, registered, 100½; coupon, 113; 4's, 119½; currency 6's, 133.

Cotton.—Prices remain about the same as last quoted. Sales of middlings are reported at 11½ a 12 cts. per lb. for uplands and New Orleans.

Petroleum.—Standard white, 7½ cts. for export, and 8½ cts. per gallon for home use.

Flour continues in steady demand and prices were firm. Sales of 250 barrels low winters at $3.25; 200 barrels sour springs at $4.50 a $5; 400 barrels Minnesota bakers' extras at $6 a $6.50; 375 barrels do. do. straight at $6.75; 300 barrels Pennsylvania extra family, medium, at $4.75; 500 barrels, do. do. good, at $4.87½; 285 barrels do. do. fancy at $5; 125 barrels Ohio do. do., choice, at $5.75; 175 barrels do. do., fancy, at $6; 125 barrels Southern Illinois do. do. at $5.75; 125 barrels Ohio patent at $6.50; 125 barrels do. do. fancy, at $7.25; 125 barrels Minnesota do. do., fair, at $7.75; 125 do. do. choice, at $8; 175 barrels do. do., fancy, at $8, and 875 barrels City Mills family on private terms. Rye flour was scarce, the market was firm.—Pennsylvania, $4.25 a $4.37½. Corn meal was nominally quoted at $4.50 per barrel for Brandywine. Bran.—Winter wheat sells at $16.50, a $17, and spring at $16 a $16.25 per ton.

Grain.—There was rather more inquiry for wheat, and prices were a fraction higher. Sales of 2200 bushels Delaware longberry, track, at $1.13 a $1.16; 3000 bush. red, track, at $1.09½; 3000 bush. No. 2 red, in elevator, at $1.09½; 2800 bush. rejected at 99 cts. a $1.04. Rye sold at 70 a 71 cts. Corn was higher. Sales of 1900 bush. sail yellow, in grain depot, at 80 a 83 cts.; 4000 bush. sail mixed, in grain depot, at 78 a 83 cts.; 3100 bushels steamer, at 77 a 78 cts., and 80,000 bushels sail mixed at 79½ a 80 cts. 10th mo.; 75½ a 75½ cts. 11th mo.; 66 a 66½ cts. 12th mo., and 61½ a 61½ cts. 1st mo. Oats were in demand at full prices. About 11,000 bushels sold in lots at 45 a 47 cts. for No. 2 white, and 40 a 42 cts. per bushel for rejected and mixed, and 15,000 bushels No. 2 white at 45 a 46 cts.

Hay and Straw Market, for week ending 10th mo. 14th, 1882.—Loads of hay, 290; loads of straw, 60. Average price during the week—Prime timothy, $1.10 to $1.20 per 100 pounds; mixed, $1.05 to $1.15 per 100 pounds; straw, 80 to 90 cts. per 100 pounds.

Beef cattle were in fair demand this week, and prices were a fraction higher: 3400 head arrived and sold at the different yards at 4 a 7 cts. per lb., the latter rate for extra.

Sheep were dull and unsettled, owing to the poor quality of the stock: 15,000 head arrived and sold at 3 a 5½ cts., and lambs at 3½ a 7½ cts. per lb., as to quality.

Hogs were in demand at full prices: 3600 head sold at the different yards at 11 a 12½ cts. per pound, according to condition.

FOREIGN.—Lord Northbrook, First Lord of the Admiralty, speaking at Liverpool of the beneficial effects of the Land act, expressed the belief that a turning point had been reached in the affairs of Ireland. The number of outrages, he said, had decreased, and rents were being freely paid.

A despatch to the Pall Mall Gazette, from Dublin, reports that, owing to the alarming increase of pauperism in the south of Ireland, the Dublin Union has taken the lead in a proposal to send one thousand able-bodied men and women to Canada, at a cost of £7000.

A convention at Athenry, Galway, on the 13th inst., adopted resolutions declaring the right of the country to national independence, accepting the principle of "land for the people," and approving the system of peasant proprietary and amendment of the Bright clauses of the Land act. A resolution was passed deprecating the prevalence of grass farming of the land as tending to paralyze industry and increase pauperism. The convention also resolved to prevent hunting until the extra police drafted in the county is dispensed with. The demand for local self-government in the programme of the National Conference includes the abolition of nomination by the Government to office, and the abolition of the office of Lord Lieutenant. The Central Council of the new League will consist of thirty members, twenty of whom will be elected by county conventions, and ten by the Irish Parliamentary party. The Freeman's Journal, reviewing the programme of the National Conference, says it is strictly constitutional and parliamentary. It is only within the lines of the Constitution that the battle of Ireland can now be effectively fought.

Michael Davitt, in a speech, at Edgeworthstown, County Longford, recently declared that the only thing that could bring peace to Ireland was recognition of the tenants' absolute ownership of any property in the soil he either created or purchased, and the right of undisputed occupancy for the tenant.

The North Staffordshire coal mine owners have ceded to the application of the miners for an advance of ten per cent. in wages. Twenty thousand men are affected by this decision.

The committee under General Sir Archibald Alison appointed to report on the Channel tunnel, come that the exit of the tunnel should be commanded by a fortress of the first class; that the tunnel should be provided with a portcullis, and with an arrangement for filling it for a sufficient space with an irrespirable gas; and that measures should be taken for the delusion of the land portion of the tunnel, for the temporary flooding of the main tunnel, and also for its destruction by mine. These arrangements should be controlled by separate parties, both inside and out of the commanding fortress. When all this is done, the committee admit that it would be presumption to place absolute reliance upon even the most comprehensive arrangements.

Memoranda from Gen. Sir Garnet Wolseley and Duke of Cambridge, the Commander-in-chief of the Army, are appended, even more strongly condemning the tunnel.

The Times considers that this report has settled the question of the tunnel adversely for a long time to come. Cairo, 10th month 15th.—The indictment of A. Pasha and his associates has not been completed. Prosecution Committee believe that the court-martial cannot meet for another week. The question of how to defend the rebel leaders causes the delay in the trial of the court-martial. The Egyptian Government preparing a note to Sir Edward Malet showing the convenience of admitting foreign counsel in the trial, and explaining that the Government would prefer to hand back Arabi and his associates to the military authorities for trial.

The revenue of Russia from 1st mo. 1st to 8th 1st, this year, was 30,128,000 roubles more than during the same time in 1881, and the expenditure for same period 26,603,000 roubles less. Freezing weather in St. Petersburg has set in. Ten degrees is recorded by the thermometer in Nishni-Novgorod. Navigation has been suspended in the Volga and Kama river account of drift ice.

The Panama Diario Oficial of 10th mo. 10th, published an editorial article dated Arequipa, 10th mo. stating that there seems to be no reason to doubt there has been adjusted in Chili the basis of an arrangement that will bring about a prompt cessation of hostilities. These preliminaries of peace are made by Garcia Calderon, with the intermediation of Min Logan. Both will go to Bolivia, to discuss the question with a view to make peace satisfactory to Bolivia and Peru.

Accounts from the Vuelta Abajo show that the cyclone in Cuba caused considerable loss of life and great destruction of property. The tobacco seedlings were destroyed. At Herraduras, three hundred houses, including the greater number of the tobacco drying establishments, were demolished. Two thousand sand palm trees were blown down. Seven hundred and sixty houses were destroyed at Consolacion del Sur. The bodies of fifteen persons drowned by the overflowing of rivers have been recovered, and many more persons are missing.

WANTED,

A situation for a boy of sixteen, in a Friend's Goods Store. For reference address J., box 337, Chester P. O., Chester Co., Penna.

WESTTOWN BOARDING SCHOOL.

The WINTER SESSION begins on Second-day, 1st month 30th, 1882. Parents and others intending to send pupils, will please make early application JONATHAN G. WILLIAMS, Supt., address Westtown Friends' Co., Pa.; or to CHARLES J. ALLEN, Treasurer, 304 Arch St., Philadelphia. Terms, $80 per session.

WANTED,

A woman Friend, as teacher in the Boarding School for Indian children, at Tunesassa; also one to assist the matron in care of the household. Apply to Jos. S. Elkinton, 325 Pine street, Philadelphia. John Sharpless, Chester, Delaware Co., Pa. Ephraim Smith, 1110 Pine street, Philadelphia.

FRIENDS' ASYLUM FOR THE INSANE Near Frankford, (Twenty third Ward,) Philadelphia. Physician and Superintendent—JOHN C. HALL, M.D. Applications for the Admission of Patients made to the Superintendent, or to any of the Board Managers.

THE FRIEND.

A RELIGIOUS AND LITERARY JOURNAL.

OL. LVI.

SEVENTH-DAY, TENTH MONTH 28, 1882.

NO. 12.

PUBLISHED WEEKLY.

if paid in advance, $2.00 per annum; if not paid in advance $2.50; 10 cents extra is charged for Postage on those sent by mail.

Articles designed for insertion to be addressed to
JOSEPH WALTON,
MOORESTOWN, BURLINGTON CO., N. J.

Subscriptions, payments and business communications, received by
JOHN S. STOKES,
NO. 116 NORTH FOURTH STREET, UP STAIRS,
PHILADELPHIA.

For "The Friend."

Dublin Meeting-House.

Attention has been directed to an article in "The Friend" of 9th mo. 16th, 1882, headed, "Dublin Meeting House," in which it was argued that "Trinity Church, Oxford," was the site of "Our Monthly Meeting at Philadelphia, ye 30 2 mo. 1688," at which the "Protest against Slavery" from Germantown Meeting was presented, and referred to the Quarterly Meeting at Philadelphia, and from there to the Yearly Meeting at Burlington. I am impressed with the belief, from researches we recently made, that "Our Meeting at Philadelphia" was located in Dublin Township, Philadelphia County, just over the creek from John Hart's house, which creek was the dividing line between Byberry and Dublin Townships. John Hart's house, where the final Monthly Meeting was first established in 1683, was in the extreme southern part of Byberry, where the three townships, Meriden, Dublin, Byberry and Moreland came together at the confluence of the Byberry branch of the Poquessing creek with the main stream. These are all now in the 23rd ward of the city. In the 5th mo. 1683, at a Quarterly Meeting of Friends in Philadelphia, "It was then and there agreed and concluded that there be established a First-day Meeting of Friends at Tookany and Poquessink, and these two make one Monthly Meeting, for men and women, for ye ordering of ye affairs of the church." The Monthly Meeting was accordingly held alternately at the house of Sarah Hart, at Oxford, and at John Hart's house in the Poquessink. One of the papers read by this meeting is still extant; it is a petition, granted to James Morris and Elizabeth Buzby, granting them permission to accomplish their marriage, and is addressed, "To the Friends of ye Monthly Meeting about ye County of Delaware, in ye County of Bucks," and was issued "At our Monthly Meeting at John Hart's house, Poquessink Creek, in the County of Philadelphia, ye 2d of ye 4th mo. 1684." The signatures to this paper are: John Carver, Richard Townsend, Walter Forrest, John Hart, Joseph English, Giles Knight, Saml. Ellis and others.

Martindale in his History of Byberry, says: "Soon after this meeting commenced, a tract of about one acre, a few yards northward from John Hart's house, on the rising ground, was set apart as a place of interment for Friends and others. This was used as a burying place for all the settlers until the separation, after which it was used only by the followers of Keith." In this lot several of the ancestors of Dr. Benjamin Rush were buried, also Christopher Growdon, of Bensalem, whose place on the Neshaminy was so highly spoken of by Gabriel Thomas in his book published in 1698 in London. This lot was bequeathed in 1698 in London. This lot was bequeathed by John Hart, grandson of the ancient John Hart, in 1786, to the township of Byberry; he says: "One acre of land, which was conveyed to me by my late grandfather, to be occupied as a burying-ground forever."

"Tradition says that Friends built a log meeting-house on the flat lands belonging to John Hart, near the present residence of Wilmer Canelle. It stood on the west side of the road now leading to the Red Lion. It is said that a lot adjoining the meeting-house was fenced off during this year, to be used as a burying-ground by Friends, but every vestige of both has long since passed away." I quote again from Martindale. If this log meeting-house was built where Martindale supposes, it would have been in Moreland Township. But if built where I suggest, it would have been in Dublin Township, and would very appropriately be named "Our Meeting at (or in) Dublin." Walter Forrest, who donated ten acres of land on the Poquessing to the Friends, owned the lands on the creek between Hart's land and the river, whereon he built a mill, and the strip of land between the turnpike, then the Burlington road (for the travel from Philadelphia to Burlington) was on the Pennsylvania side of the river, crossing at Bristol, or at a later date at Dunk's Ferry,) and the Byberry branch of the Poquessing was a much more eligible and suitable locality than where suggested by Martindale. Besides, I have been told by aged persons residing in the neighborhood, that when they were boys, the remains of an old log house was on this strip of ground, and they often wondered what had been its use. This I believe to have been the "Monthly Meeting-house at Dublin," of which John Hart was clerk on the receipt of the Protest against Slavery, sent by Germantown Meeting and signed by Gerret Hendricks, derick op de graeff, Francis daniell Pastorius, Abraham op den graef; and of which John Hart's minute says: "We finde it so weighty that we think it not expedient for us to meddle with it here, but do Rather comitt it to ye consideration of ye Quarterly Meeting, ye tennor of it being nearly Related to ye truth." John Hart was one of those in whose care and trust the ten acres donated by Forrest was placed in 1685, and, quoting again from Martindale, "Although the Monthly Meeting of Friends at Byberry had been held at John Hart's since 1683, yet the weekly meetings for worship continued to be held at the house of Giles Knight until the 4th month of this year, when the Monthly Meeting ordered it to be removed to the house of John Hart. No reason is assigned for this change; and as the location was not by any means so central as when held at Knight's, it is probable that it was through the influence of Hart, who was then the leading Friend in Byberry." One would infer, taking all the connections, that better accommodations were about being provided, and that the new meeting-house built on the Forrest land would soon be ready to be occupied.

The Keithian schism took place in 1691-2, John Hart taking an active part in favor of Keith, when a large majority of the members left the meeting, and met at the house of Henry English, near where the Byberry meeting-house is at present located.

Trinity Church, Oxford; the dedicatory sermon of which was preached by John Talbot, called the first Bishop of New Jersey, was never within the limits of Dublin Township, being located nearly a mile below the township line between Oxford and L. Dublin.

George Keith, after the disturbances created by him in the Society of Friends, returned to England in 1694, and in 1700 received orders, becoming a minister of the Church of England. He was sent back to America as a missionary in 1702, and travelled with John Talbot through nearly all the Colonies. John Hart, who had been one of his main supporters, had joined the Baptist church at Pennepack about 1697-8, and had public discussions with Keith, on his arrival in Philadelphia. Many of Keith's former adherents joined the Church of England, while more went to the Baptist and other denominations.

A society of Seventh-day Baptists contested the right to hold the Oxford Keithian Meeting-house, but the church people held it, and in a report of a general meeting of the clergy held at Philadelphia, the following sentence appears: "We have nothing further that is material to add, having by this very opportunity written at large to the Board, we beg leave to conclude this with an account of our going directly from this place to the opening of a New Church at Oxford where Mr. Talbot is to preach upon that occasion." This was subsequent to Keith's return to England in 1705, and I give some extracts from a letter written by Talbot to Keith, dated N. York, Oct. 20th, 1705. It shows the feelings of those two Rev. men against Friends, and I give it as an incident of the history of that day; when the liberal government of Wm. Penn was so distasteful to the adherents of the Church of England.

"I got some hundreds of Fr. Bugg's Books* printed, which I endorsed with a challenge and so was bound to answer it; but I could not provoke the friends to it by no means

* Wm. Sewel speaks of Francis Bugg as "an envious apostate," who "charged the Quakers with some Socinian notions; and being set on by some churchmen, endeavored also to render them odious with the government."

No, they say, as they used to do, they will answer it in print. Then I offered to take the two Almanacks by Dan. Leeds and Caleb Pusey and prove them by Friends Books. I challenged ye latter at ye head of his Regiment to come forth and see himself proved a Liar, in ye very same book and page where he most impudently charges G. K. (George Keith) D. L. (Dan. Leeds) and ye eight ministers of your Church of England. But all I could get of them at present was this sorry paper, 'False News from Gath,' which I intend to answer with 'True news to Gath,' * * at length I appointed a meeting at Church, and there I exposed their errors before all men; but none answered a word, though several Quakers were there." "Mr. Sharpe was very jealous to bring ye Quakers to stand a tryal; he carried one of ye Bombs into their meeting, and read a new challenge which I sent them, to answer what they had printed; but all in vain. Sam. Jennings stood up and said, 'Friends let's call upon God;' then they went to Prayer and so their meeting broke up. Since, I have read several scandalous Letters from several Quakers, whereby I see they are preparing War against me; one was from W. Bakeshaw, the same villain that pulled ye paper out of your hand last yearly meeting at Philadelphia. He said there was not a word of truth in the Bomb, and he would answer it but none appeared." * * * "My horse you know dyed at Burlington and ye Quakers recorded it as a judgment upon me. Ben. Wheat set it down in his Almanack, such a day of y 1st month, John Talbot's horse dyed, and Barnet Lane haled him into the river. But I was more sorry for the mare that you were so kind to give me, for she dyed before I came over the Bay in Maryland." "Ah, Mr. Keith, I have wanted you but once, and that is ever since you went." * * * I hope, good sir, you will excuse this long Letter. I had not time to write a short one." * * * &c. John Talbot.

When George Keith received orders from the Bishop of London in 1700, he prepared a Memorial, from which I quote. "In Pennsylvania, when I came to live there, which was in the year 1689, by the number of men and women that used to come to the Yearly Meetings from the several parts of that province, and from the West and East Jerseys, we did commonly reckon there might be at least 1500 Quakers, 200 of which might perhaps belong to the West and East Jerseys. After the breach that began in the year 1691, betwixt a party of Quakers that joined with me in opposing some of their errors (especially their notion of the sufficiency of the light within every man to salvation without anything else) & another Party that joined with Thomas Lloyd then Deputy Governor of Pennsylvania and a great Preacher among the Quakers, all the Meetings in those Provinces above mentioned were broken, and they set up Separate Meetings one from another, on the account of different Principles of Religion (especially in relation to the notion aforesaid) so that when I came from Pennsylvania to England, which was in the year 1694, I left behind me 14 or 15 Meetings in Pennsylvania, West and East Jerseys that met apart from the Quakers to the number of above 500 persons. Since there hath been a Church of England set up in Phila. [1695.] the Chief Town in Penna., a considerable number of those that did come off with me on account of the Quakers Errors are joined with the Church." S. C. W.

Sentiments of John G. Whittier.

We have been requested to republish an article by our esteemed friend, John G. Whittier, which appeared in the columns of this paper in 1839.

In the Pennsylvania Freeman, of which he was then editor, he reviewed a sermon delivered at Andover, Mass., on the 4th of the 7th mo. of that year. Many of us can remember the intense feeling excited at that period by the bold and unsparing exposure of the wickedness of slavery by the Anti-slavery societies; and the strong disposition manifested by many of the clergymen to reconcile slavery with Christianity. It was no cause of surprise therefore, that such a sermon should contain an attack on the abolitionists. It assumed that "ministers of the gospel" are the only rightful instrumentalities of reform. The review, which was also printed by "The Friend," says, we are satisfied "that the common sense of not only the laity in general, but of a large proportion of the clergy themselves—the experience of the past—and the concurrent testimony of all history from the time when the 'carpenter's son,' the despised artisan of Nazareth, confuted the chief priests of the corrupt Jewish church, down to the present period, will prove a sufficient refutation of a doctrine at once absurd and arrogant."

The expressions above italicised and some others contained in the review, called forth an article which appeared in the next number of "The Friend," in which the writer, R. T., mentions his fear, that the epithets used may derogate from the divine character of our Saviour, &c.

Under date of 11th mo. 23rd, 1839, J. G. Whittier replies to R. T. in the following article, in which he gives his opinions on some important and interesting points of doctrine.

J. W.

For "The Friend."

A writer in "The Friend," over the signature of "R. T." condemns some expressions in an article extracted from the "Pennsylvania Freeman," and published in "The Friend." As the writer of that article, I trust I may be permitted to offer a word in explanation.

The charge of "irreverence" towards the Saviour of mankind, seems to me by no means warranted by the simple allusion to the language of those who could answer the sublime truths of his mission only by sneering at his lowly human station as a Nazarene and a laborer. I intended nothing more than a simple recognition of this fact, as recorded in the Holy Scriptures, in illustration of the natural tendency to reject even truth itself, when "the rulers have not believed" it, and its propagator is, to appearance, of humble origin. The contemplation of this fact, it seems to me, can have no tendency to "degrade" the Great Teacher and Author of salvation. Inexpressibly tender and dear has ever seemed to me the beautiful and affecting union of the humblest form of our common humanity with the holy attributes of a Redeemer—this light of heaven shining through the depths of earthly humility—this vindication of man's relationship, even in his lowest estate, to his Creator and Preserver. It gives me a deeper sense of that unutterable condescension which prompted him to take up himself the despised form of a servant—entering into the toils, the trials, the afflictions of our nature—"touched with a feeling of our infirmities"—enduring in his human character the wants, the necessities, the temptations of those whom He came to seek and to save.

As the other charge in relation to his principles is well answered by the admissions, "R. T." himself, I am free to leave it without comment; and while I highly respect his zeal for truth and sound doctrine manifested by "R. T.," and while I would do nothing to weaken the force of his communication, so as it respects the authority of the Holy Scriptures and the divine character of the Redeemer, I would affectionately remind him that he can find abundant occasion for the exercise of that honest zeal without placing as it seems to me, a forced construction upon the language of one whose opinions entirely coincide with his own.

J. G. W.

For "The Friend"

Letter from James B. Cotton.

[The following extracts from a letter received from James B. Cotton, describe so of the scenes and incidents connected with his journey from England to Bombay, on his way to his home in Australia. It is believed that they will prove interesting to many who remember him while in this land.]

Steamer "Rohilla" in the Red Sea, 15th 8th mo. 1882.

Dear Friend,—I sent thee a letter before leaving London, and now remembering thy request to convey notice of things of interest, I intend to commence another, promising this, however, that the experiences of a sea-life do not favor efforts in this way—monotonous stroke of the engine, uneasiness of the ship, &c., induce indisposition of various kind—even reading is wearying and our books are few.

The Letters of I. Penington, thy pleasant gift to me, remind me of thee often, as they have to-day. Such writings, written as they were in the power of Truth, retain their freshness and will do so through all time, to those who can read them and understand. In this day of ignorance and perversion they stand as a witness for that Truth which shall go forth again in brightness when the iniquity of the times is full, and the Lord's voice shall again be heard, and the lighting down of his holy arm be known to judge among the nations. I believe that by the same "faith the operation of God," we may come, through the same experience, as did "holy men through all time, to ability to speak in power and freshness, as "the Spirit shall give utterance." And still through the ages the mighty Leader shall call to and shall reveal "great things," (though still in unity with the power that is of Him), and disciples shall "marvel and believe."

We left London on the 12th of 7th mo., the steamship "Ganges," and passed down the Channel through the thick air of the coasts. A head-wind one night in the Bay of Biscay, proved our steamer a little; though steady with the 2000 tons of iron that formed part of her cargo, she shipped a deal of water which found its way below; some inches deep of it washing from side to side, and sweeping loose things with it—the loud clatter of things, furniture, &c., "fetching away" in ship as she rolled, made a disturbance which alarmed some of the passengers; after the sea was calm, and has been so to the present time.

Morning of the 17th we anchored close to the neat, white looking, but small town of Gibraltar—not so high or bold in appearance as I had expected. It is situated on the east side of the Rock; the fortifications are conspicuous, but they are doubtless there. Leaving towards evening, we had a fine view of the eastern face, almost perpendicular and apparently crumbling away and sliding into the sea, the debris resting in semi-cones against the face of the Rock. The high volcanic-looking mountains of Spain were in sight for hours, and then the coast of Africa was visible till nearing Malta; this generally high, level of table land, with conic peaks occasionally; all had a dry and parched appearance, and this may have been because of distance. We had a satisfactory meeting in the second cabin. It is beyond the power of the captain to allow meeting in the saloon; in these ships the “Church of England service” only is permitted. There may be wisdom in this exclusion, but there is a bondage also, which is felt; we were most easy to make the application, that we might be clear.

We reached Malta early on the 21st, where we stayed 12 hours to coal and land cargo. We anchored close under some of the old fortifications, pierced for very many cannon, but now seem in position now. We went ashore for a few hours; we found it impossible to walk to any advantage in the narrow, crowded streets, where there were so many determined to obtain money on some pretext or other; we applied to the driver of a good four-wheel carriage and pair, or rather, he applied to us, demanding 6 shillings for an hour's drive—a policeman standing by brought it down to 6d.

We were driven through some of the principal streets and to places of interest, but amid the effects of the voyage, the intense heat and the glare of the sun from the white stone houses and the parched ground, we were not in a state much to enjoy what we saw of such things. But our interest centered in the people: many different types of faces were there, and we felt a measure of that love which is not affected by prejudice of race or nationality, and recognizes no boundary or partition of sea or land. “For there is one Lord and His name is one;” and they who take up weapons of war, in any sense, do it in forgetfulness of Him.

We saw some splendid Oleanders, heavily in bloom, but we had no time to go into the public garden. There seemed no seats provided to sit in the “shade,” such as it was. On a short walk we took the many guides were so obtrusive, and we so hot and weary, we felt inclined to take refuge again on board the ship; feeling glad, however, we had seen the shore. Fruit was plentiful and cheap, being brought from the neighboring countries. Very much of the island is taken up with one—some modern buildings are good.

We steamed away in the evening, and early on the 25th were off Port Said at the entrance of the Suez Canal. A French pilot took charge when about two miles out, and he took us through the narrow channel (protected by breakwaters of stone, and constantly deepened by dredging machines,) between the many war-ships of different nations moored on each side the little harbor, and to our anchorage at the town, said to contain 8,000 inhabitants.

Bombay, 29th 8th mo. 1882.

It was a time of great excitement at Port Said, but I need not refer to it now, thou wilt have heard sufficient from other sources. Our steamer had to wait 3 days for the Brindisi mail. We soon heard of a Russian steamer about to sail for Jaffa, and I went ashore to obtain tickets for passage by her, and make inquiries on other matters. The Arab boatman was my guide, and we were not molested in any way except by a dragoman who rather fiercely asserted his right to act as guide. A local missionary, speaking 9 languages, introduced himself to us and was very helpful; writing for us to Jaffa and Jerusalem, and giving us names of people there.

The Arabs maintained their character for rapacity and demonstrativeness of all kinds likely to suit their purpose: though I paid the boatman more than twice the sum agreed to, he pretended to be far from satisfied. About 40 had been employed to ship cargo on the steamer; to see them settling with their (Arab) leader, one might suppose an insurrection on a small scale was about to take place. In the end some of them flung themselves about in attitudes which might indicate utter despair in regard to any hope of common justice in the earth, and yet their pay must have been arranged beforehand.

We left Port Said at 5 p. m., and were off Jaffa in the morning at 7. Just as we were prepared to land (the steamer anchoring a mile from shore) the local agent of Cook's Tourist Company came on board and took charge of us and our things. The old town of Jaffa stands on a small rounded hill or bluff close on the sea. The light-colored stone houses seem crowded and without regularity as to streets. A reef of rocks, say half a mile long and not many yards from the shore, forms a safe shelter for the many boats which ply between the ships and the town. Our able conductor, accustomed to assume a bearing suited to the character of the races with which he had to deal, got us safely through the crowd of Arabs, &c., at the landing place, past the customs and all in connection, and saw us to an inn in the European “colony” adjoining the old town, comparatively pleasant in its modern style; its gardens and many trees, and yet dry and dusty—for no rain falls for months—yet every thing is very green and luxuriant; the night dews are heavy.

Our friend at once engaged a conveyance to leave the same evening for Jerusalem, it being the custom to travel in the cool of the night; ordered provisions to “sustain us” on the way, anticipating our wants in every particular, and giving us full instructions in connection with our journey. We soon found and met with several friends, in regard to whom we did not forget our mission. In the power and blessing that attends a faithfulness in these things, there is an introduction which may well supersede all other, and which has never failed. We gratefully accepted an offer of the resident minister to arrange a meeting on our return.

We were glad to escape the crowded edge of the town, passing with difficulty among the kneeling camels, asses, (“crouching between their two burdens”) heaps of melons, &c.; recumbent or cross-legged men, women and boys, and others more energetic and noisy—some of whom almost took possession of the vacant seats in our conveyance—and passing through the broad suburbs of fruit orchards, with hedges of prickly pear 10 feet high, full of their thorny fruit, which the camels were glad to snatch as they passed,—we emerged into the open fields. For 6 hours, at the rate of 5 or 6 miles the hour, we passed over a fertile plain, through melon and sugar-cane fields, with other crops of fodder we did not know, beside much harvested land. On the hills to the left we counted as many as 15 at a time of small stone built “cities,” clusters of small houses, though distant, easily seen in the moonlight. The people were watching their fields as in old time, and we passed many “a lodge in a garden of cucumbers,” &c.

There were long strings of camels loaded with melons and with merchandise of various kind. A friend we met told us she had attempted to count the camels passed on this journey, and found them much beyond 600. The drivers generally rode on donkeys, some so small that their riders looked as well able to carry them. There were also droves of loaded donkeys, and very tractable they seemed. The road is made of large stones, carefully laid originally, but now often displaced, and the riding was rough beyond all previous experience. Leaving the plain we found a well-made road through the lime-stone hills—but often very steep and sometimes zigzagged—till we reached Jerusalem at 7.30 a. m., the whole distance is about 40 miles. These hills became more and more beautiful and susceptible of cultivation as we reached the city, though we saw traces of ancient cultivation all the way. They are naturally terraced through each layer of limestone extending some yards beyond the next—by removing the soil at the edge of these terraces and collecting the loose stones in the soil and building them there into a wall, it is easily seen there is much better adaptation for the raising of grapes, olives, &c.; beside which the washing of heavy rains is more or less prevented. With the plains and the “hill country” together, Palestine might yet be, under a wise administration in all things, as in old time, a “land of oil, olive and honey,” of “plenty of corn and wine.”

Among the hills in the early morning our clothes were wet with the dew, and we found it uncomfortably cold, with foggy clouds above. The wind, during our stay, was constantly from the west. The days were hot and the sun powerful, but the nights pleasantly cool. Into the crowded, narrow, and crooked streets within the walls, no carriages can enter, though loaded camels stride along as if all must make way, to the apparent danger of treading on the people, who, however, in seeming indifference, manage to find room. So we stopped outside the Jaffa Gate, and our coachman conducted us to a good inn close by. Here we remained a day, and then found friends who took us to their home for the rest of our 6 days' stay.

(To be concluded.)

Had * * to insist on the necessity of our doing the will of the Holy Father, if we would know the doctrine of the Son; unto those thus found in obedience, his doctrine shall distil as the dew, and as the small rain upon the tender herb; they shall inherit substance, and shall certainly know that they have not followed cunningly devised fables, but living and substantial truth.—Daniel Wheeler.

For "The Friend."

Thoughts about the Eternal Gospel and the Falling Babylon.

BY CHARLES SHIELDSTREAM.*

"Therefore seeing we have this ministry, even as we obtained mercy, we faint not, but we have renounced the hidden things of shame, not walking in craftiness nor handling the word of God deceitfully, but by the manifestation of the Truth commending ourselves to every man's conscience in the sight of God. But if our gospel is veiled, it is veiled in them that perish: in whom the God of this world has blinded the minds of the unbelieving, that the light of the gospel of the glory of Christ, who is the image of God, should not dawn upon them. For we preach not ourselves, but Jesus Christ as Lord, and ourselves as your servants for Jesus' sake. Seeing it is God that said, Light shall shine out of darkness, who shined in our hearts to give the light of knowledge of the glory of God in the face of Jesus Christ."—Paul.

GOSPEL EFFECTS.

The Gospel of Christ is eternal, and is the power of God unto salvation. Some call the four books of Matthew, Mark, Luke and John for gospel, but it is not so. The gospel is preached to every creature, of which a part never see or hear of those four books. Every creature has to obey the power of God; for Christ the spiritual man will judge the world according to the gospel—that is according to his invincible power. He is the true gospel preacher who has all power in heaven and in earth, who enlightens every man that cometh into the world. He bruises the serpent's head and makes old things pass away, and makes all things new. Those that receive and follow his grace and light in all its holy manifestations, they repent of their sins and vain conversations and come out of darkness to God's marvellous light, being more and more baptized by Christ's spiritual baptism into one body of which Christ is the head; and more and more, as they are obedient to the light, will they be enabled to become sons of God, purified in their hearts by Christ's holy baptism. They come to the new Jerusalem, and the innumerable company of angels, and the first-born of the just, and to God who justly judgeth. Having feared God and known the time of his judgment, and given glory to Him, they worship Him who is the Father of spirits, in spirit and truth; and are a spiritual household, a peculiar people, the children of light—having realized the presence of God in men. They have seen and realized that the divine power of Christ has granted unto them all things that pertain unto life and godliness, through the knowledge of Him who called them by his own glory and virtue, whereby He has granted unto them his precious and exceeding great promises; and that through these they become partakers of the divine nature, having escaped from the corruption that is in the world by lust. Yea, they have for this very cause used on their part all diligence, that to their faith might be added virtue, and to virtue knowledge, and to knowledge temperance, and to temperance patience, and to patience godliness, and to godliness brotherly kindness, and to brotherly kindness love—and these things have become theirs and abound—have made them not to be idle nor unfruitful unto knowledge of our Lord Jesus Christ. They have made their calling and election sure, and they never stumble, for thus has been richly supplied to them the entrance of the eternal kingdom of our Lord and Saviour, Jesus Christ. These are the fruits of the gospel, which is eternal and is preached to the pure in heart.

Our Lord and Saviour said: "Ye, therefore, be perfect, even as your Father which is in heaven is perfect;" and Christ, the true gospel preacher, who is the Sun of righteousness and teaches as no man teaches, makes his people righteous and perfect; his dispensation being the dispensation of righteousness and perfection. Therefore every man who faithfully obeys and walks in the Light will obtain perfection. The Light makes manifest all things that are against the truth, and leadeth into all truth.

Paul, the apostle, gave this advice to the Ephesians of old: "Be ye therefore imitators of God as beloved children, and walk in love even as Christ also loved you, and gave himself up for us an offering and sacrifice to God for an odor of a sweet smell." And he desired that uncleanness or covetousness should not be so much as named amongst them; "nor filthiness, nor foolish talking or jesting, which are not benefiting, but rather giving thanks." And he reminds them that no unclean person nor covetous man, which is an idolator, has any inheritance in the kingdom of Christ and God.

"Let no man deceive you with empty words, for because of these things cometh the wrath of God upon the children of disobedience. Be not ye, therefore, partakers with them; for ye were once darkness, but are now light in the Lord; walk as the children of light, (for the fruits of the light are in all goodness and righteousness and truth,) proving what is well-pleasing unto our Lord, and have no fellowship with the unfruitful works of darkness, but rather even reprove them; for the things which are done by them in secret it is a shame even to speak of. But all things, when they are reprov'd, are made manifest by the light, for every thing that makes manifest is light. Wherefore he saith: Awake, thou that sleepest, and arise from the death, and Christ shall shine upon thee."

See, here, the glorious church, having no spot or wrinkle or any such thing, but holy and without blemish!

(To be concluded.)

The Struggle for Life against Civilization and Æstheticism.

The following extracts are from an address by Dr. Frank H. Hamilton, delivered before the New York Academy of Medicine:

"Science has not kept pace with civilization, and without concessions on the part of civilization, there is, at present, no adequate remedy for the evils we suffer. Since Bede's day we have had occasion to observe that when men left the open plains and the small hamlets, and crowded themselves into the narrow limits of cities, the ratio of sickness and death was proportionately increased. When, also, in the progress of civilization, the fire-places disappeared, with their great open throats—the best ventilators ever invented—and decorated cast-iron stoves were substituted, house-sanitation experienced a loss which no sanitary engineer or architect has ever repaired; and when, in obedience to the same inexorable demands of progress in luxury and æstheticism, gas was substituted for oil, and hot air or hot steam furnaces for stoves, the hand was again moved forward another point on the dial of human life.

In order to render pure and inodorous the atmosphere of our houses, it will be necessary first of all, that civilization should make some concessions. The concessions demanded as a condition of the successful application of our present knowledge of the laws of hygiene are:

1. That all plumbing having any direct or indirect communication with the sewers should be excluded from those portions of our houses which we habitually occupy; in other words that it shall be placed in a separate building or annex.

2. That we return to the open fire-place and the grate as a means of warming our houses.

3. A diminished consumption of oxygen by gas-burners. So long as we are obliged to depend upon gas, we must content ourselves with light, and not insist upon illumination.

The concessions demanded are named in the order of their importance. The necessity for each is urgent, but the first admits of a compromise. However, there are many other possible sources of ill health and physical decay incident to civilization than those I have referred to especially. The wholesome light of the sun is partially excluded from the apartments of wealth and luxury, because it fades the costly rugs and drapery, and offends the educated by its vulgar and intrusive garishness, and not unfrequently at large receptions the light of day is excluded wholly in order that the more æsthetic and kaleidoscopic effects of gas-light may be substituted regardless of the fact that the air is thus rendered unfit for respiration. Our social habits demand that both children and adults shall devote the hours intended for sleep to amusements, which amusements are rendered more intoxicating and pernicious by the prolonged respiration of heated and poisonous air. Dress makes its contribution. Utility and regard for health are almost invariably made subservient to the caprice of fashion and the study of effect. Flimsy head-dresses, low necks, short sleeves, tight corsets, high heels, and narrow toes do not contribute the sum total of the æsthetic requirements of civilization in the matter of dress. Walking as a means of locomotion and of exercise is rendered difficult and sometimes impossible. In the 'best' society there is neither muscle nor back-bone. Almost all respectable citizens ride when they might walk, and complain of the want of breath when the absence of an elevator compels them to ascend a flight of steps. Even when travelling, over-heated cars, long confinement in one position, hurried and irregular meals, dust and smoke, bring us to the end of our journey weary, and often sick. Railroads have enabled us to accomplish more in life than was possible when men travelled in coaches or on horseback; but it is doubtful whether, in the shortening of human life it has effected, the loss is not greater than the gain. All of these evils, and thousands not enumerated, are the necessary incidents to civilization, and medical men are painfully familiar with the impediments they present to the preservation of individual and public health. Indeed, it was the presence of these evils chiefly which has rendered the physician necessary as an integral part of society."

* The author being a Swede by birth, and more familiar with his native language than with English, the Scripture texts which he quotes will frequently be found to be different from our standard version in some of the words used.

THE CORNSTALK'S LESSON.

Selected.

One single grain of corn took root
Beside the garden walk ;
"Oh, let it stay," said little May,
"I want it for my stalk."

And there it grew, until the leaves
Waved in the summer light ;
All day it rocked the baby ear,
And wrapped it warm at night.

And then the yellow corn-silk came,
A skein of silken thread :
It was as pretty as the hair
Upon the baby's head.

Alas! one time, in idle mood,
May pulled the silk away,
And then forgot her treasured stalk
For many a summer day.

At last she said, "I'm sure my corn
Is ripe enough to eat ;
In even rows the kernels lie,
All white, and juicy sweet."

Ah me! they all were black and dry,
Were withered long ago ;
"What was the naughty corn about,"
She said, "to cheat me so!"

She did not guess the silken threads
Were tender pipes to lead
The food the tasselled blossom shook,
To each small kernel's need.

The work her foolish fingers wrought
Was shorter than a breath ;
Yet every milky kernel then
Began to starve to death!

So list, my little children all,
This simple lesson heed :
That many a grief and sin has come
From one small thoughtless deed.

—Wide Awake.

Selected.

LIFE'S HEAVIEST LOSS.

Upon the white sea-sand
There sat a pilgrim band,
The losses that their life had known ;
While evening waned away
From breezy cliff and bay,
The strong tides went out with weary moan.

One spake with quivering lip,
Of a fair freighted ship,
Of his household to the deep gone down ;
But one had wilder woe—
For a fair face, long ago,
The darker depths of a great town.

There were who mourned their youth
With a most loving ruth,
Brave hopes and memories ever green ;
And one upon the West
Turned an eye that would not rest,
Off hills whereon its joy had been.

Some talked of vanished gold,
Some of proud honors told,
Some of friends who were their trust no more ;
And one of a green grave
Beside a foreign wave
Made him sit so lonely on the shore.

But when their tales were done,
There spake among them one,
Sadder, seeming from all sorrow free :
"Sad losses ye have met,
But mine is heavier yet ;
Loving heart is gone from me."

"Alas," these pilgrims said,
For the living and the dead,
One's cruelty, for love's sure cross,
For the wrecks of land and sea!
But, however, it came to thee,
Stranger, is life's last and heaviest loss."

—Frances Brown.

ENDURANCE.

Selected.

"If thou faint in the day of adversity, thy strength is small."—Prov. xxiv. 10.

Faint not beneath thy burden, tho' it seem Too heavy for thee, and thy strength is small ;
Tho' the fierce raging of the noon-tide beam,
On thy defenceless head untempered fall.

Tho' sad and heart-sick with the weight of woe ;
That to the earth would crush thee, journey on ;
What tho' it be with faltering steps and slow,
Thou wilt forget the toil, when rest is won.

Nay! murmur not because no kindred heart,
May share thy burden with thee—but alone
Still struggle bravely on, tho' all depart :
Is it not said that each must bear his own?

Then be not faithless, tho' thy soul be dark ;
Is not thy Master's seal upon thy brow ?
Oft has his presence saved thy sinking bark ;
And thinkest thou He will forsake thee now ?

Hath He not bid thee cast on Him thy care,
Saying, He careth for thee? Then arise ;
And in thy path, if trod in faithful prayer,
The thorns shall turn to flowers of Paradise.

Maxims of Business.—Such suggestions as the following would secure a race of business men who would honor the land that furnishes them so noble a theatre for successful enterprise. 1. Engage in no business inconsistent with the strictest morality, nor in which you cannot daily seek the blessing of the Most High. 2. Follow your chosen vocation, and that alone, whatever temptations to speculation or rapid acquisition may present themselves. 3. Adopt no "tricks of trade," however sanctioned by custom, that involve deception or untruthfulness. 4. Never incur a debt beyond your resources. 5. Always live within your income. 6. Devote a fixed portion of your income, beforehand, to charitable uses, to be employed and accounted for as systematically as family expenditures. The man who will regulate his business by such simple rules as these, may free himself from the feverish excitements of adventurous traffickers, and assure himself, with God's blessing, of an honest competency, if not of a benevolent affluence and a good name.—Christian's Penny Mag.

Divine Grace.—C. H. Spurgeon, in one of his sermons, compared the visitations of the Holy Spirit to the flowing of the tide. He says:

"What a wonderful thing a flood is! Go down to the river, look over the bridge, and see the barges and other crafts lying in the mud. All the king's horses and all the king's men cannot tug them out to sea. There they lie, dead and motionless as the mud itself. What shall we do with them? What machinery can move them? Have we a great engineer among us who will devise a scheme for lifting these vessels, and bearing them down to the river's mouth? No, it cannot be done. Wait till the tide comes in! What a change! Each vessel walks the water like a thing of life. What a difference between the low tide and the high tide. You cannot stir the boats when the water is gone; but when the tide is at the full, see how readily they move; a little child may push them with his hand."

Even so when the hearts of the people are animated by the Spirit of God, they are enabled to perform his works, which they could never do without such help.

Selected for "The Friend."

How Ministers may be Exposed to Temptation.

Upon the occasion of a marriage at —, I found it my place to sit the meeting in silence. The earnest expectation of people, especially on such occasions, I believe often obstructs the current of right ministry. Silence, if duly considered, may be the best lesson of instruction for those whose life is in words or outward declarations. I have thought some amongst us are so void of a right understanding, as to suppose there is a kind of necessity for something to be done by way of ministry, at marriages and funerals especially; it being hard for them to apprehend that they can be so honorably conducted without. I have observed some who, though but little concerned to maintain our testimonies by an uniform, consistent deportment, yet appear very zealous on those occasions; taking a deal of pains, and riding many miles, and sometimes from one preacher to another, to make themselves sure of having one; and when they have been so successful as to prevail upon any to come, it would no doubt be a great disappointment, were they to be wholly silent. In this situation, the minister himself may, unless well-grounded, be exposed to temptation to gratify such. My principal view in this remark is, to show how remote such are from the truth they profess, and how nearly allied to some other professors of Christianity, who think it not like a Christian burial, when a corpse is committed to the earth without something said over it. If that over-anxiousness in the people should prevail on the preachers amongst us, to answer their cravings and expectations, either in attending, or when there, in gratifying them with words, without a due regard to the holy weight and impressions of the Word of life, as the alone moving cause to public service, they would be in danger of being lost as to the living body in the Society; and although such might continue in a consistent form of sound words and sound doctrine, as to the external appearance, yet the substance being lost, their performances would be no more than as sounding brass or a tinkling cymbal. Some, to our sorrow, have been observed to lose ground by such means; what can be more offensive to the gracious bountiful Giver, than to prostitute such a precious, divine gift, by making it subservient to the carnal, unsanctified desires of those who are strangers to God, yet love to hear of Him and his glorious acts by the hearing of the ear.—John Griffith.

Error in Catechism.—I spent some time in a school, in which there are about thirty pupils, who are trained with much Christian care, and are diligently instructed in the Holy Scriptures. I could not, however, but lament to hear them taught such palpable error as is conveyed in the Catechism of the Episcopal Church, by which they are instructed to say, that they become members of Christ and children of God by baptism, clearly implying by baptism with water. I know this fallacy is attempted to be explained away by various arguments; but it is quite in vain to try to twist the plain meaning of the words. It remains palpably untrue that any infant, by water-baptism, becomes a member of Christ, or a child of God; and the direct tendency of such instruction as teaches them to say that this is the case, is to de-

There is a saying, think it o'er,
For a lesson it may teach,
Weep the rubbish from thy door,
Ere to another thou wouldst preach."

ceive the young with regard to their own religious state, and to lead to attach to this rite the imaginary effect of a mystical chain, and to divert their attention from the baptism of the Holy Ghost, received only through the mediation of Christ, by which alone they can become members of Christ, children of God, and heirs of eternal life.—Joseph Backhouse.

For "The Friend."

Natural History, Science, &c.

Trick of an Elephant.—Lady Barker relates the following anecdote of an elephant.

"When we paid them a visit upon the afternoon of the storm, the huge beasts were taking a bath, or rather giving it to themselves by filling their trunks with water, and dashing it over their heads, trumpeting and enjoying themselves immensely. At a little distance the cooks were busy baking the chupatties—a muffin as large as a soup-plate, and nearly as thick—in mud ovens; and the grass cutters had been down to a pond near to wash the dust off the large bundles of grass for the elephants' suppers. We talked a little to the mahouts, and one very picturesque old man seemed exceedingly proud of his elephant's superior slyness and cunning, and begged us to stay and see him 'cheat'; so we waited till 'Burra Sahib' had finished his bath, and came slowly up to the mahout for his supper.

"The mahout called out to the cook to bring the chupatties, and made us retire behind the tree and watch what Burra Sahib did. As soon as the cook went away, the elephant put up his trunk and broke off a large bough of the tree above him. This they generally do to serve as a brush to keep off flies, so he knew that was nothing remarkable. He then looked slyly around him, and as he could not see his mahout he thought the coast was clear, and hastily snatched up a chupattie, which he put under the branch on the top of his head. I noticed how carefully he felt with his flexible trunk if any edge was uncovered, and arranged the leaves so as to hide his spoil completely.

"Burra Sahib then raised his voice and bellowed for his supper in loud and discordant tones. The mahout then ran up as if he had been a long distance off, stood in front of him, and commenced handing him the chupatties, counting as he did so, one, two, three, and so on. The elephant received each in his trunk, and put it gently into his huge mouth, bolting it as though it had been a small pill. Twelve chupatties was the allowance, and he required this sort of food to keep him in good condition. When the mahout came to number eleven muffin he looked about for the twelfth in great dismay, pretending that he could not think what had become of it, and calling for the cook to scold him, searching the ground, and wondering in good Hindostanee, where that other chupattie could be. The elephant joined in the search, turning over an empty box that was near and trumpeting loudly.

"The mahout was delighted to see how much this farce amused me, and at last he turned suddenly to the elephant, who was still hunting eagerly for the missing chupattie, and reviled him as a thief and a 'big owl,' adding all sorts of epithets, and desiring him to kneel down, which Burra Sahib did very reluctantly. The mahout then scrambled up on his head, snatched off the branch, and flung down the chupattie, belaboring the elephant well with the bough which had served to conceal it. It seems that the trick had been played successfully many times before Burra Sahib was found out, and the poor cook used to get into trouble, and be accused of keeping the missing chupattie for his own private consumption."

Evil Results of Smoking.—My debut as a smoker was like every body's. My first pipe made me very ill, and it was only by degrees that I managed to become a third-rate smoker that is, I disposed of eight or ten pipes a day without inconvenience, but whenever I exceeded that average I suffered from violent sick headaches, ushered in by indistinctness of vision, and numbness of one side of the face, the tongue, and one arm, most often on the left side. These preliminary symptoms lasted about ten minutes, after which the headache came on in full force. The most refractory organ, however, was my stomach. After having smoked too much, I used to experience the symptom known as pyrosis or heartburn, to a very trying extent, though as any alkaline water speedily caused these phenomena to vanish, I did not care to give up my tobacco.

About a year ago, having smoked for some months more than usual, I suddenly found myself affected by a peculiar and terrific pain over the region of the heart; in short, I had a violent attack of angina pectoris. It put a stop to my smoking, as, though I have since tried once or twice, I have always found my cigar or pipe detestable, and, to sum up, am radically converted. I do not wish to discuss scientifically the nicotinic origin of my sufferings, but am sure that they all sprang from the same cause—excessive use of tobacco. Degeneration of the cardiac muscle is often caused by tobacco. So long as the rest of his organism remains in good working order, the smoker only experiences intermittent palpitation, and the grave injury done the heart remains unperceived until some trifling cause brings into relief the irremediable disorders produced by the prolonged use of tobacco.—Dr. Deschamps in "Galignani."

Importing Frozen Meat in Summer.—An English exchange states that 150 tons of fresh Australian meat preserved in frozen state arrived on 8th mo. 21st, and was served out shortly afterward in an excellent condition to the British fleet at Alexandria. On 5th mo. 1st, this meat was shipped at Sydney in the steamship Sorrento, and brought through the Suez Canal in the hottest season. In all, the cargo, which was first taken to London, consisted of 402,000 pounds of beef and mutton, where the British Government bought 150 tons for the sailors in Egyptian waters. This experiment has been a grand success, and it determined the sending of the Sorrento for another cargo.

Do Tree Rings show the Age of Trees.—This question has been answered in the negative by Prof. Bachelart in Nature. His investigations were made during visits to the ruins of Palenque, Mexico, in 1859–80.

In 1859 M. Charnay caused all the trees that hid the façade of one of the pyramids of the palace to be cut down. On a second visit, in 1880, he cut the trees that had grown since 1859, and he remarked that all of them had a number of concentric circles greatly superior to their age. The oldest could only have been 22 years of age, but on a section of one of them he counted 250 circles; the tree was 60 to 65 cm. in diameter. A shrub, 18 mo old at most, had 18 concentric circles. Charnay found the case repeated in several species, and in trees of all sizes. He concludes that in a hot and moist climate, where nature is never at rest, it may produce, not one circle a year, as with us, but one a month.

THE FRIEND.

TENTH MONTH 28, 1882.

The views advanced by the late Robert Barclay, in his work entitled, "The Life of the Religious Societies of the Commonwealth," as to the origin and early practice of the Society of Friends, were so striking at variance with the long settled sentiments of our members, and with the impressions derived from the perusal of the writings and experiences of those who were most influential in gathering us to be a people, and settling the discipline and usages which have ever since been maintained among us, that it became an interesting and important question to determine on what foundation R. B. based his statements, and whether it could be true, that we had for so many generations been deceived in believing the plain statements of George Fox and his contemporaries as to the source from which they derived their knowledge of Divine truths, and their disciplinary regulations, particularly in reference to the exercise of the ministry.

The late Dr. Charles Evans, of Philadelphia, made an examination of those parts of Robert Barclay's work which related to the Society of Friends, and the result was published in 1878, with the title, "An Examen." In review, which is a calm and thoughtful essay, he produces evidences from the book itself to show, that Robert Barclay did not hold the belief ever held by the Society of Friends, that the immediate and perceptible revelation and influences of the Holy Spirit on the mind of man, under the operation of which his vocation is wrought out, and by which he is fitted and enabled to engage in the ministry, were assigned him by the Head of the Church. He also states that R. B. "long entertained views of faults existing, as he conceived, in the organization of the Society of Friends, obstructing its efficiency in promulgating the gospel and for increasing its membership, advocated a system analogous to that of the Wesleyan Methodists." This difference of belief and views, naturally disqualified R. B. from fully understanding the motives and course of action of our early Friends, and led him to place a construction on their language and doings very foreign to that which the Society has ever entertained, and which was suggested to Robert Barclay's mind by his prepossessions. Thus he was led to exaggerate the clear and positive language of George Fox, and others of that day, as to the source of their convictions, and their course of church affairs; and to endeavor to make them responsible for his own views, which greatly at variance with those of his own ancestor—the Apologist.

Among other errors contained in the work of R. B., is the statement, that G. Fox organized and sent forth a band of preachers, as John Wesley did in after years, and that their movements were regulated by direct revelation received from him, and not by their own sons of the Divine requirings. It seems strange how any one familiar with the biography and history of our early members could make such a statement, the truth of which is contradicted by almost every one who has a record of his or her own experiences. We constantly find descriptions of how they were called into the ministry, and then of their growing up in their minds of a concern for some particular place or people, and their being sent by the Lord to perform services which He required—and nowhere do we find any intimation of their labors being performed under any such general arrangement as that which exists among the members of Wesley; or that they were sent by G. Fox, as R. B. asserts, “in the same manner as the London Missionary Society sends foreign missionaries.”

The evidence adduced by R. B., in support of this strange assertion, is taken from letters found in the Swarthmore papers. In these, tests are made to G. Fox, that he would send some Friend to places specified—or intimation given that in accordance with his desire certain visits had been paid or services performed—or remarks made as to the need for certain unsuitable persons go abroad in the ministry—or reference to the spiritual needs of certain neighborhoods.

When George Fox was requested to send, and himself request a Friend to visit a certain place or neighborhood, there is often intimation to indicate that the intention was such an one should go as a minister of the gospel. It was then a time of great persecution, and many of our members were in prison. The care of these and their families, the collecting of information in regard to sufferings which might be laid before government to procure relief, involved much labor and research. “The care of the churches” rested with weight on the spirit of Fox, as his Journal abundantly shows; and in the absence of anything to the contrary, it is very probable that most of the allusions in the Swarthmore papers were advised by him for attention to some services. But if it be admitted, as very likely was the case, that in some instances Fox may have felt that there was an opening for religious service which it would be better for a brother minister to enter upon, he may have mentioned it to such an one, and there is no reason to believe that this amounted to anything more than that stirring up of a pure mind and encouraging the faith of another which has always been practised by the followers of Christ. John Richardson writes* that in one of his journeys in the West of Truth, he visited that deeply experienced man of God, William Dewsbury, and intimated to him the different places where he had been. William told him he must go to Coventry, where he had been in danger from the rudeness and violence of the people. At first, John was unwilling to do so, but William was positive that there was a way for him to do there. J. R. says, “upon mature consideration of the matter, and intimation to the Lord to know his will in it, I did my way clear to go, and I had some peace and good satisfaction, and left Friends better to one another than when I first met them.” Here, though the suggestion came through Wm. Dewsbury, yet the service was not entered on, until the will of the Lord had been inquired after, and the way had been made clear to go. And so we believe it would be found to have been in those cases, where G. Fox was led, as Wm. Dewsbury was in this case, to recommend special services to others. The theory that he exercised any control, similar to that of the London Missionary Society over its missionaries, is untenable and deceptive.

How is it possible to reconcile such a theory with George Fox's own words? “About this time [1654] did the Lord move on the spirits of many whom He had raised up, and sent forth to labor in his vineyard, to travel southward, and spread themselves in the service of the gospel to the Eastern, Southern and Western parts of the nation, * * * for above sixty ministers had the Lord raised up and did now send abroad out of the North country.”

In his address to the ministers among Friends, he says, “There is great danger, too, in travelling abroad in the world. The same power that moves any to go forth, is that which must keep them. For it is the greatest danger to go abroad, except a man be moved of the Lord, and go in the power of the Lord.”

Similar testimony might be multiplied from his Journal and other writings, for, as well observed by Charles Evans, “Every epistle or address to his fellow-laborers is couched in language which shows that he took it for granted, they were united with him in a common faith, and acknowledged an equal responsibility to act and speak under the same government of the Holy Head as himself.”

In strict accordance with the language of G. Fox, and in direct opposition to the assertions of R. Barclay, is the testimony given by many who lived and labored at the same time. John Crook says, “The circuit and compass of counties were showed me by the Spirit of the Lord, where mostly I should labor in the work of the Lord; though not restrained from travelling elsewhere, when required thereunto by the motions of the same Spirit.”—Friends' Lib. vol. 13, p. 215.

Stephen Crisp says: “Upon a time as I was waiting upon the Lord, his word arose in me and commanded me to forsake and part with my dear wife, children, father and mother, and go and bear witness to his name in Scotland.”—Fds. Lib. vol. 14, p. 143.

Edward Burrough says of himself and other ministers: “Being prepared of the Lord, and having received power from on high, we went forth, as commanded of the Lord, leaving all relations and all things of the world behind us, that we might fulfil the work of the Lord unto which He called us. With flesh and blood of any creature we consulted not, nor took counsel of men, but of the Lord alone.”—Fds. Lib. vol. 14, p. 384.

William Penn's works (folio, vol. 2, p. 542) charges T. Hicks with falsehood for “saying that we appoint ministers beforehand to speak in such a place, at such a time,” and adds, “God preserve us from that dry, hireling custom and practice.”

After referring to these and many similar passages, C. Evans says: “With this direct and cumulative testimony of the parties concerned, to the immediate Divine intimation of where He, the Head of the Church, required them to go and exercise their gifts as ministers of his gospel, and the absence of any sentence to the contrary in the writings of any of the early Friends, who can be so blindly credulous as to believe the assertion made now for the first time, that these servants of the Lord were acting under the direction of George Fox,—who at the same time was urging them to be obedient to Christ, their counsellor and commander.”

We have referred more at length to this subject, because we have noticed of latter times in the Christian Worker and in the London Friend, some of the same erroneous views put forth that were advanced by R. Barclay in his “Inner Life.” As they involve a radical change in the principles and practices of our Society, and their adoption leads to the destruction of unity between those who continue to be Quakers and those who have ceased to walk in the ways of their predecessors in religious profession, we would respectfully commend to the attention of those who may desire to know the truth on these points, the perusal of the “Examen” above referred to, which may be procured at Friends' Book Store, No. 304 Arch St., Philadelphia; or of Joseph Smith, No. 6 Oxford street, Whitechapel, E., London.

SUMMARY OF EVENTS.

UNITED STATES.—Professor Brooks, at Phelps, New York, on the morning of the 22d, verified a discovery made by him on Seventh-day morning of a fragmentary comet, 8 degrees east of the great comet. It appeared smaller than on Seventh-day, when it measured two degrees in length and resembled the portion detached from Biela's comet. Professor Brooks thinks it identical with the envelope thrown off several days previously.

The old post-office site in New York city was sold at auction on the 18th inst. It was bought by members of the Chamber of Commerce for $650,000.

The enormous travel on the New York elevated railroads is shown by a report just made, which states that during the year ended 9th mo. 30th, they carried over eighty-six millions of passengers, and their cash receipts amounted to $5,973,000. The annual business of the two great underground lines of London is but little more in the number of passengers carried and far less in receipts. Their average fare is about one-penny (two cents) per passenger, while in New York it is five cents.

At a sale of thoroughbred Jersey cattle in New York on the 18th, the cow Fancy Fan was sold for $1650, and the cow Flower Girl for $775.

A seat in the New York Stock Exchange was sold last week for $35,000—the highest price ever paid.

In Patrick county, Virginia, there was sold at auction on the 14th inst., a tract of 1132 acres of land, having on it several settlements and orchards, at about $3 per acre. On the same day eleven tracts of land in other portions of the county, containing several orchards and settlements, and aggregating 1800 acres, were sold at an average of $1 per acre.

The colored men of Columbus, Ga., have organized a literary association, and by one day's canvassing among the whites secured the gift of 300 volumes and the promise of a number of daily papers.

The South has this season raised nearly enough grain to supply the home demand, and will save $125,000,000 which it has been accustomed annually to spend in the West for food.

Yellow fever appears to have been much worse this year in Pensacola, Florida, and Brownsville, Texas, than has generally been supposed. It is reported that the number of cases in Pensacola has been 1970, that is to say more than one-half of the population have been ill. The death rate is not very heavy in proportion to the number of cases, but reaches one in a little over twenty of the inhabitants. The proportions in Brownsville are almost as bad; two-fifths of the inhabitants have been sick with yellow fever, and one in forty-four have died of it.

In Tulare county, Cal., the Sierras are almost as white with snow as in winter. Between one and two feet of snow are reported from Mineral King Flat, about 8000 feet above the sea level.

Nineteen new pupils from Arizona, New Mexico and the Indian Territory, have arrived at the Indian School at Carlisle, making a total of 314 Indians in that school.

* See this interesting circumstance in full in Life of John Richardson, Friends' Library, Vol. IV., p. 29.

Deaths in Philadelphia for the week ending Tenth month 21st, numbered 303, as compared with 341 for the corresponding week of last year, and 298 for the previous week. Of the whole number, 147 were males and 156 females; 49 died of consumption; 17 of marasmus; 16 of old age; 12 of typhoid fever; 12 of diphtheria, 13 of pneumonia, and 11 of casualties.

Markets, &c.—U. S. 3's, 102½; 3½'s, registered, 101½; 4½'s, 113½; 4's, 119½; currency 6's, 133.

Cotton continues quiet at the decline. Sales of middlings are reported at 11½ a 11½ cts. per lb. for uplands and New Orleans.

Petroleum.—Standard white, 7½ cts. for export, and 8½ cts. per gallon for home use.

Flour continues in fair demand at former rates; sales of 200 barrels low winters at $3.25; 125 barrels sour springs at $4.50 a $5; 150 barrels Minn. bakers' extras at $6 a $6.50; 300 barrels do. do. straight at $6.75; 400 barrels Pennsylvania extra family, medium, at $4.87½; 275 barrels do. do. good, at $5; 350 barrels do. do. fancy at $5.10; 125 barrels Ohio do. do., choice, at $5.75; 175 barrels do. do., fancy, at $6; 125 barrels Southern Illinois do. do. at $5.75; 125 barrels Ohio patent at $6.50; 125 barrels do. do. fancy, at $7.25; 125 barrels Minnesota do. do., fair, at $7.50; 125 do. do. choice, at $7.50 a $7.75; 175 barrels do. do., fancy, at $8, and 1100 barrels City Mills family on private terms. Rye flour was scarce, and the market was firm—Pennsylvania, $4.25 a $4.37½. Corn meal was nominally quoted at $4.50 per barrel for Brandywine. Bran.—Winter wheat sells at $17, a $17.50, and spring at $16 a $16.50 per ton.

Grain.—Wheat was rather easier. Sales of 2700 bush. Delaware longberry, track, at $1.13 a $1.17; 3100 bush. red, track, at $1.10; 2000 bush. No. 2 red, in elevator, at $1.10½; 1600 bush. rejected at $1.03 a $1.06, and 50,000 bush. No. 2 red, at $1 a $1.10½. Rye sold at 75 cts. Corn was firmly held. Sales of 2100 bush. sail yellow, in grain depot, at 85 a 87 cts.; 3700 bush. sail mixed, in grain depot, at 86 cts., and 2500 bushels steamer, at 83 a 84 cts., and 25,000 bushels sail mixed at 83 a 86 cts. Oats were in fair demand at full prices; about 12,000 bushels sold in lots at 45 a 47 cts. for No. 2 white, and 40 a 42 cts. per bushel for rejected and mixed, and No. 2 white at 45 a 46 cts.

Hay and Straw Market, for week ending 10th mo. 21st, 1882.—Loads of hay, 480; loads of straw, 65. Average price during the week—Prime timothy, $1 to $1.10 per 100 pounds; mixed, 95 cts. to $1.05 per 100 pounds; straw, 75 to 85 cts. per 100 pounds.

Beef cattle were dull and rather lower: 4500 head arrived and sold at the different yards at 4 a 7 cts. per lb., the latter rate for extra.

Sheep were dull and lower: 15,000 head arrived and sold at the different yards, at 2½ a 5½ cts., and lambs at 3½ a 7½ cts. per lb., as to condition.

Hogs were less active: 4000 head arrived and sold at the different yards at 11 a 12½ cts. per pound, according to quality.

FOREIGN.—A new political movement, entitled the Northern Reform Club, has been started at Newcastle on Tyne. The object is the union of the various political organizations, to effect Parliamentary Land Law Reforms, and to bring pressure upon the Government to carry them in Parliament.

The steamer Victoria, which arrived at Liverpool on the 16th instant from Boston, landed 746 bullocks, being the largest cargo of cattle imported this season without loss, owing to the improved system of ventilation adopted by the line.

An Irish National Land League was formed at Dublin on the 17th instant. It was decided that the Council should consist of forty-eight members, thirty-two from the counties and sixteen from the Parliamentary party. Since that time the Committee of the National League have adopted an address to the people, which is in substance as follows: "The landlords have combined with the purpose of breaking the spirit of the tenants. The dismay which the present scale of judicial rents has created among the applicants to the Land Courts renders it more necessary now than ever that the tenantry should be reunited in vigilant and lawful association for the purpose of protecting themselves from injustice. The inspiration of all our struggles is to transfer all local power and patronage from privileged strangers to the hands of the people, and so fortify the people for the work of self-government."

George Otto Trevelyan, Chief Secretary for Ireland, in a speech at Selkirk, Scotland, said the resident magistrates in Ireland, in their last reports, were singularly unanimous in stating that the relations between landlord and tenant were improving, that rents were being fairly paid, and that intimidation was decreasing. "Another subject for thankfulness," said Trevelyan,

"is the fact that it is now nearly six months since there has been a collision between the constabulary and the people in the Irish provinces."

James Caird estimates the requirements of Great Britain for foreign wheat, from the first of 10th month at 15,500,000 quarters, or nearly 2,000,000 quarters less than were imported during the same period last year.

The imports of France for the past nine months, as compared with those of the same period last year, increased 99,000,000 francs, and the exports increased 246,000,000 francs.

Threatening placards are nightly posted on the walls at Montecane-Mines, and threatening letters are sent to the managers of the mines. There have been several arrests, including that of Bordat, the principal ringleader and a notorious anarchist. The trial of twenty-three rioters will begin at Chalons on the 25th. The indictment charges the prisoners with a conspiracy to wage civil war, a crime which is punishable with death.

Eighty Frenchmen, assisted by 1400 African laborers, are about to commence the construction of a railway between the Niger and Senegal rivers. Their operations will be protected by a military column, which plant the French flag and erect two forts on the Niger.

A number of Tunisian chiefs with their followers have offered to return to Tunis and submit to the French. Tripoli is strongly opposed to such action. A French man-of-war has been placed at the disposal of the French Consul General at Tripoli.

A despatch to the Central News from Cairo says the crisis has ended. The Egyptian Ministry have intimated their intention to permit Broadley and Eve and Mark Francis Napier to defend Arabi Pasha on the condition that the witnesses in the case shall undergo a preliminary examination. The mode of procedure agreed upon for the trial of Arabi Pasha allows the calling of witnesses from foreign countries, or the taking of their evidence by commission. Counsel for the prisoner will have the right of final reply. Arabi Pasha desires that De Lesseps be summoned as a witness at his trial.

Ninet, who was Arabi Pasha's European adviser, declares that he received no rewards for his services, and that he can prove by documents that the evacuation of Alexandria and the defence of the country were ordered by the Ministry and sanctioned by the Khedive.

Cairo, 10th mo. 21st.—Several influential landowners, who have just returned from visiting their properties in the country, report that the state of the natives is most unsatisfactory. A thin superstratum of fear overlies among them a deep hatred of Christians.

The Times says, the departure of Lardon Bredif for Egypt does not indicate that he is to resume his old position as Comptroller General, but, on the contrary, is an indication of progress towards an amicable solution of the minor questions still outstanding between England and France. The latter Government is aware that the reconstruction of the joint control in Egypt is impossible.

In the great towns of Germany where Catholics do not predominate, the elections have resulted in favor of the Liberals. The Liberals gain 30 votes in the Diet from the Conservatives. In several new districts, in the vicinity of Potsdam and Berlin, the Conservatives have been victorious. No one party will have a majority in the new Chamber. In order to obtain a majority, it would be necessary for the Government to enter into an alliance with the Clericals and Conservatives.

A despatch to the Daily News from Berlin says the repeal of the Socialist laws is expected shortly. Even the North German Gazette favors their repeal on the condition that the Socialists abstain from interference in the higher grades of politics.

From a report made by the commander of the steamer Louise, a trading vessel, which endeavored to reach the mouth of the Yenisei river in company with the Dutch Arctic expedition ship Varna, it is considered that both the Varna and the vessel of the Danish Arctic expedition are in a dangerous position, as they were both beset by ice on the Kara Sea, about 80 miles from the Continent. The Louise endeavored to assist them during two days, but, fearing to be ultimately beset in a similar manner, she effected her escape on 10th mo. 22. The commander says that if the vessels are not by this time free they will have to pass the winter in the moving pack.

Belgrade, 10th mo. 23rd.—A woman fired twice at King Milan in the Cathedral to-day. The King was not hurt. The King's assailant is the widow of Colonel Jebrane Markowitch, who was executed, with several other rioters, in 5th mo. 1878, by order of Milan. It is suspected that the attempt is not merely attributable to revenge, but partly to political motives. After the attempt, Queen Natalie, who was with the King in the Cathedral, fainted and was carried, in an unconscious condition, to the Palace. The King accompanied thither and then returned to the Cathedral unharmed and remained until the end of the service. The attempt to lynch the assassin.

Political and financial circles are much excited by news that Senor Sagasta, the Prime Minister, has a long and amicable interview with Marshal Serrano. The incident has created a profound sensation in bearing on the situation and prospect of political ties. Negotiations between the old Republicans and Marshal Serrano for the formation of a monarchical party, meet with great difficulties, owing to a lack of accord with regard to a reform of the Constitution. Marshal Serrano expects to interview Prime Minister Sagasta again shortly, in order to effect a compromise. It is thought, however, that an arrangement will be difficult unless Senor Sagasta consents to abandon Carlists, whom Marshal Serrano, in consequence of their conservative tendencies, considers an insuperable obstacle to the proposed reforms. Senor Sagasta strongly opposes the reform of the Constitution. It is that Canovas de Castillo and Castelar are of the opinion that the attitude of Marshal Serrano is the most important and decisive event which has happened since the restoration of the Bourbons.

In the Madras Presidency, in India, during 182025 (10,125) was paid as rewards for destroying tigers, 750 panthers and leopards, and 543 other mals. 1302 persons and 8938 animals were killed wild animals and snakes, tigers killing 135 persons 3328 cattle. The cattle killed by wild animals in Presidency during the year are valued at £17,876 (18380.)

A despatch from Manila says the cholera continued to decrease. Since the last report the average of deaths has been four daily. The disease still rages on the island of Visaya. A typhoon devastated the city on day the 20th inst. Business has since been entirely suspended. There was great destruction of shipping.

Lima, 10th mo. 23d.—The Diario Oficial to-day publishes the account of an engagement between the Chiriquinos and Montoneros, which took place on the inst., near Peroto. The Montoneros were completely dispersed.

WESTTOWN BOARDING SCHOOL.

The WINTER TERM commences on Second-day, 1st month 30th, 1882. Conveyances will be at the STREET ROAD STATION on Second and Third-days, the 30th and 31st of the month, to meet the trains that leave Philadelphia at the BROAD STREET STATION, at Broad, Filbert Sts., Philadelphia, at 7.14, 8.38 and 11.13 A. M. and 2.40, and 4.55 P. M.

The UNION TRANSFER COMPANY will send BAGGAGE to any place in the built-up part of Philadelphia, if notice is left either at No. 838 Chestnut St. the South East corner of Broad and Chestnut St. the Baggage Room 15th St. above Market, or at Market St. Ferry, (north side), and will deliver it at the B. St. Station of the Pennsylvania Railroad Company a charge of 25 cents per trunk, to be paid either when the order is given or when the trunk is called for. The same charge they will collect baggage from and the other railroad depots, if the railroad checks held such baggage are left at one of the offices of the Transfer Company above designated. In all cases it was stated that the baggage is to go to Westtown Boarding School, Street Road Station, on the West Chester Philadelphia Railroad.

DURING THE SESSION, passengers for the School will be met at the Street Road Station, every day except First-days, on the arrival of the first through train for the City, and mail packages for the pupils, if left at Friends' Book Store, No. 304 Arch street, will be forwarded every Sixth-day at 12 o'clock, except on the two Sixth-days in the Twelfth month, and the expense charged in their bills.

Tenth month 24th, 1882.

FRIENDS' BOARDING SCHOOL, BARNESVILLE, OHIO.

Wanted a Superintendent and Matron to take charge of this Institution at the close of the present winter term. Friends of Ohio Yearly Meeting, who may be drawn to the service, are requested to communicate with Aaron Frame, or Asa Garretson, Barnesville, Mont county, Ohio.

MARRIED, at Friends' Meeting, Stillwater, Belknap county, Ohio, on Fifth-day, the 21st of 9th mo. 1882, JOHN W. MOTT, of Linn county, Iowa, and SARAH daughter of the late John Hall, of the former place.

THE FRIEND.

A RELIGIOUS AND LITERARY JOURNAL.

VOL. LVI.

SEVENTH-DAY, ELEVENTH MONTH 4, 1882.

NO. 13.

PUBLISHED WEEKLY.

if paid in advance, $2.00 per annum; if not paid in advance $2.50; 10 cents extra is charged for Postage on those sent by mail.

Articles designed for insertion to be addressed to

JOSEPH WALTON,
MOORESTOWN, BURLINGTON CO., N. J.

scriptions, payments and business communications, received by

JOHN S. STOKES,
NO. 116 NORTH FOURTH STREET, UP STAIRS,
PHILADELPHIA.

For "The Friend."

Letter from James B. Cotton.

(Concluded from page 91.)

With regard to the object of our visit in things and other religious service, we had to be satisfied and grateful. We had little time for sight-seeing—neither, perhaps, do we attach that importance to out-of-locality which some seem to do. But "the mountains are round about Jerusalem" and, though weary with travel, we ended the scenery from the top of the house where we stayed, including a glimpse of the Red Sea; beside taking a walk on the Mount of Olives, and another in an opposite direction toward the north. We passed a field where "a good crop of wheat" had recently been harvested; on this no soil was visible—surface solely of small stones—but this was an exceptional piece. We called on a Turkish family, living at their vineyard, partly to show it in the fruit time and partly to escape the heat of the city; they spread mats for our feet to sit on, brought grapes, and finally a baby. They also sung us some hymns. At the time of the Ramazan, when the Mohammedans fast between 3 A.M. and 7 P.M. strictly. They showed us some ancient stones they had discovered in the vineyard, cut out of the solid white limestone, and full of soil through many a century. There were apartments 10 feet square and 7 feet high; oven-like recesses (3 in a side) were in the walls of these, and they were filled with broken and half decayed human bones. They spread them on the vineyard for manure. Our friends referred us to the 8th of Jeremiah. We saw a very ancient "wine press," far from being a building; there was a reservoir excavated in the rock, about 4 feet square; the depth we could not see, it might be 3 feet. It was on the face of the rock which slanted about 10 degrees, about 50 square feet had been chiseled, and channelled for the flowing of grape-juice into the reservoir; the grapes were spread on the rock were trodden out—as was easily apparent and comprehended. A new Turkish friend accompanied us to Jerusalem, and passing through the Damascus gate, he showed us how it was a triple gate. Though only the outer ones were in place, the remains of the others are there. We thought of the Scripture, "on the north 3 gates," &c. The drawing which accompanies this description shows that all three of the gates must be passed through in succession before admittance can be gained into the town.] Many flocks of goats, mixed with sheep, all kept for milk, and which are taken for pasture to distances of some miles, were coming in, as is the custom, to lodge within the walls. The streets are irregular, crooked, often arched over with houses; they are paved with large stones on which boots are apt to slide. No provision is made for sanitary purposes. There are many ill-looking dogs who have an occupation; we thought of Jezebel and her end. The modern buildings outside the walls are large and well built, but like those within, of stone; all rooms are arched in the ceilings, and the floors are of stone; the roofs flat or domed, and adapted for collecting the rain water into wells. The country now is dry and parched, the fine dust troublesome if there is any wind, but in the season, we were told, all was different, and wild flowers abundant.

We went one day to Bethlehem (6 miles), we were a party of 7, and rode on donkeys. The scenery was exceedingly beautiful, with broad valleys and terraced hills. The land is very much improved, the stones being gathered into walls, terraces renewed, and vineyards, &c., planted. Foreign enterprise has something to do with this, and people of different nations are settling around. We saw the "Church of the Nativity," and weary pilgrims come in to kiss the pictures and the places about the manger where the babe was born—the locality however is quite doubtful. We saw throngs of gaily dressed people; among the countenances of varied type, many were excellent. A fine little boy of 12 years, who went with us on foot as interpreter, with the most persistent energy and a courage which amused both our party and others, cleared the way of camels or asses as we met them. He sent a shout of "Allah il Allah" down the narrow and crowded street of Bethlehem as we entered, that carried (to me) a new and half-mysterious feeling with it.

We returned to Jaffa in the night of the 1st of 8th mo. met our friends there, and had the public meeting as arranged, then embarked in an Austrian steamer and arrived safely at Port Said once more—grateful in view of the past, having been preserved in many ways at a critical time and yet having acquired some pleasant memories that can never be effaced. We were obliged to wait six days at Port Said for the next steamer. Our missionary friend made all arrangements for our stay on board a steamer chartered by the Government as a refuge ship. It was thought unsafe to live on shore. Disturbance was thought to be imminent, and the war-ships were all prepared. One of them, lying two miles out, searched the harbor each night, with the electric light; the broadway was very effective as it swept past us.

We left on the 11th, at 10.45, and entered the canal. The deck was strongly barricaded to render the steering-house, bridge, &c., bullet-proof, and the two cannon were prepared in case of an attack. The canal is from about one hundred to sixty yards wide, the edge faced with stone, and, in some places, with reeds and shrubs; the banks generally very low, but near the centre they are fifteen to twenty feet high. The desert is almost bare of vegetation, and many dust-pillars were moving about. We anchored in the lake at Ismalia at nightfall, but little of the town could be seen. At five o'clock in the morning we went on again, and crossed the bitter lakes before nine o'clock. Here we had to wait till six o'clock next morning because of a steamer having run aground in the channel. Arrived at Suez at eleven o'clock and stayed two hours. There is a beautiful mountain to the west of the town, which is a small one, seemingly a compact cluster of houses on the level sand of the shore. The land on both sides of the sea was well in sight till dark; the land uniformly high on the west side, and not so much so on the east. The air hot and oppressive. Temperature of the sea, eighty-five degrees.

Stayed at Aden five hours in the night of the 17th. The straits of Bab-el-mandel are about two miles wide, a light-house on the west and some fine mountain scenery on the east side. On the 19th we took the southwestern monsoon, which was moderate, though it had been heavier earlier in the season. One night the whole surface of the sea, as far as the horizon, was covered with a substance, as white as the foam made by the steamer. The horizon showed a defined white edge against the sky. We were told it was composed of animalcules or zoophytes; it had a very remarkable appearance.

We reached Bombay at noon on the 23d instant. The low hills near the town were brilliantly green and pleasant to see. We soon landed in the care of a hotel agent, and were driven two and a-half miles to our first resting-place in this large city, with its 800,000 inhabitants, consisting chiefly of a mixed colored population. The streets were thronged with them in their many-colored, light and simple garments—many bullock-teams, with their high withers, horse conveyances and tram-cars traversing the road-ways, which are often narrow, but, in many cases, of a very good breadth.

We were thankful to find that a resident missionary, whose name we had, lived quite near our hotel, and, communicating with him, the way was at once opened for religious meetings with the people. A valued friend, whom we had not expected to meet here, invited us to his house, where we have enjoyed all the comforts of a home. An old resident, and much respected here, his cordial assistance has been of no ordinary import to us.

There is much of interest in this place, but I cannot undertake to write much about it. Pleasure or sight-seeing is far from being the object of our travel; and though we have apparently much of leisure, yet a weariness attends continually, that makes writing a matter of some effort. The number of those who wish us to write to them increases as we pass along. The few things of interest I have set down thou wilt, I dare say, be willing to let others of our friends have the perusal of.

9th mo. 6, 1882. We went on the 31st ult. to Solapoor and Hoshungabad, where are two mission stations, distant about five hundred miles from Bombay, and returned this morning, glad of the opportunity of seeing a little in connection with India, from a "missionary" point of view. A great part of the journey was made in the night, but we saw a great deal of beautiful "country"—immense plains, slightly rolling and dotted with trees; other parts lightly wooded and all a rich green, just at the end of the rainy season. We saw much land not yet under cultivation. The land appeared to be rich, but the style of cultivation is very rude and simple. We saw no fences, so that crops must be watched. The native dwellings are in clusters, very low-built, and made of straw and reeds, and overrun now with gourds of some kind. I cannot now go into detail in any way. Some meetings we are to attend, and on the 8th we expect to leave for Australia, due early in 10th mo. I am thankful to say we are pretty well. With love to thyself and wife and other friends, who feel an interest in us,

I am, &c.,

JAMES B. COTTON.

For "The Friend."

Ancient Testimonies and Advices.

CARE IN OVER TRADING; AND IN THE TIMELY PAYMENT OF DEBTS.

"It is advised and earnestly desired, that the payment of just debts be not delayed by any professing Truth beyond the time promised and agreed upon: nor occasion given of complaint to those they deal with, by their backwardness in payment where no time is limited: nor any to overcharge themselves with too much trading and commerce beyond their capacities to discharge—keeping a conscience void of offence toward all men; and that all Friends concerned be very careful not to contract extravagant debts to the danger of wronging others and their families; which some have done, to the grieving the hearts of the upright: nor to break their promises, contracts, or agreements, in their buying and selling (or in any other lawful affairs), to the injuring of themselves or others, and occasioning strife, contention, and reproach to Truth and Friends. And it is advised that all Friends that are entering into trade, or that are therein, and have not stocks sufficient of their own to answer the trade they aim at, to be very cautious of running themselves into debt, without advising with some of their ancient and experienced Friends among whom they live."—1692.

"It is the advice of this meeting, that Friends everywhere keep to plainness both in speech, habit and dealing; and not to launch too far into the things of this world, by overcharging themselves with trading and debts beyond their abilities to pay; but keep out of the spirit of the world in all things, that none may be ensnared and defiled thereby. And that all Friends keep to the simplicity of Truth, and our ancient testimony in calling the months and days by Scripture names, and not by heathen; and all other things, against which Truth's testimony hath been borne."—1697.

"We earnestly desire that all professing the blessed Truth with us, be very careful to keep their words and promises, by paying their just debts without unreasonable delay; and to do justice to all men for righteousness sake, and to prevent the great reproach and scandal of defrauding any persons, by breaking in their debt, or otherwise injuring any. And where it shall happen any differences may arise, to shun going to law one with another; but that such differences may be justly and speedily ended, according to advice formerly given in this behalf."—1702.

"Whereas, in this time of general ease and liberty, too many under our profession have launched forth into the things of this world beyond their means or capacities to discharge a good conscience in the performance of their promises and contracts, as well as their just debts, to the great scandal of our holy profession, and the involving of themselves, their families, and others in great sorrow and inconvenience: it is therefore our earnest desire, that all Friends every where be very careful to avoid all inordinate pursuit after the things of this world, by such ways and means as depend too much upon the uncertain probabilities of hazardous enterprises; but rather labor to content themselves with such a plain way and manner of living, as is most agreeable to the self-denying principle of Truth which we profess, and which is most conducive to that tranquillity of mind that is requisite to a religious conduct through this troublesome world."—1724.

"Dear Friends, it hath long been the concern of this meeting, that all our members carefully walk in the Divine Light; that they may be preserved from the two extremes of covetousness on the one hand, and extravagancy on the other; the latter of which has been the occasion of the failings of some amongst us, in the non-payment of their just debts; by which great reproach hath been brought upon our holy profession. Wherefore we greatly desire all Friends to be very careful, not to run into larger trading and business than their capacities and business can well answer; and that they frequently inspect their circumstances, and do not live at an expense beyond them. And, if through adverse accidents, any should fail in paying their just debts, and should after his or her compounding with his or her creditors, be so far blessed and prospered in their affairs, as to be capable of paying their deficiencies; it is the earnest desire and advice of this meeting, that they do not omit the same; it being agreeable to the command of the gospel, and common justice among men."—1727.

"We entreat Friends, in their Monthly Meetings everywhere, to be properly watchful over one another, and early to caution all against running beyond their depth, and entangling themselves in a greater multiplicity of trade and business than they can extricate themselves from with honor and reputation. And when any shall proceed in opposition to such advice and counsel of their brethren, let them in due time be dealt with according to former advices of this meeting.

"And it is the sense and judgment of this meeting, that if any fall short of paying their just debts, and a composition is made with their creditors to accept of a part, instead of the whole; notwithstanding the parties in look upon themselves legally discharged, any obligation to pay the remainder, yet in principle we profess enjoins full satisfaction to be made, if ever the debtors are of ability. And in order that such may the better retrieve their circumstances, we exhort them a manner of living in every respect the most conducive to this purpose, and correspondent to the state they are reduced to: it being exceedingly dishonorable for any to live in ostentation and greatness at the expense of others, which is certainly the case, where any part of the debts, due by the law of equity, a strict justice, remains unpaid. And Friends in their Monthly Meetings, be cautious if they admit such, whose debts are unsatisfied into full unity, or receive collections, which cannot properly be deemed their own."—1759.—From The London Epistles.

Curing Scrofula by the Royal Touch.

Lecky in his History of England in the 18th century says, that the enthusiasm of the Established Church under Queen Anne was accompanied with a revival of the belief that the sovereign was endowed with a miraculous power of curing the scrofula by his touch.

"This singular superstition had existed from a very early time, both in England and in France. The English kings were supposed to have inherited the power from Edward the Confessor; the French, according to some writers, from St. Lewis, according to others from Clovis. The miracle was performed with every circumstance of publicity, under the inspection of the royal surgeons, and the presence of the king's chaplains, and the tenacity with which it survived so many changes of civilization and of religion, is one of the most curious facts in ecclesiastical history. In France it was an old custom for a king, immediately after his consecration, to go in pilgrimage to the monastery of St. Medard, in Champagne, where, after a period of preparatory devotion, he performed the ceremony. The patients were first visited by the chief physician of the king. They were then ranged in the church, or, if they were too numerous in the adjoining cloisters and park. The king went among them, accompanied by his great almoner, the captain of his guards, and his chief physician, and he made the sign of the cross on the face of each, pronouncing the words 'Dieu te guerisse, le Roy te touche.'

"The Reformation in no degree weakened the belief. A Doctor of Divinity, named William Tooker, in the reign of Elizabeth, wrote a work describing the cures he had himself witnessed, and he relates among other cases that of a Popish recusant who was converted to Protestantism, when he found by experience that the excommunicated Queen cured his scrofula by her touch. The Catholics were much perplexed by the miracle, and were inclined to argue that it was performed by virtue of the sign of the cross which was employed, but in the following reign this was omitted from the ceremony without any degree impairing its efficacy. Under Charles I. the service was drawn up in English, and in the conflict between the royal and republican parties the miracle assumed a considerable prominence. One cure worked is sovereign was especially famous. As he is being brought by his enemies through Winchester, on his way to the Isle of Wight, innkeeper of Winchester, who was grievously ill and in daily fear of suffocation, and had vainly sought help from the doctors, finding himself in the way of the royal prisoner, he was driven back by the guards and not dared to touch the king, but he threw himself on his knees upon the ground, imploring help, and crying 'God save the king!' The king, struck by the spectacle of so much loyalty, said 'Friend, I see thou art not permitted to come near me, and I cannot tell at thou wouldst have, but God bless thee I grant thy desire.' The prayer was heard; his illness vanished, and strange to relate, the fevers and tumors which disappeared from the body of the patient appeared in the bottle in which he had before taken his unavailing medicine, and it began to swell both within and without. The story is related by Dr. Nicholas, warden of Winchester College, who declares it 'within his own knowledge to be every word of it essentially true.' After the death of the king it was found that handkerchiefs dipped in his blood possessed the same efficacy as the living touch.

* God cures, the king touches thee.

Charles II. retained the power in exile, as Francis had done when a prisoner at Madrid, and he touched for the scrofula in Holland, and in England, and even France. In the great outburst of enthusiastic loyalty that followed the Restoration the superstition attained its climax, and it may be seriously questioned whether in the whole compass of history there is any individual to whom a greater number of miracles has been ascribed than to the most worthless and immoral of English kings. It appears that in a single year Charles performed the ceremony 8,500 times, and that the course of his reign he touched nearly 10,000 persons. Before the sick were admitted into the presence of the king it was necessary that they should obtain medical certificates attesting the reality of the disease, and in 1684 the throng of sufferers demanding these was so great that six or seven persons were pressed to death before the sovereign's door.

The political importance of this superstition is very manifest. Educated laymen might deny it, but in the eyes of the English poor it was a visible, palpable attestation of the inalienable sanctity of the royal line. It severed the sovereignty entirely apart from the category of mere human institutions, and revealed that it possessed a virtue and a glory which the other political forces of the nation could neither create, nor rival, nor destroy. It proved that no personal immorality, no government, no religious apostasy, no degradation of political power, could annul the consecration which the Divine hand had imparted to the legitimate heir of the British line. The Revolution in England at once suspended the miracle, for William, being a stranger, was not generally believed to possess the power, though Whiston relates that on a solitary occasion the king was prevailed upon to touch a sick person, 'praying God to heal the patient, and grant him more wisdom the same time,' and that the touch, in spite of the manifest incredulity of the sovereign, proved efficacious. In the person of Anne, however, the old dynasty was again upon the throne, and in the ecclesiastical and political tradition of her reign the royal miracle speedily revived. 'This noisome disease,' says Fuller, speaking of the king's evil, 'is happily healed by the hands of the King of England stroking the sore, and if any doubt of the truth thereof, they may be remitted to their own eyes for further confirmation.' 'To dispute the matter of fact,' said Collier, 'is to go to the excesses of scepticism, to deny our senses, and to be incredulous even to ridiculousness.' 'That divers persons desperately laboring under the king's evil,' said Bull, 'have been cured by the mere touch of the royal hands, assisted with the prayers of the priests of our Church attending, is unquestionable, unless the faith of all our ancient writers, and the consentient report of hundreds of most credible persons in our own ages, attesting the same, is to be questioned.'

"Many impostors came for the purpose of obtaining the gold medal which was bestowed on the occasion in England, or the alms which were distributed in France, and the great political utility of the belief, as well as simple sycophancy, combined with honest credulity to sustain the delusion."

For "The Friend."

Thoughts about the Eternal Gospel and the Falling Babylon.

(Concluded from page 92.)

FALLING BABYLON.

Many ancient religions are dead; the dying of them will always present to the thoughtful mind a spectacle of a sad character, in consideration of the consolation they have given the children of men during their existence. The religions of the Romans, Greeks, Assyrians, Phenicians, &c., have long ago passed away. There is a religion in form, in outward words and outward ceremonies, without spirit and without life, which has existed for centuries and has been called the Christian religion—though the true Christian religion is in spirit and in truth,—that religion has to pass away, earlier or later. It must pass away because it is not the religion of the new covenant which is in spirit and in truth, of which our Lord and Redeemer is the author. The outward religion that must die has come up by apostasy from the true spiritual religion. Christ said, "The kingdom of God cometh not with outward observation, but is in man;" and "the kingdom of God consists not in meat and drink, but in righteousness, peace, and joy in the Holy Ghost." "God is a spirit and must be worshipped in spirit and in truth." And that spiritual worship where God tabernacles with the children of men, is an everlasting covenant in righteousness and in peace. As the religions of old are dead and passed away, so the Christian (so called) religion in outward form, with its gorgeous temples of show and heathenish fables and Jewish ceremonies, must die.

Superstition was blind in all ages and will always be; but still superstition seems to have given consolation to minds not enlightened by the all-darkness-and-weakness-dispelling light of Christ. Children of men having rejected and rebelled against the Light, turned to fables and walked in the darkness.

Did not Christ say to his disciples, that the Holy Spirit should lead them in all truth, and bring to their remembrance what He had said? Did not Christ explain the parables to his disciples? Did not John write to his friends that they had anointing and knew all things? And is not every thing made manifest in the light?

Consequently we believe and understand what is shown to us in the light. The Scriptures are understood and believed by us when we are in a measure of the same Spirit as they were who gave them forth.

There is very much studying of the Scriptures and carnality about finding out the right meaning of texts. But all explanation in human will makes them more and more dark and hard to understand. Still it is said, we must believe what human learning makes out of them, even if it cannot be understood. The Scriptures are falsely called the Word of God, and too much used as an idol by the outward ones. But the natural man can not find out what he wants, but lives in his airy notions. But the spiritual man keeps the Scriptures precious, because he is in the same Spirit that gave them forth. He has come to Christ and got life, and he does not seek the living among the dead. He is indeed a spiritual man, and has a spiritual teacher, Christ, who teaches his people himself.

Without this spiritual teacher people will be deceiving and deceived. People having a zeal for God and seeming to be sincere, have often greatly erred. How have not generations of man quoted spurious Scripture texts? When very young I used to read inscriptions on tombstones and sarcophaguses, and I had occasion to do so on very old ones of 200 years back. The common inscription which I found was Job xix. 25, 26, which in the book of my native tongue reads: "I know that my Redeemer liveth, and He on the last day shall raise me up out of the earth, and I shall then with this, my hide, be clothed over, and in my flesh shall I see God!" That was a very strange tale. (The English translation says that the worms have eaten up the hide.) That text seems to have given a kind of consolation to many.

Both during the old times and during the Christian era, generations have lived and died in superstitions, but it has often been a kind of consolation. I know a Professor in a University, who had the name of being one of the most learned men in Europe in the Hebrew language, who said when asked what he did think about a good translation of the Old Testament; that it would not be advisable to make a correct translation because many pious people would lose their consolation! Dear reader, how important, is it not, that we should follow the true Divine light, and be independent of men's teaching, and of fables, and of what we have not realized and tested?

But as superstition is blind so it is cruel and furious; all must submit to it or perish; therefore for ages superstition has said: "If thou doest not believe as I want thee to believe, thou art going to hell;" and when that did not do enough, it said "If thou believest not as I want thee to do, I shall burn thee as a heretic, and after that thou shall be tormented in hell for ever and ever." This is the outward religion that steals holy men's words and tries to feed people on them. This religion has been the best tool for Satan to make hypocrites of human beings. I will hear the common rough question put to me about here, viz: Have all men gone to hell then? But it don't belong to me to answer, otherwise than those that rejected the light had to suffer for it. God is judge over quick and dead, for every talent received we must give a strict account; but those who have done righteousness are acceptable to God. Can superstition be acceptable to God? When God has given us so much of light to guide us, are we not responsible if we don't accept? I think in this case none can excuse himself by being ignorant. Words are one thing, and life is a different thing. Imagination is one thing, and reality is a different thing. An historical religion is one thing—a spiritual religion is something different.

The Day of Atonement in Modern Times.

Of all the holy days which the various religious creeds require their respective followers to observe, none equals in austerity and apparent contrition of heart the sacred day of atonement of the Jews. In severity of observance and solemnity of ceremonial, they cannot compare with this holiest of holy days in the Jewish calendar. And nowhere is the day more strictly observed than in Poland. In most of the countries in which the scattered nation of God have been forced by the circumstances of their history to take refuge, they have been drawn into association with the general population, but in Poland the line of demarcation between them and the inhabitants of the country of their adoption is still most rigidly drawn. In it the Jews are not only a race, but an exclusive sect.

When travelling in Poland, I happened to be staying at the quaint, dirty city of Jitomir during the month of September—the month sacred to the great Jewish fasts and festivals. It had long been my wish to be an eye-witness of the ceremonies performed on the great Fast of the Atonement by the Polish Jews, who are the Ritualists of the Hebrew Church, adhering to the very letter of the ceremonial, and not departing one iota from the rubric laid down by their forefathers. Thanks to an English clergyman, I was introduced to an elderly Polish Rabbi, who kindly offered to be my cicerone, and to give me every necessary information.

On the day before the Fast of the Atonement, the Rabbi, his wife, two sons, and myself, went into his study soon after breakfast, and there I saw the strangest ceremony I ever witnessed in my life. On the table was a large basket, in which were three cocks and a hen, all having their legs tied. The Rabbi approached the table, took one of the cocks by his tied legs, and, after repeating a cabalistic prayer, composed for the occasion, said, "The children of men that sit in darkness and the shadow of death, being bound in affliction and iron: He brought them out of darkness and the shadow of death, and brake their bands asunder. . . . If there be for him any angel, an intercessor, one among a thousand, to show unto man his uprightness, then He is gracious unto him, and saith, 'Deliver him from going into the pit; I have found a ransom.'" The Rabbi then whirled the cock around his head, saying, "This is my atonement, this is my ransom. This cock goeth to death, but may I be gathered and enter into a long and happy life, and into peace." This he recited three times, and then took the hen and performed the same ceremony for his wife. His two sons now took hold of the other two cocks, repeating exactly the same prayer as that of their father; and then all laid their hands on the cocks and hen, and immediately afterward they were handed to the Jewish butcher to be killed. This extraordinary proceeding is called the Keparoth, or atoning sacrifice. . . . The sacrifice of the present day consists of a cock for the male, and a hen for the female. A white fowl is preferred to any other, because the prophet says, "Though your sins be as scarlet, they shall become white as snow." . . .

In the afternoon we all went down into the synagogue: and, the prayers over, some of the Jews, with the assistance of their friends, prostrated themselves on the ground (taking extreme care, however, to fall down without kneeling, for kneeling is an act of idolatry); whilst others inflicted upon them, with a leather thong, forty stripes, save one, and then those who had been thus chastised, inflicted the same punishment, in their turn, upon their chastisers. I must add that the chastisement was a very mild one, and the ceremony bordered too closely on the ridiculous to impress me very strongly with the effect it was intended to create.

This over, we returned to the Rabbi's house for the last meal before the Great Feast. The Day of Atonement is the time when universal reconciliation takes place. Children ask forgiveness of parents; those who have wronged one another implore pardon; all differences on that occasion are healed, and everybody is on good terms with one another.

As soon as the setting sun proclaimed that the festival of Yom Kippur, or Day of Atonement, was ushered in, we proceeded to the synagogue, which was lighted up with numerous candles. It was a dingy-looking building, utterly devoid of architecture; at its end was the ark, screened from public view by handsome curtains; and in its centre the reading desk, a kind of raised seat, of circular form, boxed all round, on which the officers of the synagogue take their seats. But the appearance of the congregation fully made up for any want of interest in their temple of worship. I have visited chapels at home—orthodox, unorthodox, and built for every phase of religious and irreligious belief; I have mingled with worshippers abroad in cathedrals and in convent-chapels belonging to almost every Roman Catholic order—but I never met such an extraordinary-looking congregation as on that night in the synagogue at Jitomir. Everybody was dressed in white. The men in the shrouds in which they were to be buried, and the women in white garments. No leather boots or shoes were worn by the worshippers, or anything made of calf-skin, in sad remembrance of the golden calf worshipped by their forefathers. The richer Jews had on cloth boots and shoes, while many of the poor stood in their stockings. The service lasted three hours, and was to me wearily monotonous.

From 6 o'clock the next morning till sunset, the whole day was spent in the synagogue; and from the sunset of the previous day to the next sunset, no food or water was taken by any of the congregation. The prayers of the morning service lasted six hours; those of the afternoon service till four o'clock; then came vespers; and last of all the great conclusion prayer, which was not finished till after sunset.

The concluding prayer finished, the ram's horn was blown as a signal that the duties of the day were over, and the ceremony closed with the words: "Next year we shall be in Jerusalem." The Day of Atonement was now ended, the congregation having fasted from twenty-four to twenty-six hours and having continued in the exercise of their prayers upwards of twelve hours, without intermission.—From The Home and the Synagogue of the Modern Jew.

For "The Friend."

The Vine and the Branches.

Christ is the vine, his disciples the branches. As the branch cannot bear fruit of itself, except it abide in the vine, no more can we except we abide in Christ. If we abide in Christ He will abide in us, and we shall bring forth much fruit; but if we abide not in Christ we shall bear no fruit but be cast forth as a branch and become withered.

As a tree is known by its fruits, so shall we be known by our fruits as we abide in Christ our living Head. The fruits of the Spirit are peace, love, joy, meekness, temperance, integrity, brotherly-kindness, charity. In our daily walk and conversation, in thought, word and deed, these fruits will be made manifest as we possess the Spirit of Christ and abide in Him. Though our names be recorded in the church record below, and we have a name to live; yet, without this union, this abiding in Christ, our names will have no place in the record of the book of life above, and we shall be as one dead—as a branch withered and cast away. Says the wisest of men: "Every child is known by his doings, whether they be pure or whether they be right." "Gather not grapes of thorns, nor figs of thistles. A good tree cannot bear evil fruit, neither a corrupt tree good fruit. What avails the glowing advertisements and recommendations of a fruit-tree dealer if, in after years, his trees fail to bear the expected fruit? Simply null and void. So will we be in the sight of God and man if we fail to bear the fruit in our lives which we profess with our lips. How many engage with great apparent earnestness and zeal in lip-service while their hearts are far from the God they profess to worship, prompted only by a desire to appear great and learned in the sight of man,—their lives bearing only the fruits of darkness and death! Let us learn to wait upon the Lord, in silence though it be, asking Him to search us all out and see if there any evil way within us, and lead us in the ways of life everlasting.

If we abide in Christ, we may ask whatsoever we will and it will be given us. Let us learn to ask more largely from the great treasury on high; for Heaven's storehouse can never become exhausted. Let us not stop to ask for clean and pure hearts that will us for immortality, for the companionship of angels and of God, where we may abide with Christ our living head, forevermore.

Dear Friends, have we this real abiding this vital union with Christ our great Head? If we have not here, we cannot expect to have hereafter. Soon will the harvest be past and the summer ended. Let us work in the vineyard while it is day, for the night cometh when no man can work. The harvest is true, but the laborers few. Does some brain need purging? purge it dear Lord of the vineyard, that it may bring forth more fruit. Tear every idol away, whatever the idol purge and prune me that I may bear dant fruit to thy name's honor and glory.

"The dearest idol I have known,
Whate'er that idol be,
Help me to tear it from thy throne,
And worship only thee."

As we seek, dear friends, to get a stronger, er root in the true and living Vine, that may bear precious immortal fruit, and continually,—fruits akin to those on life's on the banks of the beautiful river flow-by the great white throne on high. So our lives prove a blessing to ourselves to those around us, and our Heavenly er be glorified in our midst.

O. A. PRATT.

ene, N. Y., 10th mo. 1st, 1882.

Selected.

THE GATHERING OF THE CHURCH.

which hath begun a good work in you, will m it until the day of Jesus Christ."—Phil. i. 6.

Wherefore shrink, and say "Tis vain;
In their hour hell-powers must reign;
Vainly, vainly would we force
Fatal error's torrent-course;
Earth is mighty, we are frail,
Faith is gone, and hope must fail."

Yet along the Church's sky
Stars are scattered, pure and high;
Yet her wasted gardens bear
Autumn violets, sweet and rare—
Relies of a spring-time clear,
Earnest of a bright new year.

Israel yet hath thousands seal'd,
Who to Baal never kneel'd;
Seize the banner, spread its fold!
Seize it with no faltering hold!
Spread its foldings high and fair,
Let all see the Cross is there!

What if to the trumpet's sound
Voices few come answering round?
Scarcely a votary swell the burst,
When the anthem peals at first?
God hath sown, and He will reap;
Growth is slow when roots are deep;

He will aid the work begun,
For the love of his dear Son;
He will breathe in their true breath,
Who, serene in prayer and faith,
Would our dying embers fan
Bright as when their glow began.

—Keble.

Selected.

LINES.

of earth! who art journeying to Heaven,
f eternal life,—child of the day!
for, watched over, washed and forgiven,
ou discouraged because of the way?

for, watched over!—tho' often thou seemest forsaken, nor counted a child and forgiven!—tho' rightly thou deemest fall unlovely, impure and defiled, and thirsty, no water-brook near thee,
I provide thee with strength for the day.

thro' the brambles and briars that obstruct thee,
not the gloom and the blackness of night,
in the Hand that will safely conduct thee;
o his eye, to whom darkness is Light!

ful, be steadfast, whatever betide thee,
ne thing do thou ask of the Lord,
to go forward wherever He guide thee,
believing the Truth of his word!

thy spirit deep anguish is pressing,
the yoke that his wisdom bestows,
ier burden thy soul is distressing,
that is slow in his love to repose.

ness, coldness, unthankful behavior,
ou may'at sorrow, but do not despair,
his grief thou may'st bring to thy Saviour,
on Him e'en this burden and care!

ll thy hardness—his power can subdue it;
ll is the promise, the blessing how free!
soever ye ask in my name, I will do it,"
in my love, and be joyful in Me!"

FALLOW.

Selected.

I like these plants that you call weeds—
Sedge, hardhack, mullein, yarrow—
That knit their roots and sift their seeds
Where any grassy wheel-track leads Through country by-ways narrow.

They fringe the rugged hillside farms,
Grown old with cultivation,
With such wild wealth of rustic charms
As bloomed in Nature's matron arms
The first days of creation.

They show how mother-earth loves best
To deck her tired-out places;
By flowery lips, in hours of rest,
Against hard work she will protest
With homely airs and graces.

You plough the arbutus from her hills;
Hew down her mountain laurel:
Their place, as best she can, she fills
With humbler blossoms; so she wills
To close with you her quarrel.

She yielded to your axe, with pain,
Her free, primeval glory:
She brought you crops of golden grain;
You say, "How dull she grows! how plain!"—
The old, mean, selfish story!

Her wildwood soil you may subdue,
'Tortured by hoe and harrow;
But leave her for a year or two,
And see! she stands and laughs at you
With hardhack, mullein, yarrow!

Dear earth, the world is hard to please!
Yet heaven's breath gently passes
Into the life of flowers like these;
And I lie down at blessed ease
Among thy weeds and grasses.

—Lucy Larcom.

Our Desert Guide.

BY EDWARD L. WILSON.

While in the old rock city of Petra, among the sons of Esau, I had some experience which made me regret somewhat that I had not obeyed the injunction given in Deuteronomy ii. 5: "Meddle not with them." I found it an easy thing to slip into their city unawares; but after a four days' sojourn it was not quite so easy to get away from it.

My experiences during the last three hours of my visit there, made it important for me to secure the extra services of a friendly sheik from Gaza as the guide of our party, away from that region. After a final separation from the quarrelsome children of Edom, our Gaza friend Ouida, who had the only horse in the party and the only long spear, rode ahead for as long a distance as would enable him to keep us in sight, and also to keep within our vision, in order that he might apprise us of any danger which should arise on the way. It was his habit to climb up to the tops of the hills in advance of us, to make a survey of the country, and to signal to us if he saw unfriendly Bedawin in the neighborhood. Sometimes he would plant his spear among the rocks on top of a hill, make his horse fast to it, and descend into the valley on foot; at other times, when he found the road too rough for walking, he would plant his spear upon the crest of a hill, where we could see it, and ride until he came to a neighboring hill, perhaps to reconnoitre. In this way we were guided along the proper road, and made to feel comfortable at all times, from the fact that our guide never permitted himself to go entirely out of sight, or, if he did, to leave some signal in view to prove to us that he was still caring for our welfare. Thus we were made confident of our safety, and content to go on, even through a country that we knew was infested by tribes of Bed-awin unfriendly to those who were our attendants from the Akabah country.

These experiences made me think of the promises so frequent in the Bible,—promises which had been learned in early youth, and which now bubbled up like living waters for our comfort and help, such as, "I will instruct thee in the way in which thou shalt go, I will guide thee with mine eye." (Psalm 32: 8.) "Thou shalt go before . . . to give light to them that sit in darkness and in the shadow of death, to guide our feet into the way of peace." (Luke 1: 79.) And so we were "guided" through the unfriendly country even unto the waters of Beersheba and the borders of Eschol, by our trusty sheik, who turned out to be one of the noblest Arabs we had met during our whole travel, and from whom we parted with a good deal of regret.
When we parted with him, and saluted him in friendly Arab style, I could not but thank him for his faithfulness, and refer to the fact that the God whom I loved was the God whom he loved; saying to him in the language of the psalm, with all heartiness: "For this God is our God forever and ever: He will be our guide even unto death." (Psalm 48: 14.) And it was beautiful to see his parting smile, and to hear him say, "I commit you now to God's care, and pray that He may safely guide you through the rest of your journey."—S. S. Times.

For "The Friend."

Religious Items, &c.

E. B. Pusey, the leader in the famous Tractarian movement in the Church of England, known as Puseyism, has recently died. One of his co-laborers in the preparation of the "Tracts for the Times," Dr. Newman, soon joined the Roman Church, and his example was followed by multitudes of others. E. B.
Pusey always remained a member of the Church of England, and in his later years condemned the extravagant practices of the extreme Ritualists, who had gone further than he was prepared to go in the path which he had opened for them.

Brahman Zeal.—The literature issued in India is not all on the side of Christianity.
The old faiths are using the printing-press with great energy, and some success. Based on their old books, fascinating stories of gods and ancient heroes are issued by the million;
as are also translations of popular infidel books. These are peddled at the doors of all the schools, in the hope of holding young India to the old beliefs. In Lucknow and Cawnpore, there are no less than forty-five publishing houses doing this work. One of their publishers received $4,000 from a well-to-do Mohammedan, to assist in printing the Mohammedan books. Another issued a million of Hindoo tracts, at the expense of a Hindoo prince. One hundred and three newspapers, mostly weeklies, are issued to abet Paganism and Mohammedanism, and to attack Christianity. "The native presses," says Joseph Cook, "are exceedingly active. They throw off immense editions of books intended to defend paganism, and of heathen classics notoriously stained by passages of immoral tendency, sometimes of positive indecency.
I went through a Hindoo publishing house at Lucknow, which had just sent an order to London for $25,000 worth of printing paper."—Nat. Baptist.

The Egyptian War.—The British and London Friend for the Tenth month contain several notices, either editorial or from correspondents, respecting the late Egyptian war. Some of these evidence a feeling, that some of the members of the Society of Friends in Great Britain did not bear as full and open a testimony against military operations as consistency required. The London Friend truly says: "For Christians, war is not a necessity. They have no right to reason from a human standpoint when they have their Lord's orders; but as true soldiers of Christ they must be actuated by his Spirit and implicitly follow his directions." It characterizes as "the worship of Mars, not of God," such sermons as one preached in Westminster Abbey, where it was said, "We, as Christian men, thank God to-day because we believe that the feat which our army and navy have achieved is a feat of that strength which is the true glory of a people."

Opium and China.—A recent London telegram says that a rumor was recently in circulation in Hongkong to the effect that an autograph letter, or what may legitimately pass for such in view of the Emperor's youth, will presently be sent in vermilion pencil to Queen Victoria, requesting her personal efforts in the suppression of the opium traffic. No more fitting work could be done by the young Emperor in his first use of the vermilion pencil than to address a foreign sovereign, and in no way could the good Queen of England more brightly illumine the latest pages of her history than by throwing the whole weight of her personal influence in favor of the speedy suppression of an infamous traffic, which is a blot of deepest darkness upon the fair name of the realm over which she rules.—Ch. Adv.

For "The Friend."

Natural History, Science, &c.

Ink-bag of the Cuttle-fish.—The ink-bag is a black, pear-shaped sac, with a gland attached which secretes the ink. The secretion is found to consist of about 60 parts of water, 31 parts of organic matter, and 9 parts of mineral substances. The black pigment is principally an insoluble organic substance.

Food of the Shad.—The Bulletin of the Fish Commission contains an article stating that shad feed and fatten on marine sea-weeds.

Bacterium a parasite of the Chinch Bug.—S. A. Forbes, of the Illinois State Laboratory of Natural History, in experimenting on the Chinch Bug was amazed at the rapid disappearance or death of those which he had brought to the laboratory for observation. On making microscopical examination, he found that fluids of their bodies were swarming with a species of Bacterium, to which their death was attributed. This liability to attack by these minute parasites appears thus to operate as a means of limiting the often disastrous ravages of this bug.

Salt Water in Sulphur Crystals.—Many of the flat crystals of sulphur from Catania, Sicily, contain enclosures of a colorless transparent liquid, in which gaseous bubbles may frequently be seen. The enclosed liquid is found to be a weak saline solution in water.

Retribution.—A coroner's inquest was recently held in London upon the body of a man killed by an elephant. It was shown that eight months before, the man who sold vegetables, had been at an exhibition, when the elephant put her trunk into one of his baskets and ate up the vegetables. Becoming incensed at his loss and the laughter of the bystanders, he pulled out his penknife and cruelly stabbed the elephant in her trunk; the elephant, who was blind, was in general a perfectly quiet animal, but had nourished an enmity to the man in consequence of this injury, and eight months afterwards crushed him to death against a wall.

Combustion without flame.—Chamber's Journal describes some experiments on the combustion of coal gas, tending to prove that where it can be conducted without flame, an increased degree of heat is generated. An ordinary blowpipe gas-flame was directed on a ball of iron wire weighing some three pounds. After a few minutes the flame was blown out, but the gas was allowed to flow as before. The temperature immediately rose, and was steadily maintained till the iron melted like wax. No trace of flame was visible in the gas while it was thus being consumed. The experiments seem to prove that flame is not a sign of perfect but of imperfect combustion.

Phosphorescent Centipede.—"I observed a centipede (Scolopendrum) running along a wet rope. It attracted my attention by the phosphorescent light it threw out and left behind it. I tried to catch the poor little animal, but scarcely had I touched it with a pair of pincers than it threw out a quantity of phosphorus, which besides shining on the rope, fell on the table beneath, illuminating everything with its yellow light."—L. M. D'Alberti's New Guinea.

Well Water.—The water from twenty-four different wells in New Brunswick, N. J., has recently been analyzed by Condict W. Cutler, and the results published in the Scientific American. The report of these results this chemist prefaces by the following remarks which make them more intelligible. He says:

"A well may be considered as a perpendicular drain, and as such we can readily perceive that it becomes a receptacle for all surface-water in its vicinity. One might suppose that a well dug in a sandy soil or clayey soil would be thus subject to impurities, but when constructed through rock or slate it would be entirely free from such contamination. This, however, is not always the case, for although rock may form some protection, still impure waters are often found in wells built entirely through stone.

"Although the soil in which cesspools are dug may be able to retain the sewage for a long time, still the ground gradually becomes saturated, and, acting as a sponge, the impure water is carried for many yards until, perhaps, it strikes a well into which it may drain.

"Persons living on high ground may suppose their wells to be free from such impurities, not knowing that the barn-yard or cesspool may be one of the springs from which their water is obtained.

"Wells constructed in the usual manner are particularly apt to contain bad water—first, from drainage, as I have just illustrated; and secondly, from the decay of animals or reptiles which have fallen in them. The stones lining the wells are so rudely put together that ample room is allowed for toads, snakes, snails, &c., to collect, and hence frequently fall into the water and perish. It is stated by well-diggers that generally they find at the bottom of old wells eight to sixteen inches of mud, containing the decayed debris of these unfortunate creatures. It is therefore of the utmost importance that wells be so constructed that the water may be free as possible from all drainage and contamination caused by the decay of small animals.

"If a water contain over forty grains solid matter to the gallon, it is generally injurious to health. Such an amount is always suspicious, and demands an investigation ascertain if the matter is organic or inorganic.

The Croton water supplied to New York City contains only four and a half grains solid matter to a gallon, and the Ridgewood water, which Brooklyn enjoys, has a trifle less, being about four and one-third grains a gallon. The waters of the Schuylkill and the Cochuatate are still purer, while that of Glasgow, in Scotland, brought from Loch Katrine, is wonderful for its exceeding purity only about two grains of solid matter being found dissolved in a gallon of it. Taking these waters for comparison, the aptness of the comparison of a well to a drain is seen when it is seen that the purest of these waters contained nearly three times as much matter dissolved in its water as does the Croton water. Only three of them contained less than twenty grains to the gallon, and fourteen of them by reason of the animal and vegetable impurities dissolved in them were absolutely bad. One contained two hundred and two grains of solid matter to a gallon, another seventy-nine; another, six six; and so on down. The stillness and darkness of the deep well are the very agents that prevent the self-purification of the water which is constantly going on in all running streams, and which renders such streams valuable as sources of water supply. In the location of a well, the thought that it is to be one of the most efficient of subsoil drains ought never to be lost sight of. This is of the finely-drawn, laboratory-derived fact that practical men cannot afford to ignore."—Chr. Adv.

Bad Effect of Evil Associates.—The Scotch shepherds, who are brought into constant companionship with their dogs, fully believe that the animals can communicate ideas to each other. So certain are they of this that a shepherd is quite as fastidious about his dog's companions as he would be about that of his own children.

It will be readily understood that in great sheep-feeding districts of Scotland there is no dog-gish crime so unpardonable as sheep-killing. As long as a dog can be kept from strange companions there is no great danger as a collie is scarcely able to master the action and powerful sheep of those parts—sheep which by reason of their semi-wild life are able to defend themselves against the attacks of other, and soon assumed so remarkable a manner in their conversation, that the owners consulted together on their own account agreed to set a watch upon their dogs.

very evening both dogs started from homes at the same time, joined each other, and set off after the sheep.

The old offender had invited the young and obedient dog to go with him sheep-worrying, and had even managed to tell him the time when he was to start on his expedition.

A farmer near Leslie had lost a considerable number of sheep, and so he and his shepherd searched carefully throughout the night for the purpose of detecting the dog which had worried the animals. About the middle of the night they saw a troop of seven dogs running at full speed for the field where the sheep were kept. One dog was evidently the ringleader, and there could be no doubt that the others, which belonged to different owners, had pre-arranged their meeting.—J. G. Wood.

Dr. James W. Alexander: "Observe families which have made this passage from ancient strictness to fashionable Christianity, and you will find their children, one by one, sliding away to looser forms of religion, if not to utter carelessness. More than once," continues he, "do I feel that our families must stand in a kind but determined opposition to the fashions of the world, braving the waves, like the Eddystone Lighthouse."

THE FRIEND.

ELEVENTH MONTH 4, 1882.

In another part of our columns will be the conclusion of an article by Charles Westcott entitled "Thoughts about the New Testament and the Falling Babylon."

The concern of the writer, as we understand his meaning, is to call the attention of readers from a dependence on outward forms and ceremonies, an outward profession of religion, and an outward or merely intellectual knowledge of the Holy Scriptures; to direct them to an inward walking in the Light of Christ, by which they may be truly instructed and led in the way of righteousness, and may be enabled to comprehend those spiritual truths set forth in the Holy Scriptures which the "natural man" cannot receive, because they are "spiritually discerned."

This concern is one that is always in season, for there always exists a tendency to substitute form for substance. Even those who have begun in the Spirit, and in the days of their visitation have endeavored to walk in the Light,—in humble and subversive communion with the Spirit of their former inwardly revealed,—are in danger, they come to neglect the holy watch, and finally becoming mere formal professors. How instructive is the language of Isaac Newton: "There was no true religion in the apostles' days, without turning to the inward light, and to that the true ministry is content to turn men; nor is there any true religion now, without being inwardly turned and walking in the same light; nor canst thou try any truth, or understand any Scripture-right, but in the light of God's Spirit. Man cannot understand the things of God, but the Spirit of God. The Scriptures are words, and treat of the things of God, but no man can understand, but in a light of the same nature from which they came; and, when once a man comes to the true understanding, he soon finds that the understanding which he had of the same before, was but after the flesh, even short of the nature of the true understanding."

The same deeply experienced Christian further says: "Nothing makes a true Christian but the life and power: and he that doth not bear the voice of Christ's Spirit in his heart, is no better than a heathen and a publican. Yea, any church built up out of the life and power, (nay, a church, though built by the power, yet, if not preserved in the same,) is not better than a synagogue of Satan." * * "But, God's building, raised in the light and life of his pure Spirit, how glorious, how beautiful, how lovely is it, even in the eye of God himself! 'Thou art all fair, my love, there is no spot in thee.' Sol. Song, iv. 7.—Into thy holy building, O God! into thy heavenly building, into the spiritual Jerusalem, which thou rearest and buildest up in the Spirit, no unclean or defiled thing can enter; nor is there any room there, for that which loves and makes a lie!—Without, indeed, are swine and dogs, vulturous eyes and crooked serpents, who make a show of what they are not, and lay claim to that which belongs not to them; but, within, are the children, within is the heavenly truth, even the new creation of God in Christ Jesus. For, God doth not strip his people naked, and gather them out of the spirit of this world, that they should be empty and desolate forever; but, he gathers them into and fills them with his own Spirit, fills them with light, fills them with life, fills them with holiness, fills them with righteousness, fills them with peace and joy in believing and obeying the Gospel! And, in this Spirit, is the kingdom known, which is not of this world,—the inward kingdom, the spiritual kingdom, the everlasting kingdom!—where the everlasting throne is near, and the everlasting power revealed! and the Lord God Omnipotent reigns in the hearts of his! and other lords do not reign, but their horns are broken—and the horn of God's Anointed exalted, who sits ruling as King on his holy hill of Zion!—and they that have suffered with Him, and gone through great tribulation, do reign with Him; blessed be his name forever!"

We have received from Elizabeth Thompson, of New York City, an Appeal to the American People on the subject of education and temperance. It is accompanied by copies of speeches on these subjects delivered by Henry W. Blair, of New Hampshire, in the United States Congress. One of these was in support of a bill to extend temporary aid to Common Schools, which was prepared in view of the great deficiencies in popular education shown by the statistics of the last census. The other was on a resolution to so amend the Constitution of the United States as to prohibit the manufacture and sale of distilled spirituous liquors within its limits, "except for medicinal, mechanical, chemical and scientific purposes, and for use in the arts." This resolution was introduced into Congress in 1876, and has since been renewed from time to time.

The preparation of these speeches has evidently been at the expense of much labor and thought. They are calm and argumentative in tone, and embody a large amount of testimony and statistics. E. Thompson offers to forward them to all who will apply to her by letter. Her motives are set forth in her Appeal, in which she says: "I am convinced from long observation and earnest endeavor to effect reform, that rum and ignorance are cursing my countrymen and women to their ruin." "You cannot know how great an effort it has cost me to put forth this public appeal, but in the firm belief that my life was intended to be given without reservation to promote the good of my fellow beings, I cannot, I dare not remain silent, if any word of mine can indicate escape from national danger and calamity."

We have received a circular of the "Pennsylvania Retreat for Blind Mutes and Aged and Infirm Blind Persons," incorporated in the Fourth month last, and designed "for completion of the system for the permanent welfare of the blind." There were previously in existence in Philadelphia, "The Pennsylvania Institution for the Instruction of the Blind," where pupils are received and taught; the "Pennsylvania Industrial Home for Blind Women," and the "Working Home for Blind Men," which furnish employment to men and women deprived of their sight. This "Retreat" has been planned to provide a refuge for those of this class whose age and infirmity renders them unable to earn their own subsistence.

The financial agent is H. L. Hall, Superintendent of the "Working Home for Blind Men," No. 3518 Lancaster Avenue. A letter from him, dated 11th of last month, says, "I have some four thousand dollars, and many promises of substantial aid." He is himself blind, but possessed of great energy, and apparently much devoted to the interests of those who are deprived of sight.

In passing through the streets of Philadelphia, and noticing the crowds of people and the preparations made for the Bi-Centennial celebration of the landing of William Penn in this country, we observed on an arch which spanned one of the great thoroughfares, an inscription—"Pennsylvania honors her Quaker ancestry." On the same arch was to be found the motto which governed the actions of the illustrious founder of the Commonwealth,— "Mercy, Justice." This inscription was food for thought. The truest honor that can be paid to a statesman, a philanthropist and a teacher of wisdom, is to follow his instructions, to profit by his wisdom, and to imitate his virtues.

The public interest in William Penn, his history and character has been much stimulated by the occurrence of the celebration. He has been made the theme of a multitude of articles in the newspapers and other periodicals, and of the sermons of many of the preachers of various denominations. Thousands of readers and hearers, we doubt not, have thus learned of the wise choice he made in early life, when he risked the loss of all earthly prospects and property, that he might obtain an eternal inheritance; of the patience and fortitude with which he suffered for conscience sake; and of his labors for the good of others, both temporally and spiritually. Some of our own members have been actively engaged in embracing this opportunity of spreading a knowledge of some of the principles of Friends which he advocated, by the distribution of the "Passages from his Life and Writings" recently prepared. It is greatly to be hoped that some good fruits may grow from these exertions.

The Temperance Association of Friends of Philadelphia have issued an 8 page "Tract for Teachers," intended to give such information as may enable teachers to answer intelligently questions that may be asked them about the nature and effects of intoxicating drinks. It seems to have been judiciously prepared, and contains many historical, chemical and physiological facts.

SUMMARY OF EVENTS.

UNITED STATES.—The whaling schooner R. B. Handy has arrived at San Francisco, from the Arctic Ocean, and reports that the catch of whales by 24 of the 29 vessels of the fleet this season amounts to 83, against a total catch at this date last season of 380.

The Treasury Department has just decided that frogs' legs are not "fresh fish for immediate consumption." It appears that large quantities of frogs' legs are taken in Canada and shipped across the border for consumption in the United States. The treaty of Washington provided that fish should be taken across the line free of duty. The Treasury Department some time ago decided that frogs' legs were not fish, as provided for by this treaty, and the importers of the delicacy then sought to have the frogs' legs admitted free of duty under that line of the Tariff laws which places upon the free list "fresh fish for immediate consumption." Now the Department decides that frogs' legs are no more fish under the Tariff than they were under the Treaty.

A colored woman was killed recently by a meteor which fell near Orange City, Florida.

Four acres of pasture land were sowed with pine cones by Asabel Jewett, of Winchester, N. H., twenty-five years ago, which has resulted in the only cultivated forest in New Hampshire, and contains some 25,000 trees, measuring from eight to twenty inches in diameter.

The Flint Mill, at Fall River, Massachusetts, was destroyed by fire last Seventh-day afternoon, and the loss is estimated at $500,000. The mill and picker house were of granite, the main building being five stories high, 300 feet long by 94 wide. The picker house was three stories high. The structure was erected in 1872, employed 500 hands, had 50,000 spindles, and produced annually 13,000,000 yards of print cloths.

Eighty-seven thousand dollars of silver three cent pieces were recently melted in a single lot at the mint in this city.

The Bi-Centennial Anniversary of the landing of William Penn at Chester (then called Upland), took place in that city on the 23rd ultimo. The next day a representation was given of his landing in Philadelphia, followed by parades on that and the three following days. On Third-day evening the 24th, during a display of fireworks in the Park, an iron mortar exploded and scattered its fragments around, some of them to a great distance. Fifteen persons were struck, two of them killed almost instantly, and six others have since died.

There were 311 deaths in Philadelphia for the week ending Tenth month 28th, as compared with 303 for the previous week and 341 for the corresponding week of last year. Of the whole number, 162 were males and 149 females; 45 died of consumption; 23 of diphtheria, 17 of marasmus; 13 of pneumonia; 10 of croup; 10 of old age, and 8 of typhoid fever.

Markets, &c.—U. S. 3's, 103; 3½'s, 102½; 4's, 113½; 4's, 119½; currency 6's, 130 a 133.

Cotton continues dull, and prices favor buyers. Sales of middlings are reported at 11 a 11½ cts. per pound for uplands and New Orleans.

Petroleum.—Standard white, 7½ cts. for export, and 8½ cts. per gallon for home use.

Flour is quiet, but firm, with sales of 2300 barrels, including Minnesota extras, at $5.75 a $6.50; Penna. extra family at $5; western do. at $5.37½ a $5.90, and patents at $6.03 a $7.60. Rye flour is steady at $4 a $4.37½ per barrel.

Grain.—Wheat is quiet and steady. Sales of 4000 bushels red, in car lots at $1.06 a $1.14. Rye nominal. Corn is in fair request and steady. Sales of 7500 bushels, in car lots at 86½ a 89 cts. Oats are quiet but steady. Sales of 9000 bushels, in car lots, at 39 a 46 cts.

Beef cattle were in demand, and prices were a fraction higher: 3300 head arrived and sold at the different yards at 4½ a 7½ cts. per lb., as to condition.

Sheep were rather dull, but prices were firmer: 13,000 head arrived and sold at the different yards, at 3¼ a 5½ cts., and lambs at 4 a 7½ cts. per pound, as to quality.

Hogs were lower: 4500 head arrived and sold at the different yards at 10½ a 12 cts. per pound, according to quality.

FOREIGN.—Heavy rains have caused floods in the Thames Valley, especially at Oxford, Windsor and Egham. The water continues to rise. The Charing Cross boat pier in London was carried away, but was recovered. The houses adjacent to Thames street are flooded.

A despatch from Dublin to the Pall Mall Gazette says, that 300 people on Tory Island, coast of Donegal, are without food, and that other portions of the population in Western Ireland are threatened with starvation.

Michael Davitt, in his speech at Glasgow, denied that there were splits in the Irish national forces. He said there were differences of opinion between Parnell and himself, but not differences of principles. M. Davitt, speaking at Greenock on the 26th, announced his intention of visiting the Highlands and the Island of Skye, for the purpose of becoming acquainted with the case of the crofters. He denied that anybody connected with the Land League had anything to do with the action of the tenant farmers in the Highlands.

Troops at Fort George, Scotland, have been ordered to hold themselves in readiness to proceed to the Island of Skye, to maintain order during the service of processes upon the crofters.

The Times says a wealthy resident of the Highlands of Scotland has, by telegraph, offered to pay all the arrears of rent of the crofters of the Island of Skye. It is hoped that the necessity of sending military to execute writs will thus be abandoned.

It is believed that the cost of the war in Egypt will amount to nearly four million pounds, exclusive of the expense of the army of occupation and the Indian contingent.

Among the documents belonging to Arabi Pasha in possession of the authorities, is a letter from the Sultan's religious adviser to Arabi, seriously implicating the Sultan in the course Arabi pursued.

The trial of the authors of the riots in Montceau-les-Mines, in France, has been postponed until the next session of the court, owing to numerous attempts to intimidate the jury.

Le Paris publishes the details of the anarchist conspiracy. They show that it is composed of a small number of staunch supporters in all the towns and manufacturing villages of France. The members are mostly young men, who distribute revolutionary papers. Each group has a distinctive name. A letter, which was seized by the authorities, recommends that the groups should pretend to be trades' unions. All the groups in a department form a federation, some having a secret symbol, and these federations are the link between the groups and the Central Committee.

It is reported from Metz that the emigration of individuals and of entire families from Lorraine to France, particularly Paris, is on the increase.

Marshal Serrano, General Dominguez, Senors Ballaquer and Montero Rios, and other prominent members of the Democratic party and dissident Spanish Liberal factions, formally signed a programme agreed upon between the different groups composing the dynastic Left. The programme includes the re-establishment of the Constitution of 1869, with modifications. It was subsequently decided to form a committee for the general direction of the party, and to instruct it to organize sub-committees in the provinces. Marshal Serrano declared that he would endeavor to place the commercial relations of Spain with England on a better footing, without prejudice to Spanish interests. It was thought that the Cortes will meet on 11th month 10th. Marshal Serrano's programme has received the signatures of twenty-one leading politicians, including, however, only two Republicans. The old Republicans have held a meeting, and offered to support Serrano, but refused to accept a monarchical programme.

The result of the elections for the Prussian Diet is, that the Conservatives and Free Conservatives have gained 12 seats, principally at the expense of the National Liberals. The representation of the other parties is the same as it was last session.

The Germania, which sailed last summer for Cumberland Sound with the German Arctic expedition, has returned to Hamburg. The construction of a station at Kingawa has been completed and several houses have been built. Everything is ready for the exploration.

The village of Grindelwald, 35 miles southeast of Berne, has been almost entirely destroyed by a hurricane.

Mount Etna is showing great and increasing activity and is emitting fire and volumes of smoke.

The damage by the late floods in the Southern Ty is estimated at over 1,500,000 florins.

Vienna, 10th mo. 28th.—Floods have again occurred in the Tyrol. Traffic on the Botzen and Meran Railway and on the Botzen, Trent and Lavis road has been suspended. Both lines between Preiss and Brenner impassable. All streams in the Brixen district alarmingly increasing in volume. Bad news comes from various villages, where dikes are giving way. Fears are entertained that a catastrophe more terrible than that which lately visited the Tyrol is impending.

A telegram from Klagenfurt reports incessant rain and disastrous floods in Carinthia. The Drave is rising and there are serious inundations in the valleys of tributaries. The Moell Jail Commissioners, who engaged in inquiring into the damage done by the floods, are imprisoned by the present floods at Küboch.

Vienna, 10th mo. 29th.—A Cabinet Council was held to-day to discuss measures of relief in view of the new floods of the Tyrol. The Governor of the Ty attended the Council. It is believed that the damage will reach 15,000,000 florins.

The small-pox was ravaging all the Atlantic section of the United States of Columbia, at last accounts. The 6th ult. there were 500 cases of the disease in hospital at Bogota.

The rebellion in Ecuador is at an end.

The cable between Callao and Mollendo being repaired, communication by telegraph is now open direct between Valparaiso and points in the United States. The opening of these lines connecting with the Central and South American Telegraph Company's system Lima will be a saving of fifteen hours' time between Valparaiso, the United States and Europe, compared with the old route, via Lisbon.

A report has reached San Francisco that the volcano of Kilauea, in the Hawaiian Islands, is again erupting "on a grander scale than for a quarter of a century."

WESTTOWN BOARDING SCHOOL.

In the notice respecting the opening of the Westtown Term, in the last number of "The Friend," the hour for forwarding packages from 304 Arch street, through inadvertence, stated to be 12 o'clock instead of 10½ o'clock. The paragraph on this subject is therefore now republished as follows:—

DURING THE SESSION, passengers for the School will be met at the Street Road Station, every day except First-days, on the arrival of the first through train for the City, and small packages for the pupils, if left at Friends' Book Store, No. 304 Arch street, will be forwarded every Sixth-day at 10½ o'clock, except on the two Sixth-days in the Twelfth month, and the expense charged in their bills.

FRIENDS' BOARDING SCHOOL, BARNESVILLE, OHIO.

Wanted a Superintendent and Matron to take charge of this Institution at the close of the present winter term. Friends of Ohio Yearly Meeting, who may be drawn to the service, are requested to communicate with Aaron Frame, or Asa Garretson, Barnesville, Montgomery county, Ohio.

FRIENDS' ASYLUM FOR THE INSANE Near Frankford, (Twenty third Ward,) Philadelphia. Physician and Superintendent—JOHN C. HALL, M.D. Applications for the Admission of Patients may be made to the Superintendent, or to any of the Board Managers.

MARRIED, at Friends' Meeting-house, Mansfield, N. J., on the 19th of 10th mo. 1882, JOHN N. HALL of Medford, to REBECCA T., daughter of Hanna and the late Francis Decou.

DIED, on the 5th of 10th mo. 1882, at the residence of his parents, near Germantown, S. MASON BINES of Samuel M., and Taey M. Bines, aged 29 years, member of Germantown Particular and Franklin Monthly Meeting of Friends.

WILLIAM H. PILE, PRINTER,
No. 422 Walnut Street.

THE FRIEND.

A RELIGIOUS AND LITERARY JOURNAL.

OL. LVI.

SEVENTH-DAY, ELEVENTH MONTH 11, 1882.

NO. 14.

PUBLISHED WEEKLY.

If paid in advance, $2.00 per annum; if not paid in advance $2.50; 10 cents extra is charged for Postage on those sent by mail.

Articles designed for insertion to be addressed to

JOSEPH WALTON,
MOORESTOWN, BURLINGTON Co., N. J.

For contributions, payments and business communications, received by

JOHN S. STOKES,
No. 116 NORTH FOURTH STREET, UP STAIRS,
PHILADELPHIA.

For "The Friend."

Ancient Testimonies and Advices.

EDUCATION AND TRAINING OF CHILDREN. As touching the education of Friends' children, for which this meeting has often been a concern; we think it our duty to commend unto you the necessity that there be a care in preserving them in plainness of dress and habit, suitable to our holy profession; and also, that no opportunity be neglected, nor any endeavors wanting, to inculcate in them the principle of Truth which we profess; that thereby they, being sensible of the operation thereof in themselves, may find only their spirits softened and tendered, fit to receive the impression of the Divine image, and may also from thence find themselves under a necessity to appear clear in the severances of our Christian testimony. And we advise that parents and guardians, who have the care and oversight of children, be concerned to be good examples to them. And, especially, to be careful to train them up in the nurture and admonition of the Lord; and be no less concerned to have the sense of God on your own spirits; otherwise you cannot bring them to a sense of Truth on their spirits; and without that, your work will be of small advantage. But if you find a bath hold of their minds, then [bath religiously concerned parent] a help in to work with you against those youthful inclinations to vanity."—1717, 1719.

Dear Friends, we tenderly and earnestly exhort and exhort all parents, and masters of families, that they exert themselves in the knowledge of God, and in the strength of his Word to instruct their children and families in the doctrines and precepts of the Christian religion contained in the Holy Scriptures; that they excite them to the diligent reading of those sacred writings, which plainly set forth the miraculous conception, birth, holy life, wonderful works, blessed example, meritorious death, and glorious resurrection, ascension, and mediation of our Lord and Saviour Jesus Christ; and to educate their children in the belief of those important truths, as is in the belief of the inward manifestation and operation of the Spirit of God on their own minds, that they may reap the full and advantage thereof, for their own present and everlasting happiness, which is infinitely preferable to all other considerations. We therefore exhort, in the most earnest manner, that all be very careful in this respect; a neglect herein being in our judgment very blameworthy. And farther; where any deficiency of this sort appears, we recommend to Monthly and Quarterly Meetings, that they stir up those whom it may concern to their duty therein.

"And as it is evident, that the simplicity, and distinguishing plainness of our holy profession is too much lost among us, respecting language, apparel, and behavior; we therefore earnestly exhort all to keep under the power of the cross of Christ, which will crucify to the world, and the vanities of it, and bring up in a true life of self-denial, agreeable to the gospel, and the example of our Elders."—1732.

"Dear Friends, you who have children under your care or tuition, we beseech you to accustom them early to the reading of the Holy Scriptures, and to train them up in the way of the cross, as soon as they are capable of receiving impressions of good and evil; that parents be careful how they indulge them in any thing that has an evil tendency, endeavoring to restrain them from every hurtful thing which their natural inclinations may lead them to desire after; this, we think, is the indispensable duty of all parents; and we cannot see how they can answer the omission of it in the sight of God. For such neglect too often occasions ill habits, which afterwards are not to be restrained without great difficulty, if at all. It is certain that the preservation of your offspring in the way of true religion and godliness, is of much greater moment to their happiness, both in this life, and in that which is to come, than any thing else you are capable of doing for them; and therefore we renew our advice, that you be diligently exercised in such godly care, waiting upon God for wisdom from Him, first to walk wisely and circumspectly before them yourselves, and then you may, with more weight and authority, in the meekness of that wisdom, instruct, advise, exhort, and rebuke, as you shall see occasion."—1735, 1736.

"It is our concern earnestly to exhort Friends, both men and women, to watch against the growing sin of pride; and to beware of adorning themselves in a manner disagreeable to the plainness and simplicity of the Truth we make profession of. Oh! that they would duly consider that severe reproof, which the Lord, by the mouth of his prophet, pronounced against the haughty daughters of Zion, Isaiah iii., where he describes even the particularities of their dressings and ornaments, so displeasing to the Lord, and drawing down his judgments upon them. If those things in that time were so offensive in the eyes of the Lord, how much more are they so now in a people professing the plainness and simplicity which the gospel of Christ recommends? 'I will,' saith the apostle Paul, 'that women adorn themselves in modest apparel, with shamefacedness and sobriety: not with broidered hair, or pearls, or gold, or costly array; but, which becometh women professing godliness, with good works.' 1 Tim. ii. 9, 10. Where he plainly sheweth that such adornings are contrary to the profession of godliness. The apostle Peter also is very full in his exhortations on this subject: 'Whose adorning,' says he, 'let it not be that outward adorning of plaiting the hair, and of wearing of gold, and of putting on of apparel: but let it be the hidden man of the heart, in that which is not corruptible, even the ornament of a meek and quiet spirit, which is in the sight of God of great price; for after this manner, in the old time, the holy women also, who trusted in God, adorned themselves.' 1 Pet. iii. 3, 4, 5. Plainly intimating, that those, who of old were holy, and did trust in God, placed not their delight in such ornaments. Oh! that you would weigh and consider these things! 'Let your moderation be known unto all men; and grieve not the Holy Spirit of God, but be ye followers of Him, as dear children; walking circumspectly; not as fools, but as wise; redeeming the time, because the days are evil.'—1739.

"Dear Friends, we also recommend to school-masters and mistresses, to educate the children committed to their charge in the frequent reading of the Holy Scriptures, and such other good books as tend to their instruction in true Christianity; and to discourage their reading any books of a contrary tendency, whereby their minds are in danger to be corrupted, and led aside from the way of truth and holiness. And we do with earnestness recommend to all such parents as have experienced the gracious dealings of the Lord with their own souls, to take all proper opportunities of instilling into the minds of their children just sentiments respecting the vanity and emptiness of fading and transitory enjoyments, and to direct them to seek after that solid peace and serenity of mind which attends the sincere practice of true religion and virtue, and which only can afford any durable and solid satisfaction. Such a godly care in parents is agreeable to the command of God, by his servant Moses to the people of Israel, Dent. xi. 18. 'Ye shall lay up these my words in your heart, and in your soul, and bind them for a sign upon your hand, that they may be as frontlets between your eyes. And ye shall teach them your children, speaking of them when thou sittest in thy house, and when thou walkest by the way; when thou liest down, and when thou risest up.'—1745.

"We again tenderly remind of that Christian simplicity and self-denial which our ancient Friends were in the practice of. Their plainness of speech and apparel was remarkable; and the scorn and derision they patiently underwent on those accounts, did demonstrate that their practice therein proceeded not from an affectation of singularity, but was purely conscientious. But, alas! how are many degenerated in these respects! and, by a mean compliance with the customs and fashions of this present evil world, under the mistaken notion of rendering themselves agreeable to others, are indeed become contemptible even in the eyes of those they seek to please; the more thinking part of whom have observed, that a departure from the primitive plainness of our predecessors frequently opens a door to the practice of such pleasures, follies, and corruptions of the times as they were redeemed from, and conscientiously forsook; it being a just remark, that a revolting from the form of godliness is often attended with the loss of the power of it."—1747.—From The London Epistles.

For "The Friend."

Three Months by the Sea Side.

For the last three months I have been a resident of Southern California. I am stopping in Santa Monica, a small town on a bay of the same name. Seven years ago there was thought to be a good landing here. A wharf was built and a large village predicted; streets were laid out systematically running parallel with the ocean. Eucalyptus and pepper trees were alternately planted along each street; and cheap buildings were being put up rapidly, but from some cause the wharf was abandoned, and the enterprise soon came almost to a standstill. But notwithstanding this the delightful climate could not be disputed, and thousands of people stop here during the summer months for recreation. Having no fear of rain, after the hotels are filled, tents are stretched in every direction. So that rich and poor, high and low, can all be accommodated and have the health-giving influence of pure air, sea-bathing, &c. The scenery on land is hardly equal in grandeur to that described at Monterey Bay by J. Bell. From the north-east to the south-west we have first the plains, then a range of mountains beginning with the foot hills, and gradually rising to quite an eminence; but thought to be much more beautiful during the winter season. The Pacific ocean is said to be inferior in beauty to the Atlantic, but to us, unaccustomed to ocean life, there is an attraction about it of which we do not tire.

It is seldom too warm or too cold here for comfort, and it is almost amusing to hear the sarcastic tones in which some persons speak of the sweltering heat of the East. But by others the comparisons are not favorable to the West. One woman said to me, "I have not taken a drink of water for eight years. After drinking from the crystal streams of New York, I cannot drink such water as we find here." The scarcity of water, or rather the expense of getting it, is a great drawback. The soil is almost inexhaustible in its productions when well irrigated. Both fruit and vegetables are raised in great quantities, and generally of very good quality. Besides those common to our northern climate, different kinds of tropical fruit are produced in abundance. Geraniums and other choice plants, cultivated with so much care in our eastern homes, grow luxuriantly in the yards here. The city of Los Angeles is sixteen miles east of us. It being one of the oldest towns in the State, and first settled by the Spaniards, its adobe houses, irregularity of its streets, &c., must be very noticeable to a person accustomed to a well regulated city. But it now contains many fine buildings, and the business part is much the same as in other large towns. In it are represented almost every state and nation; therefore the manners and customs of some of the inhabitants are very strange. By many there is no attention paid to the First-day of the week more than as a day of leisure, to hunt, fish, or take a stroll. Excursions come in on that day more than any other. Another thing greatly to be deplored is the small value placed on human life. Fighting in self-defence seems to be thought praiseworthy rather than disgraceful. The thought of children being brought up under that influence, has been deeply painful to me. Surely the Divine command, "Thou shalt not kill," should not be set at naught by man. S.

10th mo. 1882.

For "The Friend."

An Incident in the Life of Mahlon L. Lovett.

The father and mother of Mahlon L. Lovett, were prominent and zealous supporters of the principles set forth by E. Hicks, and in common with many of their contemporaries in Bucks county, separated from the Society of Friends in the year 1827. They were earnest and unwavering in the cause they had espoused; and when their son Mahlon turned away from the fold to which he had been gathered in childhood, and withdrew his support to some of their most objectionable, but cherished religious principles, it was a sore trial to them; and he felt himself unwelcome in their company, and an alien from his father's house. Surrounded with these embarrassments and deep provings, he felt his situation keenly; but under the precious and powerful influence of a loving Saviour, who had revealed Himself in an extraordinary manner, and had plucked him as a brand from the burning, he reasoned not with flesh and blood; but bowing in deep humility and prostration of soul at the sacred footstool, and passing through the baptism of the Holy Ghost and fire, he became established upon the immutable foundation, Christ Jesus, and having put his hand to the plough he looked not back.

On the 18th of the Twelfth month, 1842, Mahlon L. Lovett writes: "Attended meeting this day with my spirit bowed down under the weight of a great exercise, and remained for some time without being able to see what my dear Lord and Master required at my hands, but not without partaking of the crumbs from his table; it finally pleased Him to open my eyes that I might see, and my ears that I might hear; and oh! I heard it plainly pronounced in my soul, 'Thou shalt go to thy father's house this day.' Although it proved a great trial to my faith, I became resigned to his heavenly will, and covenanted with my Divine Master that I would, with his aid, perform whatever He required of me; but when I queried what can it be for? these words were very intelligibly uttered in my soul, 'Have I not always been with thee when I have required aught of thee, then go and ask no questions,—it shall be shown thee in due time.' It brought to my mind a dream I had last night; I dreamed that I was on my father's farm, and looked into the adjoining field, I there saw green grass bearing a similitude to oats, which I went into, but could scarcely get through from its height and thickness, and I looked back at some persons who seemed to show by signs my inability but I finally got through, and thought after I had broken down the grass barrier which seemed to be all round the field, I over the remainder (which was small) was in great ease. This foreshadowing was afterwards in great measure realized, and I forth fresh gratitude and praise to the Lord from me this day. Although many doubt seemed to weaken me, yet I have been more fully favored to witness the breaking through of a great barrier of ridicule, and was enabled as it were to run over the field. I obeyed my Divine Master and went in great fear to my father's house, which visit resulted correspondingly with my dream."

With this extraordinary visit to his father and mother, the natural affection of his father appears to have been re-established, their respect and kindness was continued through the remainder of their lives.

African Trading.—The system adopted for trading or bartering with the natives on the coast, comprehended between the River Coast and Ambriz, is somewhat complicated and curious. All produce (except ivory) on being brought to the trader, is put on the scale, and the price is agreed, in "longs" in English, or "peças" in Portuguese. This "peça" or "long" is the unit of exchange to which all the multifarious articles of barter are referred: for instance, six yards of the ordinary kinds of cotton cloth, such as stripes, bleached calico, blue prints, cotton chequers are equal to a "long;" a yard and a half of red or blue baize, five bottles of rum, brass rods, one cotton umbrella, 3000 glass beads, three, six, eight, or twelve cow handkerchiefs, according to size and quality are also severally equal to a "long;" articles of greater value, such as kegs of powder, guns, swords, knives, &c., are two or more "longs" each.

As each bag of coffee (or other produce) is weighed and settled for, the buyer writes down the number of "longs" that has been agreed upon on a small piece of paper called by the natives a "Mucanda," or, by those who speak English a "book;" the buyer continues his weighing and purchasing, and the "books" are taken by the natives to the store, which is fitted up like a shop, with shelves on which are ranged at hand the many different kinds of cloth, &c., employed in barter. The natives cannot be trusted in the shop, which contains only the white man and his "Mafuca," a head man, so the noisy, wrangling natives are paid from it through a small window. I will suppose, for instance, that a "book" presented at the window, on which is marked twenty "longs" as the payment of a bag of coffee; the trader takes—

A gun—value	4	long
One keg powder	2	"
One piece of 18 yards stripes	3	"
One of 18 yards grey calico	3	"
One of 18 yards checks	3	"
Eight handkerchiefs	1	"
Five bottles of rum	1	"
One table-knife	1	"
Three thousand beads	1	"
Five brass rods	1	"

Total: 20 long

This is now passed out, the trader making such alterations in the payment as the natives re within certain limits, exchanging, for instance, the handkerchiefs for red baize, or piece of calico for a sword, but there is understanding that the payment is to be certain selection, from which only small amounts can be made. If such were not the case the payment of 100 or more "books" in short time would be impossible. It is no means an easy task to trade quickly and successfully with the natives; long practice and great patience and good temper are necessary. A good trader, who is used to business, can pay the same "book" for a great deal less value than one unaccustomed to the work, and the natives will often refuse to trade with a new man or one not used to these ways and long known to them.

It is rather startling to a stranger to see and hear a couple of hundred blacks all shouting at the top of their voices to be paid first, quarrelling and fighting over their payment, or pretending to be dissatisfied with it, that they have been wrongly paid.—Monrovia, Angola.

For "The Friend."

"I Restore Him Four-fold."

Our Saviour was passing through Jericho, and an named Zaccheus sought to see Him, could not because of the multitude and for himself little of stature; he therefore went ahead and climbed up a sycamore tree. When Jesus came along He looked up and said to him, Zaccheus, make haste and come down: for to-day I must abide at thy house. He made haste and came down, and received our Saviour joyfully. But the people murmured, saying, that he was gone to be a guest with a man that was a sinner; to which Zaccheus replied, Behold, Lord, the half of my goods I give to the poor; and if I have taken anything from any man by false accusation, I will restore him four-fold. And Jesus said unto him, this day is salvation come to this house. I will restore him four-fold!" O that the hearts of the penitent Zaccheus might pervade the hearts of every professed lover of the Lord to-day! For how can we find acceptance with the Lord, and partake of his great mercy, if we have not charity for the poor, needy, and refuse to make proper restitution, even to four-fold, if needs be, to those whom we have wronged? If we repent of our sins and endeavor to make all wrongs right, we will be in the way to have our hearts purified in the sight of the Lord, from which no secret thought or action can be hid. St. James: Pure religion and undefiled before God and the Father is this: to visit the fatherless and widows in their affliction, and keep ourselves unspotted from the world. There are multitudes who manifest some degree of anxiety to behold their Lord, and struggle on for long and weary years under their load of sin. The Saviour does come to their relief, saying to them as He said to Zaccheus, "this day is salvation come to thy house." The secret is they are not humbly and penitently humbled in spirit, and through their mission to Divine Grace made willing to the cross of Christ, which would lead to confess and forsake their sins and to make restitution to those they may have wronged. While Zaccheus was willing to restore four-fold, and was accepted, some who are not willing to restore even one-fold, are consequently rejected by the Lord, and look upon sin and iniquity with no degree of allowance. Perhaps they have failed (rich,) placing their property in the hands of another, or have belonged to certain "combinations," which have enabled them to procure more of the public funds than their services warranted; or have amassed their wealth by defrauding their neighbors, or taking advantage of their ignorance or necessities; and still continue in these things. How can such an one say that he has a conscience void of offence toward God and man; that he is a new creature in Christ Jesus; old things having passed away and all things become new! Be not deceived, God is not mocked; whatsoever a man soweth that shall he also reap.

Some there are, however, with strong and resolute will, in their own strength, with hearts all untamed by grace, who dare take a bold stand in the regions of self-glorification; whose words are only as sounding brass and tinkling cymbals. Such testimonies or exhortations, however, are not likely to convert sinners from the error of their ways, or increase their confidence in the power of salvation.

What a ground-work for a true revival of religion would be laid, if each of the professed children of God throughout our land so dwelt under the influence of Divine love, as to know it to flow out, one toward another. Then would sinners flock to the fold of Christ, and skepticism as chaff be scattered to the four winds!

How is it with thee, dear friend? thou who art a representative of a Christian sect, foremost in the ranks of truth and uprightness. As thou hast set high thy standard, so labor manfully to support and defend it. Woe to thee, if through thy unfaithfulness it shall fall to earth. The higher the standard the greater the fall, if it does fall. So the greater the light the greater will be our darkness and condemnation if we fall away. If the light within us become darkness, how great will be that darkness. Let us walk in the light while we have the light.

He who covereth his sins shall not prosper, but he who confesseth and forsaketh his sins shall find mercy. Do we desire the Saviour for our guest: to have Him come in and sup with us? Would we have his salvation enter our hearts and homes? Let us then seek Him earnestly, day by day, confess our sins, show acts of charity, restore to those we may have wronged, exhibit a meek and penitent spirit, and Zaccheus' Saviour will be our Saviour, our abiding guest while here on earth, till we are called home at last to inherit one of the many mansions He hath gone to prepare for us, there to become his welcome guests forevermore.

O. A. PRATT.

Greene, N. Y., 10th mo. 16th, 1882.

Humility and contrition of spirit seem the only safe dwelling place whilst we are clothed with these poor corruptible bodies; and we shall find that there is great need of patience unto the end of our Christian pilgrimage.—Mary Capper.

The belief that General Warren died of a broken heart is strengthened by constant repetition from many quarters. He is said to have exclaimed not long before his death: "Bury me in citizen's clothes; I have had enough of the trappings of war."

For "The Friend."

Westtown Boarding School.

The report made to the Yearly Meeting in 1846, informs that "It is cause of thankfulness to be able to state that the labor and care which have been bestowed to promote among the scholars greater simplicity in dress and language, have been attended with favorable results; and it is believed that the plain scripture language is now generally spoken, and apparel becoming the children of Friends, generally worn at the school. Notwithstanding the gratifying improvement in these respects, we are sensible there is still ground for continued vigilant care in the maintenance of these testimonies, and we trust that parents who may send their children to the institution, will co-operate with the committee therein. The girls' collecting-room has been rendered more commodious by throwing into it two small rooms on the north side of it; and having been furnished with new and larger desks, and seats with backs to them, it is believed the comfort of the children has been increased. The main building requiring a new roof, and it being apprehended that the boys' chambers might be rendered more pleasant and healthful by raising the building a few feet so as to elevate the ceiling and give the opportunity for more complete ventilation, arrangements are in progress for carrying this plan into effect.

For several years inconvenience has been experienced from the unfavorable location of the nurseries, and the difficulty of giving them that full and free ventilation which is desirable for sick rooms. The attention of the committee has been frequently turned to the subject, but without being able to effect the desired change, except at a cost which the limited funds of the institution would hardly justify. Recently, however, it has been concluded to erect two buildings for nurseries—one on the east and one on the west of the girls' and boys' galleries and connecting therewith. They are each to be 20 by 32 feet, two stories high, with two rooms on a floor and a basement story for washing rooms or other desirable purposes; and are to be put up without expense to the school, except the furnishing of the basement stories, the fuel for burning the bricks, and such of the timber used in the buildings as can be procured from the farm."*

4th mo. 9th, 1847.—The committee (Enoch Lewis and Thomas Evans) appointed to apply to the Legislature of Pennsylvania for the exemption from taxation of the property under care of this committee, reported "That they gave prompt attention to the subject and succeeded in obtaining the passage of a bill, which was now read, exempting from taxation 100 acres of the farm at Westtown, together with the school and other buildings therewith connected." The certificated copy of the bill was directed to be deposited with the treasurer.

12th mo. 10th, 1847.—"The sub-committee to whom was referred the resignation of our friends Pennock and Sarah Passmore, produced an application from Jos. and Hannah Snowden to succeed them in the Superintendence of the Boarding School, which, on

* It is understood that the buildings here referred to, and which continue to be very useful adjuncts, were erected at the expense of our late valued friend, Samuel Beutle, Sen., who served on the Westtown Committee with four generations of Friends.

consideration, was acceptable to the committee, and they were accordingly appointed. Nathan Sharpless, Samuel Bettle, Hannah Williams and Hannah Rhoads were requested to inform them of this conclusion and introduce them into the school."

From the report of 1848: "The nurseries, which were finished and occupied soon after our last report, are found to answer well; the comfort and quiet of the sick being much promoted; and they are a valuable addition to the accommodations. Larger and more commodious porticoes have been erected without cost to the institution, at the south and east entrances to the main building, and other improvements are contemplated, to be paid for in a like manner.

"The recent examination of the school has afresh impressed our minds with its value and importance as a means of affording a guarded education to the children of Friends. We believe the Divine blessing has rested on the concern of the Yearly Meeting for its establishment and right maintainance; and that as there is a united engagement on the part of those employed in its management, to conduct it in the fear of the Lord and in strict conformity with our Christian principles and testimonies, watching against innovation even in what may be termed little things; we may humbly trust that He, whose heritage children are declared to be, will still regard the institution with favor; and that it will be made a means of religious as well as literary improvement to many of the rising generation."

At a stated meeting, 6th mo. 9th, 1848,—Present 19 men and 16 women Friends, and Jos. Scattergood, appointed at our late Yearly Meeting.

"Joseph Scattergood being proposed as Treasurer of this Committee in place of Jos. Snowden, now Superintendent, the nomination was approved and he appointed accordingly, the former treasurer is directed to place in his hands the money and papers connected with that office. Samuel B. Morris and Henry Cope being appointed to examine the accounts of Jos. Snowden and report them to a future meeting."

At an adjourned meeting held 10th mo. 11th, 1849: "The committee to whom the state of the buildings on the Westtown School farm was referred, report, 'That having several times met and consulted with an experienced mechanic, we have agreed to propose the erection of a farm house upon the plan herewith submitted. The house to be built of stone procured on the premises, and finished in a plain and substantial manner. From proposals made to the committee by several mechanics, the cost of its erection will be within the sum first estimated, which was $6,500; all the material to be furnished by the contractor. In ease the white oak joists for the first floor, rafters, scaffold-poles and boards, and all the lath, are supplied from the farm, there will be a deduction of $411. It is proposed that the new building be placed on the north side of the present farm house and as near to it as convenient. The committee are of the opinion that it would be an advantage to defer the building of a barn another year, as there will be some materials left on hand after the completion of the house which may be profitably used about the barn. Size of the main building 40 x 48 feet, kitchen 24 x 35 feet.

N. Sharpless, I. M. Kaighn, committee."

For "The Friend."

On the Proper Employment of Time on First-day afternoons.

Upon reading over lately some of the minutes of the Monthly Meeting of Friends of Philadelphia, the following advice issued in 1759 by the Quarterly Meeting held in Philadelphia was found, which appears to me to be well worthy of revival at the present day.

G. J. S.

From our Quarterly Meeting at Philadelphia the 7th of 5th mo. 1759.

"On reading the answers to the Queries much seasonable advice was given, and an earnest concern attending this meeting that our Christian discipline may be more strictly maintained; it is much desired that Friends in the several meetings may excite their members to a more close attention and care in the education of their children, and those under their direction, and particularly to restrain them from associating together for amusement or diversion on the First-day of the week in the afternoon, as it is much feared the good impressions made on their attending the meetings of worship in the morning, are too frequently lost or diminished by unprofitable conversation and unguarded behavior; to prevent which it is recommended to parents and heads of families to call their families together and spend the afternoon either in humble waiting on Almighty God, or in reading the Holy Scriptures, the writings of our ancient Friends or other edifying books."

FRINGED GENTIANS.

BY CLARA DOTY BATES.

So long had the October skies
Worn frown of cloud and rain,
It seemed as though my tired eyes
Would never see again
What they so loved—the tender hue
Of heaven's own blue.

I watched in vain for brightening streaks
As dawned or died the day;
But still the distant mountain peaks
Wore cowls of misty gray;
Nor gleamed one shining hand-breadth through
Of heaven's own blue.

I sought a lonely country road,
With bare fields at each side,
Where late the golden rod had glowed
In all its plummy pride.
Lo, something at the wayside grew
Of heaven's own blue.

Fringed gentians—each one bearing up
Atop its humble stem,
As with an arm aloft, a cup;
I paused to look at them—
As deep a tint they wore, as true
As heaven's own blue.

I had so missed the sky's dear face,
Its color and its light;
Yet here in this deserted place
Was something just as bright—
The bluest thing I ever knew Except heaven's blue.

Thus, often when the joys of earth
Are dimmed or disappear,
Lo, humbly in the wayside dearth
We find some other cheer—
Some lowly flower that wears the hue
Of heaven's own blue.

"Oh ask not then, how I shall bear
The burden of to-morrow?
Sufficient for the day its care,
Its evil and its sorrow,
Thy God imparteth by the way
Strength that's sufficient for the day."

Select

GOD OMNIPRESENT.

Lo, God is here! From clouds above
And from the crags on which they rest;
From placid evening's robes of love,
Outspreading in the crimson west;
And from the river, o'er whose banks
Mysterious shapes of dew appear;
From elms which stand in stately ranks,
One sound is swelling: "God is here!"

I hear it in the insect's wing;
I hear it in the thunder pealing;
I hear it where the wild birds sing;
I hear it where the breeze is stealing.
From pathless forests, thick with shade,
And from the corn-fields rustling near,
From every tree, in every glade,
The voice is uttered: "God is here!"

Whilst evening hangs her lamps above,
And dewy fragrance floats around,
That voice still speaks in tones of love,
And every spot seems holy ground,
'Tis written on the moon's pale face,
Reclining in her lucid sphere,
And countless stars the inscription trace
In fiery letters: "God is here!"

When midnight bathes the world in sleep,
Soothes weary hearts, and shuts the rose,
The voice is heard in accents deep,
'Midst intervals of calm repose;
While round the casement's lattice pane
The leaves and tendrils shake for fear,
The awful words resound again
Amid the darkness: "God is here!"

Here, when the heart with joy runs o'er;
And fancy her wild pastime taking;
Here, when the world delights no more,
And the bowed heart with grief is breaking
Here, when amidst the circle gay,
Of friends long tried, beloved, sincere;
Here, in the solitary way,
God never leaves us: "God is here!"

O Christian! let thy faith arise
In every time, in every place!
The Maker of the earth and skies
Is strengthening thee to run the race.
Bid tears depart; subdue thy grief;
Hushed be the sighs, and wiped the tear;
Thy God is nigh to give relief,
And speaks in mercy: "I am here!"

Friends in the South of France.

AN OLD MANUSCRIPT.

Alençon, Second month 18th, 178

Dear Friend,—I find myself engaged with a pleasing satisfaction to write to thee and communicate to thee and Friends in England the first events of our affairs in France. 1 years during the life of our respectable mother, the Count de Vergennes, whose loss much regret, we were informed by the report that the Assembly of the Notables were employed about the means of bestowing on the Protestants of this kingdom a rank and station. As till then we had lived in a manner unknown to the king and ministers, we felt ourselves engaged to them a faithful representation, in order to form them of our existence as a people, to solicit for ourselves the same privileges were about to be granted to other Protestant subjects. In consequence thereof I was commissioned to write the following letter to Count de Vergennes:—

"The Friends of the Christian Society called by the scornful name of Quakers, to Count de Vergennes, Minister of the king of France.

"As the simplicity of our principles do not permit us to address thee with praise and compliments, we have with joy given thee to the Almighty that He has been please

ed to the distressed a Protector, and to employ the abilities and power He has entrusted thee with, to contribute to the relief of the sufferings of mankind, and to cause the fire of peace to be established in the world. We have learned with peace and satisfaction that the Sovereign intends to grant a civil rank to the Protestants of this kingdom, and to give them in all the privileges of subjects and citizens; but as hitherto our peaceable principles have kept us at a distance from the monarch, and we therefore are probably unknown to the monarch, we have found it our conscientious duty to inform thee that there are in the Southern Provinces of France, many hundreds of dutiful subjects who, though they are neither Roman Catholics nor Protestants, worship God in those temples that Jesus the Apostles did, viz., in the inward of their souls, and pursue in reverent silence the doctrine of Christ only, without any mixture of human innovations.

On this memorable occasion we have thought it our duty to address our humble petitions to thee, requesting thee to communicate them to the General Assembly of the Notables that are appointed to present to the King the humble petition of his afflicted subjects.

We hope that the Spirit of Truth, that dwells in the heart of all that attend to its voice, will manifest the innocence of our principles to the Notables whom the King has appointed to be the dispensers of justice, and in whom he has deposited his confidence. All the inhabitants of this kingdom are equally the children of the Father, and since we love and respect him as our father and protector, we humbly entreat his beneficence, and that of his ministers, may be extended to us and to all the inhabitants of this kingdom who are not Roman Catholics.

We are, with respectful affection,

"Thy assured Friends."

The Count de Vergennes answered that he would make a proper use of my observations, and desired me to give him a memorial of our opinions and civil principles, which I did, and he seemed satisfied with it.

The Protestants, being alarmed at the course we had taken, strongly solicited that they themselves alone might be included in the privilege of toleration; but, notwithstanding their efforts against us, to which we made no reply, we have partaken of the king's beneficence, and obtained the same right and advantage as they; and not for us but for all in the world that maintain good order and peace.

Accordingly in the Eleventh month of last year the king gave an Edict, by which all, without distinction, who do not profess the Roman Catholic religion are accounted as citizens and subjects of the state; their marriages, baptisms, and burials acknowledged to be legal, provided a declaration of assent be made to the magistrate. Decent privileges of burial are granted to us, and we are admitted in all the rights of property, possessions, and inheritance, the same as the Catholic subjects.

In the short memorial I gave to the Count de Vergennes, I informed him that we do not own any other baptism than that of the Spirit and divine fire which regenerates the soul from the defilements of the flesh, and saves us by the resurrection of Christ (Peter, chap. iii.), the same Edict provides that where a child is born belonging to a sect that does not believe in the necessity of water baptism, the father or mother shall declare the birth to a magistrate.

Such wise laws give us a prospect of peace, and of being more free from storms in future, and we are in hopes that our silent worship can alarm nobody, and that we shall not be hindered from meeting quietly together in our houses for the purpose of worshipping the Almighty as we have done.

I intended sending thee a copy of my memorial to the Assembly of the Notables, as also a copy at large of the king's edict in our behalf, but I decline it on supposition that the Edict is already known in your country. Our Friends in the South remain much in the same situation, except that the favors we have received have made us more inward and humble. They are all very sensible, as well as myself, of the tender regard which our friends in England and America entertain for our little flock, which I expect to visit again next summer if it please the Lord.—From London Friend.

A Parable.—I held in my hand a little dry tree, an infant hemlock. Had it lived a century it might have towered up above all the forest, and held up its head in majesty. But it grew on a sort of bog, and a muskrat, digging his hole under it, bit off its roots, and it was dead. It was full of limbs and knots and gnarls, and I felt curious to know how it happened that it was so.

"Poor fellow! If you had all these limbs and knots to support I don't wonder you died."

"And with my roots, which were my mouths with which we feed, all cut off too!"

"Yes, but where did all these ugly limbs come from?" said I.

"Just where all ugly things come from," said he. "I am pretty much like you men. Find out where my limbs come from, and you will find where all human sins come from."

"I will take you at your word."

So I took out my knife and peeled off all the bark. But the limbs and the knots were left.

"You must go deeper than that."

So I began to split and take off layer of wood after layer. But all the knots were there.

"Deeper still," said the dry stick.

Then I split it all off, and separating it the heart was laid bare; it looked like a small rod about six feet long, and perhaps an inch through at the large end. Ah! and I was now surprised to see that every limb and knot started in the heart. The germ, or the starting-point, of each one was the centre of the heart.—Selected.

Rest and be Thankful.—It is said that in the Highlands of Scotland there is a mountain up which there winds a footpath; but the ascent is so long and difficult that many a strong man finds himself short of breath and failing in strength before reaching the top. When once there, however, he finds a seat cut in the rock, and over it the inscription, "Rest and be thankful;" and this no doubt many a pedestrian has done.

Christians in this world are like the Scotch mountain climber. They often find the path through life rugged and steep. Temptations and trials press upon them, and they feel weary. But if they faint not they shall soon reach the end of the way. The summit of the holy hill of Zion will be attained; and to each one will the Redeemer say: "Rest and be thankful." How sweet the assurance,—"There remaineth, therefore, a rest to the people of God."—Heb. iv. 9.—Messiah's Herald.

For "The Friend."

Religious Items, &c.

The Christian use of the Ballot.—Under this heading, The Christian Advocate endeavors to impress on its readers the duty of voting only for men fearing God and hating covetousness. It says that he injures both himself and society, who gives power to evil men, who are sure in some way to establish injustice. "The casting of a ballot is placed under that comprehensive law—'Whatsoever ye do, do it to the glory of God.' This wide reaching 'whatsoever' must cover the solemn act of voting, which, if not done with a purpose to 'glorify God,' must be accounted for in the day of retribution. And when a voter is confronted with the ballots he cast for men known to be false, covetous, unscrupulous, tricky, incompetent, and self-seeking, what excuse will he have to offer to the righteous Judge? What defence can he make when shown the evils which resulted from the legislation of the men whose names, perhaps for party's sake, he placed on his ballot?"

"If every Christian citizen in this great country were known to be unalterably resolved never to cast a ballot for any but men repented to be of the pattern portrayed by the sage Jethro—'able men, such as fear God, men of truth, hating covetousness'—what a wondrous political reformation would soon be wrought."

The Mennonite Emigrants in Turkestan and Bokhara.—These emigrants from Russia settled in Bokhara near the boundary of Russian Turkestan. The Emir of Bokhara ordered them to move, and caused their sod houses to be torn down, and then and their goods to be carried across the line. At the last accounts they were still there, but unsettled and not knowing what would open as the best course for them to pursue.

The Bishops and the War!—The progress and termination of the war with Egypt have elicited a series of utterances and thanksgivings from the Archbishops and the Bishops. Great has been their manifest admiration of the feats of valor performed by the British army in conquering the Egyptian troops and peasantry under Arabi. * * But one would hardly gather from the recent episcopal utterances that the speakers believe that Christ ever gave his life for Egyptians, or for any members of the human family except Englishmen, or that the souls of other peoples and nations are similarly precious in his sight. * * If there be any measure of the Divine Presence in the hearts of universal humanity, how fearful a crime is war which outrages that image itself with bayonet and shell.—[London] Herald of Peace.

For "The Friend."

Natural History, Science, &c.

Idol of Delaware Indians.—C. C. Abbott describes in the American Naturalist a stone rudely carved into the resemblance of a human head, which is supposed to have been an object of religious veneration among the Indian inhabitants of New Jersey, where it was found. It is about five and one-half inches high, and more than four inches broad. These measurements are almost identical with those of similar specimens found in Ohio and Western New York.

It was found in clearing a piece of ground for a dwelling house. The spot was covered with scrub pines, with an undergrowth of huckleberry bushes. The subsoil was a homogeneous yellow ferruginous sand; and the workman was impressed by the fact that his spade had struck a stone a few inches below the surface, as the spot was so destitute of stone that the presence of one was remarkable. In endeavoring to pry it out, the head was broken off from its base.

It is cut from an indurated clay-stone, and was probably a nodule from the clay cliffs on the shore of Raritan bay, near Keyport, N. J.

Botany.—Prof. Gray has been examining the species of Aster and Solidago contained in the great herbaria of Europe, and has published the result of his researches into those difficult genera in "Contributions to North American Botany."

Minute Crustacea.—These minute animals feed on vegetable matter and are among the most efficient agents in purifying the waters of stagnant pools. The numbers in which they exist in such pools is often quite surprising. In a quart of water taken from a pond near Minneapolis, there were counted 1829 individuals all of sufficient size to be visible to the unassisted eye.

Curious Parasite.—In the natural history collections made by the Italian frigate Magenta during a voyage round the world, were a large number of Puffins taken in the South Atlantic and Indian Oceans. In all of these the abdominal feathers were infested with a parasite belonging to the Barnacle family. As these birds spend most of their time in the air, only resting on the water at long intervals, it was a matter of wonder to find upon them animals usually found submerged in the ocean.

Indian Reed.—The Arundo, or Indian reed, is remarkable for the very leafy stems and the large brown or purplish panicle of flowers which tower above the surrounding plants, giving it a very tropical appearance. At the time when the bow and arrow were the principal implements of warfare, the Arundo Donax was used almost exclusively for arrows, combining as it did great strength with the necessary lightness. It is frequently figured on monuments of Nubia and Egypt, and Pliny speaks of the superiority of the reeds grown in Italy.

It is said to be a native of Spain and the French provinces, but it is also reported to have been found in Siberia, in Persia and even in Central Africa. Like the other useful grasses, although used for a very different purpose from the others, it is probable that the cultivation of this species for warlike purposes has dispersed this plant far beyond its original limits at a period so early as to make it impossible to determine its native country. —Public Ledger.

Impure Drinking Water.—The Christian Advocate of New York, mentions that William Graham, connected with the Methodist Book Concern, "took three of his children and went into the country for a little vacation. The scenery was beautiful, the air balmy, the society pleasant. But

In vain with lavish kindness
The gifts of God are strown, when man neglects the inexorable laws of nature. The story is simple and brief. The water of the well gave out, and the guests were supplied for ten days with water from a well that had not been used for three years. Its water was poisoned, and on the last Sunday there were twenty guests. Of these, eighteen were taken sick—twelve with typhoid fever, and six with typhoid symptoms. Only two of the twenty escaped—a child three years old, and a man about thirty. Wm. Graham returned; his children and himself all sick with a disease which—its first cousin, diphtheria, excepted—is the most treacherous of the diseases of civilization. One of the children is not; the other, with the father, recovered after a long struggle. The narrative we had from the father on his return, after long absence, to his post of duty.

"Are not the contents of such a well the water of death?"

Horse Sense.—A pleasant story has just come to us from the Cape of Good Hope. In Graaf-Reinet, as in all the old Dutch towns in the colony, there is, in the centre of the place, a large market square, where the farmers, traders and others, arriving with their produce, at any hour of the day or night, may "outspan" the oxen or horses from their wagons, and turn the cattle out to the "commonage" to feed, while they bivouac at their wagons, as is the wont of African travellers to do, until the eight o'clock morning auction. An old horse belonging to one of these parties had wandered about in search of grass and water—vainly, no doubt, for it was during the severe drought from which the country is but now recovering. Coming to the great bare market-place, and finding a knot of men talking there, he singled out one of them, and pulled him by the sleeve with his teeth. The man thinking the horse might possibly bite, repulsed him; but as it was not very roughly done, he returned to the charge, with the same reception; but he was a persevering animal, and practically demonstrated the axiom, that "perseverance gains the day," for upon his taking the chosen sleeve for the third time between his teeth, the owner awoke to the idea that a deed of kindness might be required of him; so putting his hand upon the horse's neck he said, "All right, old fellow; march on." The horse at once led the way to a pump at the further side of the square. Some colored servants were lounging about the spot. One of them at the bidding of the white man, filled a bucket with water; three times was the bucket replenished and emptied before the "great thirst" was assuaged, and then the grateful brute almost spoke his thanks to his white friend by rubbing his nose gently against his arm; after which he walked off with a great sigh of relief. A story somewhat analogous to the foregoing was told me by a friend, whose uncle, an old country squire in one of our western counties, had a favorite hunter in a loose box in the stable. One warm summer day he was "athirst," and could get no water. He tried to draw the groom's attention to the fact, but without success. The horse was not to be discouraged; he evidently gave the matter consideration. The thirst was pressing. All at once he remembered that he always had a certain halter put upon his head when led to the water. He kn where it hung. He managed to unhool from its peg, and carried it to the groom, at once, in great admiration of the know-brute, rewarded him in the manner he desired.—Nature.

Praying for money, while refusing to work to earn it, savors more of presumption than of faith.

THE FRIEND.

ELEVENTH MONTH 11, 1882.

We have received from the author, an interesting memoir of the late Enoch Le written by his son, which revives the memory of the benefit derived from instruction in mathematical studies under his tuition at Westtown School; the friendly intercourse later years, when we were both employed as teachers in that institution; and the esteem which was felt for him as a man of unusual mental powers, not only in mathematical pursuits, but in the general domain of the intellect, and as one who possessed a very varied and extensive fund of general information.

Of his early childhood, he remarked: "I do not remember the time when I did not know the first three rules in Arithmetic—Addition, Subtraction and Multiplication. Among my earliest recollections, that of setting down columns of figures on a slate and adding them up, and then subtracting the sum of one column from that of another, and afterwards multiplying the result by some other number, and thus continuing till I had filled the slate."

His demeanor was habitually grave and serious, and he early learned to exercise a degree of self-control which was greatly to his advantage. When a boy, it was the custom of farmers to give spirituous liquors to their workmen in harvest, but though he was young and inexperienced, he noticed the grading effects of the practice, and resolved to abstain from all alcoholic drinks. His biographer says: "This resolution was firmly fixed by having drunk, on a single occasion, of a sweet mixture of which gin was an ingredient, and by having felt, without being intoxicated, that he was more than usually excited, and was bereft of his habitual command, while under the influence of the draught. He was quick to perceive that he would make sure his escape from the degraded condition of a drunkard, he must foster an appetite which might become strong for the control of reason or conscience. Having taken his stand, he was not to be moved, boy as he was, by persuasion or enticement. There were companions of his hard labors, who laughed at him for his persistent singularity, but who, in after times, may have lamented their own fatal delusion, when they found themselves, before they were well advanced, whither the current of their fate was tending, whirled in the giddy circle of that maelstrom whose sweep is ruin, and whose vortex is death."

When about fifteen years of age he was employed as teacher of a school near Radnor, where the family resided, and he continued to follow this honorable occupation at intervals during much of his life. In 1793, w turned of seventeen, he went to Philadelphia to pursue his mathematical studies under the instruction of William Waring, then teacher in Friends' Academy, on Fourth Street, Chestnut. Of this estimable man, E. L. wrote in after years, "As a preceptor I saw his equal, in his line. He first directed my eyes to the value and beauty of mathematical science, and he effectually spoiled me for taking lessons of any one else then possible to me." Wm. Waring died of yellow fever in the latter part of the summer of 1793, and his former pupil continued his studies alone.

In the spring of 1795, being in the Philadelphia Library, to examine Newton's Principles, he met with Andrew Ellicott, who had been appointed a commissioner to make some surveys in the western part of Pennsylvania. Ellicott was a mathematician himself, and was surprised to hear a rustic, home-spun youth asking for such a book, entered into conversation with him and was pleased with his intelligence and the accuracy of his knowledge. This acquaintance led to an offer in the surveying party, with a liberal compensation, which was accepted.

E. L. was exposing work, and of the sixty men employed in it, many were rough in character. After leaving Pittsburgh, they were without a roof, except for a single night, till they returned to that place late in the following fall. E. L. steadily adhered to the mode of dress and language in which he had been educated as a member of the Society of Friends, and gained the esteem and confidence of his associates by his consistency, ability, and attention to duty. General Irvine, who was one of the Commissioners, was a man of intemperate temper, and on one occasion when heated, broke out into a volley of oaths. Having thus vented his feelings he turned to E. L., and though more than thirty years junior apologized for using such language. "You are an ungentlemanly and unchristian fellow," said he, "I know it is, but these fellows can never be made to believe that I am in earnest till I thunder at them, like a man." "They obey me very well," replied his young friend, "when I happen to give them an order." "Yes, yes," returned General, "your manner don't require ringing. I can't get along without it, but assure you I mean to quit it when I return home."

While engaged in their survey a rumor circulated that a body of Indians were preparing to attack the party, and no little alarm was excited. As long as it continued, E. L., one night came, took his blanket and went into the woods beyond the line of the settlement, and the light of the camp-fires, and there he remained. Though no less courageous than the officers of the expedition themselves, he had no disposition to be involved in any scene of blood, or to be in the remotest degree responsible for the consequences of a hostile collision. The principles forbade the use of arms, even in means of self-defence, and he would not in the most critical circumstances, allow others to do for him what he would not do himself.

On the return of the party from their labors, he met at Pittsburgh. Wine was then used as a beverage even by the most temperate. One day, a young man having indulged too freely in his morning potations, became giddy and foolish at dinner. Being mortifified at the conduct of his companion, E. L. watched his opportunity and slipped away before the wine came upon the board. During the afternoon he experienced some peculiar sensations which arrested his attention. He soon recollected that he had omitted his accustomed glass in dining. Conscience that there might be danger in a habit which tended to create a want, whose demand might become imperative, he resolved at once to renounce the use of wine, and thus to avoid the risks attendant upon it.

In 1799, he was married to Alice Jackson of New Garden, and in the fall of the same year entered upon the duties of mathematical teacher at Westtown Boarding School, which had been opened a few months before. He was an industrious and zealous teacher. His son says: "There was no hour however unseasonable, that he was not accessible where a mathematical question was to be resolved, or an intricate problem elucidated."

"He early formed the habit of study without the aid of books, and when walking or riding abroad, usually worked mentally on some subject which happened at the time to interest him. A novel and valuable demonstration, which afterwards appeared in a mathematical work, compiled by John Gummere, one of his pupils, and which is still the best demonstration of a practical rule in surveying extant, was the result of an evening's cogitation on horseback, on his way home from a Monthly Meeting at Concord. Other demonstrations, which subsequently he gave to the world in his published treatises, were hit upon and wrought out in a similar manner."

His wife, Alice, died in 1813, at the age of 35. She was an approved minister, and a woman of unusual loveliness of character. One, who knew her well, once said of her, "She could not enter a retail store to buy a yard of tape, without leaving the impression that she was a superior woman." At that time they were residing in New Garden, where they managed a farm and conducted a boarding school for boys and young men.

In 1815 he was married to Lydia Jackson, a cousin of his first wife.

From early life he was much interested in the religious Society of which he was a member, and devoted considerable time and labor to its interests. The subjects of slavery and war were particularly near to his feelings, and his pen was often employed in enforcing correct views in reference to them. He published also several mathematical treatises; dissertations on Oaths and Baptism; a "Vindication of the Society of Friends," from the aspersions contained in a work entitled "Quakerism not Christianity," and a life of William Penn, which forms part of the series of 14 volumes known as "Friends' Library."

His son states that his feelings inclined him to moderation in times of controversy, and though he saw that the opinions of Elias Hicks were Socinian in their character, and that doctrines were being maintained among some of our members, with regard to the atonement and divine nature of Christ and to the authority of the sacred Scriptures, which were at variance with those of ancient Friends, yet to the last moment he hoped that by forbearance and conciliation a division might be avoided.

In the disputes which arose subsequently in the Society of Friends in regard to the writings of Joseph John Gurney, his feelings appear to have been of a similar character. The writer well remembers a conversation between them in the early period of those disputes, in which he referred to the danger there was of injuring the cause of religion by imprudent efforts, even in so good a cause as endeavoring to keep inviolate the doctrinal faith of the Society. In illustration of his views, he referred to the fable of a man who had seen a rabbit browsing on the leaves in his turnip patch, and who to expel the intruder had invited the help of his neighbors. They came with horses and dogs, and though the rabbit was driven out, yet the crop was almost ruined by their rough usage. In this desire to evade controversy, we believe may be found the explanation of the position he took in the latter part of his life. Many of his friends, with whom he had always been associated in labor for the good of the church and of mankind in general, were strongly impressed with the importance of bearing an open testimony against writings published as those of Friends and not in harmony with the teachings of the Society. E. Lewis probably thought it would be better to let them alone, and content themselves with the spreading of sound doctrines by the publishing of writings against whose doctrines no exception could be taken. But in times when the feelings of men were deeply stirred on religious subjects, such a course seemed to many like a desertion of the Lord's cause, and a withholding more than is meet, which tendeth to poverty. Its effect was to weaken the bond between him and many who had been his co-laborers, and at times to place them on opposite sides of some of the practical questions which arose.

This tendency was increased by his connection with the Friends' Review, a paper which it was well understood was established as the exponent of the views of those who were not in harmony with the prevailing judgment of Philadelphia Yearly Meeting. In his conduct of this, the natural moderation of E. Lewis and his dislike of controversy are visible. Though to some extent he reflected the sentiments of those by whom it was originated, yet he evidently turned with pleasure to such more congenial topics as the spreading of the principles of peace, the abolition of slavery, the defence of the character of William Penn from the unfounded charges of Macaulay, and to whatever tended to promote the moral development of mankind—topics on which he could write freely without fear of coming into conflict with his former companions. This was in accordance with the rule laid down for his guidance in his prospectus: "It is intended to avoid as far as practicable, all controversial discussions."

He died on the 14th of 7th mo. 1856.

In the last presentment of the Grand Jury of Philadelphia, we are glad to observe the following paragraphs:

"Of the many bills submitted to us for our action, disproportionately large has been the number founded upon offences which grew out of the free use of intoxicating drinks. We are forced to the conclusion that, had there been no such cases to come before us, the business of this Grand Jury could have been transacted in a little more than one week instead of requiring five weeks as has been the state of the case. A large expense, too, would have been saved the county, whilst the question of the enlargement of our pauper and prison accommodations would neither now nor at any time in the near future, have to be considered. Hence we ask that the free license law which so disgraces our city may receive early attention.

"Finally, we would ask that some action be taken to relieve this community from the flood of pernicious papers, the low-class pictures and the larger posters of similar character, with which we are cursed. One class of these publications assails the purity of our homes; others, incite the youth to spurn parental control, and to launch upon a mode of life which they mistakenly look upon as one of liberty, but which too often terminates in a felon's cell."

SUMMARY OF EVENTS.

UNITED STATES.—General Crook had a friendly conference with the Apache Indians at San Carlos, Arizona, on the 2nd instant. He told them "the time had come for them to make an effort for their own living and to govern themselves," and said that "their present locality being unadapted to either farming or grazing, permission would be given them to select some lands on the reservation for cultivation, under care of the chief, who will be responsible for the discipline and behavior of the respective bands." About 1200 warriors listened to the address, and seemed greatly impressed by the advice.

The public debt statement shows a reduction of $15,629,180, for the 10th month.

The Postmaster General estimates the receipts of his Department for the fiscal year ending 6th month 30th, 1884, at $50,670,456, and the expenses at $46,471,111; estimated excess of receipts over expenditures, $3,929,345.

The annual report of the Sixth Auditor for the Post-office Department shows an excess of postal receipts over expenditures in Pennsylvania amounting to $1,017,439; New Jersey, $174,214, and Delaware, $19,159.

During last week, of the political matter sent to the Post-office in Philadelphia for distribution, there were about 600,000 separate envelopes which had to be left at the various houses in the city. There were also sold, in addition to one-cent wrappers and postal cards, 1,272,000 two and three cent stamps, the largest number ever before sold in one week.

The question of reciprocity with the United States is again discussed by the Mexican press. A reciprocity treaty meets little favor, as the revenues of Mexico come principally from import duties.

A case intended to test the validity of the Constitutional Prohibitory amendment, passed in Iowa by the popular vote, last 6th mo., was heard on 10th mo. 26th in the District Court in Davenport, Judge Walter F. Hayes presiding. The plaintiffs, brewers, sold $113 worth of beer to a saloon keeper, who refused payment on the ground that the bill could not be collected under the law. The Court reserved its decision until 11th mo. 1st, when it was announced by Judge Hayes. The Judge holds that the amendment "was not legally made a part of the State Constitution," chiefly on the grounds that "the journals of the Legislature do not contain the act in full on their pages, and do not contain the yeas and nays taken upon the same, and that, according to the journals, the act, as passed by the Senate of the Eighteenth Assembly, was, in its terms, prohibitory of the sale or manufacturing of liquor, not only as a beverage, but also 'to be used,' and hence, prohibited it and its use for any and all purposes, even sacramental, medicinal, &c.; but, as it passed the House of the Eighteenth General Assembly, it was in terms merely prohibitory of liquor as a beverage. In these respects, therefore, the requirements of the Constitution providing for the manner of its amendment have been disregarded. The journals do not contain the proper entries, and the same act has not passed both houses of the Legislature."

The growth of the dried fruit business in Tennessee is something wonderful. Knoxville and Nashville have handled during the past few years large quantities of dried fruit, but the trade has become so great that the lesser points in the State are getting a fine business out of it. Two years ago hardly a pound of dried fruit was shipped from Chattanooga, for example; this year the dealers in that city will handle in the neighborhood of 750,000 pounds.

Agents of a California syndicate are "prospecting the northern end" of Vancouver's Island "with a view to heavy investments."

Up to and including Seventh-day, the 4th inst., there had been a total of 2079 cases of yellow fever and 183 deaths, in Pensacola, Florida. The people are anxiously looking for frost.

At a meeting of the Board of Health of Des Moines, Iowa, it was stated that no death occurred in that city during 10th month. The population of Des Moines, in round numbers, is about 10,000.

In Philadelphia for the week ending 11th month 4th, there were 358 deaths, as compared with 311 for the previous week and 324 for the corresponding week of last year. Of the whole number, 180 were males and 178 females: 69 died of consumption; 28 of diphtheria, 16 of pneumonia; 16 of old age; 19 of croup; 13 of marasmus; 11 of typhoid fever, and 8 of alcoholism.

Markets, &c.—U. S. 3's, 102½; 3½'s, 102; 4½'s, registered, 112½; coupon, 113½; 4's, 119½; currency 6's, 133.

Cotton continues dull. Sales of middlings are reported at 10½ a 11½ cts. per pound for uplands and New Orleans.

Petroleum.—Standard white, 7½ cts. for export, and 8½ cts. per gallon for home use.

Flour is quiet but steady. Sales of 2800 barrels, including Minnesota extras, at $5.75 a $6.50; Penna. family at $5; western do. at $5.25 a $5.90, and patents at $6.37½ a $7.50. Rye flour is steady at $4.25 a $4.37 per barrel.

Grain.—Wheat was dull and unsettled. Sales of 4800 bushels red, in car lots at $1.06 a $1.13. Rye is steady at 73 a 75 cts. Corn is in moderate demand. Sales of 8700 bushels, to the trade, at 86 a 90 cts. Oats are quiet but firm. Sales of 3500 bushels, in car lots, at 40 a 45½ cts.

Hay and Straw Market, for week ending 11th mo. 4th, 1882.—Loads of hay, 500; loads of straw, 107. Average price during the week—Prime timothy, $1 to $1.10 per 100 pounds; mixed, 95 cts. to $1.05 per 100 pounds; straw, 80 to 90 cts. per 100 pounds.

Beef cattle were a fraction lower: 5000 head arrived and sold at the different yards at 3½ a 7 cts. per lb., the latter rate for extra.

Sheep were unsettled and lower: 17,000 head arrived and sold at the different yards, at 3½ a 5½ cts., and lambs at 3½ a 7½ cts. per pound, as to condition.

Hogs were in fair demand at former rates: 5000 head arrived and sold at 10 a 11½ cts. per lb. as to quality.

FOREIGN.—In the House of Commons Gibson's amendment to the Cloture rule, substituting a two-thirds majority for the bare majority proposed by the Government, was rejected by a vote of 322 against 238. The Parnellites voted with the majority.

In a speech at a meeting in Inverness, Scotland, Michael Davitt denounced the manner in which the depopulation of the Highlands was going on. This, he said, was an instance of the iniquity of the Land Laws, and he advocated the nationalization of land as a remedy.

The Times' despatch from Cairo says: Evidence will be adduced to show that Arabi Pasha saved the life of Midshipman De Chair against the wish of Toulba Pasha, and also that he stopped the massacre at Alexandria by telegraphic order. The prosecution will urge that it is impossible to believe that Arabi Pasha, who held this power, could not have prevented the massacres and incendiarism had he so wished. A fresh discovery has been made of documents important to Arabi Pasha's defence. It is stated that they implicate the Sultan in command with the rebellion.

Dr. Schweinfurth writes to the Anti-Slavery Society, under date of Cairo, 10th mo. 23rd, that all the Provinces of Egypt lying south and west of Khartoum are in the hands of fanatical insurgents, and that Khartoum is only hanging on by a thread. The army has been cut down by constant disastrous combats with the False Prophet, and is reduced to half its original size. The mass of the population believe in the ever-victorious False Prophet. Six thousand men, Dr. Schweinfurth says, were massacred by Mahne's army, which is reported to number 150,000 men, and is desperately brave. As soon as the town of Obeid has fallen, the army, it is expected, will march on Khartoum. Dr. Schweinfurth also states that the Governor of the Soudan estimates that during the war 30,000 of the False Prophet's followers have perished.

The political agitation is causing a profound sensation in Spain, and threatens to divide the Liberals into two hostile parties.

The draft of an ordinance has been submitted to the German Bundesrath, prohibiting the importation of American swine, pork and sausage meat.

Contrary to the usual experience in similar cases, later reports of the floods in Northern Italy are distressing than the first accounts. The king contributed 100,000 francs to the relief fund, and the people in parts of the realm are nobly imitating his example. The worst feature of the calamity is that in many places its results will be permanent. Charity will keep sufferers from starvation, but it cannot redeem the which has been buried beneath a deposit of clay rocks.

The elections for members of the Italian Chamber Deputies, held recently, resulted in the return of members of the Right, 65 of the Centre, 258 of the 27 Radicals and 2 Socialists. The voting through the country was orderly, except at Leghorn, where the mob attempted to destroy the urns and registers.

A despatch to the Times from St. Petersburg says: great increase in the number of large fires in Russia causing nearly all the insurance companies to fall on their reserve funds. Insurance premiums have been raised by forty per cent., on the advice of the gates from English companies, who were present at Insurance Congress recently held in London. The river Neva is full of ice and navigation is closed.

The elections for members of the Norwegian Storting have resulted in a crushing defeat of the Government, four-fifths of the members returned being Liberals or Republicans.

A violent earthquake has occurred in the vicinity Aintab, in northern Syria. Several villages have been destroyed.

Advices from Jamaica to the 27th ult. say that the maicea is at present in a more disturbed and agitated condition than at any time since the last rebellion. One of her troubles is a disturbance at Black River the Maroons. It appears that their mules were let on for taxes, and they subsequently marched down the village and took forcible possession of them the authorities. In the territory allotted to these people they are exempt from taxation by treaty, but property not included in this territory, and owned by the subject to taxation. At last accounts they mustering at their township, and numbered 100 that something serious was expected.

It is officially reported that within the limits of City of Mexico there are now 2000 houses in course of erection or repair. A large American hotel is talked of.

It is reported that copper mines have been discovered in Cerro de La Palma, in the department of Quil Chili.

There were 15 deaths from yellow fever in Havana during the week ending last Seventh-day.

Canadian capitalists are talking about the railway between Lake Superior and Hudson Bay. It is said to exist in that region 60,000 square miles land, some of it valuable for farming purposes, much covered with fine forests, and some of it rich in mineral wealth. There is talk of a railway to the bay at Ottawa, via the Desert River. An exploratory survey is soon to be made. The distance is about 450 miles.

The 200 destitute people recently brought to Quil from the Island of Anticosti have been taken in charge by the Canadian Immigration Department, and will be distributed in various parts of the Dominion.

FRIENDS' BOARDING SCHOOL, BARNEVILLE, OHIO.

Wanted a Superintendent and Matron to take charge of this Institution at the close of the present winter. Friends of Ohio Yearly Meeting, who may be drawn to the service, are requested to communicate with Aaron Frame, or Asa Garretson, Barnesville, Montgomery county, Ohio.

FRIENDS' ASYLUM FOR THE INSANE

Near Frankford, (Twenty third Ward,) Philadelphia. Physician and Superintendent—JOHN C. HALL, M.D. Applications for the Admission of Patients made to the Superintendent, or to any of the Board Managers.

MARRIED, at Friends' Meeting-house, Flushing, Montgomery Co., Ohio, on Fourth-day, the 4th of Tenth mo. 1882, HENRY HALL, of Malvern, Chester Co., Pa., and ANN ELIZA, daughter of David and Sarah H. Brainerd of the former place.

—, at Friends' Meeting, Upper Darby, Pa. Fifth-day, Tenth month 5th, J. MURRAY BACON, Philadelphia, and ANNA C., daughter of Dr. George Bailey.

DIED, at his residence in Lancaster Co., Pa., 8th 13th, 1882, in the 63d year of his age, JOSHUA FURMAN, a member of Sadsbury Monthly and Particular Meeting.

THE FRIEND.

A RELIGIOUS AND LITERARY JOURNAL.

DL. LVI.

SEVENTH-DAY, ELEVENTH MONTH 18, 1882.

NO. 15.

PUBLISHED WEEKLY.

if paid in advance, $2.00 per annum; if not paid in advance $2.50; 10 cents extra is charged for Postage on those sent by mail.

Articles designed for insertion to be addressed to

JOSEPH WALTON,
MOORESTOWN, BURLINGTON CO., N. J.

tions, payments and business communications, received by

JOHN S. STOKES,
O. 116 NORTH FOURTH STREET, UP STAIRS,
PHILADELPHIA.

For "The Friend."

Selections and Reflections.

There is not a doubt in the mind of the Society of Friends was set up, not only to set forth by the pen the precious doctrines and testimonies given to our forefathers to uphold before the world, but, also, that their lives and conversation should consistently correspond with. In other words, that they should live out in harmonious practice their convictions, or live what they profess;—being as a way-marks to the eternal kingdom, and read of all men. Is not this, more clearly foreshadowed to us, being an ex- command in the Jewish law: "Ye shall keep my statutes and my judgments; which man do, he shall live in them; I am the Lord." This was no doubt, practically effected for a time at the rise of the Society; perhaps, one great secret of the remarkable stir and impression made upon the minds of hearts of observers within the sphere of influence. For, in accordance herewith, I am Penn writing of the early Friends "I cannot forget the humility and the zeal of that day." "We were an exalted people; our very countenances and treatment declared it."

How greatly is it to be desired that these characteristics of earlier times in our Society, that more generally be traced upon us! as a more inward and spiritually minded people, we might with renewed Christian and primitive dedication hold up the banner of Quakerism in its original dignity and purity; and thus show unmistakably that we are the true lineal successors of that glorious band of tried and proved men and women who, "Looking o'er this vain world with the keen eye of faith," counted not their dear unto themselves, that they might live their course with joy. Hereby we too united together as the heart of one man—should be enabled, through his omnipotent power who remains the same yesterday, to-day and forever, to rebuild the broken down temple, and effectually turn the battle to the Lord in a day when there are many adversaries. See the period so favorably represented in Penn, our members have been exposed to many temptations from the increase of wealth, with the excesses and extrava-

gances into which it so often leads. It is hard to guard the heart against the perils of success. The flood-tide of prosperity is not good for the soul. The cares of this life and the deceitfulness of riches choke the word. And the prophet's words to Tyre, should be a warning to us: "By thy traffic hast thou increased thy riches, and thine heart is lifted up because of thy riches." It was the view of these dangers so tending to bias the purpose, so fertile in reconciling religion with luxury, that prompted John Woolman's pen to the following testimonies: "Small treasure to a resigned mind is sufficient. How happy is it to be content with a little, to live in humility, and feel that in us, which breathes out this language, Abba! Father. May we reverently wait on the Lord for strength to lay aside all unnecessary expense of every kind, and learn contentment in a plain simple life."

"Friends in early times refused on a religious principle, to make or trade in superfluities, of which we have many large testimonies on record; but for want of faithfulness some gave way, even some whose examples were of note in our Society; and from thence others took more liberty. Members of our Society worked in superfluities, and bought and sold them; and thus dimness of sight came over many. At length, Friends got into the use of some superfluities in dress, and in the furniture of their houses; and this has spread from less to more, until superfluity of some kind is common amongst us. In this declining state, many look at the example of another, and too much neglect the pure feeling of Truth."

Another eminent elder in the Truth testified that, "Not all the persecutions, not all the apostates, nor all the private or open enemies we have ever had, have done us, as a Christian Society, the damage that riches have done. And the justness of this observation has been, in succeeding times, most abundantly verified and illustrated on every hand, in the desolation that has generally followed the inordinate pursuit of riches and worldly greatness, both to the victims of this snare and to their posterity."

An apt specimen of the ardent zeal, godly sincerity, fervent piety, and true Christian simplicity of our worthy predecessors, as follows, is taken from an epistle of William Edmondson: The things of this world were of small value with us, so that we might win Christ, and the goodliest things of the world were not dear us, so that we might be near the Lord, and the Lord's Truth outbalanced all the world, even the most glorious part of it. Then great trading was a burthen, and great concerns a great trouble; all needless things, fine houses, rich furniture, and gaudy apparel, was an eye-sore; our eye being single to the Lord, and the inshining of his light in our hearts, which gave us the sight of the knowledge of the glory of God, which so affected our minds, that it stained the glory of all earthly things, and they bore no mastery with us, either in dwelling, eating, drinking, buying, selling, marrying, or giving in marriage; the Lord was the object of our eye, and we all humble and low before Him, and self of small repute. Ministers and elders, in all such cases, walking as good examples, that the flock might follow their footsteps as they followed Christ in the daily cross and self-denial in their dwellings, callings, eating, drinking, buying, selling, marrying, and giving in marriage; and this answered the Lord's witness in all consciences, and gave us great credit amongst men."

In consideration of the weighty trust committed to us as a people, John Woolman thus stirringly writes: "A trust is committed to us, a great and weighty trust, to which our diligent attention is necessary. Wherever the active members of this visible gathered church use themselves to that which is contrary to the purity of our principles, it appears to be a breach of this trust, and one step back toward the wilderness; one step toward undoing what God in infinite love hath done through his faithful servants in a work of several ages, and is like laying the foundation for future sufferings."

"I feel a living invitation in my mind to those who are active in our religious Society, that we may lay to heart this matter, and consider the station in which we stand; a place of outward liberty under the free exercise of our consciences towards God, not obtained but through the great and manifold afflictions of those who lived before us. There is gratitude due from us to our heavenly Father, and justice to our posterity. Can our hearts endure, or our hands be strong, if we desert a cause so precious, if we turn aside from a work in which so many have patiently labored?"

"May the deep sufferings of our Saviour be so dear to us, that we may never trample under foot the adorable Son of God, or count the blood of the covenant unholy!"

"May the faithfulness of the martyrs when the prospect of death by fire was before them, be remembered! May the patient, constant sufferings of the upright-hearted servants of God in latter ages be revived in our minds! May we so follow on to know the Lord, that neither the faithful in this age, nor those in ages to come, may be brought under suffering through our sliding back from the work of reformation in the world!"

"While the active members in the visible gathered church stand upright, and the affairs thereof are carried on under the leadings of the Holy Spirit, although disorder may arise among us, and cause many exercises to those who feel the care of the churches upon them; yet while these continue under the weight of the work, and labor in the meekness of wisdom for the help of others, the name of Christ in the visible gathered church may be kept sacred. But while they who are active in the affairs of the church, continue in a manifest opposition to the purity of our principles, this as the prophet Isaiah expresses it, is like 'as when a standard-bearer fainteth.' Thus the way opens to great and prevailing degeneracy, and to sufferings for those who, through the power of Divine love, are separated to the Gospel of Christ, and cannot unite with any thing which stands in opposition to the purity of it.

"The necessity of an inward stillness bath under these exercises appeared clear to my mind. In true silence strength is renewed, the mind herein is weaned from all things, but as they may be enjoyed in the Divine will, and a lowliness in outward living, opposite to worldly honor, becomes truly acceptable to us. In the desire after outward gain, the mind is prevented from a perfect attention to the voice of Christ; but being weaned from all things but as they may be enjoyed in the Divine will, the pure light shines into the soul. Where the fruits of that spirit which is of this world, are brought forth by many who profess to be led by the Spirit of Truth, and cloudiness is felt to be gathering over the visible church, the sincere in heart who abide in true stillness, and are exercised therein before the Lord for his name sake, have a knowledge of Christ in the fellowship of his sufferings, and inward thankfulness is felt at times, that through Divine love our own wisdom is cast out, and that forward active part in us subjected, which would rise and do something in the visible church, without the pure leadings of the Spirit of Christ.

"While aught remains in us different from a perfect resignation of our wills, it is like a seal to a book wherein is written 'that good and acceptable, and perfect will of God concerning us;' but when our minds entirely yield to Christ, that silence is known, which followeth the opening of the last of the seals. Rev. viii. 1. In this silence we learn to abide in the Divine will, and there feel that we have no cause to promote but that only in which the light of life directs us in our proceedings, and that the alone way to be useful in the Church of Christ, is to abide faithfully under the leading of his Holy Spirit in all cases, that being preserved thereby in purity of heart and holiness of conversation, a testimony to the purity of his government may be held forth through us to others."

"I trust there are many who at times, under Divine visitation, feel an inward inquiry after God, and when such in the simplicity of their hearts mark the lives of a people who profess to walk by the leadings of his Spirit, of what great concernment is it that our lights shine clear, that nothing in our conduct carry a contradiction to the Truth as it is in Jesus, or be a means of profaning his holy name, and be a stumbling-block in the way of sincere inquirers."

Safety Valve.—Dr. Tyng met an emigrant family going west. On one of the wagons there hung a jug with the bottom knocked out. "What is that?" asked the doctor. "Why that is my Taylor jug," said the man. "And what is a Taylor jug?" asked the doctor again.

"I had a son in General Taylor's army in Mexico, and the General always told him to carry his whisky jug with a hole in the bottom and that's it. It is the best invention I ever heard of for hard drinkers."

Conversion.

For "The Friend."

Of those converted by man in what are called Revival Meetings, nine out of ten, or nearly so, fall away. They trust too much on man.

When converted by the Spirit and through the power of the Father, nine out of ten stand. The reason is, Christ feeds his children with the bread of life that man cannot give; He takes care of them, and through his Spirit they are converted. But others look to the help of man, so they fall.

Dear people, let all look to Christ, the head and fountain of all good.

JOHN MOON.

Emporia, Kansas.

From the "British Friend."

Letter to Patience Brighton.

The following is a copy of a letter from a clergyman to Patience Brighton, of New England, when on a religious visit to Old England. The letter is dated 2nd mo., 1786:—

"Friend,—That love that thinketh no evil, & rejoiceth in the Truth, constraineth me to say, that your Exhortation on Wednesday Evening was suited to my Case or State. I am humbly thankful, God hath not left me without his Witness in my Heart; and also that he hath inclined you to point me out; may I humbly wait his Time of Delivery; and follow by Faith, his fiery and cloudy Pillar, all thro' this howling Wilderness.

I have (I humbly hope) preached Jesus Christ, but not in your Society; & hope in a good measure with a single Eye to the Glory of God; but having been lately exercised with many & severe Tryals from the professed Church, have been led to retire more inward, to commune with mine own heart & be still.

I see my own Ignorance, my Will Worship, my Forms and Modes of Gospel Schemes, my unfeeling Prayers & often unseasonable Preachings, without Spirit & without Life, as only arising from a carnal Mind, which is Enmity against God, and the Imagination exalting itself against him.

From six years of age, I have tasted at seasons divine Love and Favour; but must lament, I have too often lost the Savour of his precious Truth.

May it be so no more: many Times, like Israel have I been delivered, & as often have I provoked him by Distrust, &c: yea he hath chastized me & I have been like a Bullock unaccustomed to the Yoke: O that I might be so moulded into his heavenly Image, as daily to say experimentally, 'thy Will be done.'

He indeed renewed his Love to me that Evening and since, he hath caused his Grace to distill as the Dew, and has given me to know that, in his own Time and Way, he will lengthen my Cords & strengthen my Stakes, & cause me to break forth on the right hand & on the left.

I feel my Spirit melted while I write this, with the tenderest Love and Affection towards you, that minister in the Word, and towards your Society. I joy in your joys, and should sorrow in your sorrows, did I know them.

Pardon me, if I go too far in saying, that I have seen in my Mind what the Lord will do in his own Time: Antichrist will fall with all its power, & a pure primitive Church (perhaps like thine) shall arise out of its Ruins: for in the evening time it shall be light, & that shall shine brighter and brighter unto the perfect Day.

I have been burdened with the Weight of an awful, fearful apprehension, that the Lord God hath a Controversy with us, as a Nation laden with Iniquity; his Hand hath been, and will be stretched out against us, if we do not repent and turn unto him with all our Minds.

Oh! Friends, I know by my many Years Experience (though I am but a young man) that if you are faithful to reprove publickly and privately, you shall suffer persecution perhaps even among some of your own Wellhearted people; for all are not Israel that are born of Israel, but continue you faithful unto Death, and you know who hath said he will give you a Crown of Life. I conclude, may the peace of God reign in your heart: & may you be stirr'd up to thankfulness to him for your Spirit on my Account & may all we heard you that evening (if he so will) be to praise him for ever. As to me, at a suitable Time, thy People shall be my People; I will live & die in their Communion, & among them (if I can & the Lord please) I will be buried: Thy God is my God & to his Grace I am a great Debtor.

When you find Freedom in Prayer, remember your affectionate Friend

W. N. F.

Wishing and Willing.

Perhaps of all the familiar ways in which weakness makes itself apparent none is more common than that of wishing. A wish and a desire are not quite synonymous. A strong desire, when it fills the mind, usually leads to action, but a wish is of feeble material, and expends its force upon itself. There are so many people whose very existence seems to be a long series of wishes. They wish the sky were brighter and the air softer, and the temperature warmer or cooler, as the case may be. They wish for some sudden stroke of fortune which never comes; they wish to be wealthy and powerful, but fail to put forth the energies necessary to become so; they wish for friends without being friendly; for the respect of others without respecting themselves; for all the various results of labor and effort without performing the labor that would bring them.

Such people do not always confine themselves to wishing for objective advantage; they often wish for subjective qualities. They hear them continually lamenting their own deficiencies, and wishing they were more industrious and economical, more prudent; wiser, more patient and self-controlled, more energetic and resolute. Getting glimpses of their folly they will, even at times, wish they could leave off wishing, but the habit is strong, and they continue to indulge in the course which their reason unhesitatingly condemns. The very expression which they give to this feeling feeds and nourishes it. Then a man or woman from whose lips the words "I wish" are forever issuing is sure to come sooner or later to the painful conclusion that for some reason or other his or her wishes are likely to remain forever unfulfilled.

On the other hand, he who wills is of an entirely different type. He, too, desires certain things earnestly, but spends no time in vain wishing he had them, or in expatiating upon the fact. He realizes that he has within him a stock of unemployed forces, which from time to time he draws upon, and he takes care his drafts are always honored. He understands that in order to master any business must first master himself, and thus he rules the helm of his appetites and passions, instead of drifting with them. He counts the cost of each projected enterprise, and takes full use of his abilities to carry it out. If he finds it to be beyond his power, he resigns it; he ceases to wish for it, or at least to give value to the wish. If, however, he declines upon it, it is with a firm resolve to accomplish it, which renders all wishing superfluous.

These two classes may be seen every day by the side of each other. One business man wishes his business were larger, his accommodations were more ample, his clerks more faithful or capable, his customers more numerous or easily satisfied. He often utters these wishes, and mingles them with complaints and regrets. Yet none of these things seem to be materially altered. He continues wishing, and the sources of his dissatisfaction remain. Another, in the same circumstances, instead of pausing to regret for these changes, wills them; that is, he studies the cause which underlie his troubles, and proceeds prudently, but steadily, to remove them. He sets in train measures calculated to extend his business, to ensure loyalty from his employees, to regulate his expenses, to quicken his sales. Whatever it be which he sees is desirable, he plans for and endeavors to carry out. If he finds it beyond his power, or for any reason, unadvisable, he dismisses it from his mind, knowing that idleness is worse than useless. One mother housekeeper wishes that her house were better ordered or more tastefully arranged, that her servants were more competent and faithful, that her children were more obedient and orderly, that she could exercise hospitality without nervous apprehensions, and find time for the many duties that weigh upon her. She frets and complains, and longs for better things, but they do not appear. Then, taking a calm survey of the situation, she finds that some of her desires are, at least for the present, extravagant and impossible, and she reasons and practices. The former she abandons at once, the latter she wills to have. She studies causes, lays plans, tries experiments, brings all her penetration, her energy and her energy to bear upon the matter, and gradually conquers her difficulties and realizes her desires.

Her wishes as a whole are not to be hindered or crushed. They are at first small and right, and, if used properly, will accomplish a good purpose. They are suggestions, not to be disregarded nor implicitly obeyed, but judged and sorted with discrimination. Some are futile and impossible of attainment, and need a speedy dismissal. Others are excessive and need pruning down. Others are reasonable and right, and should receive prompt attention. But they should in any case be transient guests. They have certain duties to deliver, and their mission period, they should pass out of sight and out of mind. It is the permanent, mental condition which that we should guard against. It is not only foolish in itself, but it enervates the mind, enfeebles the powers and palsies the will. If reason justifies the wish, let it be translated into will power, energy, and practical action. Nothing so thoroughly dispels an unwholesome reverie as a determined purpose and vigorous activity.—Pub. Ledger.

[The following communication from a friend in Canada, we suppose to refer to the new Discipline adopted a year or two since, to which some of the members were so opposed that it led to a separation in their limits. The view advanced by the writer is undoubtedly correct—that all religious labor must spring from the movings of the Spirit of God, who only can qualify for service in his Church, and whose command must be waited for. Yet this principle is not inconsistent with the setting apart of a committee for attention to certain duties, as was practised in the primitive Church in the days of the Apostles, and has been in our own Society from very early times. When a religious meeting is gathered into a true waiting on the Lord, a concern may arise for the performance of some labor, and a sense may be given to some present of who it is that the Lord designs should be employed in its accomplishment. Such a meeting may set apart a committee with a measure of the same authority as the Church at Antioch, of which it is recorded: "As they ministered to the Lord and fasted, the Holy Ghost said, Separate me Barnabas and Saul for the work whereunto I have called them. And when they had fasted and prayed, and laid their hands on them, they sent them away. So they, being sent forth by the Holy Ghost, departed."]

We refer to this, not with the intention of weakening the force of our correspondent's article, but to guard against the danger to which some minds are exposed, of carrying their views to such an extreme, that in avoiding one error they fall into another.—Ed.]

For "The Friend."

Pastors and Pastoral Committees.

"And I will give you pastors according to mine heart, which shall feed you with knowledge and understanding."—Jer. iii. 15.

This language was spoken to a backsliding people, who were in a similar condition as this branch of the church militant (Canada Yearly Meeting of Friends) is at the present time. They were vainly endeavoring to worship God in a way that was not well pleasing in his sight. They had pastors or prophets of their own appointment, who spake not the word of the Lord to the people, therefore God was grieved with them, and his anger was kindled against these pastors. This is the word of the Lord concerning them, "I have not sent these prophets, yet they ran; I have not spoken to them, yet they prophesied." (Jer. xxiii. 21.)

In reading the following minute from the present Discipline of Friends in Canada to the members, I thought how fully it tended to bring us into the same condition, as a people, that the prophet speaks of, viz: "For my people have committed two evils; they have forsaken me the fountain of living waters, and have hewed them out cisterns, broken cisterns, that can hold no water." (Jer. ii. 13.) The minute says, "Monthly Meetings are to appoint committees annually, who shall be selected with special reference to their qualifications for pastoral labor." Page 33. A part of their work shall be to endeavor to acquaint themselves with the spiritual condition of those whom they visit.

Thus it appears we have "committed two evils;" first in not looking to our Father in Heaven, who, if He sees meet, will supply us with living water, or send us cisterns that are not broken, and who contain the water of Life fresh from the Fountain of living waters. The apostle says: "Now ye are the body of Christ, and members in particular; and God hath set some in the Church, first apostles, secondly prophets, thirdly teachers," &c. (1st Cor. xii. 27-28), whom the text declares "shall feed you with knowledge and understanding." This could not those pastors do whose authority is derived solely from Monthly Meetings, and who run without that high and holy commission which they receive whom "God hath set in the Church."

Moses in his beautiful song speaking of Israel says: "So the Lord alone did lead him, and there was no strange god with him," (Deut. xxxii. 12;) and again he declares, "For the Lord's portion is his people; Jacob is the lot of his inheritance. He found him in a desert land, and in the waste howling wilderness; He led him about, He instructed him, He kept him as the apple of his eye." (Deut. xxxii. 9-10.)

These things were given for ensamples, that those who come after might take knowledge and walk accordingly, looking to Him who has ever been the leader of his people. I would that Friends might be concerned to examine for themselves and see if these things are not so; if as a Society we are not tending toward an hireling ministry, a man-made ministry, a paid ministry, which has ever been condemned by our forefathers in the truth. See Barclay, (prop. 10, sec. 7 :) "What maketh or how cometh a man to be minister, pastor or teacher in the Church of Christ? We answer, by the inward power and virtue of the Spirit of God."

This was the judgment of one of the supporters of ancient Quakerism; but we find a great declension has taken place in the way pastors or teachers are appointed and maintained at the present time among us. In the minutes of the Yearly Meeting of Friends held at Norwich, 1881, we find the following (page 15): After appointing a "nominating committee" to bring forward names of Friends to constitute our Pastoral committee for the ensuing year, it was proposed and after a free expression of opinion united with, that the expenses of the said committee should be paid. We find also that $127.58 in cash, and a valuable diamond ring was contributed to the fund; this sum was placed in the hands of the Yearly Meeting's treasurer for the use of the committee.

Most truly do many Friends in Canada mourn over these departures from the truth, and with sorrow behold their brethren going back to that state of bondage out of which George Fox, by the light of the Spirit of truth, was enabled to lead many in his day, and point them to Christ within them who would lead them, as they yielded a willing obedience to his teachings, out of all sin and condemnation into a state of justification; and that all might be encouraged to come to this perfect state, I would entreat them in the language of Isaiah, "Come ye and let us walk in the light of the Lord."

JEREMIAH LAPP.

Oakwood, Canada, 9th mo. 15th, 1882.

Duty well performed to parents in prosperity will end.

For "The Friend."

A Prayer by George Fox.

The following, being part of a petition pleadingly put up by that great Reformer, George Fox, in 1671, is especially worthy the attention of all in this day—both those who can intercede availingly on account of the worldliness and iniquity which so greatly abound, and those also who are the poor, guilty ones, whose irreligious course is calculated to provoke Divine displeasure, and call down that retributive justice, with the fearful woes and judgments which await, sooner or later, not only the individually wicked, but "all the nations that forget God."

"O Lord God Almighty! prosper Truth, and preserve justice and equity in the land! Bring down all injustice, iniquity, oppression, falsehood, cruelty and unmercifulness, that mercy and righteousness may flourish!

"O Lord! set up and establish verity, and preserve it in the land! Bring down all debauchery, vice, and the spirit which causeth and leadeth the people to have no esteem of thee, O God! nor their own souls or bodies, nor of Christianity, modesty, or humanity!

"O Lord! put it in the magistrates' hearts to bring down all this ungodliness, violence, cruelty, profaneness, cursing and swearing! and to put down all those playhouses, which corrupt youth and people, and lead them from thy kingdom, where no unclean thing can enter, neither shall come! Such works lead people to hell. Lord, in mercy bring down all these things in the nation, to stop thy wrath, O God, from coming on the land!

G. F.

For "The Friend."

It is to be feared that some Friends neglect the daily reading of the Bible in their families. It is a practice enjoined by Discipline, at least "frequently," and should not be neglected, even where there are none unable to read for themselves. A fitting opportunity is before the family leave the breakfast table, perhaps better than before retiring at night, as in the morning none are weary, and so unable to listen appreciatively. It is also an advantage to allow a little time after the reading for reverent waiting on the Lord; silent service, if such be the Master's will, vocal if He call for it.

Although taken from the business of the day, I believe the time thus spent will not be lost, but if done in a right spirit, a blessing will attend such seasons.

Often at our tables are those of a careless life; it may be a casual visitor, or it may be hired help, whose hearts our Heavenly Father may see fit to reach by this means. The portion read need not be long; indeed, perhaps it is better short, that the mind may more readily grasp it, and that even the little ones may not be wearied. But let it be done reverently, with hearts lifted to Him without whose aid we can perform no acceptable service.

Dear friends, any of you who are omitting this, will you think about it? E.

One of the most successful ways to impress men with the truth of the gospel is to live out the principles it teaches. This fact is frequently illustrated. A correspondent of the Christian of London, England, says: "A sceptical young German said, plead for your Christianity as eloquently as you like, but until I see you professing Christians live different lives from other men, I cannot believe in Christianity!" This is really a proper test. The Saviour says, "By their fruits ye shall know them," and if professing Christians do not bring forth the fruits of righteousness, is it any wonder that others are made to doubt? This thought should impress every Christian with the importance of living what we profess. If some should be made to doubt through our unholy conduct, what a fearful account we may have to give.

For "The Friend."

BE STILL.

"Be still, and know that I am God."

Be still, O Earth, thy many voices hush,
And lure me not into thy giddy way,
When thy tints fair but false before me flush,
Then with deceitful lure thou'dst lead astray.
Be still, O earth.

Be still, O Isles; and you ye restless waves
That dash and break upon a shore of sand,
Or lave the sullen rock, or in dark caves,
With muttering thunder speak your dread command,
Be still, ye waves.

Be still, O Sun; nor stars your radiance shed
Till ye have heard his voice say, "I am God."
Before ye were, He was. By his hand led,
Ye first did climb the path ye since have trod.
Sun, stars, be still.

Be still, ye Winds, nor chili the striving soul
That breasts your storm and hears your roar and wail.
A "still, small voice" within speaks of the goal
When ye are passed, when ye no more assail.
Be still, ye winds.

Be still, all Flesh; before the Lord be still
All lusts; all passions, all vain strivings cease.
Hush, busy self, and let Him come and fill
His temple with his quiet reign of peace.
Be still, all flesh.

A. L. WASHBURN.

Philada., 10th mo. 29th, 1882.

GOOD-BY.

[This is supposed to be an abbreviation of the old Saxon parting exclamation, "God be with you!" The members of the Society of Friends have generally avoided the use of the expression, except in cases where it could be used with due reverence, and under some feeling of the nature of the blessing thus asked for.]

Good-by, good-by! It is the sweetest blessing
That falls from mortal lips on mortal ear,
The weakness of our human love confessing,
The promise that a love more strong is near.
May God be with you!

Why do we say it when the tears are starting?
Why must a word so sweet bring only pain?
Our love seems all-sufficient till the parting,
And then we find it impotent and vain.
May God be with you!

O, may He guide, and bless, and keep you ever,
He who is strong to battle with your foes!
Whoever fails, his love can fail you never,
And all your need He in his wisdom knows.
May God be with you!

Better than earthly presence e'en the dearest
Is the great blessing that our partings bring;
For in the loneliest moments God is nearest,
And from our sorrows heavenly comforts spring,
If God be with us!

Good-by, good-by! with latest breath we say it,
A legacy of hope, and faith, and love;
Parting must come, we cannot long delay it,
But one in Him, we hope to meet above,
If God be with us!

Good-by! 'tis all we have for one another,
Our love, more strong than death, is helpless still;
For none can take the burden from his brother,
Or shield, except by prayer, from any ill.
May God be with you!

THE WAY-SIDE WELL.

BY WALTER LEARNED.

He stopped at the way-side well,
Where the water was cool and deep;
There were feathery ferns 'twixt the mossy stone
And gray was the old well-sweep.

He left his carriage alone;
Nor could coachman or footman tell
Why the master stopped in the dusty road
To drink at the way-side well.

He swayed with his gloved hands
The well-sweep creaking and slow,
While from seam and scar in the bucket's side
The water plashed back below.

He lifted it to the curb,
And bent down to the bucket's brim;
No furrows of time or care had marked
The face that looked back at him.

He saw but a farmer's boy
As he stooped o'er the brim to drink,
And ruddy and tanned was the laughing face
That met his over the brink.

The eyes were sunny and clear,
And the brow undimmed by care,
While from under the brim of the old straw-hat
Strayed curls of chestnut hair.

He turned away with a sigh,
Nor could coachman or footman tell
Why the master stopped in his ride that day
To drink at the way-side well.

—Good Comp.

Elevation of Woman in Japan.

Wherever Christianity has gone, it has elevated woman in the social scale; and the influence of Christian nations in this respect more and more felt in other lands.

Japan illustrates this fact. In 1870 a Japanese gentleman of high rank, named Kuroda, was in the United States; and still he came in an official capacity to our country. During his two brief visits he was so deeply impressed with the happy condition and the salutary influence of American women, that he inquired carefully into the reasons of this state of things, and soon became satisfied that it was because women were highly educated, and treated with the greatest respect and consideration, and as equals and companions and friends of men, all the higher qualities of humanity.

The subject so impressed him, that he thought and talked unceasingly about the importance of educating the women of his native land, and wrote to his government a letter on the subject. It urges the importance of colonizing the wilder parts of Japan, and says that to send out ignorant men would be useless, and that therefore the first step was to educate the women of the empire, so the coming generation might be enlightened. As children, in their earlier years wholly under the influence of mother, he urges that it is of the utmost importance the latter should be educated; for the education of women would elevate the people of Japan. As the government had sent its young men to America and Europe to be educated, and was already reaping a return, now he says is the time to begin to educate its women also; and he urges that the education of girls be at once sent to America, believing that many others would follow the pathway of enlightenment thus opened before them.

As the result, five Japanese girls went with the great embassy to Washington, as the wife of the American Minister.

the embassy, these Japanese girls were under her charge on the journey from Jeddo to Washington. Before leaving home, they were summoned to Jeddo, and in testimony of the approbation and good will of the Mikado, they were, according to an ancient custom, presented with beautiful specimens of crimson silk, and an order was issued that all their expenses in America should be paid by the government.

About the time of their sailing, the young Mikado took occasion to set forth to his people the desirableness of educating females as well as males; and his address would rank with the views of our advanced Christian statesmen who are awake to the fact that future mothers are to mould and shape the character of the future nation. He said that his country was undergoing a great change from old to new ideas; and that the weak and strong-minded should endeavor to be good guides to the government and people; that the young, both boys and girls, should be allowed to go abroad, that the country might be benefitted by the knowledge they might acquire; and that females, if educated intelligently, should and would be respected, and have a position hitherto unknown, and so great things for the welfare of families and the country.

In Japan, woman has always had a higher position than among the neighboring nations of Asia; and the disabilities under which they have labored has come, to a great extent, from the influence of Chinese literature and example, which have been introduced into, and affected, the country. But in former times it was not so. A high Japanese authority says, that from the earliest dawn of Japanese history, women always enjoyed equal rights with men, and that though abuses have crept in through Chinese teaching and example, womanhood has never been degraded in Japan. And in proof of his assertions, he states the fact, that out of 124 sovereigns, rulers of Japan, eight empresses are included in the list, and that they ruled long and most wisely. It was under the rule of an empress, he says, that Japan conquered Korea, which country she held for over 600 years; and that under another empress, the empire attained high literary culture, and reason was inculcated and respected, and facilities for general education were greatly increased and improved. He says that Japan prospered under eight such reigns, and that, confirmed by the experience of the Western nations, she will not hesitate to enforce among all classes, the respect and veneration for women which has never been wanting about her court, and among her better families. "Thus," he adds, "may Japan be able to insure the stability of her civilization, to regain her early chivalry, and by enlist the assistance of educated mothers and daughters, secure a noble future."—Nationalist.

Can And I Will.—How many boys there are who can, but never do, because they have no will power, or if they have, do not use it! The difference between "Give up," and "I can't," and "I can and I will," is just the difference between victory and defeat in all great conflicts of life.

I know a boy who was preparing to enter the junior class of the New York University; he was studying trigonometry, and I gave him three examples for his next lesson. The following day he came into my room to demonstrate his problems. Two of them he understood, but the third—a very difficult one—he had not performed. I said to him, "Shall I help you?" "No sir," he answered, "but I can and will do it, if you will give me a little more time." I said, "I will give you all the time you wish." The next day he came into my room to recite another lesson in the same study.

"Well, Simon, have you worked that example?" "No sir," he answered, "but I can and will do it if you will give me a little more time." "Certainly; you shall have all the time you desire."

I like these boys who are determined to do their own work, for they make our best scholars, and men, too. Again Simon entered my room; I knew he had it, for his whole face told the story of his success. Yes, he had it, notwithstanding it had cost him many hours of the severest mental labor. Not only had he solved the problem, but what was of infinitely greater importance to him, he had begun to develop mathematical powers which, under the inspiration of "I can and I will," he has continued to cultivate, until to-day he is professor of mathematics in one of our largest colleges, and one of the ablest mathematicians of his years in our country.

My young friends, let your motto ever be, "If I can, I will."—New York Evangelist.

The Society of Friends were gathered to the principle of the inward manifestation of the Spirit. This was that in which their unity, as a people consisted. In the efforts to restore the Society to unity in the difficulty on account of Wilkinson and Story, the spiritually minded early Friends exhorted all to seek to know the rule and dominion of the Spirit in their own hearts, as they had known it at their conviction: this they taught would again bring them into unity. The founders of the Society did not hesitate to warn early Friends that the Spirit which would lead them away from this inward principle was a spirit of separation, and that they who taught contrary to the original teachings were separatists. When we find that ministers who travel as such, now deny the principle and doctrine in which the unity at first consisted, is it any marvel that the Society of Friends is to-day in fragments? For the faith, which was the fruit of the Spirit, which was raised by, and stood in the life, light and power of God, as it was inwardly manifested, another faith has been substituted, which is a faith or belief which is only a natural faculty, standing in the human will, and based on a rational human conception of the literal promises of the Scriptures. . . . On the basis of this cheap, blind human faith, the whole system of doctrine which starts with "instantaneous conversion," and ends with "instantaneous sanctification" is constructed. . . . We long to see a movement of all who bear the name of Friends, away from both extremes, back to the old principles of Friends, back to the old unity, where all Friends minded the same thing; back to the old doctrine of the inward light, as a precious gift of the Son of God, who died on the cross, and tasted death as an atonement for every man. Standing on this old foundation, Friends will again be one people. The faith will be a faith which stands in the power of God. The workers will walk in the light, so that the walk of faith will be a walk in the light.—Western Friend.

The Circle of Fire.

The following thrilling tale, related by Dr. Guthrie, the eloquent Scottish preacher and writer, illustrates the guidance of Providence in a most noticeable degree. May it teach us to give heed to the counsel of the still small voice, remembering that as many as are led by the Spirit of God, they are the sons of God! If we seek to know and do his will, He will guide us by his eye.

"I was in the habit of visiting an aged widow, as paralysis made it impossible for her to attend church. She was tended by a very dutiful daughter, who, working at a flax-mill in the neighborhood, toiled hard, and contented herself with plain dress and simple fare, that she might help to maintain her mother. Before leaving the cottage for her work, she was in the habit of heaping up the refuse of the mill in the grate, and kindling it. She placed her helpless mother in a chair right before the fire, and as this fuel burned slowly away the old woman was kept comfortable till her return.

"It happened one day that I left my manse, and skirting on the walls of the old churchyard, and passing the corn-mill, with its busy sound and flashing wheel, I took my way down the winding dell to the cottage of the old woman, which stood in its garden, embowered among trees. But having met a parishioner, with whom I had some subject of interest to talk about, I made a halt; and sitting down on a bank of thyme, we entered into conversation. Ere the subject was half exhausted, the widow rose to my recollection. I felt somehow that I must cut it short, and hasten away on my visit. But the idea was dismissed, and the conversation went on. However, it occurred again and again, till, with a feeling that I was neglecting a call of duty, as by an uncontrollable impulse I rose to my feet and made haste to the cottage. Opening the door, a sight met my eyes that for the moment nailed me to the spot.

"The erection of mill-refuse which had been built from the hearth some feet up the chimney, having its foundation eaten away, had fallen, and precipitating itself forward, had surrounded the helpless paralytic within a circle of fire. The accident took place some minutes before I entered. She had cried out, but no ear was there to hear, nor hand to help. Catching the loose refuse about her, on and on, nearer and nearer, the flames crept. It was a terrible sight for the two Wigtown women—martyrs, staked far out in the sands of Solway Frith, to mark the sea-foam crawl nearer and nearer them; it was more terrible still for this poor woman in her lone cottage, without any great cause to die for, to sit there and see the fire creeping closer, drawing nearer and nearer to her feet. By the time I had entered, it had almost reached her, where she sat motionless, speechless, pale as death, looking down on the fire as it was about to seize her clothes and burn her to a cinder. Ere it caught I had time, and no more, to make one bound from the door to the hearth-stone, and seizing her, chair and all in my arms, to pluck her from the jaws of a cruel, fiery death.

"By what law of nature, when I lingered on the road, was I moved, without the remotest idea of her danger, to cut short, against all my inclinations, an interesting conversation, and hurry on to the house, which I reached just in the nick of time?—one or two minutes later, the flames had caught her clothes, and I had found her in a blaze of fire. Be it mine to live and die in the belief of a present and presiding, as well as a personal God; in the faith which inspired my aged friend to thank Him for her wonderful deliverance, and the boy to explain his calm courage on the roaring deep, in these grand but simple words, 'My Father is at the helm.'—Guiding Hand.

Last Interview of Christopher Healy and Ruth Ely.

At the close of Bueks Quarterly Meeting, held 26th of 2nd month, 1851, Christopher Healy went to see his old friend and fellow laborer and travailer for the prosperity of Zion, Ruth Ely.

She had long been confined to the house, but though absent in body from the assemblies of the Lord's people, and debarred by situation from much of the company of her valued friends, she was often present in spirit with them, and partook in measure of their earnest concern and exercise, that the testimony of Truth might be supported and primitive principles and primitive practices maintained in all their purity and brightness.

The visit was very satisfactory to the two aged friends, who standing on the borders of the grave, in which they were about to descend, could commemorate the Lord's mercy in time past, and could rejoice in feeling and knowing that they had not been following cunningly devised fables, but living and eternal truth. They felt that their own work was nearly accomplished, and they were permitted to rejoice in perceiving the spiritual greenness of each other.

When the time for parting came, Christopher took hold of Ruth's hand, shook it cordially, and looking at her very pleasantly, said, "Farewell! Ruth, Farewell! We may meet again in mutability, and we may not." Ruth, then as an answer to the implied possibility of their again meeting, said, "It is lively with me to tell thee what passed between two dear friends at their last interview. One said, we may meet again in mutability. The other answered, 'No, when thou comest this way again, I shall be in Heaven.' " Ruth added, "I thought I must get out again, but I am now waiting"—evidently meaning she was waiting for her release.

At this Christopher paused awhile, and then said, "I must say what I once heard passed between a Presbyterian minister and one of his hearers, who told him, she was in a waiting state. 'There is no waiting state till the work is done.' "

Ruth received the admonition couched in the anecdote, and sweetly, yet with much solemnity of manner, said, "I must see what remains for me to do." Christopher's wife then coming into the room, Ruth said, "This has been a very satisfactory visit to me. The unity that has been between us is not to be broken. Neither heights nor depths, nor anything in this world can break the unity that is between us."

Thus these aged friends parted in the overflowing of gospel love and fellowship. Ruth soon found herself a little stronger than she had been for some time previously, and she ventured out short distances from home, as she felt her mind drawn to visit some of her friends and acquaintances; she was also once at meeting. Divers of her visits are said to have been remarkable seasons, satisfactory to the visited and relieving to herself.

"On returning from the last of these visits, she said, she believed her work was now done. Shortly after this, just twenty days from her parting with Christopher, she was suddenly and quietly released from the body and gathered to the just of all generations, who have finished their allotted portion of service and suffering on earth. Her death took place 3rd mo. 18th, and the next time Christopher "came that way" was to attend her funeral. She was then in Heaven, having gained the crown before him; but he did not tarry long behind her. In less than two months, he also was permitted to enter into the joy of his Lord. Divine Mercy sustained him in his sickness and in his closing hours, so that death had no sting, and the grave no victory. Peace was his daily portion whilst treading the dark valley. The tempter, the accuser of the brethren, stood rebuked. Thanks be to God, who giveth the victory through our Lord Jesus Christ.

The Temple Thrown Down.—To the disciples, as to all Jews, the temple seemed the very extreme of splendor and permanence. They gazed with admiration and awe on the great stones of the foundation and the gold which adorned it; and when the Master said: "There shall not be left one stone upon another that shall not be thrown down," it was as if he had foretold the falling of the arched heavens. A few years passed; and the prophecy was dismally fulfilled, amid fire and blood. The temple, which had been the scene of hypocrisy, hatred, and fraud; the temple, which had been made the occasion of false swearing against the innocent; the temple, whose walls had echoed to the cry, "Crucify Him!" the temple had the frown of God upon it; it could not stand; it fell.

How often in all ages have men looked on some structure, and wondered and admired, because of its outward splendor; and they have not known that God's voice has gone out against it; they have imagined that it was for all time; but presently it has crumbled to ashes.

When Louis XIV. was in his pride, over-awing Europe, who dreamed that before the close of the century, his descendants would be on the scaffold and that the remains of "Louis the Great" would be dragged out of their resting-place by the hands of the mob, and be tossed about in ghastly sport? Later, in 1810, when Napoleon was surrounded by attendant kings as other monarchs are surrounded by courtiers, when he dispensed thrones as other men dispense shillings, who dreamed of Waterloo and St. Helena? And when his (so-called) nephew had consolidated his reign by victories, by diplomacy, by enlisting the Pope, by the Plebeite, who would have predicted Sedan? And when Pope Pius IX. called a council to proclaim him Infallible, who either hoped or feared the overthrow of the temporal power and the crowning of the King of Free Italy in Rome?

So of many a political and social system, offspring of selfishness, offensive to God. In the very hour when they seemed most solid, they have been under the curse of God; and the very steps by which men hoped to sustain them have proved their ruin.

In fact, nothing is permanent, unless it be the blessing of God; and it cannot have the blessing of God unless it is founded and built in righteousness.—Nat. Bapt.

For "The Friend."

Religious Items, &c.

The First-day.—The proprietors of Bessemer Steel Works of Pittsburg, have ordered the discontinuance of all former work on First-day, in every department of their great establishment. This decision has been reached after a prolonged and exhaustive examination of the whole subject—the conclusion reached being, the best interests of concerned required the honoring of the day.

Prohibition.—The Presbyterian Synod of Harrisburg adopted a resolution almost unanimously, refusing to support any legislative candidates not in sympathy with the prohibitory movement.

Gipsies.—Some of the English Gipsies have been won over to Christianity; and a literary organization has been formed among them, which under the name of the Conver Gipsies has been engaged in successful evangelistic work in the south of England.

Women Preachers.—The Earnest Christian, the organ of the Free Methodists, in speaking of the CANADA CONFERENCE says: "A peculiar feature of the work is the large number of sisters employed on the circuits. They were thus sent out this year as supplies. Their appearance indicates deep piety, modest humility and intelligence. They were neatly and plainly dressed in black, and wore black straw hats, or bonnets, with a plain black ribbon around it."

As a contrast with the action of the Free Methodists, the Ledger says, that Dr. Eat of Louisville, Ky., refused to permit any of the women advocates of temperance to speak from his pulpit during a convention in that city; not, he says, that he is opposed to temperance, which he is not, but because he is bitterly opposed to women preaching, thinking it a sin for them to do so."

For "The Friend."

Natural History, Science, &c.

Consumption.—It is stated that the milk of animals suffering from tubercular disease is capable of transmitting it to previously healthy human beings.—Lancet.

Tetanus or Lockjaw in Bengal.—This disease is more frequent in Bengal than in many other places. Of 280 cases admitted to the Medical College Hospital in Calcutta in ten years, 100 recovered. It is often produced by exposure and debility as well as by mechanical injury.—Lancet.

Blood Poisoning of Wounds.—The number of deaths in the Melbourne Hospital resulting from erysipelas or blood-poisoning in surgical cases, led to the appointment of a committee to consider what steps could be taken to improve the health of the institution. Their report in the Australian Medical Journal commends the thorough adoption and use of the system of treating every wound with carbolic acid or other material, which has the power of destroying those germs of microscopic forms of life which are often abundant in hospitals, and which settling on the exposed surface develop disease.

Conflict between the Farming and Mining Interests in California.—There is a very bitter feeling among the miners toward the farmers.

sts in the valleys which are endeavor-to prevent the filling up of the streams by washings of the miners, which is now done at a rapid rate. It is said that 60-million cubic yards of debris are daily deposited by a river. The matter is far more pernicious than the Chinese question, and vast sums are at stake on both sides. If hydraulic mining goes on in the old way, navigation streams will be made useless for such uses, and a large area of productive valleys destroyed. If mining industries are checked, large sums invested in these mines will be as good as wiped out. This question is likely to come before the courts for settle-

The collection of fir-cones is quite an industry in Puyallup county, W. T. The cones are dried in furnaces till the seeds fall out,
and they are packed up and sold for export.
Large quantities of this seed are planted in the West. The price is from $5 to $8 per hundred.

Plants Used for Food.—In a lecture on this subject delivered at Fairmount Park, Prof.
Huxley says: "Comparing the frigid zones with the torrid, one might say that, whilst the former had a meagre representation in the number of species of plants, yet of these an enormous percentage could be used in some form for food. The equatorial regions, with their immense wealth of specific forms, contained a large percentage of poisonous plants, and, although the same plant often contained both a poison and a food, of which the Cassava or Manihot furnishes an illustration, the poisonous and the starch (tapioca) being distinct. Taking even the flowerless vegetation of Alaska, we find that the lichens enormously preponderate in individuals and all, large enough, may be made to support life, that is, all contain starch, and many mucilage and mucilaginous matter.

The common brake, Pteris Aquilina, which is there abundantly (as it does almost everywhere else,) contains starch enough in its roots to sustain life, and, even in England, it is used by the poorer classes to make bread of. The banana and plantain resemble each other so greatly that they have been regarded as the same species. There is a difference, however, the plantain is cooked, but the banana is not. These have been so long in cultivation that their nativity is unknown. From the fact that the only place on earth where they have been known to seed habitually is the An-till Islands, it is supposed that they originated there, but the conclusion, being indubitable only, may be wrong. The banana is regarded only as a luxury. We should also remember that it is nutrient enough and cheap enough to figure largely as solid food. In the West banana flour is often found in the ground. No plant furnishes so large a return of soil covered as this. Take wheat as a portion of 33, potatoes at 99; for the same area, the yield of bananas would be

The lecturer then exhibited bread from Nicaragua. It is native to the Antill Islands, but has been brought by the British Government to the West India Islands, and thence it has spread to the adjacent regions. The mission of the ship Bonnty, with a mutinous crew peopled Pitcairn's island was to bring the bread fruit plant and the West India.

The "Spanish chestnut" was not a native of Spain at all, but came to Southern Europe originally from China. The Spanish chestnut is used, not so much as a luxury in Southern Europe as a food, where it is eaten roasted, made into a bread or into a sort of porridge.

There was an immense range in the character of chestnuts, only the finer qualities from selected groves commanding the highest prices.

Among the other plants alluded to was the Salvia Columbaria, from our southwestern coast, where it is called Chia. It is remarkable to find a plant belonging to the mint family which possesses the properties this Chia does. In general appearance the seed, when whole or when crushed, is suggestive of flaxseed in size, color and mucilaginous properties. So highly was this plant valued by the native Mexicans prior to the conquest that it was accepted by the Government in payment of taxes. It formed a staple article of diet, and appeared, from the frequency with which it is found buried with the dead, to have had some religious association in the minds of the natives. To this day it is much used by the Mexicans and the other races of the Pacific coast, especially in crossing deserts, or where a wholesome, nutritious diet is required which is light and portable.

How the King of Beasts Kills his Prey.—I once had a rare chance of seeing a lion catch and kill his prey in the open daylight. While on a short hunt to the north of Waterberg, in the Transvaal, in the winter of 1874, with a Dutch Boer, we saddled up one afternoon to shoot a couple of quaggas (Burchell's zebra) for our followers. We had ridden a considerable round without falling in with any, but about an hour before sundown we came across a troop of about fifty. Galloping up within shot, we fired, when one mare dropped. Re-loading and mounting, we started after the troop, which had now disappeared over a ridge. On gaining the rise we saw the quag-ga commencing to ascend a second slope.
Cantering on, my companion suddenly pulled up and pointed out to me a lion trotting swiftly up across the quaggas' line of retreat behind a few scattered boulders and low bushes dotting the slope, evidently with the intention of securing his supper. We moved slowly forward, when the hindmost quagga, thinking we were getting too close, started after his companions at a smart canter. It was now exciting. The quagga was close to the line of the lion's approach; a couple of seconds more and the dark mass of the lion's form shot out from behind a stone on his prey. In a moment the quagga was on the ground.
The lion left him instantly, moved a few yards distant and lay down with his head away from the quagga, twitching his tail nervously from side to side. The whole thing was done so quickly and suddenly that it is difficult to describe. The lion had not yet seen us, but riding nearer he turned and faced, looking rather put out at our appearing on the scene.
At first he seemed inclined to bolt, but at last lay down facing us, evidently unwilling to give up his game. Being anxious to examine the quagga, and knowing my Boer friend to be reliable, we rode up to about fifty yards and dismounted. I held the horses, keeping my double rifle in reserve in case of accident.
The lion, not liking the look of things, got up and walked a few steps toward us, growling savagely. I told the Boer to shoot straight, which he did, and dropped the lion on the spot. On examining the quagga it would appear from the claw mark that the lion's left forearm was thrown over the wither and the claws fixed in the shoulder, the right fore-arm's claws in the chest, the left hind claws had been driven into the flank a little below the level of the hip-bone, the right hind foot evidently on the ground, thus holding the animal as if in a vise, while the teeth had met in the neck about three inches or four inches behind the ears, smashing the bone as effectually as a two-ounce bullet. My two front fingers met in the bite-hole. Death was instantaneous. The lion was a full grown male, with perfect teeth. From all testimony that I could gather from old hunters during seventeen years' residence in the Transvaal, and my own limited observation, I would say that the lion uses his claws as a holding power and kills by bite.—London Field.

Our Flannels.—The value of flannel next the skin cannot be over-rated. It is invaluable to persons of both sexes and all ages, in all countries, in all climates, at every season of the year, for the sick and the well; in brief, I cannot conceive of any circumstances in which flannel next the skin is not a comfort and a source of health. It should not be changed from thick to thin before the settled hot weather of the summer, which in our Northern States is not much before the middle of 6th month, and often not before the first of 7th month. And the flannels for the summer must not be three-quarters cotton, but they must be all woollen, if you would have the best protection. Invalids and delicate persons often take cold by omitting to wear flannel during the night. With the ordinary night-dress there should also be used a flannel shirt of the same thickness as that worn during the day. But the same flannel should not be worn both day and night.

I have seen, I believe, in the light of the Lord, that when antichrist's kingdom is completely overthrown, preaching up war, and making a trade of preaching to get money by, will both be utterly abolished, and remembered with wonder that ever they could have a place among professed Christians.—
J. Scott.

THE FRIEND.

ELEVENTH MONTH 18, 1882.

A friend has favored us with the perusal of a letter which he recently received from one who had been convinced of the blessed efficacy of the Light of Christ—which William Penn speaks of as God's gift for man's salvation—though not joined in outward communion with our Society. He resides in a distant territory, where he very seldom sees the countenance of a Friend.

There is something animating and cheering in the language of this lonely professor of the truth. "I can say that I have nothing dearer and nothing more delightful than to bear testimony to and exalt the all-sufficient Light of our Redeemer which is a perfect antidote against all sin and darkness, and causes us to have remission of sin through the blood of the Lamb."

"How wonderfully has not the divine Light and Spirit been laboring during these 35 years with me! O how vain I was, how vain my love, and I would have gone astray to perdition if my Saviour's holy Light had not restrained me. Everything round me was darkness, and seemed to be an impenetrable barrier against the Light which shone in darkness—but the darkness could not overcome the Light. What a war arose in my poor heart between Light and darkness! and when obedient to the Light, my friends that called themselves Christians scorned me for building [as they said] on my natural feelings and conscience."

"I don't care for the favor of men, or if I am looked upon as a fool for my Master's cause. The disciple must go the same way as his Master, and be baptised with his Master's baptism, and drink his Master's cup, and live by the bread of Heaven."

A friend having sent him some Friends' books, among which was the Journal of William Evans, he thus refers to them—"When I read about such people that have been brought up among God's people, I can say that I was raised in the Egyptian darkness. The priests, the blind leaders of the people, did be the worst of the peoples, and did not seem to think otherwise than post mortem nulla voluptas.

Ede, bibi, ludi

[Eat, drink and play. After death there is no pleasure.]"

Like our early Friends, who were brought through experiences similar to his own, he has a strong testimony to bear against idol-worship, and was greatly grieved by meeting with one whom he calls "a fast Quaker or bogus Quaker"—probably one of those who have lost faith in silent worship, and who did not agree with him in belief as to "our inability to worship God in our own will and time."

The raising up by the immediate operation of Divine Grace of such witnesses to the Lord's power and teaching, and to the preserving efficacy of his Light and Spirit, ought to give fresh courage to those who are endeavoring to advocate the precious doctrines of the Gospel; and to increase their hope and confidence that the Lord in his own time and way will yet cause his truth to spread in the earth, and that He will bless the labors of his faithful servants.

SUMMARY OF EVENTS.

UNITED STATES.—The result of the elections held on the 7th instant, in a large majority of cases was favorable to the Democratic candidates. The successful Republicans were mostly elected by reduced majorities. Grover Cleveland, Democrat, was elected Governor of New York by a majority of over 196,000; the largest that any officer in this country has ever received. B. F. Butler, Democrat, was elected Governor of Massachusetts by a plurality of over 13,000. Robert E. Pattison, Democrat, was elected Governor of Pennsylvania by a plurality of about 38,723. Governor St. John, Republican, of Kansas, was defeated by a small vote, while the rest of the Republican ticket in that State was successful.

The construction of railway main track in the United States during 10th month, as reported by the Railway Age, shows an aggregate of 1068 miles, and for the ten months of this year 9143 miles of new line.

During the year ending 9th mo. 1st, 1882, 827,281 barrels of ale and beer were produced in Cincinnati, Covington and Newport, an increase of 90,000 barrels on the production of last year. Cincinnati's product was 769,621 barrels, an increase of 64 per cent. in seven years.

The corn crop report of the Department of Agriculture for 11th month, indicates a total crop of 1,650,000,000 bushels, or about 30,000,000 bushels below the 10th month estimate.

A bar of gold was recently cast in Nevada City, Cal., which weighed 450 pounds, and is said to be the largest ever cast in this country.

The annual report of the Baltimore and Ohio Railroad for the fiscal year ending 9th mo. 30th, which will be presented at the stockholders' meeting 11th mo. 20th, shows the gross receipts to have been over $18,000,000.

The building, Nos. 243 and 245 Pearl street, New York, occupied by several parties, was burned on the 8th inst. through an explosion in the paint and oil store of Hsley, Doubleday & Co., on the ground floor. The total loss is estimated at upwards of $30,000. One young man perished in the building. It is supposed that the explosion was caused by a spark from an electric light wire coming in contact with a quantity of varnish.

By acts of their Legislatures the waters of Long Island Sound have been divided between the States of New York and Connecticut for the purpose of determining fishing rights and possible questions of jurisdiction. Judge Nelson, of the U. S. Court in New York, however, has rendered a decision that "Long Island Sound is a part of the Atlantic Ocean, and its navigation is not governed by the provisions of the act regulating inland waters." Should this decision be sustained, neither New York nor Connecticut can exercise proprietary rights in the Sound fisheries.

Professor Brooks, of the Red House Observatory, at Phelps, New York, reports the "observance" on Second-day morning, the 13th inst., of the grandest auroral display seen for many years. "A vast, brilliant arch illuminated the landscape equal to the light of the moon in her first quarter, followed by immense streams and waves of light projected with startling velocity from the horizon to the zenith. Great meteorological disturbances may be expected."

There were 323 deaths in this city last week, a decrease of 35 from the previous week and 36 less than the corresponding period of last year. Of the whole number, 156 were males and 167 females: 56 died of consumption; 27 of diphtheria; 17 of croup; 17 of old age; 14 from typhoid fever; 13 from pneumonia, and 9 from Bright's disease of the kidneys.

Markets, &c.—U. S. 3's, 102½; 3½'s, 102; 4½'s, registered, 112½; coupon, 113½; 4's, 119½; currency 6's, 123.

Cotton.—There was no essential change to notice in price or demand. Sales of middlings are reported at 10½ a 11 cts. per pound for uplands and New Orleans.

Petroleum.—Standard white, 8½ cts. for export, and 9½ cts. per gallon for home use.

Flour is in limited request and favors buyers. Sales of 2000 barrels, including Minnesota extras, at $5.75 a $6.25; Pennsylvania family at $4.75 a $5; western do. at $5.25 a $5.75, and patents at $6.40 a $7.50. Rye flour is firm at $4.25 a $4.37½ per barrel.

Grain.—Wheat was dull and unsettled. Sales of 3700 bushels red, in car lots at $1.04 a $1.12. Rye is nominally quoted at 71 a 73 cts per bushel. Corn is dull and prices are easier. Sales of 8900 bushels in car lots, at 84 a 86 cts. Oats are in fair request and firm. Sales of 9500 bushels, in car lots, at 42 a 47 cts.

Hay and Straw Market, for week ending 11th mo. 11th, 1882.—Loads of hay, 298; loads of straw, 62. Average price during the week—Prime timothy, $1 to $1.10 per 100 pounds; mixed, 95 cts. to $1.05 per 100 pounds; straw, 80 to 90 cts. per 100 pounds.

Beef cattle closed dull and unsettled. About 3500 head arrived and sold at the different yards at 3¼ a 6¼ cts. per lb., the latter rate for extra.

Sheep were unsettled: 13,000 head arrived and sold at the different yards, at 2¼ a 6 cts., and lambs at 4 a 7 cts. per pound, as to condition.

Hogs were a fraction lower: 6000 head arrived and sold at the different yards at 9½ a 11 cts. per lb., the latter rate for extra Chicago.

FOREIGN.—Dublin, 11th mo. 12th.—Judge Lawson evidently had a narrow escape from assassination last evening. Since his appointment as one of the Judges under the Prevention of Crimes Act, and especially since the severe newspaper comments upon him, he has never gone out without police protection. He has received a large number of threatening letters, and it is alleged, has been sentenced to death by a secret tribunal. He was walking last evening on Merion street, followed at the distance of a few yards by two constables, while two army pensioners, who were engaged to assist the constables, kept him in view from the other side of the street. The party had nearly reached the Club House, when a man having the appearance of an artisan pushed against Corporal McDonnell, one of the pensioners, in endeavoring to pass him somewhat hastily, and said, in a confidential manner, "It is all right." McDonnell thought there was something suspicious in the man's manner, and walked as near him as possible without attracting his attention. When opposite the Club House, the man crossed the street and turned to meet Ju Lawson. McDonnell, who meanwhile, had noticed but of a revolver protruding from an inner pocket the man's coat, rushed after him, loudly proclaiming his discovery and, knocking him down, obtained the revolver after a struggle, in which McDonnell received a cut on the hand. On the way to the station, the prisoner endeavored to get rid of a dozen cartridges. His name is Patrick Delaney. He is a returned convict, who is 1870 was sentenced to servitude for robbery and attempted murder. As the revolver found on Delaney is an expensive one, the police believe that it was supplied to him, as his circumstances would not permit him to buy such a costly article.

The Dublin Freeman's Journal says, Gladstone has yet has declared so clearly his opinion as to the necessity for home rule in Ireland as he did in the House of Commons on the night of the 8th inst. The whole Kingdom will recognize that the cause of Home Rule has been distinctly advanced by his speech.

The returns issued by the Board of Trade show that during the month just passed, British imports increased £2,800,000, as compared with that month in last year, while the exports decreased £363,900, as compared with the 10th mo. 1881.

A despatch from Derby reports that the explosion in the Claycross colliery 11th mo. 7th, caused the loss of 43 lives, including those of injured workmen who had since died.

Vegetarianism is rapidly making progress in Ireland. The temperance people are aiding it, and vegetarian dining rooms are being opened in the towns.

A despatch from Berlin to the Daily News says: laws against the Socialists will probably not be retained. Prince Bismarck is opposed to them, as he does not think they have proved efficient.

Traders from the Soudan report that El Obeid, where the false prophet had been besieging, has been relieved.

A despatch to the Daily News from Cairo says: Commission of inquiry preliminary to the trial of A. Pasha has repudiated the forms of procedure agreed upon between Arabi's counsel and the prosecution. The Commission now insists that witnesses cannot be cross-examined directly, and that the trial must be finished by Christmas. Counsel have protested.

Henry M. Stanley's steamer, Harkaway, left Antwerp on the 12th inst. for the Congo river, laden with an assortment of goods as will enable him to establish a solid trade with the native kings. The steamer carries a number of sheep for acclimatization, an assortment of European cereals. Stanley has gone to recruit his health. He will return to Africa early in 1883.

Manilla, 11th mo. 8th.—A typhoon passed over to-day doing great damage.

Forty-eight deaths occurred in Mecca from cholera on 11th mo. 29th.

The Minister of Public Works of Mexico has issued a circular "encouraging silk growing throughout the Republic."

It is stated that, during the present year, up to month 31st, 153,055 immigrants arrived in Canada, of whom 82,482 remained in the Dominion. This does not include arrivals in British Columbia or from the United States border between Emerson and the Rocky Mountains.

FRIENDS' BOARDING SCHOOL, BARNESVILLE, OHIO.

Wanted a Superintendent and Matron to take charge of this Institution at the close of the present winter. Friends of Ohio Yearly Meeting, who may be drawn to the service, are requested to communicate with Aaron Frame, or Asa Garretson, Barnesville, Mont county, Ohio.

FRIENDS' ASYLUM FOR THE INSANE

Near Frankford, (Twenty third Ward,) Philadelphia. Physician and Superintendent—JOHN C. HALL. Applications for the Admission of Patients made to the Superintendent, or to any of the Board Managers.

DIED, on the 16th of 12th mo. 1881, PRESBURY W. in the 67th year of his age, an esteemed member of the Sandwich Monthly Meeting, Mass. was an unassuming man who loved retirement, was quiet and peaceful in his last illness, and as one waiting for his Lord, saying, "My spirit is in the arms of my dear Redeemer."

WILLIAM H. PILE, PRINTER,
No. 422 Walnut Street.

THE FRIEND.

A RELIGIOUS AND LITERARY JOURNAL.

OL. LVI.

SEVENTH-DAY, ELEVENTH MONTH 25, 1882.

NO. 16.

PUBLISHED WEEKLY.

If paid in advance, $2.00 per annum; if not paid in advance $2.50; 10 cents extra is charged for Postage on those sent by mail.

Articles designed for insertion to be addressed to

JOSEPH WALTON,
MOORESTOWN, BURLINGTON CO., N. J.

Orders, payments and business communications, received by

JOHN S. STOKES,
O. 116 NORTH FOURTH STREET, UP STAIRS,
PHILADELPHIA.

For "The Friend,"

Ancient Testimonies and Advices.

UNDER COUNSEL AND ENCOURAGEMENT TO THE YOUNG.

We recommend, that such Friends as are concerned in the affairs of the church, in the quarterly, Monthly, or Particular Meetings, be careful to act therein in the wisdom of God: whereby they will be exemplary to the young; and may be esteemed members thereof, and of the same. And as such young persons are found to be qualified with a real knowledge of Truth on their spirits, and subjection to the Lord, and thereby are made capable to come and serve in their respective meetings; and as they are desired to encourage and bring forward therein; whereby they may be edified to the ancients, and brought up in a knowledge of God's holy name; and standing in the lot, will supply the place of the elders in church meetings, through the same spirit, when they are gone."—1722.

We earnestly entreat our young Friends, to have all readiness of mind to receive and give to the labor of love and wholesome admonitions bestowed upon them by their parents or others, for their benefit and instruction; and carefully to avoid all evil company, which corrupts good manners, and leads into disorder and extravagancy."—1736. As many of our worthy elders have of late years been removed from us by death, we tenderly entreat, that an holy concern prevail on your minds, who are of the present generation, to fill up their places; first heed to yourselves, 'seeking the kingdom of God and his righteousness,' that so they may be preserved through the temptations and from all the delusions in this life, and may become instruments in the hand of God to promote his honor, the good of his church, and the universal advancement of holiness and virtue. And, dearly beloved youth, do remember the examples of Joseph, David, Samuel, and many other instances of piety; consider the preservation they have been favored with through every trial, and the nature of that dignity wherewith their names have been transmitted through many generations. He who raised and supported them, and hath, from age to age, formed a people to testify to his salvation, and stand up to the cause of righteousness, hath ever rewarded them with serenity of mind, and the enjoyment of that peace, 'which is as a river, the streams whereof make glad the city of God.' Let not the amusements, the gaieties, and other delusive follies, which too many earnestly pursue, take up your minds, and thereby prevent your offering the early tribute of love and obedience, so justly due to the Author of your being, and the fountain of every blessing."—1762.

"Dear young people, as some of you, in many places, have embraced the renewed visitations of Divine love in your hearts, and have, in degree, entered into covenant with your Creator; strong is the engagement we feel for your preservation and advancement in the path of the just; that, through the power of Divine grace and your faithful obedience thereunto, you may become useful members in the body, and fill up the various stations in the church, to its edification and your own lasting advantage.

"And the youth in general we entreat; that a constant care be upon all your minds, to press after the power and virtue of that heavenly principle, in the profession whereof most of you have had your education. If you keep your places therein, it will preserve you; but if through disobedience ye depart therefrom, ye forsake your own mercies, and others will take your crown. Remember the children of Abraham, by deviating from the steps of their fathers, lost the privileges and blessings they would otherwise no doubt have received."—1763.

"We affectionately request the youth amongst us, who are favored with pious and exemplary parents, to pay all dutiful regard to their instruction and example, and that they be very cautious of bringing grief and dishonor upon them by departing from the safe and commendable simplicity of the Truth, the moderation and plainness it leads to both in dress and address, and in every other part of their conduct and behavior. 'Honor thy father and mother,' the apostle observes, 'is the first commandment with promise.' Such, therefore, who reject the advice of godly parents, and set light by their example and authority, both bring dishonor on their parents, and forfeit their own title to the holy promise of God. We, therefore, most fervently beseech our rising youth to buy the Truth and sell it not; not to fashion themselves after the practice of those who manifestly deviate from the pattern of our Lord and Saviour Jesus Christ, and his humble self-denying followers, but that they may tread in the footsteps of the flock of his companions, 'become servants to God, and have their fruit unto holiness, that their end may be everlasting life.'

"The advice of Divine Wisdom is, 'Buy the Truth and sell it not.' But those who prefer the gaiety, the vain customs, and fluctuating fashions of this world, renounce wisdom for folly, duty for disobedience, and the reality of enduring substance for the flattering delusion of transitory enjoyments."—1768.

"We beseech you, dear young people, who are sensible of the visitation from on high, and have tasted the power of its love, suffer nothing to draw you from it. 'See that ye refuse not Him that speaketh; for if they escaped not who refused Him that spake on earth, much more shall not we escape, if we turn away from Him that speaketh from heaven.' This inward speaker is the Spirit of your Redeemer. Esteem his reproofs above the world's caresses, and prize his cross before all its enjoyments; for these will soon terminate in disappointment and sorrow, but that will lead to enduring substance. The way to the crown is strait to flesh and blood, and there is no other by which it can be obtained. Be neither afraid nor ashamed of it. Enter it in the days of your youth, and whether you reach to old age or not, as you steadily persevere therein, you will have cause to rejoice in that peace which passeth the understanding of the carnal mind. Great is the advantage you possess above those in more advanced years, who have long suffered themselves to be ensnared into negligence and delays, and who being again mercifully awakened to behold their danger, deeply deplore the loss they have sustained, and the difficulty they find in their return, from the many entanglements and inconveniences their former remissness hath subjected them to. Improve the precious opportunity put into your hands. 'Seek the Lord while He is to be found; call upon Him while He is near.' It will be highly beneficial to you, and contribute much to your strength and consolation, if you employ that time in attending upon God, and seeking to advance in Divine life and virtue, which so many of our fellow creatures inconsiderately lavish away in idle and unprofitable discourse, in conversing with the numerous publications calculated to divert their attention from the Sacred Writings, and from a virtuous and godly life, by gratifying the passions, exciting levity, or instilling the pernicious principles of infidelity and licentiousness, and also in the pursuit of various kinds of dissipating and ruinous entertainments; those dangerous snares of Satan, which corrupt and captivate unguarded minds, whilst they pass upon them under the deceitful color of innocent amusements. Give due regard to that apostolic advice, 'Flee youthful lusts; but follow righteousness, faith, charity, peace, with them that call on the Lord with a pure heart.' 2 Tim. ii. 22.

"We are sensible that many of you have experienced the work of Truth begun, and in measure carried on in your hearts, to whom our exhortation is, stand always open thereunto. Set no bounds in your minds to the operation of the Holy Spirit, either from inclination to self-indulgence, or from the fear or favor of men. It is not for man to say to his Maker, 'Hitherto I will follow thee, and no further. I must allow myself this and the other liberty, in speech, in dress, in behavior, in converse, in commerce, or in any kind of self-gratification.' You can never obtain Divine approbation by this means, but will surely incur the displeasure of Him you were created to obey, administer cause for Him to withdraw the sense of his preserving presence from you, and leave you to the painful fruits of your own devices. Remember, 'The way of man is not in himself: It is not in man that walketh to direct his steps. The steps of a good man are ordered by the Lord.'" —1774.—From London Epistles.

For "The Friend."

Effect of the Penal Laws of the Eighteenth Century on Irish Character.

It is a remark that has been frequently made, that many of the Irish who emigrate to this country, do not appear to have a strong feeling as to the necessity of adhering to the truth in their statements. Many of them will deliberately tell falsehoods, if they hope thereby to promote their interests; and are apparently almost unconscious that in so doing they are committing a moral wrong. In this respect their system of morality is below that which they exhibit in other parts of their conduct. It is an interesting and important question to determine how such a trait ever became fastened on the national character; for the natural impulses of man, and the teachings of Divine Grace, lead him to speak the truth.

Considerable light is thrown on this subject by the review of Irish history, after the expulsion of James the Second from the British crown, contained in Lecky's History of England. An intolerant spirit then prevailed, and the Catholic population of Ireland were subjected to great oppression and hardship. The laws which were enacted were very arbitrary and unjust. "Every thing indeed connected with the history of those times," says Lecky, "corroborates the assertion of Burke, himself a Protestant, that 'all the penal laws of that unparalleled code of oppression, were manifestly the effects of national hatred and scorn towards a conquered people whom the victors delighted to trample upon and were not at all afraid to provoke. * * Whilst that temper prevailed, and it prevailed in all its force to a time within our memory, every measure was pleasing and popular just in proportion as it tended to harass and ruin a set of people who were looked upon as enemies to God and man, and, indeed, as a race of savages, who were a disgrace to human nature itself.'"

By Act of Parliament Irish Catholics were deprived of the elective suffrage, excluded from the corporations, from the magistracy, from the bar, from the bench, from the grand juries, and from the vestries. They could not be sheriffs or solicitors or even gamekeepers or constables. They were forbidden to possess any arms, and could not possess a horse of the value of more than £5, and any Protestant, on tendering that sum, could appropriate the hunter or carriage horse of his Catholic neighbor. In his own country the Catholic was only recognized by the law for repression and punishment. Indeed the doctrine was distinctly laid down from the bench, "that the law does not suppose any such person to exist as an Irish Roman Catholic."

The Catholic was excluded from the University. He was not permitted to be the guardian of a child. It was made penal for him to keep school, to act as usher or private tutor, or to send his children to be educated abroad. The schools in which they might legally be educated were avowedly intended, by bringing up the young as Protestants, to extirpate the religion of their parents.

The great confiscations under James I., Cromwell, and William, had done much to make the land-owners of Ireland exclusively Protestant. The penal laws continued the work. No Catholic was suffered to buy land, or inherit or receive it as a gift from Protestants. A Catholic had not power to dispose of his landed estate, but at his death it was to be equally divided among his sons, unless the eldest became a Protestant, in which case the whole was settled on him. A Protestant woman, who was a landowner, if she married a Catholic, was at once deprived of her inheritance, which passed to the nearest Protestant heir.

Though the laws of Elizabeth prohibiting Catholic worship were unrepealed, yet, Lecky says, "the hopeless task of preventing some three fourths of the nation from celebrating the rites which they believed essential to their eternal salvation, was not attempted." Every Catholic priest was required to be registered before he could celebrate mass, which he might then do without molestation. But all the bishops and other higher orders of the clergy were ordered to leave the island, and were liable to be hung if they returned. The same penalties were prescribed for the unregistered priests and friars, and large inducements held out to any who would procure their arrest.

"It was impossible, without producing a state of chronic civil war, to enforce such enactments in the midst of a large Catholic population. Rewards were offered for the apprehension of priests, but it needed no small courage to face the hatred of the people. Savage mobs were ever ready to mark out the known priest-hunter, and unjust laws were met by illegal violence. Under the long discipline of the penal laws, the Irish Catholics learnt the lesson which, beyond all others, rulers should dread to teach. They became consummate adepts in the arts of conspiracy and of disguise. Secrets known to hundreds were preserved inviolable from authority. False intelligence baffled and distracted the pursuer, and the dread of some fierce nocturnal vengeance was often sufficient to quell the cupidity of the prosecutor. Bishops came to Ireland in spite of the atrocious penalties to which they were subject, and ordained new priests. What was to be done with them? The savage sentence of the law, if duly executed, might have produced a conflagration in Ireland that would have endangered every Protestant life, and the scandal would have rung through Europe."

Edmund Burke says this code of laws was "as well fitted for the oppression, impoverishment and degradation of a people, and the debasement in them of human nature itself, as ever proceeded from the perverted ingenuity of man." The greater part of it continued in force for nearly a century, and to its operation much of the duplicity, disregard of law and resort to violence and murder which have stained the Irish character, may fairly be ascribed. "They were educated through long generations of oppression into an inveterate hostility to the law, and was taught to look for redress in illegal violence or secret combinations." J. W.

Selected for "The Friend"

Continual Change of Scene.

The child of faith needs to be assured the will of the Lord, before he goes forth foreign travel, aimless in all but the gratification of what is called the "natural taste." The continual change of scene, the contrast with what he would at first gladly avoid, otherwise humble or depress him. It is possibly end by his looking more leniently what first filled him with dismay and led him to his knees. The lovely scenes and enervating climate, may weaken the life faith by giving a preponderance to the sense. Thus his own fair inheritance, the eternal glory, will wax paler and pale the spiritual eye. Things that cease to be desired are no longer realized, and this world's idols take possession of the mind. With Christ as our companion, our Shepherd our light, we may sojourn safely in the stranger's land as elsewhere. Without Him there is danger everywhere: perhaps in no position so insidiously as in foreign travel.

For "The Friend"

Westtown Boarding School.

12th mo. 14th, 1849. The following minute was adopted and directed to be signed the clerk, appended to the information transmitted, in the form of a circular, to parents and guardians of the pupils now at the school.

"Much inconvenience has been experienced from the practice, which has of late increased of removing children from the school previous to the examination at the close of the session. As such removal is a violation of the regulations, and deprives the children of one of the incentives to industry and exertion in the view of their studies, and also produces much uneasiness and unsettlement among the scholars that remain, it has become the subject of concern to those having charge of the institution. Parents and others are therefore earnestly requested not to allow, nor give their children any reason to expect that they will be taken from the school before the expiration of term for which they are entered;" except under peculiar circumstances and with the consent of the Superintendent.

From the report of 4th month, 1850. The number of pupils during the year ending 10th mo. previous, was 191—100 boys and 91 girls.

"Notwithstanding the prevalence of cholera as an epidemic disease, in various parts of our land during some portions of the year, no case of the kind occurred in school, and the family there was favored by a usual degree of health.

"Notwithstanding the difficulties which attend the conducting of such a school, with a great diversity presents in the dispositions and habits of the pupils, the committee believe that as it is managed under the spirit of Christian love, and a well regulated discipline is maintained, it will continue to shed a beneficial influence upon the youth, which manifest itself in after life, and thus, under the Divine blessing, contribute to the spread of sound principles and practice."

There is good reason to believe that iment here expressed by the Friends at time concerned in properly conducting large and interesting Seminary, has been used in many instances, some of which come to the knowledge of the writer. who was a pupil at Westtown, not long after the commencement of the present century, subsequently entered the legal profession, became a prominent man in public life, holding several responsible positions, but who, being separated for more than half a century from membership with the Society of Friends, has lately returned by making a factory acknowledgment, remarked during a recent interview, "that the effect of the teaching of Thos. Scattergood, at Westtown Boarding School in 1808, had never been effaced from his mind." A useful and intelligent conscientious member of the Philadelphia bar, now beyond middle age, attributes much of his success in life to the early training he received at Westtown.

W. K. Price,* in the memoir of his parents, Philip and Rachel Price, in speaking of their connection with Westtown, remarks of it:— "the value of the instruction derived at this Seminary has been of incalculable service to members of the Society of Friends, presenting them generally in advance of others in all circumstances for intelligence, respectability of character and power of usefulness. although the immediate benefit be exclusively to members of the Society, the remote advantages have been widely diffused throughout the States of the Union, not only in the number of educated citizens sent forth to mix as active members of the community, but by multiplying good teachers to add largely the benefits of education. How often the Society of Friends has thus been benefactors of the country it would be difficult to overestimate, and it is a stream of beneficence that flows on perpetually."

In confirmation of the above was the statement made some years since by Dr. Wilmer Thompson, deceased, then representing Chester county in the State Senate, in regard to having been whilst he was a member of that body, an attempt made at Harrisburg to pass a law imposing a tax upon the Westtown School property, and which he had successfully resisted, telling his fellow-members in the lower house, where the bill originated, "whilst Westtown Boarding School had educated her hundreds and thousands, without asking one dollar from the public coffers, and institutions of a like character throughout the State were annually at their doors asking money for their support."

W. K. Price adds, that it was while Philip Price was superintendent, that some of the improvements of the property were commenced that have been since greatly advanced by the laying out of walks and planting of trees, now become groves of ample size for recreation and scenery, in keeping with the beautiful and varied landscapes that surround this retreat of learning.

Whilst penning this article the writer has been called upon by a lawyer of some prominence, having a profitable practice (not a sinecure) to obtain admission for a relative at Westtown, saying that from his examination of a young man in his office who had received education at that school, he had formed a high opinion of the thoroughness of the system of teaching there practised. Whilst deriving some encouragement from such circumstances as are here narrated, and it is believed they are by no means isolated ones, it is well for those now charged with the responsibility of rightly conducting Westtown, to bear in mind that the first and great desire of the dear and valued Friends who were concerned in its establishment, was to imbue the tender minds committed to their care, with a deep sense of their religious responsibility; to make them acquainted with the doctrines and testimonies as held by our religious Society, and the grounds on which they rest. It is believed that as this duty is entered upon in the Divine fear, with sincere desires that a blessing may rest upon the efforts, they will be brought to see the beautiful harmony that exists between the principles of Truth as held by us, and the teaching of the early Christians as well as of the dear Saviour himself.

The Orphan's Protection.—I recently heard a beautiful incident of three little German girls, whose friends were in America, and who wanted to go thither. They were somewhere from eight to twelve years old, and the question was how to get them across the great ocean, and away into the interior of America. There was no one to go with them, they must go alone; and no one could tell what troubles might assail them, or what dangers might surround them. But their friends had faith in God, and before they sent them out, they got a book, and on the fly-leaf of it they wrote a sentence in German, in French and in English, and they told the little children when they started:

"If you get into any trouble, or need any help, you just stand still and open this book and hold it right up before you."

Then they started the children off on their long journey, by railway and by steamship, from place to place, and from port to port; and wherever they went, if any trouble occurred or any difficulty arose, the children would stop and open the book, and hold it up before them, and they always found some one who could read German or English or French, and who was ready to help them on their way.

And so in due time they reached their friends far off in the interior of America.

And what were those words which proved such a talisman and protection to these children, among strangers, and in a strange land? What were the words that made the careless civil and thoughtful, and the rough and reckless kind? They were the words of One who lived on the earth long years ago, and who, though He has passed away from human vision, yet holds his grasp upon the minds of men. These were his words:

"And the king shall answer and say unto them, 'Verily I say unto you, Inasmuch as ye have done it unto one of the least of these my brethren, ye have done it unto me.'—Matt. xxv. 40.)"

These words, written upon the fly-leaf of a New Testament, made them friends among strangers, gave them protection and help in every hour of need, opened doors before them, and made rough places plain and crooked places straight.—The Christian.

We must pray as earnestly for grace as for comfort.

Selected.

Among the Women of India.

BY THE DAUGHTER OF A DECEASED MISSIONARY.

To the new-comer in India one of the strangest among many strange sights is the sad and hopeless look stamped on the faces of the women.

I never pass through the streets of Boston, and see the bright, happy, independent faces of its women and girls, without thinking of the contrast between them and their dusky-faced sisters in India.

In the words of a veteran missionary, "Young women in India are treated as dirt, and girls are ciphers that have no claims of any kind." Of course, the women you meet in the streets of the heathen cities are those of the lower classes, but even in the "zenanas" or "apartments for women," among the wealthy classes, the despair seems to deepen on the fairer faces, for their seclusion is absolute, and there is nothing to break the dreary monotony of the days full of gossip, strife and quarreling, without books or work, without the cheerful sunshine of Christianity, until death ends the sorrowful years.

The Christian missionary's gentle deferential treatment of his own wife is a matter of constant surprise and remark by the Hindoo gentlemen.

A wealthy native gentleman (a banker) named Gover Dun Das, often visited my father when we lived in Futtoghur, in Northern India. He so far deferred to Christian customs as to shake hands with my mother when she entered the parlor, but he invariably brought a brass vessel of water with him, and as soon as she had left the room he would step out on the veranda and carefully wash his hands in this water, so ridding himself of the pollution of a woman's touch.

He often expressed the greatest wonder when he saw my father extend to my mother the simple acts of courtesy which we American women accept as our right.

One morning we visited, at his request, the zenana, where his wife and his son's wives lived, together with the mothers-in-law, aunts and the poor "little widows," whose lot is saddest of all.

As we entered the court-yard we caught glimpses of fair faces peering curiously behind the lattice-work. My father remained with the men while we passed into the women's apartments. Here we found ten or eleven women, beautifully dressed in silken robes and covered with jewels. They presented us with sweetmeats and sprinkled us with "ottar of roses," while examining our clothes with greatest interest. My mother longed to tell them some word of Christ, as she answered their eager inquiries of the outside world. But this had been strictly forbidden beforehand, for, in the words of Gover Dun Das, "Christianity was all a dream, and there was no need of putting it into the women's heads." Then we told them of our days, full of books and work, long walks and talks and happy songs in the twilight. We asked them what they did?

"Oh," they answered, "we tell fairy stories, and we try on our new dresses and jewels, and we sleep, yet the days are very long. * * * We have talked of your promised visit for weeks, and, after it is over, we will have something to talk about for a long time to come."

Poor things! With an aching heart my mother turned away, for had she not brought

* W. K. Price was a pupil at the school in 1813 and although now beyond 85 years, is still clear in mind and vigorous in body for that advanced age.

the bread of life to hungry souls, yet they could not take it! It was a very different class of women that my mother met twice a week on our back veranda. Here in the shade of the honeysuckles a few poor women of lower castes timidly crouched, while she taught them of Christ, who spoke kindly even to women; who said to the trembling creature at his feet: "Daughter, be of good comfort: go in peace." These poor women always brought some coarse garment which my mother taught them to make or mend. My mother chose for them the passages where Christ spoke to women. With wistful faces they listened to the story of Mary weeping at the sepulchre—of the woman who was a sinner, yet anointed his feet—and many others.

One day they heard for the first time, "Come unto me, all ye that labor and are heavy laden, and I will give you rest."

Eagerly a tired-looking woman looked up and dropped her work: "Is it the Christ who says that?"

"Yes," said my mother.

"And how long is that rest to last?"

"Forever and ever."

"But," said another woman, who was cast out and despised by her sons, "how do we know that message is for us? Christ was kind to women, but did he care for women? Perhaps those words are only for the men."

Then my mother told her of how Christ cared for his mother with his dying breath, as he commended her to John and said, "Behold thy mother!"

"Then he was good to his mother," she said while her tears fell fast. "Yes, he loved his mother; I will believe those words are for me."

So as little children they took Him at his word, and found as they said; "something worth living for now."

Many of our State and County "Agricultural Fairs" might better be designated horse-races, for the main feature, the great central interest of the occasion, is the horse-racing. Take away that, and most of them would suddenly and completely collapse. Yet what there is about a horse-race that is "agricultural" it is difficult to see. Endangering life or limb of man or beast does not become an innocent pastime by being denominated an "Agricultural Fair," nor does the betting on such occasions become pious and allowable because the demoralizing pastime is carried on under an innocent name.—Selected.

The Duke of Wellington had an adventure which might have cost him his life if his self-possession had not been extraordinary. One day as he was writing at his desk, with a pile of unanswered letters before him, he heard a step, and, looking up, saw a tall, gaunt figure standing before him, with a drawn sword in his hand. "Who are you?" said the Duke. "I am Apollyon. I am sent to kill you." "What," said the Duke, "with all these letters unanswered? I have not time to attend to it to-day. Call to-morrow at ten, and I will be at leisure." So saying he rang the bell, Apollyon retired, but before he left the house was secured. In some way he had passed the servants unobserved. If the Duke had lost his self-possession he might have been killed, or, at the best, had to fight for his life at a great disadvantage.

EVENING HYMN.

The golden bars are open
In the portals of the west;
The earth is left in shadow;
The sun has gone to rest;
Night's veil is gathering slowly,
Star-studded, faintly grey;
May all things living thank thee, Lord,
At the ending of the day.

Through all the hours of sunlight
Thy smile hath made us glad;
Hath comforted the weary,
And eased the poor and sad;
And through the hours of darkness,
When all are wrapped in sleep,
Thy ever wakeful eye above
Its silent watch will keep.

Oh, when our souls are passing Away beyond the west;
When shadows gather round us
At thy sweet call to rest,
Keep us, Eternal Spirit,
From fears and vain alarms,
Oh, take us, mighty Saviour,
Into thy loving arms.

And when we cross the river,
That strange calm stream of death,
Receive, oh, blest Redeemer,
Our last and faintest breath.
Till we, beyond all sorrow,
Rest near the jasper sea,
And day, and night, and morrow
Merge in eternity.

A. B.
Selected.

THE LIGHTHOUSE.

BY EMILY HUNTINGTON MILLER.

The tide comes up and the tide goes down,
Over the rocks so rugged and brown,
And the cruel sea, with a hungry roar,
Dashes its breakers along the shore;
But steady and clear, with a constant ray,
The star of the lighthouse shines away.

The ships come sailing across the main,
But the harbor mouth is hard to gain,
For the treacherous reef lies close beside,
And the rocks are bare at the ebbing tide,
And the blinding fog comes down at night,
Shrouding and hiding the harbor light.

The sailors, sailing their ships along,
Will tell you a tale of the lighthouse strong;
How once, when the keeper was far away,
A terrible storm swept down the bay,
And two little children were left to keep Their awesome watch with the angry deep.

The fair little sisters wept, dismayed,
But the brother said, "I am not afraid;
There's One who ruleth on sea and land,
And holds the waves in his mighty hand,
For Christ's dear sake I will watch to-night,
And feed, for the sailors, the beacon light."

So the sailors heard through the murky shroud,
The fog bell sounding its warning loud;
While the children up in the lonely tower,
Tended the lamp in the midnight hour,
And prayed for any whose souls might be
In deadly peril by land or sea.

Ghostly and dim, when the storm was o'er,
The ships rode safely, far off the shore,
And a boat shot out from the town that lay,
Dusk and purple, across the bay.
She touched her keel to the lighthouse strand,
And the eager keeper leaped to land.

And swiftly climbing the lighthouse stair,
He called to his children, young and fair;
But, worn with their toilsome watch, they slept,
While slowly over their foreheads crept,
The golden light of the morning sun,
Like a victor's crown, when his palm is won.

"God bless ye, children," the keeper cried.
"God bless thee, father," the boy replied.
"I dreamed that there stood beside my bed,
A beautiful angel who smiled and said,
Blessed are they whose love can make Joy of labor, for Christ's dear sake."

—Little Corporal.

HEALTH ALPHABET.*

Selected

A—s soon as you are up, shake blanket and sheet;
B—etter be without shoes than sit with wet feet;
C—hildren, if healthy, are active, not still;
D—amp beds and damp clothes, will both make you ill;
E—at slowly, and always chew your food well;
F—reshen the air in the house where you dwell;
G—arments must never be made too tight;
H—omes should be healthy, airy and light;
I—f you wish to be well, as you do, I've no doubt,
J—ust open the windows before you go out;
K—eep your rooms always tidy and clean;
L—et dust on the furniture never be seen;
M—uch illness is caused by the want of pure air;
N—ow to open your windows be ever your care;
O—ld rags and old rubbish should never be kept;
P—eople should see that their floors are well swept;
Q—uick movements in children are healthy and right;
R—emember, the young cannot thrive without light;
S—ee that the cistern is clean to the brim;
T—ake care that your dress is all tidy and trim;
U—se your nose to find if there be a bad drain,
V—ery sad are the fevers that come from its train;
W—alk as much as you can without feeling fatigue;
X—erxes could walk full many a league;
Y—our health is your wealth, which your wisdom must keep;
Z—eal will help a good cause, and the good you reap.

A Wonderful Deliverance.—Among the foothills at the base of Pike's Peak is an immense deposit of gypsum. It is quarried and taken to a mill near by where it is ground into plaster of Paris. The vein dips at a slight angle into the hill, and after it had been worked several months there was left an immense mass of overhanging rock which was thought to be perfectly secure. One day last several men were working under that ledge of sloping rock. One of them was a praying man and an outspoken Christian. Something went wrong with his work. The profane man told him to swear at it if he wanted it to go right. Looking up he calmly replied, "No; praying is better than swearing. If I get into trouble and ask my heavenly Father to help me He will hear my prayer."

A few hours later those two men were working under the ledge of rock, when some one shouted from above that the whole mass was giving way. The profane man jumped outward while the other jumped in toward the wall, when the great mass of rock fell with an awful crash. The one who jumped outward was caught by a rock falling on his leg. His companions failed to extricate him as they started for town to summon help, supposing, of course, that the other man was crushed to death.

After they were gone the profane man lay there alone, when suddenly he heard the voice of prayer issuing from the rocks. Said afterward, "I never heard such a prayer all my life." It was the prayer of a man who, rescued from one terrible death, looked another calmly in the face. The great rock had broken in two just over his head, and falling had left a cavity where he was known as in "the secret place of the Most High." At first he was stunned by the falling stones and clouds of dust, but recovering consciousness he found that the stones around him were loose and that he was in a dark place where he could move about. Supposing that it would take days for his companions to remove the great rocks, and that he must die there, he resigned himself to his fate, and concluded to spend his time in prayer. In the dense darkness

* The Ladies' Sanitary Association of London, give the above simple rules for keeping healthy.

he poured out his soul to God. After lying for a while he began to look around to see if there was any chance of escape. He saw a little ray of light, and removing a few stones he discovered a passage way near the rock just large enough for his body. Crawling painfully along for some rods he appeared to his astonished companion, when he succeeded in rescuing from the rock. At this time a crowd of men appeared on the shore, but there was no need of their services. The praying man again prayed. He knelt on the ground before those rough men and poured out his thanks to God for the wonderful deliverance.

And one of them afterward, "I am ashamed of myself that I did not go and kneel by his side." This true incident has more than one moral, and our readers may draw them for themselves.—Good Words.

For "The Friend."

William Penn and the Indians.

In the course of one of the public discourses lately delivered in this city, respecting the character of William Penn, some remarks are reported to have been made implying that, in settlement of the Province, William Penn induced to, or encouraged among the natives, the use of intoxicating liquors. How correctly the remarks may have been reported we do not know; but as these derogatory elements have to a certain extent been circulated by the publication of them in some of the public journals of the day, it seems proper that some notice should be taken of them, and facts of the case stated, that the reputation of the Founder of this Commonwealth should not be allowed to lie under so untrue and injurious a charge.

Among the most early documents relating to the Indians of Pennsylvania which have been published, is a petition addressed to Governor Markham requesting him to require a prohibition on the sale of rum to them, for reasons which they mention. This document is dated 8th of October, 1681, about a year before William Penn landed in this country, and shows first, that the Indians were already accustomed to the use of rum; secondly, that laws were then in force to restrict its sale. It is as follows (as published in "Hazard's Annals," p. 531): "Whereas selling of strong liquors was prohibited in Pennsylvania, and not at New Castle, we find a greater ill-convenience than before, our Indians going down to New Castle, and there buying rum, and making them more debauched than before (in spite of the prohibition). Therefore we whose names are hereunder written, do desire that the prohibition may be taken off and rum and strong liquors may be sold (in the foresaid Province) as formerly, until it be prohibited in New Castle, in that Government of Delaware.

NANNE SEKA,
KEKA KAPPAN,
JONG GORAS,
ESPON APE."

William Penn in several of his letters alludes to the love of the Indians for strong rum and its evil effects upon them, and also his intentions of discouraging its sale and use among them. In a letter to Henry Saunders, dated 5th mo. 30th, 1683, he says of the Indians, "Some of them [are] admirably sober, though the Dutch and Swedes and English have by brandy and rum almost debauched them all, and when drunk the most wretched of spectacles, often burning and sometimes murdering one another, at which times the Christians are not without danger as well as fear."—Penna. Arch., Vol. I, p. 69.

The following is a copy of an enactment designed to protect the Indians, passed soon after his arrival in 1682.

"Whereas, divers persons, as English, Dutch, Swedes, &c., have been wont to sell to the Indians rum and brandy, and such like distilled spirits, though they know the said Indians are not able to govern themselves in the use thereof, but do commonly drink of it to such excess as makes them destroy one another, and grievously annoy and disquiet the people of the Province, and peradventure those of neighboring governments, whereby they may make the poor natives worse, and not better for coming among them, which is an heinous offence to God, and a reproach to the blessed name of Christ and his holy religion; it is, therefore, enacted, that no person within this Province do henceforth presume to sell or exchange any rum or brandy, or any other liquors, at any time, to any Indian within this Province; and if any one shall offend therein, the person so convicted shall for every such offence, pay five pounds."*

On considering the evidence which may exist and which may appear to furnish the basis for a charge against William Penn, so adverse to his well-known character and acts, it has occurred to me that it may be found in the following extract from the first deed of the Indians for the sale of land executed "the 15th day of July, 1682." Among the goods, merchandise, utensils and other articles mentioned as the consideration for the land conveyed in this deed, are "two anchors of rum, two anchors of cyder, and two anchors of beer."†—Penna. Arch., Vol. I, p. 47. These liquors, if they had been furnished to the Indians with the knowledge or by direction of William Penn, would have furnished a ground for this charge; but it must be observed that this purchase was made by William Markham, the Deputy Governor, who was acting, no doubt, under the general instructions which had been issued by the Governor, but who had also enjoined his commissioner to treat them with all possible justice, candor, and humanity. Is it not most probable in viewing the circumstances of the case, that Markham, knowing the fondness of the Indians for intoxicating liquors, had of his own motion included the above-mentioned items in the list of articles to be supplied to the Indians in return for their grant of land?

Certain it is that in the purchases of land which took place while William Penn was in this country, viz., from 10th mo., 1682 to 8th mo., 1684, of which ten are recorded in the volume of Pennsylvania Archives above referred to, no mention is made of intoxicating

* This law was afterwards modified (3d mo. 10th, 1684) so as to prevent the sale of strong liquors to the Indians, provided "an agreement can be made for the punishment of such of the Indians as shall abuse themselves with those drinks unto drunkenness, and shall submit to have the laws of this Government executed upon them equally with other inhabitants." At a meeting of the Council held 7th mo. 17th, 1685, however, a proclamation was ordered to be published forthwith "to reinforce the law made at Upland (above quoted) prohibiting the sale of rum, brandy and other strong liquors to the Indians, under the penalty therein expressed, and that all magistrates take notice thereof, and put the same in execution."—Colonial Records, Vol. 1, p. 104.

† An anchor is about 10 gallons.

liquors as part of the consideration paid, excepting in one instance "four bottles of cyder." It is also worthy of notice that in a deed executed by the Indians, 8th mo. 2d, 1685, the next year after William Penn's departure from the colony, one barrel of beer is recorded among other articles as having been given to the Indians in payment.

So far as an argument can be drawn from these records, it appears that during the time that the personal presence and influence of William Penn were felt in administering the affairs of his government, spirituous liquors were not furnished to the Indians: an example and precedent which are the more remarkable, when it is considered that by the general customs of society in England, the drinking of malt liquors was almost universal.

The following testimony from the Indians in reference to the care of William Penn and the first settlers to discourage the use of strong liquors among them, has been preserved by Thomas Budd, who, in an account published in 1685, gives the following relation of what took place at a meeting at which eight kings and many other Indians were present. He says: "The Indian kings sat on a form, and we sat on another over against them. One of the kings, by consent and appointment of the rest, rose and spoke as follows:

"The strong liquor was first sold to us by the Dutch, and they were blind, they had no eyes; they did not see that it was for our hurt. The next people that came among us were the Swedes, who continued the sale of those strong liquors to us; they were also blind; they had no eyes; they did not see it to be hurtful to us to drink it. But if people will sell it to us, we are so in love with it that we cannot forbear it; when we drink it it makes us mad, we do not know what we do; we then abuse one another; we throw each other into the fire. Seven scores of our people have been killed by reason of drinking it since the time it was first sold to us. Those people that sell it are blind; they have no eyes. But now there is a people come to live amongst us that have eyes; they see it to be for our hurt; and we know it to be for our hurt; they are willing to deny themselves the profit of it for our good. These people have eyes; we are glad such a people are come among us; we must put it down by mutual consent; the cask must be sealed up, it must be made fast, it must not leak by day nor by night, in the light nor in the dark. And we give you these four belts of wampum, which we would have you lay up safe, and keep by you to be witnesses of this agreement that we make with you, and we should have you tell your children that these four belts of wampum are given to you to be witnesses between us and you of this agreement."

The subject of selling rum to the Indians early claimed the attention of Friends in their collective capacity, as the following extracts from minutes made in 1685 and 1687 respectively, clearly show, viz;

At a Yearly Meeting, held in Philadelphia, beginning the 15th of 7th month, 1685—

"This meeting doth unanimously agree and give as their judgment, that it is not consistent with the honour of Truth, for any that makes profession thereof to sell rum or other strong liquors to the Indians, because they use them not to moderation, but to excess and drunkenness."

At a Yearly Meeting in 1687, a minute was adopted, declaring that selling strong drink to the Indians, "considering the use they made of it, is a thing contrary to the mind of the Lord, and a great grief and burthen to his people, and a great reflection and dishonour to the Truth, so far as any professing it are concerned; and for the more effectual preventing this evil practice as aforesaid, we advise that this our testimony may be entered in every Monthly Meeting book, and every Friend belonging to the said meeting to subscribe the same."^{*}

In reference to the action of the Yearly Meeting in 1685, Robert Prond says in his "History of Pennsylvania:" "In this year, 1685, the Quakers in their Yearly Meeting, at Burlington, in West Jersey, took additional measures to prevent all persons in their Society from selling strong liquors to the Indians. About the same time, by particular appointment, they also had a religious meeting with them, as they frequently had before, to inform and instruct them in the principles of Christianity, and the practice of a true Christian life.

The Indians generally heard patiently what was said to them on this subject, and seemed affected with it for a time, but for the most part, it appeared to make no very durable impression on their minds, for the proper regulation of their passions and appetites, which, at last, too generally seemed to prevail over convictions of this nature, and their better knowledge.

Divers preachers of this religious Society, from abroad, often had meetings and serious discourse with them for this purpose, as well as those who had settled in the country, particularly Samuel Jennings, Thomas Olive, William Penn and others, from time to time, labored to inculcate into them a just sense of the benefit of a Christian life and conduct."

G. J. S.

For "The Friend."

Religious Items, &c.

An English Parish.—One of the curious affairs connected with English parishes is shown in a late vestry meeting of the parish of Warden, which was held at the house of a lady ninety-three years of age, who was made chairman of the meeting, only two other persons being present. The parish church has been pulled down to prevent its tumbling over the cliffs. The few parishioners naturally object to paying tithes to the clergyman, on the ground that Divine service is no longer held in the parish.

Mormon Missions.—Fifty travelling Mormon Bishops recently sailed for Norway, Sweden, and Denmark, on a proselyting tour. They will succeed as they have done before, and the result will be seen, in a few months, in the arrival of a whole ship-load of immigrants to settle in Utah and surrounding territories. That the leaders of Mormonism unite fanaticism, cunning, perseverance, and heroism of a certain sort, no one can deny.

Opium Trade.—One of the most important steps taken in the agitation for the suppression of the opium traffic in China is the preparation of a memorial by the missionaries at Peking, to be signed by all the missionaries in the Chinese Empire, and forwarded to the British House of Commons. This memorial shows that the opium traffic is a great evil to China; that its legalization by the British treaty with China, and the production of opium in India as a Government monopoly, renders Great Britain morally responsible for the dire evils of the trade; that the importation has increased from 12,000 chests in 1834, to 97,000 chests in 1880; that the treaty legalization of the traffic prevents the Chinese Government from dealing effectively with it; that the connection of the British Government with the trade excites prejudice against missionaries, and seriously hinders their work; that the glaring inconsistency of the same nation's sending the teaching of the Gospel and this ruinous drug to China is very apparent to the people; that the traffic is wholly indefensible on moral grounds; and that no doubt as to the ability of China to stop the production of opium and the practice of opium-smoking should prevent the House of Commons from doing its plain duty in the premises. The petitioners, therefore, ask the earliest possible action of the House to put an end to the legalization of the traffic, and to prevent the evils which have been so ruinous in China from falling upon the native races of India and Burmah. They close their memorial with the expression of their belief that the House of Commons, in taking the action petitioned for, "will receive the blessing of those that are ready to perish, the praise of all good men, and the approval of Almighty God."

The First-day of the Week.—The New York Penal Code adopted last year, which goes into operation on the 1st of 12th month next, has the following paragraphs:—

The first day of the week being by general consent set apart for a day of rest and religious uses, the law prohibits the doing on that day of certain acts hereinafter specified, which are serious interruptions of the repose and religious liberty of the community.

SEC. 262. Acts Forbidden.—The following acts are prohibited and forbidden to be done on the first day of the week:

1. Servile labor.
2. Public sports and shows.
3. Trades, manufactures, or mechanical employments.
4. Public traffic.
5. Serving process.

SEC. 263. All manner of servile labor on the first day of the week is prohibited, excepting in works of necessity or charity.

SEC. 265. All shooting, hunting, fishing, playing, horse-racing, gaming, or other public sports, exercises, pastimes or shows, upon the first day of the week, and all noise disturbing the peace of the day, are prohibited.

SEC. 266. Trades.—All trades, manufactures, and mechanical employments upon the first day of the week are prohibited.

SEC. 267. Public Traffic.—All manner of public selling, or offering, or exposing for sale publicly of any commodities upon the first day of the week is prohibited, except that meats, milk, and fish may be sold at any time before 9 o'clock in the morning, and except that food may be sold to be eaten upon the premises where sold, and drugs, medicine, and surgical appliances may be sold at any time of the day.

An Unsigned Will.—The family of the late Deacon Whittin, of Whitinsville, Mass., who left an unsigned will, are carrying out its provisions as if it had legal force. The Massachusetts Home Missionary Society has received $20,000, the Permanent Fund of the American Board $25,000, the Church Extension Society $8,000, and the University of New Mexico $5,000.

For "The Friend."

Natural History, Science, &c.

The World's Population.—According to the latest tables of Drs. Behm and Wagner just issued, the total population of the globe now reported at 1,433,800,000. According to their last report, it was 1,455,900,000. The difference would indicate a decrease of 22,000,000; but as a matter of fact there has, according to these authorities, been an increase of 33,000,000. This is explained by the fact that the population of China has been very much overestimated heretofore. In the last issue of this work, it was given at 434,000,000; it is now put at 379,000,000. In fact, those countries alone in which censuses have been taken, the official returns show an aggregate increase of 32,000,000 during the preceding interval of ten years. The number of people inhabiting the larger divisions of the globe, as given by Behm and Wagner, are as follows: Europe, 327,743,000; Asia, 795,500,000; Africa, 205,323,000; America, 100,410,000; Australia and Polynesia, 4,282,000; Poland, 82,000. Russia is credited with 83,000,000 inhabitants; China, 379,000,000; Japan, 36,000,000; and British India, 252,000,000. In the case of some countries no official statistics are to be had, and for such countries the figures presented are necessarily the result of computation or even conjecture. The report of the population of China, for instance, is but an estimate; while that of Central Africa can be little better than a guess. The results given by Behm and Wagner are, however, generally accepted as the most trustworthy published.

Nervous Unrest.—The sufferer from nervous unrest often longs for the quiet of retirement. If free, he thinks, from the world's bustle and care, he would be all right. He longs for the wings of the morning, in order to fly away and be at rest. This is a mistake. To be always basking in the sunshine of excitement, always in the midst of the battle of life, or always engaged in the exciting gamble of business, is killing, but a certain amount of excitement is necessary to the very existence of a person of the nervous temperament. Without it he would droop and die, like a tender plant placed in a semi-darkened room, in which the sun never shines, nor the fresh air finds access.

The great object of the nervous should be as far as the body is concerned, to establish and keep up a correct balance between the blood and the nervous system. Sufferers from nervous unrest think and live faster than others, and there is a greater waste of tissue causing a drain on the system, which may be met by a due supply of healthy nutriment. The state of the stomach and digestive organs must be carefully studied; whatever known to disagree must be avoided. The food should be taken as regularly as possible day after day at the same hour, and not too large quantities. No work should be done for half an hour after eating. Breakfast should be early, dinner in the middle of the day, and supper three hours at least before going to bed. But a lunch of milk biscuit be eaten a short time before retiring. Food should be nourishing, but at the same time substantial. The stomach is composed of muscular tissue, and deteriorates if over-exercised—a truth which few are aware of, which facts prove.

^{*} This minute and a minute of Chester Monthly Meeting, Penna., held 5th mo. 2nd, 1683, subscribed by members "having unity with the above said testimony," is published in "The Friend," vol. xvi. p. 316.

Proper judicious management of the digestive organs you supply the nerves with the elements of nutrition. But you must do more; blood must be as pure as possible; it must be carbonized by plenty of fresh air: while the heart, the great central propeller, must be invigorated and kept up to the mark by a proportion of exercise. This must on no account be carried to the verge of fatigue.

Food, fresh air and exercise act then on the nervous system through the blood, but the nerves are directly braced and toned by means of the cold or tepid sponge bath, with occasionally a warm vapor or hot-air bath.

Change of scene and change of climate are really always beneficial to sufferers from nervous unrest. Most cases are benefitted by seaside or mountain air. A sea-voyage does much good.

There is no relief to be had from medicines? Sometimes there is, but it is not well sustained. Flying for help to the Pharmacopœia is not a habit to be recommended, and I would advise the nervous patient to take no medicine without first consulting a physician—cod-liver oil probably excepted; but this is more good than a physic, and does much good as a substitute in cases where it is readily dispensed.

At last, last of all, to say a word or two about sleep—"tired nature's sweet restorer." Sleep is nature's mine, not the poet's. I wish, hereby, to draw the reader's attention to the fact, unless a due proportion of muscular exercise be taken during the day, the sleep by night will not be refreshing. Exercise is the preparation for sleep, and after supper, which I have already said should be early, the mind must not be allowed to dwell on any thoughts that excite or annoy. I can scarcely add that narcotics or sleeping draughts are most injurious, whether in the form of opiates, or that slow but certain poison called chloral hydrate.

In conclusion, if he values his life and comfort, the sufferer from nervous unrest must do his best to avoid over-excitement of all kinds, both bodily and mental, and endeavor to maintain a pure mind in a pure body.—Harpers' Artificial Ivory of a pure white color and very durable has lately been made by the inventor of celluloid. It is prepared by dissolving shellac in ammonia, mixing the solution with an oxide of zinc, driving off the ammonia by heating, and afterward powdering the residue and strongly compressing it in molds.

Mountable Mountain in Nevada.—In the eastern part of Churchill county, on the road from Elsworth to Grantsville, and about sixty miles from the former place, is a sand dune, which is remarkable alike for its peculiar formation and moving propensities. As far as the eye can reach is a vast wilderness of greasewood and stunted sagebrush, and here and there abrupt mountain ridges, sharp, rocky peak. The dune, or sand mountain ridge, which is about four miles in length, and covers probably a mile of greasewood in width, was, perhaps, formed by the dry winds which prevail in that section, blowing across those deserts through a natural opening in a small range of mountains, and depositing the small particles of sand that were picked up, in a heap where the wind's course is disturbed and an eddy formed.

In the whole dune, which is from 100 to 400 feet in height, and contains millions of tons of sand, it is impossible to find a particle much larger than a pin-head. It is so fine that if an ordinary barley sack be filled and placed in a moving wagon, the jolting of the vehicle would empty the sack, and yet it has no form of dust in it, and is as clean as any sea-beach sand. The mountain is so solid as to give it a musical sound when trod upon, and oftentimes a bird lighting on it, or a large lizard running across the bottom, will start a quantity of the sand to sliding, which makes a noise resembling the vibration of telegraph wires, with a hard wind blowing, but so much louder that it is often heard at a distance of six or seven miles, and is deafening to a person standing within a short distance of the sliding sand.

A peculiar feature of the dune is that it is not stationary, but rolls slowly eastward, the wind gathering it up on the west end, and carrying it along the ridge until it is again deposited at the eastern end. Mr. Monroe, the well-known surveyor, having heard of the rambling habits of this mammoth sand heap, quite a number of years ago took careful bearings on it while sectionizing Government lands in that vicinity. Several years later he revisited the place, and found that the dune had moved something over a mile.—Reno Gazette.

THE FRIEND.

ELEVENTH MONTH 25, 1882.

We have received from our friend, William Archut, who is a German by birth, a communication expressing his concurrence with the article in No. 13, by C. Shieldstream, headed "Thoughts about the Eternal Gospel," &c. He refers more particularly to the remarks made therein on Job xix. 25, 26, 27, a text which has been thought by some to favor the idea that the bodies of flesh and blood which we now inhabit will be again brought to life by the Divine power. This idea he regards as inconsistent with the New Testament declaration, "Flesh and blood cannot inherit the kingdom of God;" and he gives a translation from the German text of the accurate and learned doctors De Wette and Augustin to show that the construction put upon the authorized English version by many professors of Christianity is inaccurate.

Our English Bibles represent Job as saying, v. 26, "Though, after my skin, worms destroy this body, yet in my flesh shall I see God." This has been regarded by some as an expression of the faith, which enabled Job to believe that he should yet see God and partake of his mercies before he was removed from this state of existence, notwithstanding the miserable condition he was then in. It certainly cannot justly be regarded as proving the resurrection of these bodies.

That this doctrine cannot be deduced from it is still more clearly apparent if we take the version of Anthony Purver, a learned member of our Society, who, in his translation, gave but little play to the imagination, but rendered the Hebrew text very literally into English. His work was published in last century through the liberality of Dr. John Fothergill, of London. He says, v. 26, "And when after my skin they have destroyed this, out of my flesh shall I behold God." To this A. Purver appends the following note—"Out of, which the Hebrew is, and not in; and where was this but in Heaven, when his soul was gone out of his body?"

The English translation of the Old Testament used by the Jews, is still clearer, v. 26: "And after my skin is cut to pieces will this be; and then freed from my body shall I behold God."

De Wette's version is very similar,—“And when after my skin this has been destroyed, yet without my flesh shall I see God.”

The Society of Friends have never encouraged their members to enter into speculations on such mysterious subjects, as the nature of those bodies with which we shall be clothed in a future state of existence—but the writings of our early Friends indicate very clearly that they did not hold the outward and material views which prevail among many others.

As an illustration of this remark, we find that Thomas Story mentions that a priest charged our Society with denying the resurrection. T. S. says, "I replied, I did not understand they denied the resurrection; and that Christ, to prove the resurrection, adduced that Scripture, where it is written, 'But as touching the resurrection of the dead, have ye not read that which was spoken unto you by God, saying, I am the God of Abraham, and the God of Isaac, and the God of Jacob. God is not the God of the dead, but of the living.' If then Abraham, Isaac and Jacob had attained the resurrection from the dead, in Christ's sense of the resurrection, and yet the bodies of those saints then remained in the earth, something else must be meant by the resurrection of the dead than earthly bodies."*

In another place he records that Roger Gill, who was travelling with him in the ministry, said in his testimony, "He had once believed, that if the body of a man were burnt to ashes, and those ashes sifted through a sieve over all the earth, sea and air, yet, at the last day, the same dust should come together again, and the same body should then arise; but," said he, "I now believe otherwise." On this Thos. Story remarks: "Now, though we fully believe the resurrection of the dead, both of the just and unjust, yet we take not on us to determine the mode of existence in that state, or with what bodies they shall come; but leave it with the Almighty to give unto us bodies as may best please Him."†

It would be easy to multiply similar passages if there were occasion for it. But we suppose there are not many of our readers who are troubled with doubts on this subject. We hope (again using the language of Thomas Story) that they "are rather in the first place concerned how to attain the resurrection of the just, and the right hand of the Father, through the life of Him who is the resurrection and the life, than to gratify a lust of knowledge of Divine mysteries, rather pertaining to another state, than fully understood, or to be at all known by the sons of Adam, as such only, here in this world."

Yet it seems proper thus briefly to refer to this question, in view of the statement made by William Archut, that he was for a time in doubt as to the belief of the Society of Friends on the doctrine of Martin Luther, "of the resurrection of the flesh," because the subject was so little dwelt upon among us. He thinks there is an inclination among many Friends of modern date to reason away some of those doctrines which we have received from the early Friends, and to bring the views of the Society more into accord with those prevailing among other professors of Christianity. Such a tendency renders it doubly needful to revive the testimonies which were borne among us in the beginning.

In reply to some inquiries which have reached us, we state that the publication of the letter of J. B. Cotton, in Nos. 12 and 13 of the present volume, was designed simply to give information to our readers respecting some foreign places of interest; and was not intended as any endorsement of religious movements not under the control of our Society and outside of its organization; or as sanctioning a disregard of the wholesome advice issued by the body in former days, "Men and women are cautioned against travelling together as companions in the work of the ministry, to avoid all occasions of offence."

SUMMARY OF EVENTS.

UNITED STATES.—Full official returns from all the counties of Pennsylvania give Robt. E. Pattison a plurality of 40,202 for Governor.

Agent Rowan, at the Flathead Agency, in Montana, has informed the Indian Bureau that 7400 laborers on the Northern Pacific Railroad are approaching the Agency from two directions, "accompanied by a crowd of gamblers, fakirs, and portable saloons," and he asks whether he shall admit "these persons" to the reservation. The Commissioner has instructed the agent that vendors of food and clothing may be admitted to the Agency under license allowing them to sell goods only to the railroad men, but that whisky dealers must be kept out. Application has been made for a detail of troops from Fort Missoula to enforce the orders of the Commissioner.

The total value of the exports of breadstuffs from the United States during the four months ending 10th mo. 31st, 1882, was $4,881,719, against $9,311,635 during the corresponding period of 1881. The total value of breadstuffs exports during the ten months ending 10th mo. 31st last, was $149,737,960, against $192,292,555 during the corresponding period of 1881.

Our exports of petroleum and its products during the nine months ending 9th month 30th last, amounted in value to $34,356,921, or $596,040 less than during the corresponding period of last year.

A company of English capitalists has purchased 4,500,000 acres of land in Western and Northwestern Texas, and propose to sell alternate tracts of from 200 to 500 acres to European immigrants. This investment is regarded as likely to largely increase the population of Texas.

The General Superintendent of the Life-Saving Service has referred to the Board on Life-Saving Appliances for examination about twenty-five plans and devices submitted for use at Life-Saving Stations. The Board is now in session at New York city.

The Spanish and New York Telephone Company, of New York, was incorporated on the 17th inst. in Albany. It is to operate in a number of States in this Union, and also in Spain, and the capital is fixed at $1,000,000.

The Directors of the "National Mineral and Industrial Exposition" at Nashville, have arranged for the purchase of several acres of ground in that city as a site for the Exposition building.

The largest individual sheep-owner in Texas is a woman known all over the State as the "Widow Callahan." Her sheep, more than fifty thousand in number, wander over the ranges of Uvalde and Bandera counties, in the southwestern part of the State. Their grade is a cross between the hardy Mexican sheep and the Vermont merino. They are divided into flocks of two thousand head each, with a "bossero" and two "pastoras" in charge of each flock. At the spring and fall shearings long trains of wagons transport the widow's wool to the market at San Antonio.

A severe "anorral" storm prevailed on the 17th inst. throughout a large portion of the United States and the Eastern Provinces of Canada, seriously interrupting telegraphic communication for several hours. During its prevalence the few wires that were working were continually liable to disturbance, and it was "almost impossible to send or receive long messages continuously." At Cincinnati wires worked to Columbus and St. Louis without a battery, and were so heavily charged that a flame appeared when the contact was broken. The storm extended from Boston as far West as Ogden, Utah, and it was still felt on Seventh-day morning at various points, though not so severely as on Sixth-day. The anorral display of Sixth-day night was almost unexampled in magnificence at many points West. At Omaha and Cheyenne "the illumination rendered the night almost as bright as day." At St. Paul "the sky was of blood red color, the display being grand and fearful." The anorral was also brilliant throughout the Pacific Coast region from San Diego, California, northward. The ocean cables were especially affected, and the storm was felt in Europe. In the afternoon the electric storm had ceased in this hemisphere, and the wires worked well in all directions. A spot of unusually large size was visible near the central part of the sun, at the time of the storm.

The largest telescope in existence will soon be completed for the Russian Government by the firm of Alvin Clark & Sons, Cambridge, Mass. This largest of all glasses is for the Russian Observatory at Polkovo, which was founded in 1839 by the Czar Nicholas. In 1878 the Government authorized the Astronomer, Otto Struve, to draw upon the Treasury for whatever sum might be required. The grinding of the new lens has now been proceeding for twelve months, and it is expected that it will soon be completed. The length of the Polkovo telescope will be 45 feet, and the diameter of the object-glass 30 inches. It will be mounted upon a lawn to the southwest of the principal building of the Observatory. It is estimated that this new lens will practically bring the moon within a distance of 38 leagues from the earth.

The Board of Health of Iowa City, Iowa, reports that not a death occurred within that city's limits during the 10th month. The city has a population of over 10,000 persons.

There were 328 deaths in the city last week, an increase of 5 over the previous week and the same number as in the corresponding period of last year. Of the above 165 were males and 163 females; 55 died of consumption; 39 of diphtheria; 22 of pneumonia; 10 of croup; 10 of typhoid fever, and 10 of old age.

Markets, &c.—U. S. 3's, 102½; 3½'s, 102; 4½'s, registered, 112½; coupon, 113½; 4's, 119½; currency 6's, 133.

Cotton.—There was no essential change to notice in price or demand. Sales of middlings are reported at 10½ a 11 cts. per pound for uplands and New Orleans.

Petroleum.—Standard white, 8½ cts. for export, and 9½ cts. per gallon for home use.

Flour is in limited request and weak. Sales of 2100 barrels, including Minnesota extras, at $5.50 a $6.25; Pennsylvania family at $4.75 a $5; western do. at $5.25 a $5.75, and patents at $6.25 a $7.50. Rye flour is quiet but steady at $4.25 a $4.37½ per barrel.

Grain.—Wheat was dull and unsettled. Sales of 3600 bushels red, at $1.01 a $1.10. At the open board, $1.07½ was bid for 11th mo.; $1.08½ for 12th mo.; $1.10½ 1st mo.; $1.12 2nd mo. Rye is nominally unchanged. Corn is quiet but firmer. Sales of 8600 bushels to the trade at $1 a $1.04 cts. Oats are firm and in moderate demand. Sales of 10,000 bushels, in car lots, at 44½ a 53 cts.

Hay and Straw Market, for week ending 11th mo. 18th, 1882.—Loads of hay, 363; loads of straw, 72. Average price during the week—Prime timothy, 95 cts. to $1.05 per 100 pounds; mixed, 90 cts. to $1.00 per 100 pounds; straw, 75 to 85 cts. per 100 pounds.

Beef cattle were in fair demand last week, but prices were unsettled and rather lower: 4100 head arrived and sold at the different yards at 4 a 6½ cts. per lb., as to condition.

Sheep were in demand, and prices were a fraction higher: 12,000 head arrived and sold at the different yards, at 3 a 6 cts., and lambs at 5 a 7½ cts. per pound, according to quality.

Hogs were dull and rather lower: 5500 head arrived and sold at the different yards at 9 a 11 cts. per lb., the latter rate for extra.

FOREIGN.—On the 20th inst. in the House of Commons, Trevelyan, Chief Secretary for Ireland, informed Parnell that the Unions in the western part of Ireland had been ordered to relieve the distressed people, and that the Local Government Board had instructed the inspectors to see that the arrangements were sufficient, and that the relief measures were not interfered with for want of funds.

W. E. Gladstone, in reply to an inquiry from William Forster, stated that the Government was anxious to deal with the question of the suppression of the slave trade in Egypt, and that their first despatch to Lord Dufferin since his arrival in Cairo related to that subject.

The French imports during the past ten months compared with the same period of 1881, show an increase of 75,000,000 francs, and the exports an increase of 175,000,000 francs.

A despatch to the Times from Paris says, the anarchists who were arrested at Lyons have been committed for trial. A preliminary investigation showed the existence of a scheme for a partial rising at various points in order to pave the way for a general outbreak.

The Liberté announces that, in consequence of a treaty concluded by De Brazza, the French gunboat Gittaire will shortly be despatched with orders to proceed up the Congo River.

An English company offer $1,000,000 for the privilege of draining Lake Lemán, in Switzerland, provided they can have the land thus laid bare. They propose to drain it into the river Rhone by means of a canal twenty miles long.

One thousand troops, comprising a portion of the expedition to Soudan, left Suez on the 15th instant, for Suakin. A second portion will follow shortly. The Egyptian troops ordered to the Soudan, continue to desert in large numbers. As a measure of precaution arms and ammunition required for the expedition are being forwarded to Suakin separately.

The correspondent of the Times at Madrid says the sufferings of the nation from civil wars, pronunciamientos, and succeeding periods of exhaustion and oppression, are too recent to have been forgotten. For these reasons the nation is opposed to Marshal Serran's movement. Prime Minister Sagasta understands that he knows that he has the country at his back, and feels that it is his duty, as well as his policy, to resolutely oppose the movement in the almost revolutionary air it has taken. The Ministerial papers state that, while the ministry are conscious of the great importance of the adhesion of the Republican party to the throne, they cannot admit the principle of a reform of the constitution.

Some of the Republican journals continue to violently attack the new party.

The semi-official Spanish journal, Correspondencia Espana, at Madrid, states that, at a Cabinet council Señor Camacho, Minister of Finance, declared that despite the exceptional state of affairs in some provinces, owing to bad crops, the revenue had considerably increased. He said the financial measures he had introduced had produced very satisfactory results.

Some of the newspapers in Madrid announce that Spain has resolved to take possession of the port of Santa Cruz de Marpequina, on the coast of Morocco, and that a force of 500 men will shortly embark for Cadiz and proceed to Morocco via the Canary Islands.

A despatch to Reuter's Telegram Company from Carro says: The Chiefs of the Albanian League, together with several prominent Albanians, have forwarded to the Emperor Francis Joseph, a petition asking for the occupation of Albania by Austrian troops at an early date.

A despatch to Reuter's Telegram Company, from Constantinople, says the Porte intends to address a circular to the Powers, calling attention to the Montenegrin armaments, and the steps the Porte has taken with a view to settling the last disputed points in connection with the delimitation of the frontier.

DIED, on the 31st of 8th mo. 1882, MARTHA J., widow of Alonzo Mosier, aged 44 years, a member and elder of Pilot Grove Monthly Meeting, Iowa. This dear Friend joined our Society by conviction, when young; and continued firm to the end in her attachment to its principles and testimonies. "Blessed be the pure in heart for they shall see God."

—, on the 23d of 10th mo. 1882, at Bristol, P. MARTHA B., widow of Joseph B. Taylor, a member Falls Monthly Meeting, in the 64th year of her age.

—, at her residence near Chester, Penna., on the 1st of 11th month, 1882, ANN M., widow of Richard Wetherill, in the 80th year of her age, a member Chester Monthly Meeting. She was convinced in early life of the doctrines of the Christian religion as professed by Friends, and was concerned to exemplify them in her daily walk. For a number of years she was engaged in teaching, and was careful to inculcate lessons of piety and virtue; and some of those who were under her care can "rise up and call her blessed."

THE FRIEND.

A RELIGIOUS AND LITERARY JOURNAL.

OL. LVI:

SEVENTH-DAY, TWELFTH MONTH 2, 1882.

NO. 17.

PUBLISHED WEEKLY.

if paid in advance, $2.00 per annum; if not paid in advance $2.50; 10 cents extra is charged for Postage on those sent by mail.

Articles designed for insertion to be addressed to
JOSEPH WALTON,
MOORESTOWN, BURLINGTON CO., N. J.

scriptions, payments and business communications, received by
JOHN S. STOKES,
NO. 116 NORTH FOURTH STREET, UP STAIRS,
PHILADELPHIA.

For "The Friend."

Ancient Testimonies and Advices.

EVERENT WAITING UPON GOD IN RELIGIOUS MEETINGS.

Dear Friends, it is matter of grief to the faithful among us, to observe a visible declension in too many, from that fervor, love, and joy, which our ancient Friends were endowed with, for the honor of God and the promotion of His truth. Too many are departing from the plain and self-denying life of Jesus, our Saviour's Head, in which they were found. Alas! it is that pious devotion and reverence of God, that brokenness and contrition of spirit, conspicuous in their religious assemblies, and how careless and indifferent do many now a-days appear, in that most important concern of worshipping the Lord in awe and glory in an awful silence, and with the best breathings for the renewings of His power and presence. Oh! that all hearts might be stirred up to follow the steps of our faithful elders, in an holy contempt of this world, and in that Christian courage and patience, which supported them under the reproaches of men, and the opposition they met with from the spirit of the world. Oh! that all might walk after their example, preferring the love of truth to the love of earthly things, and the honor of God to the honor of man.—London Yearly Meeting Epistle, 1746.

Dear Friends, seeing the Spirit of truth, which manifesteth itself in the heart and conscience, is given for a leader into all truth; the assistance whereof, we may, through His grace, be enabled to demean ourselves with propriety, throughout the various transactions and trials incident to this life of probation; we beseech you, have an eye to its influence in all your concerns, carefully avoid all improper pursuits, and misleading engagements. Endeavor to improve the precious moments afforded, to your lasting advantage. Take frequent opportunities of resting to wait in humility and reverence upon the Lord; and in all seasons of worship, whether public or private, let your attention be fixed singly upon Him, guarding against every thought and imagination that might divert your desires, and the strict adherence of your minds to the Father of spirits, the Fountain of immortal good.

If, on such occasions, we sit in an unwatch-ful and unconcerned frame, indolence of mind will introduce heaviness of body; and where drowsiness appears in meetings, it is a grief and burden to the sensibly concerned, an ill example to others, and reproachful to our holy profession.

"Let every one, therefore, who professeth to worship the omnipresent Lord in spirit and in truth, give diligent attendance both on First and other days of the week, and be neither careless in coming together, nor slack in exercise when assembled. Let all affairs of an inferior nature give place to this great and profitable duty; for true worship is both acceptable to God and beneficial to our own souls.

"The Lord,' saith the Prophet, 'is good unto them that wait for Him, to the soul that seeketh Him.' This ought to encourage, and strongly induce us, often to renew the practice of humble retirement before the bountiful rewarder of those who diligently seek Him. The more it is followed, the comforts of Divine grace are the more experienced, faith increased, and ability received to 'live according to God in the Spirit;' and the Apostle exhorts, 'If we live in the Spirit, let us also walk in the Spirit.'—Ibid. 1775.

"In your religious meetings for the worship of God, both on the First and other days of the week, be diligent in waiting upon Him in His Spirit, whereby you may renew your strength, and witness Him your sufficient help; for surely many of us have cause thankfully to remember his early visitations in the assemblies of his people, where He brake in upon our hearts with his power and love, and did, in the needful time, administer help, comfort, and counsel, whereby we have, in the renewings thereof, been upheld in a faithful testimony, and in the discharge of our duty to Him."

"We farther entreat you, that in all your religious meetings appointed for the worship of Almighty God, you wait in an humble reverence, for the influence of the word of life; be cautious not to move in acts of devotion in your own will; set not forward self to work; but patiently attend and wait for the gift and enlivening power of the Divine Spirit; without which, your performances will be unacceptable, and like those of old, of which it was said: 'Who hath required this at your hand?'—Ibid. 1742.

"As it is an awful thing to approach the presence of the Infinite Majesty of heaven and earth, the dread of nations, let due reverence possess every mind upon these solemn occasions; that no lightness nor airiness appear in their coming in, nor any restless motions or noises be made, which may disturb the solemnity of the meeting; but that all may demonstrate they came not to gratify the itching ear, or to entertain a vain curiosity, by that seriousness and gravity in their demeanor, which becomes a people truly concerned to wait upon God in awful stillness and humility, and to worship Him in spirit and in truth.

"Let us, therefore, be found worshippers within the temple; and be cautious how any of us give occasion of additional sufferings to the truly conscientious amongst us, by any compliance with such observations as our worthy ancestors were rightly concerned to bear testimony against."—Ibid. 1759.

For "The Friend."

Westtown Boarding School.

In confirmation of the statement in the last previous number of this series, that the principles and testimonies of the Society of Friends were in strict accordance with those held by early Christians, may be adduced the following striking testimony of one not in profession with us, and who was remarkable for his spiritual as well as his intellectual attainments, the gifted Thomas C. Upham, who wrote as follows:—

"I have carefully studied the Bible in the original languages, I have visited the Holy Land, the places memorable in scripture history, and the earthly life of Christ; and what is more important, I have had many years' experience. The conclusion of the whole matter with me is, an abiding conviction that Christianity is true, and that the Society of Friends have produced the highest and best statement of spiritual Christianity yet made. Their spiritual view of Christ, their doctrine of universal saving grace and light are yet in advance of the age, and of the views entertained by any other denomination on this important subject. I am an old man, and could not at this time in life change my denomination, either with profit to myself or the cause; but I entertain the same views that were taught by the early Friends."

Mary Lyon, in the routine of daily life at the celebrated Mount Holyoke Seminary, required each student to spend one half hour morning and evening, alone and in silence, waiting upon her Creator. "In a family of 300 she must be entirely alone." It is understood, she was to take or have no other book than the Bible, and even that was not to be read excepting as a reference for confirmation or instruction as to any passage of Scripture which may have presented to the mind.

In a previous number of "The Friend," it is stated that "An elderly man, a 'minister of the establishment' in England, said, 'I believe if it had not been for the Society of Friends the Church would have been in papacy long since. I believe that the fact of a society maintaining the uselessness and undesirability of all forms in the worship of the Almighty, has prevented us from going to lengths to which we might otherwise have gone, and I further believe that the day is coming, when our altars and our crosses and our robes and our surplices and much more of our paraphernalia will go to Babylon whence they came.' He added, turning to one of our members, "I can easily see the way from us to you, but I cannot see the way that some of you are finding from you to us."

An aged man of much experience in the world and learned in the law, expressed to the writer recently a great desire he felt for the more general distribution of the approved writings of Friends—having relation, more particularly to those explanatory of the doctrines held by the Society; adding that "it was his belief, that if they were universally known, accepted and adopted, it would bring about the millenium."

From the report made to the Yearly Meeting 4th mo. 1851:

"After a state of health rather unusually free from interruption in so large a family throughout eleven months, a fever appeared among the children near the middle of last month, in the first place of a remitting character, and which in general was soon brought under control, but in about 8 or 10 cases it ran into a low fever attended with some symptoms which led the physician to believe it would be advisable to place no obstruction in the way of parents and others who thought proper to remove their children from the school, with which the committee coincided, and the scholars were nearly all dispersed about three weeks before the usual time of closing the session—and by which the last inspection of their progress was prevented. Two deaths occurred among the boys, which, with the nursing and close attention required by the sick, has made it an anxious, laborious time to the Superintendent and his wife, and to those having immediate charge of the invalids. In order to give the family time to recruit, to furnish an opportunity for effecting some necessary repairs and removing some of the floors in the basement story, which could not be conveniently done while they were occupied, the committee propose to defer re-opening the school until the first Second-day of the 6th month. In consulting the physicians they gave the opinion that as there would then be a change of the season and of the diseases appearing at that period of the year, it would be most judicious to convene the school in that month.

Since the last report, the new farm-house has been completed, and has been occupied from about the 1st of the year. The old one has been removed: $7502 have been expended in this improvement, in bringing a supply of water to the house, and for other accommodations not embraced in the original estimate. The arrangement of the fences, levelling the grounds and planting trees around the premises will make a small addition to the above sum. As it is not convenient to commence the erection of the barn this spring, it has been postponed for the present.

Apprehending a removal of the laundry from the basement of the school buildings would be likely to promote the comfort and health of the family, the committee have had erected a house for the purpose a short distance north of the main building. Apparatus of an improved construction, worked by steam power, and calculated to perform the business of washing, wringing and drying the clothes, has been put up in the building, which, when completed, will relieve the family of a laborious branch of their duties, and dispense with the hire and introduction into the house of a number of assistants who were needed in the former management of that department."

Thoughts about the Eternal Gospels and the Falling Babylon.

BY CHARLES SHIELDSTREAM.

(Continued from page 100.)

COMPARISONS.

Every outward religion had a time when it flourished and shone with splendor. The Egyptians had their sorcerers, mighty men, who by the aid of the dark powers deceived the people, and tried to contend with Moses, the servant of the most high and true God, the Father of Light. The Greeks had their celebrated oracle in Delphi, that pretended to and in some measure seems to have been able to prophesy and work miracles. These old religions were the religions of darkness, whose priests led the people into captivity to superstition. As the time passed along, it pleased the most good God, in his infinite mercy, to pour out of his Spirit upon mankind; and as the Light shone, the darkness became more and more discovered, and priestcraft had, in some degree, to relax its withering hold. But the old serpent was always ready to step in when the people were becoming enlightened by the divine Light; and by means of priestcraft he is always trying to hinder the progress of the Gospel.

At the commencement of the Christian era, the south of Europe, parts of Asia and northern Africa were mostly in the practice of the Greek and Roman religion. But at that time, notwithstanding all the striving and working of its priests and upholders, that religion had little power over the people. It was a religion then struggling hard for life, a dying religion. But when Christendom degenerated, the religion of the heathens was amalgamated with that of Christians by priestly influence.

God had given a measure of his light and grace to many among the Romans and Greeks, who were called philosophers or lovers of wisdom. They were enlightened by the true Light, which enlightens every man that cometh into the world, and were, among these nations, comparable to the prophets among the Israelites. Socrates, Plato, Sophocles, Zeno, Cicero and Seneca and many other worthies were conscious of the work of the Light, Grace and Spirit of God in themselves; they were followers of the true God and no sorcerers, as the priests were who administered the rites and ceremonies of the false religions, and held the people in superstition, deceit and captivity. In brief the philosophers represented the true wisdom of God which is inward in men; the false religion represented the alienation and fall from God, being outward and in rebellion against the Light of Christ.

Christ as the seed of woman, came on the earth. He was a Jew as to nationality—He came to his own, but his own received Him not—but to those that received Him in his Light, to them gave He power to become sons of God. His own people claimed this relation to the true God. They made great profession of religion, and were zealous in making proselytes. They, besides, expected Messiah to come; they did search the Scriptures, and they did consider themselves exceedingly wise. The Pharisees were very learned, and great men of prayers and outward religion. But they did not receive Christ: his message was a mystery even to one of the best among them, Nicodemus. Though they were very diligent about searching the Scriptures, they were like those of whom Paul spake afterwards,—“ever learning and never: to come to the knowledge of the truth which has been a lamentable condition of outward Christendom. Christ reproved them saying: “Ye search the Scriptures, for think that ye have everlasting life in them, to me ye will not come that ye may have everlasting life.”

For "The Friend."

The Jewish religion was a covenant between God and men, foreshadowing a better covenant, and was to pass away when a better covenant entered. But it was abused by the apostate people; and the outward Jews in Christ's time were compared to the outward Christians now-a-days. Outward Christians are very diligent to search the Scriptures, and trying by all means to increase their sects. They exhort to search Scripture texts on which their creeds are founded, and to come and hear the priests and go through their performances; and they reproach those that want to be free from bondage, and do what God will show them by his Light, that they are disobedient to Christ's command; and that by not joining church, as they call it, they neglect to put on the whole armor of salvation and neglect their own salvation and the salvation of their families, if they have such. And as the Jewish religion could bear with an outward ceremony as they seemed to submit very well to John's water-baptism, but misunderstood and rejected Christ's words, which are spirit and life, so those present outward professors bring the whole Christian religion to outward ceremonies, especially those who teach that water-baptism is the door to the sheepfold (thou Christ is our door), and say that none can be a true Christian without it, because God sent John to baptize Christ, and that all must submit to it as He did. In using the bread and wine, these say that none can partake of it without being dipped as they have been; and several of them with whom I have reason seem not to understand that baptism signifies any other thing than with water. So be it, my courteous reader, thou mayst see a very great likeness between the Jewish religion at its end, and the outward religion, Babylon, in our days.

Hints for the Sick Room.

I have for a long time been impressed with the need of more knowledge on our part of necessary duties in case of sickness in our families. A physician may be most skilled in his profession, but the patient must suffer until proper care supplements the physician's efforts. There are few of us, comparatively speaking, who are competent to care for the sick, and yet, when any of our near and dear are ill, we feel that no one can nurse them for us, when, at the same time, our ministrations may produce other than the desired effect.

The day is happily past when fresh air and sunlight were not allowed in the sick room when a drink of cool, fresh water would have been considered suicidal; and when, if the patient recovered, it was due more to the possession of a strong will and an iron constitution than anything else. It must have been a strong constitution, indeed, which could survive the doses, and blistering, and bleeding of old days.

For "The Friend."

but there is one way in which many of us help, even if we are not competent to take entire charge of a sick person: we can attend to the preparation of proper food.

How many times we hear a person speak of a nurse in this way: "She was an excellent nurse in every other respect; but she couldn't do anything that tasted good to me."

I have seen a slice of toast burned on one side, and scarcely warmed on the other—I propose to equalize the matter—laid on a cold plate, and buttered before the cup of tea or coffee was poured. A well person should know better than to eat it; an invalid could look at it with anything but an irritable feeling of distaste, and it would be carried to the kitchen with the remark: "You expect to get stronger if you won't eat." Gruel is made half cooked and half-sealed, and brought to the invalid in any dish which may be at hand, and left standing in the room all day. Then another nurse makes gruels "good" as she says; preparing food only unfit for an invalid. And always if a person does not progress rapidly, it is the fault of the physician!

I wonder sometimes that a man is found who is willing to study for this profession. His practice is often a hand-to-hand fight with ignorance or heedlessness, sometimes both at once. I've heard a physician say that, when he left the rooms of certain patients, he knew by his instructions as to food, regularity of taking medicines, &c., would not be properly attended to; that the patient would be exposed too much to drafts, or smothered under many blankets, or that the medicines would be neglected. He is very apt to find something wrong when he comes in the next morning.

A sick person is like a child, as helpless and fully as unreasonable, and should be treated with a gentle authority one would think of exercising otherwise. A man or woman sick must be said "mustn't" to, even though he be the king; and although a patient should never be irritated by contradiction, still he or she must be watched, and strictly but firmly forbidden anything which would do harm.

A patient who is faint from want of nourishment will frequently refuse food if asked: "What do you want for dinner?" or "Can you think of something which you would like?" A sick person should never be allowed to wait until faint before being given a little nourishment. A weak person, if careful, should never, unless so ordered, wait all night until morning, without something to eat or drink; a little beef tea, jelly or milk, or milk—only a little, perhaps not more than two or three teaspoonfuls—but never allow an interval of twelve or more hours to pass, as it so often does, without some refreshing refreshment being given. To a person who cannot sleep, and who has been sick a long time, there is really no difference between night and day, save that the night is longer and more unendurable. No one would think it judicious to give such a patient nothing after breakfast until late in the evening; but it is just as reasonable, in some cases, as allowing one to wait from early morning to, perhaps, a late hour next morning, for a little beef jelly is excellent, when one wants something cool, or is tired of beef tea. Put a pound of lean beef, cut fine, into a porcelain tureen, and pour a pint of cold water; let it stand half an hour, and then put it on the stove where it will heat gradually; when it gets boiling hot, skim carefully, and put it where it will simmer gently for half an hour. While this is cooking, put a third of a box of gelatine into a bowl with two tablespoonfuls of cold water, salt the broth to taste, and strain, boiling hot, over the soaked gelatine. Strain again, when the gelatine is dissolved, into cups or moulds, and put away to cool. Keep on ice, and serve a little at a time. This can be taken when the stomach will not retain broths, and being very cold, is most refreshing.

Mutton or chicken broth is very nice prepared in this way. Do not be afraid you have not used sufficient gelatine. The jelly seldom hardens in less than six, and sometimes ten or twelve hours. The easiest way of dividing is to pour out the gelatine from one package, and divide it in three parts, returning two to the box. It is always difficult to take out just enough from the box.

Sea moss is very strengthening, and may be used in a variety of ways. It makes a very nourishing drink for those who are mostly confined to liquids. Wash a few pieces, three or four stems, in warm water, then put it in cold water for a few minutes. Drain, put it in a pitcher, and pour over it a pint of boiling water. When cold, strain, and add lemon juice and sugar to taste, adding water if it is too thick to be palatable. Keep very cold, and carry only a little at a time into the sick room.

Water and lemonade—everything, in fact,—is much nicer if cold and fresh, if, indeed, it were not decidedly unwholesome, if allowed to stand.

All medicines should be covered and kept, if possible, by a shaded window.

To properly arrange the ventilation of a room, that the air may be kept fresh and pure, and at the same time to avoid the slightest draft, goes far to promote recovery. Remember that cold air is not always fresh air. I have often seen a door opened into a cold room which had not, perhaps, been properly aired for weeks, in order to "air the room," the cooling process being considered synonymous with that. Air should come directly from out of doors, and from the sunny side of the house, if possible.

An open fire-place is an almost indispensable luxury in the sick room. Even in summer, a little fire morning and evening is not uncomfortable, and the purifying influence of such is beyond expression.

Of the necessity of fresh bed linen, of frequent bathing of the face and hands, fresh glasses for the cool, refreshing drinks, &c., I hope there is no need to speak. One cannot imagine the comfort which attention to these seeming trifles gives to the invalid in our care.—The Household.

That was an argument for prohibition which even the drinker can appreciate, which was made by an Iowa drinking man just before the election in that State. He said: "I have three boys. One of them is old enough to drink, and is drinking. He learned it in the saloon. My prayer is, and my vote shall be cast, to close the saloons before my other boys get into them and get to drinking; and I know scores and scores of other drinking men who are as anxious as I am to close the saloons before the little boys reach them."

Religious Views and Tenets.

The main object of a true minister of the gospel is to turn the people to the power of Divine grace in their own hearts. We cannot, of ourselves, save a brother or a sister beloved; but we can, by Divine aid, point them to the Lamb of God who will, through obedience to his grace, turn them from the darkness within to the light within, and from the power of Satan to God: that they might receive forgiveness of sins and be saved with an everlasting salvation. There is much in the religion and worship of the present day which is calculated to turn the mind of the emotional man to that which is outward and showy, instead of to the inward, the silent invisible Spirit and power of the Lord, wherein alone ability can be received to perform that true heart-felt worship of the Father in spirit and in truth.

As time advances I become more firmly established in the "religious views and tenets" which, in many respects distinguished our forefathers as a peculiar people; but which, in recent days, are fast fading away amidst the fogs and darkness of this world that lies in wickedness; until now but little appears left, in places, to distinguish us from the formal professors around us. The Fathers, where are they? And the ancient landmarks which they so dearly bought for us to follow, where are they? How dimly seen by many, and how little inclination appears to be left to even try to follow them! The Truth does not wax old as doth a garment; nor my being old does not prevent me from seeing it in the beauty of holiness. Although "all flesh is as grass," and every thing pertaining to this world is passing away, yet the word of the Lord endureth forever. And such as have the living and eternal Word abiding as a comforter in them, are in mercy permitted to feel at times, that while the outward man is gradually fading away, the inner man is renewed by that Divine life which never dies, but is as an anchor to the soul, both sure and steadfast, amid the storms of life which at times are suffered to beat vehemently. And so they have the comforting hope that when the conflicts of time are over, "they shall mount up with wings as eagles," and join "the general assembly and church of the first-born, which are written in heaven."

I am now in my eighty-second year. I have lived to see many of the joys and sorrows that belong to this world. O that I could, while the breath of life remains in this mortal frame, persuade, if only a small remnant of the children of men, to halt no longer between two opinions, but choose while the day of their visitation lasts, whom they will serve! If the God that so wonderfully delivered the Israelites of old, when they relied on Him, be our God, then let us serve and follow Him, and worship Him. But if the God of this world has so blinded our eyes as to cause us to bow down and worship him, then we shall be left to our choice, but leanness will be our portion.

"When Ephraim spake trembling, he exalted himself in Israel; but when he offended in Baal, he died." Yes, died spiritually. Lost his divine life and power, and became self-exalted. He mixed himself among the people; strangers devoured his strength and he knew it not. The Lord said, through Jeremiah,

"They that depart from me shall be written in the earth, because they have forsaken the Lord, the fountain of living waters." Though they may still have a name to live, yet they are dead. "The cares of this world, and the deceitfulness of riches, and the lust of other things have entered in," and, above all, the applause of men; so that the word that was once living and powerful, has become unfruitful.

I have lately attended Indiana Yearly Meeting, during the sittings of the first week. And then to Kansas, and attended the Yearly Meeting there. Have heard a great deal in the way of ministry, singing and prayer. But as to how much of it was from the cultivated intellect of man, is the great question. A question which the unrenewed mind of man can never decide. For the world by its wisdom knows not God; nor the ministry which proceeds from the Spirit of God. It is only understood by the light of that Spirit from whence it flows. And as the natural man has not that spirit, so he cannot know the true ministry, because it is spiritually discerned. But the true Spirit understands the true ministry; because it searches all things, yea the deep things of God. Of what great value it would be to us, a highly professing people, if we, in the transaction of our church affairs, and in our ministry, could have more faith and dependence in the Spirit that quickeneth, and that would make us alive unto good works; and less in the wisdom and teachings of fallible men. If this were more generally the case, I am abundantly convinced that our meetings would be more to the edification and spiritual refreshment of the hungering multitude than they now are. I have often had to watch, and I think we all should watch, lest the busy work of imagination should be suffered to come forth in words, and be substituted for the simple, yet clear putting forth of the still small voice of the heavenly Shepherd. Yet I want us to watch also, that the true word of the Lord may have free course and be glorified. I am also convinced that before we are fully prepared to enter successfully into the work of the Lord, we must, through the washing of regeneration, and with the assisting grace of God, "cleanse ourselves from all filthiness of the flesh and spirit, perfecting holiness in the fear of God." For without holiness we shall not be permitted to even see the King in his beauty, nor to behold the land, which to the ungodly, is very far off. How then shall we be able to teach others the way to it, unless we experimentally know for ourselves, the Way, the Truth and the Life!

But I have repeatedly found, during my long life, that it is through much tribulation that we enter the kingdom of heaven. But "tribulation worketh patience, and patience experience, and experience hope." So the love of God is shed abroad in our hearts as a recompense of reward. And our Saviour says, "Because thou hast kept the word of my patience, I also will keep thee from the hour of temptation, which shall come upon all the world to try them that dwell upon the earth."

D. H.

Springdale, Kansas, 10th mo. 22d, 1882.

Virginia drinks up her entire wheat crop annually, and it is stated that the liquor drank in Louisiana costs $47,000,000, or $2,000,000 more than its combined cotton, sugar and rice crop.

SAVED.

"* * * * I that speak in righteousness mighty to save."—Isa. lxiii. 1.

O why did I linger
So long in the shade,
And when He called to me
Why was I afraid?

Because sin had bound me
So fast in its chain;
But the Saviour he found me
And brake it in twain.

In the light of his presence,
The warmth of his love,
I am waiting to follow
The voice from above,

And whither He leadeth,
By night or by day,
By the pillar of fire
Or the cloud, on the way.

No more a vile sinner,
But saved through his grace,
I long to be near Him
And look on his face.

For thus a poor wanderer
He found, and forgave;
The promised Messiah,
Is mighty to save!

In the mansions of glory,
O, there I shall see
The Lamb who was slain,
Now precious to me.

There, there, to adore thee,
My Lord and my King,
As a glorified spirit
Thy praises to sing!

O blessed abounding!
Let nothing alloy
A union so holy,
The peace, nor the joy,

For He hath redeemed
A poor soul from the grave.
The Son of the Highest
Is mighty to save!

San Jose, Cal., 11th mo. 1882.

FOR LOVE'S SAKE.

BY MARGARET J. PRESTON.

You have read of the Moslem palace—
The marvellous fane that stands
On the banks of the distant Jumna,
The wonder of all the lands.

You have heard of its marble splendors,
Its carvings of rare device,
Its domes and its towers that glisten
Like visions of Paradise.

You have listened, as one has told you
Of its pinnacles snowy and fair—
So pure that they seem suspended
Like clouds in the crystal air.

Of the flow of its fountain falling
As softly as mourners' tears;
Of the lily and rose kept blooming
For over two hundred years.

Of the friezes of frost-like beauty,
The jewels that crust the wall,
The carvings that crown the archway,
The innermost shrine of all—

Where lies in her sculptured coffin, (Whose chisellings mortal man Hath never excelled), the dearest
Of the loves of Shah Jehan.

They read you the shining legends
Whose letters are set in gems,
On the walls of the sacred chamber
That sparkle like diadems.

And they tell you these letters gleaming,
Wherever the eye may look,
Are words of the Moslem prophet,
Are texts from his holy book.

Original.

And still as you heard you questioned Right wonderingly, as you must,
"Why rear such a palace only
To shelter a woman's dust?"

Why rear it?—The Shah had promised
His beautiful Nourmahal
To do it because he loved her—
He loved her—and that was all!

So minaret, wall and column,
And tower and dome above,
All tell of the sacred promise,
All utter one accent—LOVE.

You know of another temple,
A grander than Hindu shrine,
The splendor of whose perfections
Is mystical, strange, divine.

You have read of its deep foundations,
Which neither the frost nor the flood
Nor forces of earth can weaken,
Cemented in tears and blood;

That, chosen with skill transcendent,
By the wisdom that fills the throne,
Was quarried, and hewn, and polished,
Its wonderful Corner-Stone.

So vast is its scale proportioned,
So lofty its turrets rise,
That the pile in its finished glory
Will reach to the very skies.

The lapse of the silent Kedron,
The roses of Sharon fair,
Gethsemane's sacred olives
And cedars are round it there.

And graven on its walls and pillars,
And cut in its crystal stone,
Are the words of our Prophet, sweeter
Than Islam's hath ever known—

Texts culled from the Holy Gospel,
That comfort, refresh, sustain,
And shine with a rarer lustre
Than the gems of the Hindu fane.

The plan of the temple only
Its Architect understands;
And yet He accepts (oh, wonder!)
The helping of human hands!

And so, for the work's progression,
He is willing that great and small
Should bring Him their bits of carving,
So needed to fill the wall.

Not one does the Master Builder
Disdainfully cast away—
Why, even He takes the chippings
We women have brought to-day!

Oh, not to the dead—to the living,
We rear on the earth He trod,
This fane to his lasting glory—
This church to the Christ of God!

Why labor and strive? We have promised
(And dare we now recall?)
To do it because we love Him—
We love Him—and that is all.

For over the church's portal,
Each pillar and arch above,
The Master has set a signet,
And graven one watchword—LOVE.

—Southern Churchman

You had Better Shift Trains.—I took a seat in a certain train. The iron horse began to cough and spit, the wheels began to turn, and off shot the cars, rattling, rumbling away. At the first stopping place I was surprised when the conductor looked at my ticket and said in a very significant way "You are on the wrong train. You'd better get off here." I took his advice and left once.

The affair set me to thinking, for it was an interesting fact that I had supposed I was right and yet was going wrong. May others be on some train thinking they are right, and yet are in the wrong? You may be young. You do not fancy yourself serious at fault. You are a bit careless, you might

But it is nothing alarming, you say. It might be a little more attentive to your duties, a little more dutiful at home, a little more particular in out-door habits, you conclude. But these "littles" indicate a present urgency from the right, and may grow a serious departure. You are in the wrong train and had better leave at once. You may be in the habit of using intoxicating beverages. It is a mere matter of degrees, sips, occasional drinks, you say. And the dirty tenant of the miserable gutter is only a taster, sipper, occasional drinker, you say. You are in the wrong train and had better leave at once. You may be pursuing the wrong course towards your neighbor. You do not openly recognize it as wrong. Indeed, you try to flatter yourself that it is right, at any rate of little consequence. It is something that has a long root, goes back to a far-away beginning, an old grudge kept up, prejudice continued, a suspicious advantage never once taken and never dropped. You varnish it over under a fair name and it goes. Still it is a fault. The train is wrongly going in a direction that is wrong. You had better change at once. You need more. The general course of your conduct towards God is wrong. How many culpable give little or no thought to this subject. They are honest, they are diligent, they are capable, they are good citizens, they go to church, they claim that they are "about right," and yet they may give as little thought to God as people do to the sun when he has set below the western hill-tops. They are not only in the wrong train, but they are gone to sleep over the fact. It is a kind of going to disturb one's ease, to prick one's conceit, to remind self that it is needy in the sight of God. Take it as a word spoken in love, a deed done in love, when a rough hand is laid on that sleeping conscience, and it very rings out, "Wrong train! change!"—American Messenger.

The Battering-ram.—The celebrated architect, Sir Christopher Wren, had to remove an ancient and massive wall in clearing the ground for St. Paul's Cathedral. The problem was how to batter down that wall. He thought of the Roman battering-ram. He had one built, and set a gang of men to work. They battered the wall vigorously all day, but made no apparent impression. They were ordered to stop; but the architect said, "Go on." They did go on the next day, a third day, fourth, and I think a seventh day, before there was any sign of fissure in the wall. Then, all at once it began to crack, to tremble, to totter, and it soon fell.

Sir Christopher said that the very first blow the ram made an impression and weakened the wall. Every subsequent blow carried on the work. There was real progress all the while, though there was no visible sign of it. The result was sure, if the operation was continued long enough.

Is it not so when we batter with truth against the hoary walls of error? Even if we see no immediate results, there may be a weakening and trembling visible to angels and men. Our business is not to watch for results, and to grow impatient and despondent when they fail to appear, but to go on doing our duty, to strike with all our might for the truth, and for God, believing that we cannot fail. That incident encouraged me; and I hope it will encourage others. How long and patiently the early Christians battered the walls of the old Roman and Grecian idolatry! In due time it fell. And so will fall every thing that exalts itself against God.—Selected.

For "The Friend."

Western Yearly Meeting of Friends.

(SMALLER BODY.)

The sittings of the Yearly Meeting were held in the meeting-house at Sugar Grove, Hendricks county, Indiana. The select meeting was held on Fifth-day morning, the 14th of 9th month, and the general meeting commenced on Sixth-day, the 15th. About two hundred Friends were in daily attendance, the number of men and women being about equal. A minister from Canada, and two companions, brought certificates of the unity of their friends at home, with a prospect of religious service, including their attendance of the Yearly Meeting. There were Friends present from other Yearly Meetings, including some from Indiana, and others from distant parts of Western Yearly Meeting, who had never attended the meeting since it has been held at Sugar Grove. Epistles were read from co-ordinate meetings in Canada, Iowa and Kansas, and a committee was appointed to prepare replies thereto. An epistle from N. England was also read and referred to the Meeting for Sufferings: Friends not feeling their way to correspond with that meeting at present.

White Lick Quarterly Meeting having suggested, on account of the reduction in its membership by death, that advantage would be gained by making a change in the distribution of Monthly Meetings, a committee was appointed to consider the subject. They are expected to report another year. On Seventh-day morning, Albert Maxwell was reappointed Clerk, and Caleb Mills was appointed Assistant Clerk.

A vacancy in the correspondents of the Yearly Meeting, made by the decease of R. W. Hodson, was filled by the appointment of Joel Newlin. Three Friends in the station of elder deceased in the past year, and one minister was recorded. The subject of changing the time and place of holding the Yearly Meeting was brought under consideration, and referred to a joint committee of men and women.

On Second-day morning the Queries and answers were read, and much pertinent counsel was given, tending to incite to a more faithful maintenance of our Christian profession. A few Friends were named to assist the Clerk in embodying some of these in a minute of advice to the subordinate meetings. The subject of education took a strong hold on the minds of many, and the report of the committee charged with the care of schools was considered in joint session. It appeared that three schools had been in successful operation during the year. They were taught by exemplary Friends who were well qualified to conduct them satisfactorily as institutions of learning. Eighty-one children, nearly all members, had attended them. In the Yearly Meeting at large 141 children were reported between the ages of six and twenty-one years. None of these were growing up without literary instruction. The exhibit was thought to be encouraging, and the absolute necessity of maintaining schools under their care was insisted upon. "The meeting was united in authorizing the committee to draw on its treasury for $100, to be expended at its discretion for the assistance of Friends in the education of their children who are unable to give them a guarded education under the care of our Society."

A memorial respecting our late friend, Robert W. Hodson, prepared by Plainfield Monthly Meeting, was read, and several testimonies were borne to his diligence in the work of his day, by some who had known him from forty to sixty years.

A meeting for worship was held on Fourth-day morning, and in the afternoon the last session for business. After answers to the epistles and reports of several committees had been read, the minute of advice was adopted as follows:

"As the condition and work of our meeting has been brought under review by the reading and answering of the queries, and in the consideration of the various subjects of interest that have been brought before us, we have been renewedly sensible of our weakness and short-coming.

"The bond of Christian love and true gospel fellowship brings us into a unity deeper and stronger than can be expressed by words. 'If we walk in the light as He is in the light, we have fellowship one with another, and the blood of Jesus Christ, his Son, cleanseth us from all sin.'

"We profess to be Christians and Friends. What are Christians, what are Friends, but real followers of Christ, walking in his fear and counsel; living up to and living out practically and faithfully all his requirements as manifested in our hearts and minds by that Divine light, life, and grace, a manifestation of which it is declared is given to every man to profit withal?

"As we profess to be Friends, we ought to live up to the doctrines and principles which Friends have ever held. If we are unsettled or doubting in any of these, we are in a condition to be led farther and farther away.

"If we are fully convinced of the spirituality of Divine worship, nothing of common importance will prevent us from meeting with our brethren and sisters for the performance of it. He that hath not the Spirit of Christ is none of his. The spirituality of the Gospel is a mystery to the unregenerate mind. If our religious experience is not such as to regulate our conduct and conversation and intercourse among our neighbors, it is of little avail to us.

"In the days of the Judges, Israel had no king, and they were left to mark out their own course, their highways were obstructed, and Israel walked in byways. As there was a deep searching required for their deliverance, so there is a loud call for deep searching of heart, and an earnest individual work, in order to know of a truth whether we are under the direction and leadership of our King, the Lord Jesus Christ. As much as we may be inclined to do the things that may seem right in our own eyes, and much authority as we may claim for so doing—yet we must enter into a deep searching of heart to know his will. Remember that He will have not only a tried but a proved people, proved as by fire, that all the dross may be purged away.

"The Lord visits by his Spirit the children of men, manifesting Himself unto them. When we have committed sin this manifestation of the Spirit comes to us as a still small voice, condemning.

"It comes to us as a deliverer from sin, drawing us unto Himself, giving us a true sense of our condition. Thus we see that we must be redeemed from sin; the old man being put off, and we brought into fellowship with the Father and his Son, Jesus Christ; experiencing of a reality that his blood cleanseth from all sin.

"Our minds have been brought into affectionate solicitude for our younger members, that the work of true religion may not be marred or obstructed in them by a disposition to evade the cross of Christ. Beware, dear young friends, of the alluring diversions and pastimes, fashions and follies of the present day.

"Let us all examine to know whether we are bringing forth the fruits of righteousness. By our fruits we are known. What will it avail if we are hearers of the word only, and not doers of the will of God. Though our service may seem to us as but filling the water-pots with water, assuredly He will bless all that is done under his requiring.

"As we come to a conclusion, we acknowledge the goodness of our heavenly Father in enabling us to transact the business of the meeting in love and unity. The meeting concluded to meet at the usual time and place next year, if consistent with the Divine will.

ALBERT MAXWELL, Clerk."

Power of Prayer—A True Incident.—An American judge relates the following incident as occurring in his practice:—He was trying a case, in which one of the parties was not able to pay counsel fees, and undertook to plead his own cause. But he found, in the course of the trial, that the keen and adroit attorney who managed the case for the other party was too much for him in legal strategy, evidently making the worst appear the better cause. The poor man was in a state of mind bordering upon desperation when the opposing counsel closed his plea, and the case was about to be submitted to the justice for decision. "May it please your honor," said the man, "may I pray?" The judge was taken somewhat by surprise, and could only say that he saw no objection. Whereupon he went down upon his knees and made a fervent prayer, in which he laid the merits of his case before the Lord in a very clear and methodical statement of all the particulars, pleading that right and justice might prevail. "O Lord, thou knowest that this lawyer has misrepresented the facts, and Thou knowest that it is so and so," to the end of the chapter. Arguments which he could not present in logical array to the understanding of men, he had no difficulty in addressing to the Lord, being evidently better versed in praying than pettifoggery. When he rose from his knees, the opposing counsel, very much exasperated by the turn which the case had taken said:—"Justice, does not the closing argument belong to me?" To which the judge replied;—"You can close with prayer, if you please." The man of law wisely forbore, leaving his opponent to win his case, as he did, by his mode of presenting it.

A friend should bear with a friend's infirmities, but not his vices.

For "The Friend."

Bible Reading at Meal-time.

In continuation of the subject of reading the Scriptures in families, mentioned by a correspondent in "The Friend" of 11th mo. 18th, it may not be amiss to remark by way of encouragement to some, that a few weeks ago having stayed overnight in the house of one of our members, and being obliged to take an early morning train, I saw with satisfaction not only that breakfast was timely prepared, but also that opportunity was given to have the Bible read with deliberation before taking my departure. In another case, where the family was much larger, the reading was omitted.

Where there are guests to provide for who have to leave early in the day, and the mother of the family finds herself, it may be, with inadequate help, there may sometimes be an advantage in reading the Bible while the morning meal is in preparation. Although one or two members of the household may be prevented from being present at the reading; that alternative would probably generally be preferable to the omission altogether of a helpful custom, necessitated by a hurried breakfast and departure. Yet there may be occasions when the savory conversation of a guest may be as the milk and wine of the kingdom, instructively filling up the brief time before departure, so that no loss might ensue from the almost perforce omission of the stated reading. That duty, indeed, could be afterward rightly attended to, in most cases, before the family separated for the day.

As a general remark,—while the spirit of the Bible injunction as to hospitality, so far as the preparation of meals is concerned, is not to be overlooked, I believe that any reasonable guest would greatly prefer a very simple repast, served with love, to the cumbering of his or her entertainers with "much serving."

J. W. L.

For "The Friend."

Religious Items, &c.

Statistics.—The New York Times states that the expense of conducting worship in New York City, the attendant benevolence, repairs of church buildings, and contributions to missionary objects amounts to more than $6,500,000 per annum—about one-fourth of the amount spent for liquors in the same time.

The Trinity Church Corporation, and the Reformed Dutch Collegiate Church are very wealthy, holding property to the value of many millions of dollars; much of which is probably due to the rise in value of their real estate.

The Dutch have 22 churches and a membership of 6,938; church expenses, $177,638; benevolence, $42,583.

The Episcopalians have 70 congregations with 25,526 communicants; church expenses not known exactly, say $600,000; contributions for benevolence, $550,407.

Presbyterian churches, 60; members, 19,871; church expenses, $314,964; benevolence, $297,350.

Baptist churches, 35; members, 12,725; church expenses, $131,906; benevolence, $200,603.

Methodist churches, 65; members, 13,359; benevolence, $42,555; support of ministers, bishops, &c., $117,225; current church expenses, $32,836; church maintenance, including city missions, $200,661.

Lutheran churches, 19; members, 9,100; church expenses, $95,000; benevolence, $2,000.

Jewish congregations, 19; membership 913, (heads of families;) expense account $202,476; benevolence, $100,000.

Women Preachers among the Methodists.—The Christian Advocate in reply to a question as to the status of female local preachers in the body it represents, says: "There is no power in the Methodist Episcopal Church by which a woman can be licensed a local preacher. Certain Quarterly Conferences undertook to license them without law, but appeals were made to the General Conference from the rulings of certain Bishops on this subject, and the rulings were sustained. Some Quarterly Conferences, in direct violation of disregard of these decisions of the General Conference, have licensed them, and some presiding elders have put the motion, but the whole is invalid, and the Conferences and elders deserving of censure. Under these circumstances those women who have license to preach are entitled to the respect that their personal characters give them, just as are other women. They are entitled to no additional honor or power, because they have an illegal document."

The Free Methodist Conference, held at Burlington, Iowa, adopted a chapter on temperance, forbidding the use of intoxicating wine for sacramental purposes and condemning the voting for candidates for office who favor the common traffic in intoxicating liquors. The growing and sale of tobacco for common use is forbidden among them. All houses of worship are required to be plain, without steeple, and no more expensive than absolutely necessary.

For "The Friend."

Natural History, Science, &c.

Lac.—This substance forms a crust surrounding the branches and twigs of certain trees, and is the excretion of an insect called Coccus lacca. After the larvæ appear they crawl about the stem of the plant in search of young juicy spots to which they fasten themselves by their proboscis. The female insect never shifts her position.

The incrustations of lac vary from half an inch to an inch in diameter. The branches are broken off from the trees by the natives and in this state are called stick-lac. Shell lac is prepared by putting a quantity of pieces of lac into long cloth oblong bags, two men holding each end of the bag extended over gentle charcoal fire, by which process the lac is melted. When quite fluid each man twists the bag so as to force out the melted substance, and this drops upon pieces of the stem of the plantain placed beneath, the smooth and glossy surface of which prevents the lac from adhering. Shell-lac is almost a pure resin and dissolved in alcohol, forms a valuable varnish.

Dry Thunder Storms.—A correspondent of the London Times writing from South Africa says: "Every afternoon tremendous storms of thunder and lightning burst upon us. These were of two kinds, the wet and the dry. During the dry thunderstorms, the lightning seemed quite stupefying. It was unaccompanied by either wind or rain. The angry flashes were followed almost simultaneously by awful crashes of thunder, which seemed to shake the earth. One or two tents were ck, and the grass was set fire to in several places within sight of our camps, but no life lost."

Curious Partial Loss of Memory.—An English scholar during a holiday excursion in Hartz mountains, subjected himself one day to a severe physical strain, which produced a singular mental disturbance. He went on his feet from morning till night, and the course of the day's wanderings, made several arduous ascents, taking no rest, and neither eating nor sleeping. At night, when he reached a place where he could supply himself, he was unable, to his great astonishment, to recollect a single word of the German language, although he ordinarily spoke with fluency. His memory did not fail in any other respect; he knew his own language as well as ever, and recalled perfectly all the incidents of the day. As soon as he had thoroughly rested, and had eaten food which he procured by signs, his German returned to him completely.

It is probable that such temporary aberrations of memory are more frequent than are commonly supposed; and that they may help to account for some of the otherwise unaccountable failures of men in responsible places to do their duty.—Scientific American.

Escal.—This is an article of diet prepared by the Indians from the roots of a species of starchy plant. The thick portion of the plant is the root of the leaves is exposed to a fire, and then roasted in a pit filled with hot stones and covered over with leaves. When sufficiently cooled the cooked plant is cut in slices, which have a dark mahogany color and a sugary taste.—San Francisco Bulletin.

Protective Effect of Vaccination.—The most striking of all evidence is that derived from small-pox hospitals themselves. At Highgate, during an experience of 40 years, no doctor or servant, having been revaccinated, ever contracted the disease. Among all the students, who during the past two years attended the hospital of the Manchester Infirmary, for clinical instruction, not one has died, all having been revaccinated before being permitted to enter the small-pox wards.—London Times.

Remedy in Burns.—Cover the burned surface with a piece of soft rag or lint, or even blotting paper, and keep it constantly wetted with a cold saturated solution of carbonate of soda (baking soda,) in plain water or camphorated water. The pain will soon subside.

Usefulness in Animals.—In his Naturalist Australis, Bennett speaks of a pair of tame kangaroos at Sydney. One day some persons were present who did not know the birds, and being afraid of them, ran away. Whereupon the emus, enjoying the joke, gave chase after one of the fugitives, and took off with him.

G. Wood, has preserved the following anecdote, which shows the presence of a similitude in horses.

One of our carriage horses, "Charley," though by no means vicious, was a saucy fellow. We had much difficulty in securing him, as he could slip or untie his halter, take down the bar and open the stable door. One day the groom forgot the necessary precaution of locking the door. Out into the yard went Charley, where he found the coachman's little boy. The animal did not attempt to hurt the child, but (with that feeling which causes great boys to find amusement in teasing younger ones,) drove him into a corner, and, seeing that the little fellow was frightened, kept him there by shaking his head at him whenever he attempted to escape. It happened to be the first person who discovered them, and, although but a child myself, went to the rescue.

"I knew the animal's funny tricks, and he knew that I was not afraid of him, therefore he allowed me to lead him back to the stable, only giving a parting shake of the head to his late prisoner. Although so fond of liberty himself, he would thus imprison dogs, cats or fowls whenever an opportunity offered."

In the Zoologist, there is an anecdote of a short-tailed field-mouse, which had been found so covered with ticks that it could hardly crawl. It was picked up, cleared from the vermin and placed in a box. It was so grateful for the relief, that it did not try to escape, and on the very first day took food from the hand of its benefactor.

Little "Peter," as he was named, soon learned to come when called, and was let out of the box every day to play about the room. Strange to say, he showed a decided appreciation of fun, a favorite amusement being to hide himself in a basin of corn, which was kept for his benefit. In this he would bury himself, refusing to answer to his name, and evidently expecting to be looked for. If my friend took no notice of him, Peter's slender stock of patience soon became exhausted; first a shrill squeak was heard, then the corn flew up in showers, and, at last, up came Peter's little round head to the surface.

Dr. Bennett, in his "Gatherings of a Naturalist," mentions that a couple of young duck-bills in his possession used to play at hide-and-seek behind the furniture of the room. One would hide itself and then give a squeak, when the other would hunt for it and at last find it.

THE FRIEND.

TWELFTH MONTH 2, 1882.

At the funeral of a young woman not long ago, who was not a member of our religious Society, where a large company was gathered, the assembly was addressed by a man, who stated that he believed their deceased friend had finished her work on earth, and he exhorted those present to be diligent in the performance of their duties so that they might procure one of the heavenly mansions.

The advice was good so far as it went, but it was felt to be painfully defective, and also liable to mislead the hearers, for there was no reference to the indispensable experience of repentance for sins past, as a preliminary to a sense of their remission; no reference to the need of pardon; and nothing to lead the audience to suppose that they needed Divine help to enable them to live godly lives. Whether it was intended or not, those who listened to the discourse might easily infer that their salvation depended solely on their own efforts, and that it was as legitimate a fruit of their labors, as the wages of a mechanic are of his day's work.

This man was followed by another, who dwelt principally upon the importance of living in communion with the Lord, so that they might be prepared for happiness hereafter.

The advice was excellent in itself, and it supplied one of the omissions of the previous speaker; yet it did not bring into view the need of repentance for the sins we have committed; and appeared to regard our Saviour principally as an example of holy living, to be imitated and followed by all who bear his name. In making this criticism, we do not overlook the fact, that the duty of a minister of the Gospel is to proclaim the message given him at the time by the Head of the Church, and that he is not at liberty in his own will and wisdom to add thereto what might seem to him needful to round it and render it more complete. Yet the impression left on the mind by the remarks of the preachers on this occasion was, that their hearers had need to remember the language of the apostles, when brought before the Jewish Council to give account of the healing of the lame man,—“Be it known unto you all, and to all the people of Israel, that by the name of Jesus Christ of Nazareth, whom ye crucified, whom God raised from the dead, even by Him doth this man stand here before you whole. This is the stone which was set at naught of you builders, which is become the head of the corner. Neither is there salvation in any other: for there is none other name under heaven, given among men, whereby we must be saved.” And also the subsequent testimony of Peter and the other apostles: “The God of our fathers raised up Jesus whom ye slew and hanged on a tree, Him hath God exalted with his right hand to be a Prince and a Saviour, for to give repentance to Israel and forgiveness of sins.”

When we are brought under condemnation for our many transgressions—for our refusals to obey the Divine will as shown to us individually by the Light of Christ shining into our hearts—for our choosing our own way instead of submitting ourselves to the Divine guidance; and feel the terrors of the Lord for disobedience—when we are made sensible that we are sinners and have no claim on the Divine favor;—what a blessed message it is to be told that there is One who can give “repentance” and “forgiveness of sins!”

This repentance will lead to forsaking of sin through the powerful operation of the Grace of God—and if this effect is not produced in us, we cannot be saved, for nothing that is impure or unholy can ever enter the kingdom of heaven. All must be “washed, sanctified and justified in the name of the Lord Jesus, and by the Spirit of our God.”

There is at the present day a spirit widely prevailing, which reasons away or undervalues the plain language of Scripture, and would destroy all belief in the atonement of our Redeemer. Those who are exposed to its influence, either by converse with those imbued with it, or by frequent perusal of articles tinged with such rationalism, have need to be on their guard, and to adopt the prayer of the apostles, “Lord, increase our faith.”

SUMMARY OF EVENTS.

UNITED STATES.—The Sioux Commissioners were in St. Paul on Second-day last week, on their way to the Standing Rock Agency. Judge Shannon, one of the Commissioners, said they had held Councils at the Santee, Pine Ridge and Rosebud agencies, and found the Indians in all cases willing to separate and go to farming, and also anxious for the education of their children. The Commission, it is stated, “will recommend the allotment of about 26,000 cows to the agencies visited, and also the establishment of one school for each thirty children; the attendance at the schools to be compulsory, with the penalty of withdrawal of rations. The plan includes the continuance of ammunition and rations until the Indians become self-supporting."

All the Navajoe Indians in New Mexico have returned to their reservation, and no further trouble with them is expected this year. The Commissioner of Indian Affairs has refused to allow the chiefs of the Mille Sae Indians in Minnesota to go to Washington for a "pow wow." He tells them that "the terms of the treaty will be faithfully adhered to, and that so long as they refrain from committing outrages they will not be compelled to remove to the White Earth Agency."

The Northern Pacific Railway by the close of this year will have but 310 miles incomplete, with large forces of workmen steadily closing the gap at both ends. The entire supply of construction material for the uncompleted portion is ready, with much of it delivered where needed. This year the company has built 410 miles of the main line and 253 miles of branch lines.

The Callender building at Providence, Rhode Island, occupied by jewelry and other firms, was burned on the morning of the 21st ult., and two girls were killed by jumping from upper windows, and ten or twelve other persons were injured, two, at least, fatally. The building was unprovided with a fire escape. The loss on property is about $70,000.

The Mayor and City Councilmen of Elizabeth, New Jersey, have joined in a circular urging the creditors of that city to accept the proposition for a settlement on the basis of 50 per cent. The debt and interest to 7th mo. 1st, 1882, amounted to $6,700,000, while the city valuation on which taxes can be collected is a little over $10,000,000.

Diphtheria and other contagious diseases being prevalent in Boston, the Health Board of that city has forbidden public funerals in the cases of persons who die of such diseases.

Malignant diphtheria has appeared in the village of Millerton, near Poughkeepsie, and the schools have been closed and families are leaving the place in consequence.

A few new cases of yellow fever have occurred in Pensacola within a few days, but only two of the existing cases are regarded as serious. The Health Board has only two nurses now on duty. Absentees are returning to the city in full force, business has been resumed, and the Advance-Gazette newspaper is again published, after a suspension of two months.

There were 349 deaths in this city last week, an increase of 21 over the previous week, and 22 more than the corresponding week of last year. Of the whole number, 185 were males and 164 females: 65 died of consumption; 29 of diphtheria; 21 of pneumonia; 19 of croup; 12 of marasmus; 13 of apoplexy, and 11 of old age.

Markets, &c.—U. S. 3's, registered, 102½; 3½'s, registered, 101½; 4½'s, registered, 112½; coupon, 113½; 4's, 119½; currency 6's, 133.

Cotton continues dull at former rates. Sales of middlings are reported at 10½ a 11 cts. per pound for uplands and New Orleans.

Petroleum.—Standard white, 7½ cts. for export, and 8½ cts. per gallon for home use.

Flour continues dull, but prices were unchanged. Sales of 2300 barrels, including Minnesota extras, at $5.50 a $6.25; Pennsylvania family at $4.65 a $5; western do. at $5 a $5.75, and patents at 6.25 a $7.25. Rye flour is steady at $4.25 a $4.37½ per barrel.

Grain.—Wheat is a fraction higher. Sales of 3800 bushels red and amber, in car lots, at $1.01 a $1.12, as to quality and location. Rye is nominal at 67 a 70 cts. Corn is quiet but firm. Sales of 8000 bushels to the trade at 90 a 91 cts. for old yellow; 65 a 70 cts. for new yellow, and 62 a 65 for white, according to dryness. Oats are in limited request at former rates. Sales of 9600 bushels, in car lots, at 43½ a 49 cts. for mixed and No. 1 white.

Hay and Straw Market, for week ending 11th mo. 25th, 1882.—Loads of hay, 400; loads of straw, 80. Average price during the week—Prime timothy, 95 cts. to $1.05 per 100 pounds; mixed, 90 cts. to $1.00 per 100 pounds; straw, 75 to 85 cts. per 100 pounds.

Beef cattle were dull and unsettled: 3500 head sold at the different yards at 3½ a 6½ cts. per lb., the latter rate for extra.

Sheep were in fair demand: 15,000 head arrived and sold at the different yards, at 3 a 5½ cts., and lambs at 4 a 7½ cts. per pound, as to condition.

Hogs were a fraction lower: 4400 head arrived and sold at the different yards at 8½ a 10 cts. per lb., as to quality.

FOREIGN.—It has been officially reported to the Government that widespread distress is feared in Ireland this winter. The districts most seriously affected through want of employment on farms and the failure of the potato crop are Sligo, Ballina, Swineford and the greater portion of Galway. There is much destitution in West Clare and Connought. Owing to continuously heavy demands upon Irishmen in America to support the Land League, there has been a considerable decrease in the remittances to the struggling natives in Ireland. This has reduced many of them to the condition of being unable to purchase new seed.

Two men were convicted of the murder of the Joyce family, at Maamtrasna, and sentenced to be hanged. The remaining four men charged with complicity, who had not been brought to trial, pleaded guilty and threw themselves on the clemency of the Crown. They were sentenced to death, but will probably have the punishment respite to penal servitude.

A detective named Cox, was shot dead in the streets of Dublin, on the 26th ultimo. The assassin and several accomplices have been arrested.

The authorities of Edinburgh, Glasgow, Paisley, Govan, Partick and Perth have all refused the application of the authorities of Invernesshire for constables to aid in serving processes on the Skye crofters. The authorities of Aberdeenshire have agreed to send a detachment of police to the Isle of Skye, to assist in the serving of processes, providing the Commissioners of Invernesshire will hold themselves responsible for their expenses. In the meantime defensive arrangements on the Island are proceeding. At a mass meeting on the island one of the speakers said that any tenant paying rent, unless revaluation was granted, would be a marked man. It was resolved to take every lawful means to prevent tenants from taking evicted farms. There is some prospect of a settlement between the crofters and their landlords. The latter have consented to submit the dispute to arbitration. The county police have received promise of a reinforcement of eighty constables. Many of the crofters are acquainted with the details of the Irish agitation. The authorities are of opinion that only soldiery can arrest the offenders.

London, 11th mo. 27th.—A train on the North Scotland Railway, which left Macduff, at 4 o'clock this afternoon, fell through the bridge at Fyvie, Aberdeenshire. Fourteen persons were killed and many injured. The engine had passed in safety, but all the carriages were wrecked.

In the House of Commons, Trevelyan, Chief Secretary for Ireland, replying to a question by Healy, said that since 8th mo. last, all the copies of the Irish World and the Irish Nation which had arrived in Ireland had been seized, but the stoppage of circulation of those papers in England was unnecessary.

Admiral Seymour and General Wolseley have been gazetted peers.

It is announced on good authority that the question of joint control of Egypt will soon be brought to a satisfactory settlement, compatible with the interests of both France and England.

Giffen, President of the Statistical Society, has delivered his inaugural address. His subject was the influence of population statistics upon political thought. He referred to the growth of the population of the United States, which, if continued, he said would cause great difficulties. The masses of laborers would have to contend, under increasing difficulties, against a fall in the scale of living, and probably there would eventually be a diversion of the larger part of the stream of emigration from Europe and the Eastern States of America to the northwestern part of Canada.

A reactionary movement would seem to have begun in England in the matter of wearing birds. We read in Truth of a garden party at which a young girl was boycotted for wearing on her hat "two sweet little gray doves," which, she boasted, some one had shot especially for her. The other girls scarcely spoke to her, and made the men promise to neglect her, and she was only reinstated into general favor when she removed her hat, confessing that she had never thought of the cruelty to the birds.

On the 21st ultimo, in the French Chamber of Deputies, the bill ratifying De Brazza's Treaty with the Congo Chief, Makoko, was adopted. M. Duclerc, President of the Council, said that the execution of this Treaty could not give rise to any difficulty. Duclerc read the text of the treaty of 1836 with Portugal. He pointed out that it reserved all the rights of France. The Government, he said, will shortly ask for a grant of 200,000 francs for De Brazza's expedition, in order to enable him to establish twelve scientific, commercial and hospital stations along the Congo river.

Rome, 11th mo. 22d.—Parliament was opened to-day. The speech from the throne was very pacific in tone. It recommends the Chamber to devote itself chiefly to economic, social and administrative questions. The recommendations were approved by a great majority of the Deputies. Thirty Radical members absented themselves from the opening, so as to avoid taking oath to the King and to the Constitution.

Official returns show that the revenue of the Russian Empire from 2nd mo. 1st to 9th mo. 1st, increased 1,000,000 roubles, and that the expenditures decreased 26,000,000, as compared with the same period last year.

In consequence of the representations of the Pow Montenegro is disposed to accept a compromise of the Porte—namely, the cession by Turkey of half Kioatchin District, instead of the whole district, a first demanded by Montenegro.

The Constantinople Vakuf states that the shore of the Red Sea as far as the Gulf of Bussora are Ottoman territory, and that sales of plots of land to foreigners the native tribes are in contravention of the Imperial irade. Some of the Ulema special agents will shortly be despatched to prevent the native tribes from being deceived by evil-disposed persons. Turkey refuse to recognize the cession of Massowah or any territory of the Red Sea to any Power.

A despatch to the Exchange Telegraph Company from Cairo says: The trial of Arabi Pasha has been postponed, with the consent of the President of the Court. A very uneasy feeling is beginning to prevail.

There is reason to believe that the opium question between England and China will soon be settled. The Che-Foo Convention is not ratified the settlement will be on the line of that instrument.

The various estates in the Finland Diet, except peasant Representatives, have petitioned the Czar give permission for the introduction at the next session of a bill granting full liberty to the press in Finland. They refer to the loyalty and tranquillity of the Finland in support of their prayer.

The steamship Wearmouth, Captain Evans, which left Quebec 11th mo. 19th for London, with a cargo of coal, was wrecked on one of the Magdalen Islands the night of the 21st. All her crew of twenty perished, except four. The Wearmouth was a vessel of 1100 tons, built for the coal trade, without partitions between decks or bulkheads forward or aft of the engine.

The cut of lumber in the Ottawa Valley, Canada this season, will, it is estimated, reach 800,000,000 feet, the largest since 1873.

The stock of sugar in Havana on the 27th ult., imported at 27,175 tons. In the jurisdiction of Santa Clara some plantations have commenced grinding. Considering the drought in the greater portion of the Island whole season, the northern winds came too early, rising the cane before it had reached its full development. The planters in the Sagua districts believe that there will be fully 50 per cent. below the last, while those of other parts of the Island estimate the decrease at 20 per cent. The merchants, as a rule, however, consider these calculations premature. There were eight deaths from yellow fever in Havana last week.

The Spanish Cabinet have resolved to reply to demands of the United States Government, with reference to the losses suffered by Americans during the Cuban insurrection, that they will act in conformity with principles of strict justice.

Three hundred and sixty workmen from the Cay Islands have left Cuba for the purpose of settling in Mexico, and it is said a Mexican agent has contracted for three hundred more to leave the Island for the same destination.

A Meeting of the Teachers' Association of Philadelphia, will be held at Boys' Select School 820 Cherry street, at 2.30 p. m., on Seventh-day, mo. 2d, 1882. Subjects to be discussed: Least Common Multiple and Greatest Common Divisor; Care of Her Written Examinations.

Friends interested are invited to attend.
MARY W. WOOLMAN, Secretary

FRIENDS' ASYLUM FOR THE INSANE
Near Frankford, (Twenty third Ward,) Philadelphia
Physician and Superintendent—JOHN C. HALL, M.D.
Applications for the Admission of Patients may be made to the Superintendent, or to any of the Board Managers.

WILLIAM H. PILE, PRINTER,
No. 422 Walnut Street.

THE FRIEND.

A RELIGIOUS AND LITERARY JOURNAL.

OL. LVI.

SEVENTH-DAY, TWELFTH MONTH 9, 1882.

NO. 18.

PUBLISHED WEEKLY.

if paid in advance, $2.00 per annum; if not paid in advance $2.50; 10 cents extra is charged for Postage on those sent by mail.

Articles designed for insertion to be addressed to

JOSEPH WALTON,
MOORESTOWN, BURLINGTON CO., N. J.

Subscriptions, payments and business communications, received by

JOHN S. STOKES,
NO. 116 NORTH FOURTH STREET, UP STAIRS,
PHILADELPHIA.

For "The Friend."

Atmospheric Germs.

There have appeared at different times in the columns of "The Friend," notices of some remarkable discoveries of modern times relating to the living organisms which are spread through the atmosphere, and which are so important a part in the processes of defecation and infection. One of the observers and experimenters on this subject, John Tyndall, has collected into one volume essays and papers in which he had previously recorded his observations; and the book presents such an interesting exhibit of sagacity, patience, perseverance, and candor, with which his researches were carried on, and of the manner in which one observation leads to another in the sincere seeker of truth; that a more connected account of the whole subject, it is thought will prove valuable and interesting to the readers of The Friend.

It is a familiar observation that the rays of the sun shining into a darkened room, reveal a track by the particles of dust which are floating in the air. In the course of some experiments into the decomposition of vapors, it was necessary to remove this dust, and at the experimental tube containing the vapors, should embrace no substance capable of scattering light in the slightest sensible degree. In attempting to effect this removal, U-tubes were placed in succession in the path of the air, before it entered the liquid in which the vapor was to be carried into the experimental tube. One of these contained fragments of marble wetted with caustic potash, the other fragments of glass wetted with concentrated sulphuric acid. Tyndall found that the air still retained a considerable amount of mechanically suspended matter, which was eliminated when a beam of light was passed through the tube.

Tyndall says, "I tried to intercept this floating matter in various ways; and on October 5, 1868, prior to sending the air through a drying apparatus, it was carefully permitted to pass over the top of a spirit-lamp. The floating matter then no longer appeared, having been burnt up by the flame, and was therefore organic matter. I was by no means prepared for this result; having previously thought that the dust in our air was at least partly inorganic and non-combustible. I had constructed a small gas-furnace, now much employed by chemists, containing a platinum tube which could be heated to vivid redness. Within this tube was a roll of platinum gauze, which, while it permitted the air to pass through it, ensured the practical contact of the dust with the incandescent metal." The result was, that the floating matter totally disappeared, having been burnt up. This condition of the tube he expresses by the phrase, "optically empty."

"In a cylindrical beam, which strongly illuminated the dust of the laboratory, I placed an ignited spirit-lamp. Mingling with the flame and round its rim, were seen curious wreaths of darkness resembling an intensely black smoke. On placing the flame at some distance below the beam, the same dark masses stormed upwards. They were blacker than the blackest smoke ever seen issuing from the funnel of a steamer; and their resemblance to smoke was so perfect as to lead the most practised observer to conclude that the apparently pure flame of the alcohol lamp required but a beam of sufficient intensity to reveal its clouds of liberated carbon.

"But is the blackness smoke? This question presented itself in a moment and was thus answered: A red-hot poker was placed underneath the beam; from it the black wreaths also ascended. A large hydrogen flame was next employed, and it produced those whirling masses of darkness, far more copiously than either the spirit-flame or the poker. Smoke was therefore out of the question.

What, then, was the blackness? It was simply that of stellar space; that is to say, blackness resulting from the absence from the track of the beam of all matter competent to scatter its light. When the flame was placed below the beam the floating matter was destroyed in situ; and the air, freed from this matter, rose into the beam, jostled aside the illuminated particles, and substituted for their light the darkness due to its own perfect transparency. Nothing could more forcibly illustrate the invisibility of the agent which renders all things visible. The beam crossed, unseen, the black chasm formed by the transparent air, while, at both sides of the gap, the thick-strewn particles shone out like a luminous solid under the powerful illumination."

The removal of the floating matter from the air was also effected by filtering it through a plug of cotton wool closely packed in the tube. The small particles adhered to the wool and were retained. The same effect takes place in vessels which remain closed air-tight for a considerable time. The gentle currents caused by the varying temperature, bring all parts of the enclosed air in succession into contact with the sides of the vessels, and the motes adhere thereto. Sent through such air, the most concentrated beam of light fails to render its track visible.

From these observations it is evident that we are always living in an atmosphere of dust, which we inhale into our lungs, and which comes into contact with all the exposed surface of our bodies. The belief has gradually grown up that many of the forms of epidemic disease to which man and other animals are liable, are due to the absorption from the air of certain germs which sometimes exist in and form part of this dust, and which have the power of growth and reproduction in our bodies, and thus produce disturbance by the development of parasitic life. "As a planted acorn gives birth to an oak, competent to produce a whole crop of acorns, each gifted with the power of reproducing its parent tree; and as thus from a single seedling a whole forest may spring; so, it is contended, these epidemic diseases literally plant their seeds, grow and shake abroad new germs, which, meeting in the human body their proper food and temperature, finally take possession of whole populations. There is nothing in pure chemistry which resembles the power of propagation and self-multiplication possessed by the matter which produces epidemic disease. If you sow wheat you do not get barley; if you sow small-pox you do not get scarlet-fever, but small pox indefinitely multiplied, and nothing else. The matter of each contagious disease reproduces itself."

This theory was strengthened by the discovery in 1836, that the process of fermentation is due to the yeast-plant, a living organism, which when placed in a proper medium feeds, grows and reproduces itself, and in this way carries on the process of fermentation. Schwann, of Berlin, in 1837, announced the important fact that when a decoction of meat is effectually screened from ordinary air and supplied solely with calcined air, putrefaction never sets in. Putrefaction, therefore, he assumed to be caused not by the air itself, but by something in the air which could be destroyed by a sufficiently high temperature. These results were confirmed by the experiments of other scientists.

Additional confirmation was given to this theory by the well-known fact, that many hospitals become so infected with germs of disease, that in them patients suffering from wounds, or from diseases that require the use of the knife, are exceedingly liable to have the exposed surfaces affected with malignant inflammation; though in other localities there would be very little tendency to such an affection. So saturated have the walls of some such buildings become with these poisonous germs, that they have been torn down as a sanitary measure. As a preventive to this danger, the practice has been introduced into surgery of throwing a fine spray of carbolic acid solution on wounds when they are exposed to the air in dressing. This material seems to have the power of effectually destroying the vitality of the germs, or at least of preventing the infection of the exposed cavities of the body, by them. J. W.

(To be concluded.)

For "The Friend."

Religious Views and Tenets.

As age advances, and my bodily strength declines, I am increasingly convinced that I should not be filling the design of my merciful Preserver and Redeemer, if I were to sit down in stupid indifference, while the ways of so many of my fellow men are as the ways of the crooked twining serpent. I believe it would be more in accordance with the divine will concerning me, to use the greater part of my remaining strength in endeavoring, either by pen or tongue, to strengthen the things which remain that are ready to die; and as far as ability is given, to stir up even the pure mind by way of remembrance, that we may "make straight paths for our feet (towards the heavenly kingdom), lest that which is lame be turned out of the way; but let it rather be healed," so that we all may be strengthened to press onward in the narrow way to life eternal. But to purify and fit us for eternal life, we have to be baptized with a deeper baptism than that of John. His baptism was only a preparatory and superficial work. It was figurative of a deeper baptism that reaches the heart. It did not cleanse the fountain of sin and corruption there. It was a baptism of repentance for the remission of sins; but it alone did not remit sins. That was left for one that was to follow after who is mightier than John. He was to baptize with the Holy Spirit, and also with that divine fire which purifies the heart from the fleshly fallen nature, and makes us new creatures in Christ Jesus. This is a baptism which not only cleanses the outside, but it also burns as an oven, inwardly, and thus takes away the sin of the world, out of the heart, and gives us the answer of a good conscience towards God, by the resurrection of Jesus Christ again in the heart. The baptism of John was all right as far as it went, and as far as the figure is concerned. "He was a burning and shining light;" but he was not the true light which lighteth every man that cometh into the world. He was only to prepare the way of the Lord, and make the paths straight of Him who is the life and the light of men, and the light of the world.

John was as one crying in the wilderness. But his ministration foreshadowed one who was to follow after, and who was to perform a deeper work; and who was not only able to lead his followers out of the wilderness of this world but to give them an eternal inheritance in the heavenly land beyond the spiritual Jordan—they having been baptized in it, and cleansed by the washing of regeneration, and the renewing of the Holy Spirit, or divine life which was lost in the fall. But Christ comes in the temple of the heart, as a refiner and purifier, to fit and prepare it for the heavenly mansions, where nothing impure can ever enter. "But who may abide the day of his coming, and who shall stand when He appeareth? (in this way) for He is like a refiner's fire, and like fullers' soap. And He shall sit as a refiner and purifier of silver; and He shall purify the sons of Levi, and purge them as gold and silver, that they may offer unto the Lord an offering in righteousness. Then shall the offering of Judah and Jerusalem be pleasant unto the Lord, as in days of old, and as in former years," &c. But they are not all Israel which are of Israel. "But the children of promise are counted for the seed." "He is not a Jew now, which is one outwardly," &c., (Romans ii. 28, 29.) The Jews then were a self-confident people; believing they were the chosen of the Lord. But we see their zeal for God was not according to a heart-felt or a heart-changing knowledge of Him whom to know in the regeneration is life eternal. "For they being ignorant of God's righteousness, and going about to establish their own righteousness, had not submitted themselves unto the righteousness of God." We may follow a transformed light and take it for a true light; and thus allow our reason to take the place of revelation. And our own ideas of the fitness of our work in the church may govern us in things where, in simple obedience to the leadings of the true light is required at our hands. Great is the "deceivableness of unrighteousness in them that perish."

Our holy Redeemer says: "Not every one that saith unto me, Lord, Lord, shall enter into the kingdom of heaven; but he that doeth the will of my Father which is in heaven. Many will say to me in that day, Lord, Lord, have we not prophesied in thy name? and in thy name cast out devils? and in thy name done many wonderful works? And then will I profess unto them, I never knew you: depart from me, ye that work iniquity." Here we see, many are brought to view who thought, perhaps in all sincerity, that they were prophesying in the dear Redeemer's name, and doing many wonderful works for Him, but that He never knew them in it all. But they were sentenced to depart from Him as workers of iniquity. We are all posting on towards "that day" spoken of above—a day which we cannot evade—a day in which the sinner in Zion (the church) shall be afraid, and fearfulness surprise the hypocrite. Yes, the hypocrites; those who are passing to and fro in the churches; flattering the credulity of the unwary, saying in effect: "Thus saith the Lord, when the Lord hath not spoken" by them. But no new thing has happened to us as a people, (except that the devastation is more widely spread,) neither is it any marvel; "for Satan himself is transformed into an angel of light. Therefore it is no great thing if his ministers also be transformed as ministers of righteousness." I feel no hardness in bringing these plain scriptures to view. But I want, as a faithful watchman on the tottering walls of our Zion, to warn such amongst us as are deceiving others, and being deceived themselves, that they might in time turn from the spirit of man to the Lord. "There is a spirit in man; and the inspiration of the Almighty giveth them understanding." And nothing short of the inspiration of the Almighty can give us an understanding in relation to spiritual or heavenly things. We may, by the spirit of man that is in us, know the things of man, and become very wise in relation to the things of this world; but the things of God, or of the world to come, we cannot know only by the Spirit of God. True, we have the Holy Scriptures in addition to the immediate revelations of the Holy Spirit. But they were given by inspiration of God. And it takes something of the same inspiring light of revelation that the holy men of God had as they were moved by the Holy Ghost to write them, to enable us to understand them to profit. So we need the inspiration of the Almighty to give us an understanding. As man in the fall became destitute of the divine life and heavenly understanding, how are we to be restored but God, through Christ, the second Adam—quickening Spirit, breathing in us afresh breath of life whereby we become living souls. Our first parents, through disobedience to test that they had given them, lost the divine life. But we, through obedience to the trials of faith that we have given us, I believe may not only be restored to the life, innocency and purity that they had, but that we may be raised by Christ to a more steadfast state in Him who never fell; and finally be crowned with an immortal life which Satan cannot destroy; and become as pillars in God's temple which shall go no more out. So I read the Scriptures aright, more is gained by Christ than what was lost by Adam in the fall. For "as sin hath reigned unto death, even so grace might much more reign through righteousness unto eternal life, Jesus Christ our Lord." D.H.

Dublin, Ind., 11th mo. 22d, 1882.

Anglo-Saxon Translators of the Bible.

BY J. I. MOMBERT.

At a very early period, centuries before the Reformation, considerable portions of the Sacred Scriptures were translated into Anglo-Saxon, the language from which modern English is descended. The accounts of these early efforts to enlighten the people are interesting and instructive.

The very first notice reads more like legend than history. At Whitby, on the east coast of England, there stood in the seventh century a famous abbey, of which Hilda was abbess. The life in the abbey was not strictly religious but admitted of pastime. When the day-work was over, all the inmates and dependants would meet in the common hall and devote the evening hours with poetry and song. Among the humble retainers of the abbess was a certain Cædmon, so ignorant that, when his turn came to take the harp and sing verse, he could not do it. This greatly mortified him, and moved him abruptly to leave the hall, and hide his shame in the stable where it was his duty to keep watch; as he sat there, nursing his grief, he fell asleep, dreamed, or saw a vision of wonderful reality. He heard a stranger call him by his name, saying: "Cædmon, sing me something." He protested that he had nothing to sing, but the stranger insisted, saying: "Nay, but thou hast something to sing." "What must I sing?" asked Cædmon. "Sing the creation," the stranger continued. This gave him courage, and forthwith he began to sing verse "he had never heard before." Then the stranger left him and he awoke. Great was his astonishment that he was able not only to repeat the verses he had sung in his dream but to continue in a similar strain. His friend to whom he told what had happened, was greatly amazed, and reported the matter to Hilda, who sent for Cædmon and questioned him about the matter before the learned monk that lived in the abbey. His simple statement and the sample of his verse, convinced that he had received the gift by inspiration, but they wanted to test the matter, and presented him a portion of Holy Scripture bidding him to repeat it in verse; the next day he came with a poetic version of Genesis. Then the abbess invited him to enter her house as a monk, and induced him to many Bible histories in verse. According to Bede, "he sang of the creation of the world, of the origin of man, of the whole history of Genesis, from the exodus of Israel to the possession of the promised land, and of the histories of the Holy Scriptures." Some of these metrical translations have come down to us, and a few stanzas of the very first added in a free English version. They are, of course, not what we now call a translation, or even a metrical version, but simply literal paraphrases, rather vague and mysterious, but for that very reason all the more interesting.

Now should we laud and praise,
Publish in grateful lays
What God hath wrought.
Praise the Creator kind,
And of his glorious mind,
The work and thought.

How by his mighty word,
He the eternal Lord,
The universe made.
First like a roof was spann'd,
Work of his mighty hand,
The welkin he laid.

Then for his children here
Did the Creator rear
The beautiful land.
Mid-earth, almighty Lord,
Rose at thy gracious word,
And at thy command.

We are indebted for this account of the first rude attempt of conveying the sense of the Scriptures into the language understood by the people, to the venerable Bede, one of the brightest lights of the Anglo-Saxon church. In his extreme old age he conceived the idea of translating the Gospel of St. John into the vernacular. With his accustomed vigour he had translated as far as "But what say among so many?" (John vi. 9,) when an attack of asthma confined him to bed. Though unable to write himself, he employed pupils as amanuenses, who, at first, seem to have written at his dictation, but, as his infirmity increased, to have made a first rough translation, which they read to him for correction. Thus the work went on incessantly spite of his distressing sickness, until one evening some of his youthful scribes (perhaps absent himself, who records the circumstance with great tenderness) said: "Beloved teacher, one chapter only yet remains to be done. Does it distress you to answer questions?" "No," he replied; "take your pen, meet, and write as fast as you can." Later in the day, while he was distributing his belongings among his disciples, the amanuensis came in with the exclamation: "One sentence, beloved Master, remains to be written." He said: "Write it quickly!" Presently the youth announced: "The sentence now is ten" (descripta), when Bede rejoined: "God, thou hast spoken the truth: it is finished. Hold my head, and turn my face to the spot where I have been wont to pray." When this had been done, he exclaimed, "Pray be to the Father, and to the Son, and to the Holy Ghost," and breathed his last. In the translation, which has been preserved, the following is an extract in English (in i. 6-12): "6. A man was sent from God, whose name was John. 7. This man came to witness, that he should give witness of light, that all men might believe through him. 8. He was not the Light, but that he might bear witness of the Light. 9. That the true Light which enlighteneth every man coming on this mid-earth (into this world). 10. He was on mid-earth, and mid-earth was made through him, and mid-earth did not know him. 11. He came to his own, and they received him not. 12. But truly how many soever received him, to them gave he power that they might be the children [bairns] of God, to them that believe on his name."

The Saxon king, Alfred the Great, was a translator of Holy Scripture, but not an exact one, as is evident from his celebrated mutilation of the Decalogue. But it is a fault more or less common to most of the Anglo-Saxon versions, which appear to have been made on the principle of popular utility, rather than on faithful reproduction of the Latin text in Jerome's translation, from which most of the Anglo-Saxon translations have been made.

An interesting example is supplied in the following extract from the famous homilies of the illustrious Elfric, who flourished in the eleventh century. It narrates the creation of Eve (Gen. 2), and runs: "Then said God, It is not fitting that this man be alone, and have no help; now let us make him a mate for help and comfort. And God then caused Adam to sleep, and as he slept, he took a rib from his side, and of that rib wrought a woman, and asked Adam how she should be called. Then said Adam, She is bone of my bone, and flesh of my flesh: be her name Virago, that is female;* because she is taken from her husband. Then Adam afterwards bestowed on her another name, Eva, that is life: because she is the mother of all living."—S. S. Times.

"What Did Jesus Say?"—The pathway across a field near a village in Ireland was strewn with the fragments of some torn-up book. It was a copy of the Bible, which the priest of the parish had destroyed, on discovering it in the possession of one of his flock, who had bought it from a Bible colporteur.

A countryman passed by that way, not heeding the scattered papers till a tiny scrap caught by the wind, lighted on his sleeve. He was about to cast it from him when his eye was caught by the last words on the paper: "And Jesus said." Guessing now what the torn paper meant, he tried to dismiss the matter from his mind, but in vain. Constantly the question was stirring within him, "What was it that Jesus said?" And he could not rest until he had procured a copy of the Scriptures, and found for himself what Jesus said. Thus reading, not one but many of the gracious words which proceeded out of His mouth, and receiving those words into his heart, they became to him the joy and rejoicing of his life. Truly the Lord "disappointeth the devices of the crafty," and the "wrath of man shall praise him."—Selected.

It is said that Lady Napier, during the time that her husband, Lord Napier, was Governor of Madras, visited the schools of the Church Missionary Society at Salameotta, and was so pleased with everything she saw and heard that she asked permission to plant a young banyan tree in the school-compound in token of her pleasure. With much ceremony the tree was planted, but it never grew, and yet to-day a magnificent banyan tree spreads its umbrageous arms over that school-compound. Whence came this? It has arisen from one of the stakes which were put round the young and favored banyan tree to guard it. Even so God is working at home, raising from among those whom perhaps we have looked upon as worthless, "trees of righteousness" for his own glory.

* The debased sense in which the word "virago" is now used in English was not known in Anglo-Saxon times.

For "The Friend."

Ancient Testimonies and Advices.

THE PRESENT STATE OF THE CHURCH COMPARED WITH ITS BEGINNING.

"Dear Friends, as it is recorded in Holy Scripture, that 'many of the Priests and Levites, and chief of the fathers, who were ancient men, who had seen the first house, when the foundation of the second was laid before their eyes, wept with a loud voice;' so many, in this our day, are affected with grief, in comparing the present state of the church with its first beginning; when the members thereof adorned the doctrine of the gospel in their lives and conversations; and the fruits of the Holy Spirit, viz., their patience, long-suffering, gentleness, meekness, temperance, love, sincerity, truth, humility, self-denial, plainness of speech and habit, were conspicuous to all. Wherefore we earnestly exhort, that Friends everywhere, who have swerved from the way of Truth, would speedily return to their first love, and turn their minds to the inward manifestations of the Divine light, which discovers and reproves the deeds of darkness, and leads to purity and holiness, and every good work; begets true unity and fellowship one with another, and a reverent and sacred regard to the truths delivered in the Holy Scriptures."—London Epistle, 1740.

"Dear Friends, we think meet to remind you, that the several branches of our Christian testimony, which our worthy elders were called to bear, and for which they patiently underwent a fight of afflictions, were not taken up in their own will and wisdom, but effectually impressed upon their minds by the divine operation of the Holy Spirit of Christ, convincing their understandings, and strengthening them to walk in obedience to the convictions received. Thus were they enabled to stand faithful for the Truth upon earth, and to leave us a noble and Christian example, that one might follow their steps. Let us, in this day of more ease and tranquillity, beware, lest we be drawn aside to decline from the testimonies they bore; and, through the deceivableness of unrighteousness, with which the unwearied adversary of souls is laying wait to ensnare us, have our understanding so darkened, as not to discern the importance of those testimonies which our fathers were led to a perfect sight of, and steady perseverance in, by the light of Christ, that unerring guide, which, if we follow, will direct us in the same path."—Ibid. 1750.

"Let us, we earnestly entreat you, brethren, under the present circumstances of outward ease and liberty in matters of religion, which God in his mercy hath influenced the king and parliament to continue to these nations, beware of indulging ourselves, and of sitting down at rest, or falling asleep, in a state of indolence or carnal security. But let us rather consider this day of outward freedom and tranquillity, as a day of imminent danger, wherein our adversary, the devil, restrained from 'devouring as a roaring lion,' is incessantly exercising his wiles and subtilty as a serpent, to beguile and seduce us into a lukewarm and indifferent condition in matters of religion, and a supineness and negligence in that great and most important concern of our soul's salvation. The numerous snares of this subtle enemy being adapted to every age and circumstance of human life, make it every man's indispensable duty to be always upon his guard: let us, therefore, continually keep in mind the precept of our Saviour: 'Watch and pray, that ye enter not into temptation.'—Ibid. 1755.

"To what is this obvious deficiency—in that essential duty of meeting at the times set apart for the worship of Almighty God—to be imputed? Is it to the want of members sufficient to support our meetings with reputation and to advantage? In many places this is by no means the case; the multitudes that assemble on particular occasions demonstrate the contrary. If we look honestly for the true cause, shall we not find it in our own breasts? Have not many entertained a lukewarm spirit, a coolness of heart towards religious exercises, instead of that fervency of love, that ardency of concern for their own growth, and for the good of all, which were so conspicuous in our faithful predecessors?"—Ibid. 1765.

"Our worthy predecessors were, and the faithful among us now are, concerned to bear testimony, both in doctrine and practice, not only against the numerous innovations and superstitions, invented in the times of apostasy, whereby darkness, in a great measure, covered the earth, and gross darkness the people; but also against their continuance amongst protestant communities; such as a hired and coercively supported ministry, ceremonial performances in worship, with their various appurtenances. As we cannot join in the practice of these things, neither can we actively contribute towards their support. For as we are plainly assured in the sacred writings, so we firmly believe, that the right qualification for true gospel-ministry is freely given by Christ, and by Him the gospel is commanded to be freely administered; acceptable worship being only that which is performed in spirit and in truth.

"And, dear Friends, we find it necessary to remind you that our worthy ancestors, having their eye directed toward an enduring inheritance, and their affections established upon things above, sought not after greatness in this world, but passed the time of their sojourning here in fear, and in great simplicity of heart, as well as of outward demeanor, endeavoring thereby to reach the Divine Witness in every mind, and promote the love of truth and righteousness among mankind."—Ibid. 1767.

Nothing does so establish the mind amid the railings and turbulence of present things, as both a look above them and a look beyond them—above them, to the steady and good hand by which they are ruled; and beyond them, to the sweet and beautiful end to which by that hand they will be brought.—Jeremy Taylor.

"God respecteth not the arithmetic of our prayers, how many they are; nor the rhetoric of our prayers, how neat they are; nor the geometry of our prayers, how long they are; nor the music of our prayers, how methodical they are; but the divinity of our prayers, how heart-sprung they are.

"A LITTLE BAD."

Selected.

"Come, darling, come! The voice was sweet,
Yet baby only shook her head,
And so, in tones all tenderness,
Rebukingly her mother said:

"I'm sorry you're so wilful, dear,
I called, you would not come, but stood;
Now, go into the dining-room
And don't come back till you are good."

A sudden meekness seized the child,
With eyes bent downward to the floor,
Obedient now, she straightway went,
Yet paused a moment at the door.

Her face revealed a strife within,
A veil more thin no spirit had:
She raised her earnest eyes and said,
"May n't I be a little bad?"

O human nature! still the same,
In child, or man or woman grown,
That when God says, "Give me thy heart,"
Would keep a portion for its own—

Some cherished sin, some fault that lies
'Twixt us and heaven when we would pray,
Not knowing that surrender blest
Enriches while it takes away.

Not almost, altogether thine,
Help us, O Lord, henceforth to be;
To give ourselves a sacrifice
Holy, acceptable to thee.

—H. Jackson.

WEAVING THE WEB.

Selected.

"This morn I will weave my web," she said,
As she stood by her loom in the rosy light;
And her young eyes, hopefully glad and clear,
Followed after the swallow's flight.

"As soon as the day's first tasks are done, While yet I am fresh and strong," said she,
"I will hasten to weave the beautiful web Whose pattern is known to none but me!"

"I will weave it fine, I will weave it fair,
And ah! how the colors will glow," she said;
"So fadeless and strong will I weave my web,
That perhaps it will live after I am dead."
But the morning hours sped on apace;
The air grew sweet with the breath of June;
And the young lover hid by the waiting loom,
Tangling the threads as he hummed a tune.

"Ah! life is so rich and full," she cried,
"And morn is short though the days are long;
This noon I will weave my beautiful web—
I will weave it carefully, fine, and strong."
But the sun rose high in the cloudless sky;
The burden and heat of the day she bore;
And hither and thither she came and went,
While the loom stood still as it stood before.

"Ah! life is too busy at noon," she said;
"My web must wait till the eventide,
Till the common work of the day is done,
And my heart grows calm in the silence wide;"
So, one by one, the hours passed on,
Till the creeping shadows had longer grown;
Till the house was still, and the breezes slept,
And the singing birds to their nests had flown.

"And now I will weave my web," she said,
As she turned to her loom ere set of sun;
And laid her hand on the shining threads,
To set them in order one by one.
But hand was tired and heart was weak;
"I'm not as strong as I was," sighed she;
"And the pattern is blurred, and the colors rare,
Are not so bright or fair to see!"

"I must wait, I think, till another morn;
I must go to my rest with my work undone;
It is growing too dark to weave!" she cried,
As lower and lower sank the sun.
She dropped the shuttle; the loom stood still;
The weaver slept in the twilight gray:
Dear heart! Will she weave her beautiful web
In the golden light of a longer day?

"The gates of hell are open night and day, Smooth the descent and easy is the way."

INDIAN SUMMER.

Selected.

Just after the death of the flowers,
And before they are buried in snow,
There comes a festival season,
When Nature is all aglow—
Aglow with a mystical splendor
That rivals the brightness of spring—
Aglow with a beauty more tender
Than aught which fair summer could bring.

Some spirit akin to the rainbow
Then borrows its magical dyes,
And mantles the fair-spreading landscape
In hues that bewilder the eyes.
The sun from his cloud-pillowed chamber
Smiles soft on a vision so gay,
And dreams that his favorite children,
The flowers, have not passed away.

There's a luminous mist on the mountains,
A light, azure haze in the air,
As if angels, while heavenward soaring,
Had left their bright robes floating there;
The breeze is so soft, so caressing,
It seems a mute token of love,
And floats to the heart like a blessing
From some happy spirit above.

Oh! beautiful Indian Summer!
Thou favorite child of the year,
Thou darling, whom Nature enriches
With gifts and adornments so dear!
How fain would we woo thee to linger
On mountain and meadow awhile,
For our hearts, like the sweet haunts of Nature,
Rejoice and grow young in thy smile.

Not alone to the sad fields of autumn
Dost thou a lost brightness restore,
But thou bringest a world-weary spirit
Sweet dreams of its childhood once more;
Thy loveliness fills us with memories
Of all that was brightest and best—
Thy peace and serenity offer
A foretaste of heavenly rest.

The important distinction was explained to them between the Word, which was in the beginning with God and was God, and the Bible, a subject on which their ideas were confused, from having been accustomed to hear the Scriptures styled "the word of God." After alluding to the memorable conference between the Saviour of the world and the woman of Samaria, who, when told she had had five husbands, &c., left her water pot and went her way into the city, and said, "Come, see a man that told me all things that ever I did: is not this the Christ?" I asked them if they had not at seasons felt something within themselves which brought to their remembrance sins and transgressions that had been long ago committed—things which they would be glad to forget, much rather than remember with painful retrospect; querying whether they had not long been sensible of this, before they ever saw the face of a missionary or heard his voice? On this some of them shook their heads and answered in the most satisfactory manner, with unequivocal simplicity and sincerity, yes, that they had, long enough ago, proving a fact which I have never doubted since the Lord Most High was pleased to reveal the Son of his love to my finite understanding, that the gospel has been preached in and unto every creature under heaven. reminded them of the apostle's declaration to the Romans, "That which may be known of God is manifest in them, for God hath showed it unto them," and "He hath showed thee, man, what is good." This, I told them, was that gospel "which was preached to every creature which is under heaven," to every son and daughter of Adam.—From the narrative of Daniel Wheeler's visit to the Tahitians in his Journal.

A True Story from Humble Life.

Mary A. Deats was born near Haddonfield, N. J., in 1842. She had a fall, when about a year old, which, it was thought, injured her spine, and made her a cripple through life. Her mother dying when "Polly" (as she was always called) was one and a half years old, her situation was truly sad and forlorn. Her maternal aunt, Mary Allen, was at that time living with a valuable friend, Sarah Nicholson, in the village of Haddonfield. Feeling much compassion for the neglected condition of her little niece, this aunt (although dependent upon her own exertions for a livelihood) with the consent of her generous friend, brought Polly to her home when she was about three years old; and devoted herself with great affection and efficiency to the duty of caring for her, during the remainder of her life.

In her new situation, she came under the influence of many, who were anxious to have all that was possible, for the development of her powers, as she was unable to use her hands, either to walk or feed herself; and was deprived of the use of speech as to be unintelligible to most persons.

Although her nervous system was thus affected, her intellect was not impaired, and she took great delight in the books which were presented to her, although she could not read in herself. Her dolls and playthings, of which her kind friends had given her a good store, were also appreciated; she took pleasure in entertaining her little friends with them, giving a care to have them well preserved and put away neatly, when not in use.

She was used to push about the floor in a little cart on wheels; and her aunt had a carriage made, that Polly might accompany her on visits to her friends. When older she would take her to meeting with her, leaving the carriage in an adjoining room, so that she might hear the sermon through an open door. The friend she lived with was very attentive to the interests of this little invalid, and all she could for her happiness. She was in the habit of reading aloud to her from the Bible, morning and evening. Polly would listen most reverently to "Mom" as she called her, and always counted it a privilege to hear the Holy Scriptures.

When about eight years old, on going to bed at night, she pointed to the sofa, and expressed by signs a wish to be taken there and rested upon her knees, which being done, she was moved by her earnest manner and the motion of her lips, that she was speaking to her heavenly Father, though the expressions were not understood by those present. In her life she referred to this period as the time when she felt a sense of pardon for past sins; although conscious many times after that, of transgression, she did not rest easy until she had asked and obtained forgiveness, both of her Heavenly Father and earthly caretaker.

When about ten years old, her kind friend died. She had written out a catalogue of some of Mary Deats' friends, giving the names of sixty persons. In it she says: "Mary Deats, or 'little Polly,' as everybody calls her, is a smart, little, active girl, who knows a great deal, but cannot talk or walk, but tries very hard to do both; she loves everybody very much, not forgetting her most dear friend Sarah N——." The privilege of friendship was continued to Polly through life, and the circle of her friends widened as years went on, and included some of the best people in her own neighborhood, and singular as it may seem, extended to distant places. In England, New York, Cincinnati, Philadelphia, in Camden, and other parts of her own State, were those she claimed as friends. She loved warmly, and welcomed her visitors with pleasure, expressing this by such signs as she was able to make.

After the death of her friend, her aunt, assisted by many who were interested in them both, moved to a house of her own; here they lived together, until she was about fourteen, when she was placed in the Germantown School for Imbeciles, but this was not an appropriate place for her, as she was not deficient in intellect, but in physical power. Returning from this school she never left home again.

At an early age she felt anxious to become joined to the Baptist Society, of which her aunt was a member. Being physically unable to go through with the usual forms, she was told that she would be considered a member without them, which seemed to satisfy her, and she took great interest in the visits of her pastor, and other members of the meeting. Indeed, all Christians were peculiarly welcome and appreciated; her love and reverence for piety continued through life; in this way were many of the valuable friends alluded to, drawn to her, and as a result, correspondence by letter grew up between her and some of them.

We will give an extract from a letter of one of these friends. Under date of Haddonfield, Ninth Month 27th, 1868, she writes:

"Let me tell thee, my dear friend, that of all the visits I have paid in this village, none have been more sweetly instructive and useful to me than those by thy bedside. There has been such a sense of the Saviour's presence, such an evidence that in all thy weakness and suffering, His Almighty Arm was round about, and His loving, compassionate eye over thee, that we who are in the enjoyment of health, have often been constrained secretly to return thanks to our Father in Heaven for the rich compensation He gives to his afflicted children, in that He seems to draw so very near the couch of suffering, and speak His blessed words of peace."

Sincerity was a marked feature in Polly's character; it pained her to be thought untruthful. Gratitude may also be mentioned as another, she was so thankful for the many gifts and kindnesses bestowed upon her, and so appreciative of them. Her manner of speaking of her Heavenly Father was quite original; she would glance her eye upward, and say "Up," when asked who sent her such and such things; showing that her thankfulness ascended beyond the instrument to the Great Giver of every good and perfect gift. Her trust in Providence was remarkable; not feeling the least fear of being left alone when her aunt was necessarily absent from home, saying "Up" would take care of her—and according to her faith so it was unto her, for no harm came to her in many years, and she was often alone.

Polly's disposition to industry must not be overlooked, for though unable to work with her hands, she exerted what powers she had to be useful. Her unwavering love and devotion to her aunt were among her good works. She greatly enjoyed the office of housekeeper, when her aunt was out—for this she received a stipulated sum, and earned, at one time, enough money to buy a pair of sheets for her own bed; where she was almost always lying, especially after the year 1868, when she had a severe spell of illness, which left her much enfeebled. She had to endure the conflicts incident to the Christian warfare, signifying she knew when she felt naughty; but it is believed the watch was maintained, and her prayers were fervent and frequent.

Deprived of the privilege of social worship with her friends, she sought the Lord in secret, in the silence of home, declaring in her simple way, that she and "Up" had their meetings together.

Her last illness, which was in the year 1880, when she had arrived at the age of thirty-nine, was a suffering one, neuralgic pain mingling with her other complaints. It was all patiently endured, but she was anxious to depart to the blessed land she had so long wished to enjoy. Some days previous to her death, her aunt observed her gazing earnestly at the ceiling as if something there attracted her attention; on questioning her, Polly said she saw "Mom," (meaning her old friend S. Nicholson) and that she was calling her to come "Up." She sent for some of her friends to come and bid her farewell, the day before she died, and it was solemn as well as sweet, to sit in the room with that helpless girl, and feel that her soul was aspiring to the glories of eternity, having been washed and purified and justified, in the name of the Lord Jesus and by the Spirit of our God.

She lived through that day, and until about three o'clock on the following morning: one of the nurses offered her drink, of which she partook, and then declining to have any more, she raised her hand and eyes upward, and said "Up," and in an instant she was gone to joy unspeakable, and full of glory.

Undisciplined Tempers.—The touchy and sensitive temper, which takes offence at a word; the irritable temper, which finds offence in everything, whether intended or not; the violent temper, which breaks through all bounds of reason when once roused; the jealous or sullen temper, which wears a cloud on the face all day, and never utters a word of complaint; the discontented temper, brooding over its own wrongs; the severe temper, which always looks at the worst side of whatever is done; the wilful temper, which overrides every scruple to gratify a whim—what an amount of pain have these caused in the hearts of men, if we could but sum up their results! How many a soul have they stirred to evil impulses; how many a prayer have they stifled; how many an emotion of true affection have they turned to bitterness! How hard they make all duties. How they kill the sweetest and warmest of all domestic charities! Ill temper is a sin, requiring long and careful discipline.—Bishop Temple.

Rise of Gin Drinking in England.—It was not until about 1724 that the passion for gin-drinking appears to have infected the masses of the population, and it spread with the rapidity and the violence of an epidemic. Small as is the place which this fact occupies in English history, it was probably, if we consider the consequences that have flowed from it, the most momentous in that of the eighteenth century—incomparably more so than any event in the purely political or military annals of the country. The fatal passion for drink was at once, and irrevocably, planted in the nation. The average of British spirits distilled, which is said to have been only 527,000 gallons in 1684, had risen in 1735 to 5,394,000 gallons. Physicians declared that in excessive gin-drinking a new and terrible source of mortality had been opened for the poor. The Grand Jury of Middlesex, in a powerful presentment, declared that much the greater part of the poverty, the murders, the robberies of London, might be traced to this single cause. Retailers of gin were accustomed to hang out painted boards, announcing that their customers could be made drunk for a penny, and dead-drunk for twopenny, and should have straw for nothing; and cellars strewn with straw were accordingly provided, into which those who had become insensible were dragged, and where they remained until they had sufficiently recovered.—Lecky's England.

For "The Friend."

Religious Items, &c.

Chinese Christians in New York.—A writer in the National Baptist, who had been visiting among some Chinese converts in New York City gives a pleasing account of their meekness and forbearance under insult and ill-treatment. One of them was recently exposed to an unprovoked and lawless assault at the hands "of wicked and unreasonable men." Witnesses declared that throughout the attack made upon him, he did not speak one word or do the least act of provocation. Another thus describes his experience on a ferry-boat. "One night go over to Brooklyn; bad man drunk on boat; he strike me; one say, 'strike him back.' Me say 'No strike; I a Christian.' When boat land, I run; man drunk run, and strike me again; but God not let him hurt me; but if wicked man should kill, then I go to heaven! Glad I a Christian."

The Salvation Army has been stopped from pursuing its peculiar proceedings in India. The leaders have been informed by the Courts that they are at perfect liberty to teach their doctrines in all proper times and places, but have no right to create disturbance, excite fanatical opposition, and provoke collisions in the streets.

The Mennonites have members in nearly every county in the State of Pennsylvania, and settlements in many of the Middle and Western States and in Canada. They keep no record of their numbers—holding the same view in regard to this as they do in respect to giving of alms—"Take heed that ye do not your alms before men to be seen of them." They have about 3500 members in Lancaster Co., Pa., 1100 in Montgomery Co., 1200 in Bucks Co., and smaller numbers in the other counties.

Secret Societies vs. Presbyterianism.—Secret oath-bound societies are contrary to the profession of the United Presbyterian church, as they are declared in our testimony to be contrary to the Bible. The law of the church on this subject has been re-affirmed more than once by her General Assembly, and at times under considerable pressure, she has steadfastly refused to lower her testimony. At the last meeting of the synod, our trumpet gave no uncertain sound. The attention of our people was called to the aggressive movements of secret societies, the synod declared its attachment to the position of our standards on this subject, and exhorted ministers and elders and people to testify against and expose the evils of said associations by word and by deed.—Report to the Synod in Iowa.

Secret Societies.—J. Blanchard has addressed in The Christian Cynosure, an open letter to the meetings of Friends of Carthage and Spiceland, Indiana, in whose meeting-houses he had been allowed the opportunity of pleading against secret societies. In it he says, some of their ministers who sat by his side in those meetings had joined the Free Masons, Odd Fellows and other secret orders; and he calls upon these to repent and renounce all connection with these "unfruitful works of darkness."

We suppose he would scarcely have made such a direct and positive statement in a letter evidently written in a friendly spirit, unless he had received information which he considered reliable. If the report is true, it is a thing to be lamented; and we hope the few who may have been entangled in this snare of the enemy of all righteousness will speedily extricate themselves therefrom.

The United Kingdom Alliance for the Suppression of the Liquor Traffic.—We have received from S. Hope, of England, a copy of the Alliance News, containing a detailed account of the annual meeting of this body held in Manchester, England, in the 10th month. The meeting was cheerful in its tone and seemed encouraged by the advances which had been made in prohibition legislation, especially that which closed the public houses in Wales on the First-day of the week. A memorial was addressed to W. E. Gladstone, referring to a declaration made in Parliament in 1880, that the evils of intemperance in Great Britain are equal to the combined calamities of war, pestilence, and famine. It asks that the public sale of intoxicating liquors be prohibited, either by direct Imperial enactment, or by a Local Option law, which shall enable the inhabitants in their respective localities to exercise a direct veto on the liquor traffic.

One of the resolutions appeals to all electors to form temperance electoral associations in their respective limits, which will support candidates who will vote for Local Option.

For "The Friend."

Natural History, Science, &c.

Fossil Trees.—The Smithsonian Institution has received from Fort Wingate, New Mexico, portions of two stone trees, one from the neighborhood of the fort, the other from the banks of the Lithodendron, 20 miles from Navajoe Springs, Arizona. The expediency of securing them was suggested to the commander of the fort by General Sherman. The party detailed for the purpose were well supplied with tools and appliances.

In his report, the lieutenant in charge says that the Navajoes, who were pasturing their sheep about the head-waters of the Lithodendron, thought it very strange that the "Great Father in Washington" should want some of the bones of the "Great Giant" their forefathers had killed years ago when taking possession of the country, the lava beds being the remains of the blood that ran from his wounds. Specimens by thousands were found on each side of the valley of the Lithodendron, there about half a mile wide. Along the slopes, which were perhaps 50 feet high, no vegetation whatever was to be seen; we being very scarce, the soil was composed of clay and sand mostly, and the petrification broken into millions of pieces, lay scattered all adown the slopes. Some of the large fossil trees were well preserved, though the action of heat and cold had broken most of them sections from 2 to 10 feet long. Many of them must have been immense trees; several which were measured were from 150 to 200 feet in length, and from 2 to 4½ feet in diameter, the centres often containing beautiful quartz crystals.

Water from Wood.—By thrusting the end of green scrub wood in the fire, and catching the sap driven out of the other end in a bag, an Australian supplied himself with water and saved his life while crossing a waterless region.

Duration of Wire-Cables.—The engineer in charge of certain suspension bridges in France, whose duty required a careful examination of them each year, found that reddish spots appearing on the surface of the cables in places liable to be wet, was an indication that the centre or core was rusted. His observations lead to the conclusion that about thirty years is as long a time as a cable can safely be trusted without renewing.

Power Required for Drawing Carriages.—To draw a load on a level road of sand requires a power equal to one-fifth of its weight, on ordinary earth one-tenth, on hard clay one-twentieth, on ordinary cobble-stones one-thirtieth, on good cobble-pavements one-fortieth, on ordinary Belgian-blocks one-fiftieth, on asphalt one one-hundred and thirty-thirtieth, on iron rails one two-hundredth of the load. The economy in horse power obtained by using the hardest and smoothest roads is clearly shown. If one horse can just draw a load on a level over iron rails, it will take four horses to draw it over an ordinary earth road and 40 over a sandy road. These proportions will not hold good where the load has to be lifted as well as moved, as in going up hills.

Duration of Telegraph-poles.—Poles cut in winter last several years longer than those cut in summer. Cedar poles (winter cut) last about 16 years, chestnut 13, spruce 7, juniper 13. The soil in which they are set influences their duration. On an average, they require to be replaced about once in 12 to 15 years.

Willow-trees of the Alaska Islands.—Ellie in his "Monograph of the Sea Islands of Alaska," says the creeping willow is the original form of tree found in the Pribyllov group. They progress like a cucumber-vine in the gardens. After sending up a sprout of 6 inches or so in height, it droops over a branch and crawls on the surface. Some of the large trunks are 8 or 10 feet in length, and as large round at the stump as a man's waist.

Agate Polishing.—At Oberstein, in Germany, the business of polishing agates and other semi-precious stones has been conducted for many years. From 250 to 300 tons of agates are annually brought here from Brazil. Jasper, amethysts and a variety of other minerals are also worked at the same place. They are polished by grinding on large sand-stones which revolve rapidly and are kept constantly wet.

American Crocodile.—It has recently been found that in addition to the Alligators, a species of Crocodile inhabits some parts of Florida—generally in the salt-water creeks.

called by the Indians the long-nosed alligator. It is the Crocodylus acutus, and is found in the West India islands. The mother crocodile watches over her young, and when they hatched from the eggs buried in the sand, feeds them and feeds them with masticated and disgorged for the purpose.

Consciousness of Wrong-doing.—This is illustrated by the following anecdote, related by Nett, of a Siamang Ape:

Once or twice I lectured him for taking my soap from the washing place, which would remove for his amusement, and use it about the cabin. One morning I was sitting, the ape being present in the cabin, and casting my eyes towards him, I saw a little fellow taking the soap. I watched him, without his perceiving that I did so; and he would occasionally cast a furtive glance towards the place where I sat. I pretended to write; he seeing me busily occupied, took the soap and moved away with it in his paws. When he had walked half the length of the cabin, I spoke quietly, without frightening him. The instant he found I saw him, he looked back again, and deposited the soap exactly in the same place from which he had taken it."

Ansfield Parkyns, in his work on Abyssinia, speaks of a semi-tamed hunting-dog, one of the wild animals of the country, which he named "Tokla." He says: "Once a member being attracted into the yard by the bustling noise as of animals running about, mixed with my pet's shrill, squeaking cry. On going out, nothing was apparent but a sheep lately bought for dinner, which, however, was running about with every appearance of nervousness. There was Tokla, whose voice I had just heard uttering notes of unusual excitement, lying quietly in a corner, shamming sleep, but peeping at me from a corner of one of his little wicked black eyes."

I said nothing, but concealed myself in a bush, through the branches of which I could observe all that passed. In a short time the little brute lay motionless in the same position as I had left him. For awhile, however, he got up stealthily, stretching himself as if just awake, but at the same time taking a furtive glance to see that I was quiet. Having satisfied himself on this point, he made a rush at the poor sheep, turned his ears back, and squeaking horribly. The sheep ran away when it could, only standing and butting at its little opponent when it came into a corner, and evidently in a desperate fright." The dog was perfectly aware that he was doing wrong in attacking the sheep, and so feigned to be sleeping when his master came on the scene.

to the strongest impressions left on their minds, it would be found that one had observed with especial care the character of the soil and farming, the kinds of crops and the number and variety of domestic animals. Another would have noticed the trees and plants which were native to the country over which he had passed, and have drawn instructive comparisons as to the effect of climate and soil on these vegetable inhabitants. Another's mind would have been much occupied with the character of the roads over which he had journeyed, and of the vehicles in which he had ridden; and with the detentions he had met with, or the facility with which he had passed along. To another the most absorbing object of study would have been the personal characters of those with whom he had come in contact.

If the same individual were to pass over the same route in successive years, when his thoughts were running in somewhat different channels, there would be a corresponding difference in the objects that most strongly arrested his attention.

The same law applies to our reading. One may take such a book as the New Testament and peruse it, with his thoughts directed to the accuracy with which the original Greek has been rendered into English—another may critically examine the version as a literary production—another may study it as an historical narrative, as he would Prescott's Conquest of Mexico,—and another may regard it as a repository of texts from which he can construct a system of theological doctrines. Each of these will probably see much that escapes the notice of the others.

We doubt not there are many who have been conscious of their minds being opened to receive new instruction from passages in the Scriptures which they had often previously read without being impressed in the same manner. Our Heavenly Father communicates to his obedient children light and knowledge as He sees meet for them. In their reading the Bible, He may teach them at one time a lesson for which they have a present especial need; and at another time He may open their eyes to behold in the same passages another lesson adapted to their wants at that time. Again, He may, without any very definite teaching, bless the opportunity by tendering the heart or imprinting on it a sense of his holy, solemnizing presence,—which is as spiritual manna, nourishing the soul.

May we then be increasingly concerned, in reading these precious writings, to have our minds turned to the Lord for instruction and comfort, realizing that it is only through faith in Christ Jesus that they are able to make us wise unto salvation: and that without Divine assistance we are liable to "wrest" them to our own destruction.

The Advices of our Yearly Meeting in reference to the Scriptures declare: "As a true understanding of the Divine will, and meaning of Holy Scripture, cannot be discerned by the natural, but only by the spiritual man, it is therefore by the assistance of the Holy Spirit that they are read with great instruction and comfort."

We notice with satisfaction in the President's Message the following reference to a Peace Congress:

"About a year since invitations were extended to the nations of this continent to send representatives to a Peace Congress, to assemble at Washington in November, 1882. * *

In view of the fact that no action was taken by Congress in the premises, and that no provision has been made for necessary expenses, I subsequently decided to postpone the convocation, and so notified the several Governments which had been invited to attend. I am unwilling to dismiss this subject without assuring you of my support of any measures the wisdom of Congress may devise for the promotion of peace on this continent and throughout the world, and I trust that the time is nigh when, with the universal assent of civilized peoples, all international differences shall be determined without resort to arms by the benignant processes of arbitration."

The more this subject is kept before the public mind, and nations and governments become familiarized with the idea of settling the disputes which arise by peaceful negotiation or by reference to disinterested parties, the greater is the probability of resorting to such rational means rather than to the brutal appeal to force.

SUMMARY OF EVENTS.

UNITED STATES.—Both Houses of Congress convened in Washington on the 4th inst. The President's Message which was transmitted, refers to the action of our Government in regard to American citizens imprisoned in Ireland, to remonstrance with Russia against persecuting the Jews, to American protection of the proposed Panama Canal, and to the failure of peace negotiations between Chili and Peru. Our revenue last year from all sources was $403,525,250; the total expenditure for ordinary purposes was $257,981,440; leaving a surplus of $145,543,810. This, with $20,737,695 of spare cash already in the Treasury, was applied to paying off $166,281,505 of the public debt during the year. The President thinks it impolitic to collect so large a revenue, and advises the abolition of all Internal Revenue taxes except those which relate to distilled spirits. He also advises a reduction of duties on foreign imports, but wishes it to be distinctly understood that he is "far from advising the abandonment of the policy of so discriminating in the adjustment of details [of the Tariff] as to afford aid and protection to domestic labor." The Post-office Department is more than paying its way, and will soon be accumulating surplus profits; he therefore suggests a reduction of letter-postage to 2 cents. In regard to reform in Civil Service, President Arthur asks that both the Executive and Congress shall be relieved of the pressure brought to bear upon the appointment of a hundred thousand persons! Other subjects of minor importance are handled, and on the whole the document is able and practical.

The public debt statement for 11th month shows a decrease of $5,534,142.

A recent discovery by the General Land Commissioner of "land frauds of startling magnitude in connection with the Osage Indian lands in Kansas," has led to an order by the Commissioner suspending "all cash entries made by single men since June 23d, 1881, where the lands lie within the counties of Sumner, Harper, King and Comanche, Kansas." In his letter to the Register and Receiver at Wichita, Commissioner McFarland says "it has come to his knowledge that numbers of entries have been made in these counties by cowboys, who immediately afterward turned the land over to their employers."

The State Department has issued a pamphlet entitled "Ostrich Farming in the United States," which contains "full information concerning ostrich farming at the Cape of Good Hope and Algeria, from the hatching of the eggs to the export of the feathers, together with the estimated expense of importing birds into the United States, and the probabilities of the success of the experiment."

Off Horton's Cove, Long Island, a bed of native oysters has been found, which is said to have an area of five square miles.

The water in the Hudson river, at Albany, is said to be lower than has been known at this season for twenty years.

THE FRIEND.

TWELFTH MONTH 9, 1882.

We doubt not that those who are accustomed to watch the operations of their own minds, have often observed the well-recognized fact, that our powers of observation are greatly affected by the degree of earnestness with which the mind is turned towards those objects in which we are interested.

Inquiry were made of a company of persons who had performed the same journey, as

Two million bushels of apples were picked in one county of Arkansas this fall. Drying kilns are being started on many of the farms, and a New York firm is drying apples at the rate of 1000 bushels per day, and sending them to Europe.

The steamer Jessie E. Bell arrived at New Orleans on the night of the 4th from Plaquemines, with 527 hogsheads and 351 barrels of sugar and 1400 barrels of molasses. This is said to be the largest cargo of sugar and molasses received in New Orleans since the war.

A telegram from Chicago says the season now closing "has been more prosperous than any previous one on the Lakes, except that of 1880." The arrivals of vessels at Chicago this season have numbered 12,447, against 12,788 in that year. In number the arrivals exceed those at New York about 3000.

Markets, &c.—U. S. 3's, 102½; 3½'s, 101½; 4½'s, 112½; 4's, registered, 119½; coupon, 120½; currency 6's, 130.

Cotton.—Prices remain about the same as last quoted. Sales of middlings are reported at 10½ a 11 cts. per lb. for uplands and New Orleans.

Petroleum.—Standard white, 7¼ cts. for export, and 8½ cts. per gallon for home use.

Flour has been dull, but prices were without essential change. Sales of 3100 barrels, including Minnesota extras, clear, at $5.75; small lots do. do. straight, at $6.25; Pennsylvania extra family low grades, at $4.50; do. do. choice, at $4.75; Ohio do. do., at $5.50 a $5.65; do. do. do. new process, at $6.25; Southern Illinois do. do. at $5.50; Wisconsin winter family at $5.50; Ohio patent at $6.40 a $6.75; Minnesota do. at $7.12½ a $7.50, and 600 barrels City Mills on secret terms. Western and Pennsylvania super, at $3 a $3.37½; do. do. extras at $3.50 a $4; Pennsylvania extra family at $4.50 a $4.75; Ohio do. do. $5.25 a $5.75; Indiana do. do. at $5.25 a $5.75; St. Louis and Southern Illinois do. do. at $5.37½ a $5.75; Minnesota bakers' clear, at $5.50 a $6; do. do. straight at $6.25 a $6.50; patents, winter wheat, at $6.25 a $7; do. do. spring, at $7 a $7.50. Rye flour sells at $4.25 a $4.37½ per barrel. Feed.—Winter bran sells at $17, a $17.25, and spring at $16 a $16.50 per ton.

Grain.—Wheat was unsettled and rather lower. Sales of 3600 bushels of red and amber at $1.05 a $1.11; 2200 bushels do. track, at $1.08½; 3400 bushels No. 2 red, in elevator, at $1.08½; 1900 bushels rejected at $1.02 a $1.03, and 40,000 bushels No. 2 red, at $1.08½ a $1.08¾. Rye sold at 68 cts. Corn was unsettled. Sales of 7200 bushels sail yellow, in grain depot, at $6 a 87 cts.; sail mixed, at 85 a 86 cts.; steamer, at 83 a 84 cts.; new at 62 a 70 cts., as to condition; and 65,000 bushels sail mixed at 68½ a 68¾ cts. Oats were unchanged; about 9000 bushels sold in lots at 47 a 49 cts. for No. 2 white, and 43 a 45 cts. per bushel for rejected and mixed, and No. 2 white at 46½ a 47¾ cts.

Hay and Straw Market, for week ending 12th mo. 2nd, 1882.—Loads of hay, 287; loads of straw, 58. Average price during the week—Prime timothy, $1 to $1.10 per 100 pounds; mixed, 95 cts. to $1.05 per 100 pounds; straw, 75 to 85 cts. per 100 pounds.

Beef cattle were dull last week and prices were a fraction lower: 4000 head arrived and sold at the different yards at 3 a 6½ cts. per lb., the latter rate for extra.

Sheep were dull and a fraction lower: 12,000 head arrived and sold at the different yards, at 3 a 5½ cts., and lambs at 4 a 6½ cts. per pound, as to condition. Hogs were unchanged: 4000 head arrived and sold at the different yards at 8½ a 10½ cts. per lb., as to quality.

FOREIGN.—On the evening of the 27th ult., Trevelyan stated in the House of Commons that the number of agrarian crimes in Ireland this month was less than for any month during the past 28 months, not 28 years, as was incorrectly reported.

Parliament was prorogued 12th month 4th until the 15th of 2d month. There were about 80 members present in the House of Commons when the prorogation took place.

A deputation, including Forster and other members of Parliament, waited upon Lord Granville, Foreign Secretary, on the 28th ult., and read a memorial contending that the French claims in Madagascar were unfounded, and expressing the belief that there were five times as many English there as French, and that the English trade quadrupled the French trade. Lord Granville replied that he was not aware of any treaty which gave France the right to exercise a protectorate over Madagascar.

A semi-official statement is published in Paris that France is resolved to uphold her treaty of 1863, with Madagascar, in its entirety. The concessions offered during the recent pourparlers with the Malagassy Embassy, have been cancelled by the action of the latter in breaking off the negotiations. England, it is said, has not protested against the claims of France; she has only manifested a desire for information in regard to the intentions of the French Government with respect to Madagascar.

The French Cabinet, at a council on the 28th ult., decided to send a pacific expedition to survey the ceded territory on the Congo and report upon its resources.

A party of Englishmen, members of trade unions, who are in Paris, visited Leon Say and De Freycinet on the 2d inst. The latter acquainted their callers with their views on the scheme for tunnelling the English channel. De Freycinet spoke in complimentary terms of the political good sense of English workmen and the wisdom and forethought of English statesmen. The idea of a French invasion in the event of the channel scheme being carried out was inadmissible, De Freycinet said, as the English would rise as one man and repel such invasion. Moreover, De Freycinet asked, what hostile army would risk an engagement in a narrow tube forty kilometres long?

On the 28th of 11th month, the Rhine reached the highest point during the past century. Railway traffic was entirely suspended. At Cologne, the forts on account of the flood from the overflow were emptied of stores and ammunition. The Zoological Gardens are inundated, and the animals have been removed. The lower stories of the houses in Bonn were submerged.

Berlin, 11th mo. 30th.—It was announced in the Diet last night that the worst of the floods was over. The Rhine has fallen a foot and a half in the last twenty-four hours. Detailed reports received show that there is six feet of water in the streets of Cologne, Coblenz and Bonn. At the last named place 490 houses are submerged, and nearly all the provisions and fodder in the town have been destroyed. There is much sickness in the flooded districts, especially among the children and the poor.

The German Reichstag has rejected, by a vote of 153 to 119, the motion to allow as optional the use of French in debates in the Provincial Committee of Alsace-Lorraine.

The Municipal Bank of Skopin, in the Province of Reazan, Russia, has failed for over $60,000,000, ruining the whole town as well as hundreds of families elsewhere.

Cairo, 12th mo. 3rd.—The Court Martial which had been summoned to meet to-day assembled this morning. Arabi Pasha pleaded guilty to the charge of rebellion. The proceedings were very brief, the Court sitting only a few minutes. In the afternoon the Court reassembled and pronounced sentence of death against Arabi. The Khedive subsequently commuted the sentence to exile for life. It is believed that Arabi will retire to some part of the British dominions. His demeanor before the Court was very dignified. The decree commuting the sentence says that Arabi will be amenable to the sentence of death if he re-enters Egypt or its dependencies.

It is stated that before the end of the year India will have 12,000 miles of railway. The mileage has increased 100 per cent. in the last three years. The country is becoming our competitor in supplying Europe with breadstuffs. The exports have increased about one-third since 1879, being $360,000,000 last year. British capital is rapidly improving Indian agriculture.

The Mexican Central Railroad has been completed to Lagos, 260 miles from the City of Mexico. The National Railroad of Mexico was expected to be finished to Naravatio, 136 miles from the capital, by the 5th inst.

A telegram received in London announces the laying of the foundation stone of the City of La Plata, the new capital of the province of Buenos Ayres.

A telegram from Montreal says "the Canadian Pacific Railway Company to-day raised its capital stock from fifteen million to one hundred million dollars."

FRIENDS' LIBRARY.

A recent examination of Friends' Library shows that a number of volumes are missing from their places on the shelves. Some of them have no doubt been lost years ago, and cannot be recovered. Others may have been mislaid or forgotten by those who have borrowed them. The committee having charge of the Library respectfully request all who find any of the books alluded to, in their houses, to return them before the first day of the coming year.

FRIENDS' ASYLUM FOR THE INSANE,

Near Frankford, (Twenty third Ward,) Philadelphia.

Physician and Superintendent—JOHN C. HALL, M.D.

Applications for the Admission of Patients may be made to the Superintendent, or to any of the Board of Managers.

RECEIPTS.

Received from Joseph Armfield, Agent, England £2, vol. 56, 4 copies, and for Samuel Alexander, Josh Ashby, John Ashworth, John E. Baker, Henry B. John Bellows, Maria Bradburn, John Bottom, Samuel Bottomley, John Cheal, Robert Clark, Jan Cloak, Thomas Connell, Henry Darby, Charles Eleo, James Gill, Sarah Gibbins, William Graham, Susan Grubb, William Green, Forster Green, Mary Hald, John Horniman, James Hobson, Samuel Hope, Hel Horsnall, William Knowles, Benjamin Le Tall, William James Le Tall, Jane Moorhouse, Manches Friends' Institute, Mary Moore, William R. Na Daniel Pickard, George Pitt, H. M. Reynolds, Rael Rickman, Eliza M. Southall, Esther Shaw, Abraham Shield, George Smithson, John Sykes, Josiah Thonson, Ellen Watkins, William Allen Watkins, Lucy Walker, Robert Walker, William Ridley Warr, Francis Ellington Wright, William Wright, Jo Wood, Susan Williams, Thomas Williamson and William Walker, 10s. each, vol. 56; for Joseph Lamb a Sarah Pearson 10s. 6d., to No. 52, vol. 56; for Dr. Burton and Henry A. Uprichard, £1 each, vols. 55 a 56; for J. Barcroft Houghton, 5s., to No. 27, vol. 56; and for William Haydock, £1, vols. 55 and 56.

DIED, on the 25th of 4th month, 1882, CASSANDRA HARVEY, an esteemed member of New Garden Monthly and West Grove Particular Meeting, Pa., the 58th year of her age. She was attached to the principles and testimonies of the Society of Friends, and valued the privileges of membership in it. On evening before her death, when told that she could live long, she calmly replied, that she believed "th was one of the lower seats in her Heavenly Father's kingdom prepared for her."

—, on the 27th of 10th month, in Philadelphia HANNAH G. PUSEY, daughter of Joseph and Rebecca Pusey, of West Grove, Pa., in the 31st year of age, a member of New Garden Monthly Meeting. This dear Friend was one who moved through life in a qu unobtrusive way, without attracting much notice fr persons outside of her own circle of relatives and frie and yet, winning the respect and affection of those w whom she was associated by her cheerful, unselfish, faithful character. For a number of years, and to time of her death, she was engaged in teaching; and this employment was industrious and energetic. was a self-sacrificing, conscientious woman, who deavored to perform her duties, as in the sight of Heavenly Father. During the last year of her especially, she spent much time in silent meditation prayer, seeking for a preparation for that kingdom rest and peace into which it was her earnest desire enter when time to her should be no longer. Du her last illness she often repeated passages of Script and uttered many heavenly expressions, which sho the bent of her thoughts, and on what her confide was founded. At one time she quoted the language of Saviour, "Come unto me all ye that labor and are he laden, and I will give you rest." At another time she marked, "I am going to dwell in one of those beau mansions prepared for those that love Him here; a feel as if I had done that. But it is not of any merit o own that I feel this unbounded happiness, but thro his adorable goodness." Though very simple and sistent in her dress and appearance, she had felt at ti that it would be right to put on a plainer bonnet she had before worn. This was a step in the na way set before her that she had not yet taken, ar was brought to her remembrance as she lay on the of death, with a sense of forgiveness from the l for any shortness or delay in bearing her testimo and she could say, the Lord knows that I love I Seeing a small book lying on a table, she asked it was, and added, "Something trashy, I fear. V a great satisfaction it is to me, now that I can nee read nor sleep, that I have never read any of that l The mind can now draw upon that it had treas which was good and true. But it is well to give for prayer and supplication, so that when it com this, I can ask Him to take me to Himself." Fre were her petitions for patience and submission in ever was to be meted out for her to bear; and fo Saviour's presence.

—, in Burlington, New Jersey, 10th month, BENJAMIN V. MARSH, in the 65th year of his a member of Burlington Monthly Meeting of Friend

WILLIAM H. PILE, PRINTER,

No. 422 Walnut Street.

THE FRIEND.

A RELIGIOUS AND LITERARY JOURNAL.

OL. LVI.

SEVENTH-DAY, TWELFTH MONTH 16, 1882.

NO. 19.

PUBLISHED WEEKLY.

if paid in advance, $2.00 per annum; if not paid in advance $2.50; 10 cents extra is charged for Postage on those sent by mail.

Articles designed for insertion to be addressed to

JOSEPH WALTON,

MOORESTOWN, BURLINGTON CO., N. J.

Options, payments and business communications, received by

JOHN S. STOKES,

NO. 116 NORTH FOURTH STREET, UP STAIRS,
PHILADELPHIA.

For "The Friend."

Atmospheric Germs.

(Concluded from page 137.)

conducting his experiments on atmospheric germs, Tyndall used a wooden box with glass front, and glass plates let into the two sides. The bottom was pierced with twelve holes into which twelve test tubes were fitted tightly, their mouths opening into the box, their bodies projecting below the bottom of the box. A hole two inches in diameter on the top of the box was covered with a sheet of India Rubber and through this passed a long glass tube ending above in a small funnel. After allowing the box to stand for some days all floating particles had disappeared from the air, eight of the test tubes were filled with a fresh animal solution by means of the tube passing through the India Rubber. At the same time, on the 13th of 9th mo. 1875, eight other tubes, containing portions of the same solution were placed outside the box, and exposed to the ordinary air. The solution in all seven of the tubes was boiled for five minutes before their immersion in a bath of heated brine.

The only difference in the treatment of the tubes was, that part of it was protected by being contained in the box, and part of it was exposed to whatever germs might be contained in the outside air. The exposed tubes soon became turbid, mould formed on the surface, and germs of Bacteria in active motion were detected in them, and the smell became putrid. At this time the protected tubes exhibited a perfectly unchanged appearance, and at the end of four months it was as bright and transparent as when first prepared.

A similar experiment was tried with an infusion of mutton, boiled and carefully filtered so as to be perfectly clear. The tubes were sealed on the 24th of the 9th month. Three weeks afterwards the exposed tubes were turbid and by the sixth day the Bacteria in them had increased to astonishing swarms. During the whole of this time the infusion in contact with the motionless air of the chamber remained as clear as distilled water, and was entirely free from life.

These experiments were repeated with substantially the same result on a great variety of infusions of animal and vegetable substances, such as of beef, pork, hay, turnips, tea, hops, salmon, &c. So long as they were protected from exposure to air containing organic germs they remained unchanged; while they speedily became putrid when exposed to the ordinary atmosphere. On one occasion, when the tubes in the closed box had remained pure for a considerable time, a panel was taken out of the back, and the air of the laboratory permitted to enter. On the fourth day after they were all muddy and swarming with Bacteria.

The vivacity of some of these minute organisms was extraordinary. They darted rapidly to and fro across the field of view of the microscope; clashing, recoiling and pirouetting—rendering it, indeed, difficult to believe in their vegetable nature.

The great care which is needed in such investigations to avoid sources of error which might vitiate the conclusions, is shown by Tyndall's experience. Some turnip-infusion had remained clear in the box for about a month, when the door at the back was opened and specimens taken out for examination by the microscope. In doing this, pipettes, or pieces of narrow glass tubing drawn out to a point, with a few inches of India Rubber tubing attached to them, were used to withdraw portions of the liquid from the test tubes. The first tube showed no signs of life. Picking up another pipette, he took a sample from the second tube. Here to his astonishment the exhibition of life was monstrously copious. There were numerous globular organisms, which revolved, rotated, and quivered in the most extraordinary manner. This unexpected exhibition led to further examinations, in the course of which some suspicion rested on the pipettes themselves as the source of the living creatures. On inspecting one of them, a tiny drop was found remaining in the fine point. This was blown on to a slide, covered and placed under the microscope. An astonishing exhibition of life was the reward. The Bacteria darted in straight lines to and fro, bending right and left along the line of motion, wriggling, rotating longitudinally, and spinning round a vertical axis. Monads also galloped and quivered through the field. Thus it was proved that the impurity was in the pipettes used, and not in the solutions in the box.

These experiments were afterwards varied by using small glass flasks drawn out at one end to a point. They contained about an ounce of liquid which was boiled and the point then hermetically sealed by melting over the flame of a spirit-lamp. One hundred and thirty of these, charged with twenty-four kinds of infusions, were prepared, and yielded the same results as had been obtained with the closed box. They all remained clear and unchanged, while portions of the same solutions exposed to the air speedily swarmed with Bacteria.

The germs of these Bacteria "abound in every pool, stream and river. All parts of the moist earth are crowded with them. Every wetted surface which has been dried by the sun or air contains upon it the particles which the unevaporated liquid held in suspension. From such surfaces they are detached and wafted away, their universal prevalence in the atmosphere being thus accounted for." Many of the experiments heretofore described had been made in the laboratory of the Royal Institution at London. To prove that these germs were widely diffused, open tubes or flasks of similar solutions were placed in various parts of the building from the roof to the cellar, and in different parts of England; and all in process of time swarmed with life.

Another set of experiments on the relative abundance of these germs in different parts of the air, showed that they were very unequally distributed as to numbers, some portions of the atmosphere swarming with them, while in other places their numbers seemed comparatively small. Tyndall estimates that 30,000,000 germs daily would be a very moderate estimate of the number falling from the air in a room of 20 feet by 15, in which he operated.

As has been previously stated these germs abound in water as well as in air. The means commonly resorted to for the destruction of the germs which might exist in the solutions used, was boiling. But in some cases it was found that exposure to the heat of boiling water for several minutes failed to destroy their life. A long series of experiments was instituted for the investigation of this subject. The germs contained in the infusions of old, dry hay were the most difficult to destroy, retaining their vitality in some cases after several hours of continuous boiling.

Every difficulty that presented was met by new devices, and by fresh experiments, and through the precautions, variations, and repetitions observed and executed with the view of rendering the results secure, the separate vessels employed in this inquiry mounted up in two years to nearly ten thousand!

One of the most important bearings of these and similar researches is the light they throw on epidemic diseases, some of which have been proved to be associated with microscopical parasites infecting the bodies of their victims. It is quite probable that the contagion which produces some of them may float in the air as seeds or germs, and being absorbed into the system, there develop and produce the disease.

J. W.

For "The Friend."

Westtown Boarding School.

At a meeting of the committee held 4th mo. 18th, 1851, notice was received of a legacy from Geo. Williams, deceased, of one thousand dollars for general purposes,—the words of the will being simply, "For the use and benefit of said Boarding School." The liberality here allowed the committee of disposing of funds in a manner which they think will most inure to the benefit of the institution, is very commendable.

At a meeting of the committee held 12th mo. 3d, 1851, a new set of Rules and Regulations were submitted and adopted, which occupy about 19 pages of the minute book—evidencing much care in their preparation.

10th mo. 18th, 1852. It was proposed to erect tanks in the attic for holding water; a new furnace under the girls' side of the house; and the purchase of some new, and the repairing of old chemical and philosophical apparatus, all of which were agreed to, subject, however, to be carried into effect "whenever the funds for this purpose shall be obtained." The care observed by Friends of that day not to proceed in extensive improvements without knowing how they were to be paid for, is quite noticeable, and equally so is their liberality in due time in providing the requisite funds for all needful repairs and additions.

12th mo. 8th, 1852. "The committee appointed to confer with the farming committee on the subject of conducting the farm, report that our friends J. and P. B. having offered to take charge of the farm and house, * * we have believed it right to accept their offer, with the understanding that the committee are to stock the farm and furnish such parts of the house not occupied by their family. In order to carry out that arrangement, it is believed that an expenditure of at least six thousand dollars will have to be made. On behalf of the committee,

DAVID ROBERTS,

PENNOCK PASSMORE."

"It being suggested that the requisite funds for stocking the farm, furnishing the house and other unavoidable expenditures, might be raised by voluntary subscriptions to a loan for 3 or 4 years, without interest, the following friends were appointed to endeavor to obtain them in this way, and the Treasurer is hereby directed to issue to the individuals thus loaning the money, and to sign on behalf of the committee, such notes or other evidences of the debts so incurred as may be suitable and satisfactory, viz: Thos. Evans, Samuel B. Morris, Alfred Cope, Samuel Bettie, Jr., and others."

At a meeting of the committee held 4th mo. 8th, 1853, it is recorded that all the improvements proposed at the meeting held 10th mo. 18th, 1852, had been carried into effect, together with other conveniences, including alterations of No. 19, and furnishing it as a parlor—"all of which has been paid for by voluntary subscription." The cost of these additions appears to have been about $3500, exclusive of subscription to the farm.

The report to the Yearly Meeting in 1853 says: "The necessary repairs in an establishment where there is so great a number of buildings of large extent, involves a heavy expenditure, especially as many of them are old; and the increased cost of living makes the average expense of each pupil upwards of $15 per annum more than is charged for board and tuition, without any allowance for repairs and improvements, for depreciation in furniture and other articles, or interest on the capital invested and for several years past has occasioned an annual loss in conducting the institution." This continues to be the case, the average cost per pupil for the year ending 4th month 5th, 1881, being $202.25—price charged $150 per annum. "As the motive which led to the establishment of this seminary was a religious concern for the proper training and instruction of the children of Friends, under the watchful care of the Society, and as it affords great advantages for the attainment of these important objects, it is very desirable that no step should be taken which would discourage Friends from sending their children there; but that its benefits should be as widely disseminated as its accommodations will admit.

"The committee feel the charge of conducting this important institution in a manner consistent with the original design of its establishment, to be a weighty and responsible trust; and they affectionately desire that parents and others who may send children, will cordially co-operate in the efforts used to preserve that simplicity of dress and demeanor which becomes our religious profession, as well as a ready and cheerful obedience on the part of the pupils, to those salutary regulations and restraints which essentially contribute to the comfort of such a family, and of all its inmates. It has been satisfactory to observe the degree in which these desirable ends have been attained during the past year, and we trust that through the continued blessing of Him, whose heritage children are declared to be, in the religious watchful care and kind attentions of the different officers, the time spent there may prove of lasting benefit to our beloved young friends who enjoy the privilege of an education within its sheltered enclosure."

The sentiments here expressed will find a ready response in the minds of many, if not all of the Friends composing the committee at the present time. The task of inspecting the clothing, &c., of children sent to Westtown to receive their education, is no light one, requiring on the part of those appointed to this unpleasant duty, firmness united with a kind consideration for the feelings of the pupil, so that whilst carrying out faithfully our testimonies in regard to plainness, it may be done so as to carry conviction to the minds of the children of the truth of the grounds on which those testimonies rest.

Extract from the will of Henry Pemberton, deceased, produced and read at a meeting of the committee held 10th mo. 7th, 1853.

"Item—all the rest, residue and remainder of my estate, real, personal and mixed, I give, devise and bequeath unto my executors herein named, and the survivor: In trust nevertheless for the following uses, intents and purposes, * * * to the treasurer for the time being of the committee having charge of the Boarding School at Westtown, the said fund to be safely invested by the said committee, and the income and profits thereof to be appropriated * * to the payment of clothing, board and tuition and incidental expenses attendant thereon of such children in indigent circumstances, members of the religious Society of Friends," &c. The desire is subsequently expressed that in admitting such children on this fund, a preference may be given to members of Philadelphia Quarterly Meeting, but does not limit the expenditure to them. This legacy has been quite beneficial, and a further addition to it could at this time be used to advantage.

12th mo. 7th. The committee to assist the farming committee report the estimated value of household furniture at the farm-house, stock and utensils, &c., on farm to be eight thousand three hundred and thirteen dollars and fifteen cents. A spacious and convenient fire-proof chest has been constructed in the library, and the expense has been defrayed by individual contributions for the purpose.

The inadequate provision for lighting school building, as well as the inconvenience and danger attending the present arrangement, having at various times claimed attention of the committee, as has also the subject of the want of suitable accommodation on the boys' side of the house for wash and bathing; and the want of means to effect these improvements having been made known to a number of Friends who feel an interest in the welfare of this institution, we are informed that the call has been so liberally responded to as to leave no doubt but that sufficient amount can be readily secured at the present time to defray the expense of these very desirable improvements. In consideration of which the following Friends were appointed, in conjunction with the Superintendent, carefully to digest and arrange the best plan for effecting them, and to carry same into execution as early as practical, viz., Samuel Bettie, Jos. Scattergood, Thos. Evans, Thos. Kimber, Samuel B. Morris and Joel Evans.

A Letter of Jno. Barclay.

Alton, 15th of 12th mo. 182

Be assured thou hast my very tender sympathy under the important circumstances thy letter unfolds; and that my best, though feeble desires are and will be for thy best welfare. I cannot doubt but preservation and sufficient help will be extended, while a simple, unreserved surrender of the will is sought after and abode in. I have thought, in a case of this kind, there is always abundant concession, gentleness, forbearance, and love suffering manifested towards us, poor fallible creatures. He putteth forth and goeth before us (poor fallible creatures) knoweth our frailty and himself took our infirmities; when we take a step a little awkwardly, or with too much forwardness or mistakingly, mercy is near to hold us up and restore us, so long as we are not wilful, but singly desire to be right in our movements. We may be, and some of us know we have been long borne with, in matters that borders on, and indeed proves to be, little better than thorough unbelief and disobedience. We read that "rebellion is as the sin of witchcraft." We may have held back on different grounds, very reasonable as we have thought; but we have been chastised for that. Leanness and feebleness have come over us, that when we would afterwards have given up, the Divine sense, strength and blessing have receded; neither have we enjoyed the answer of "Well done." Our situation, perhaps, has somewhat resembled that of the Israelites who, after refusing, attempted to enter the promised land; there is, nevertheless, forgiveness with Him, that He may rightly feared, and also plenteous redemption.

I believe we are safe in resting under a holy simple fear and caution, as to so awful a proceeding as the first exercise of the ministry but how far this should be carried, cannot well be defined for another; vessels are variously moulded and variously dealt with or used there may be too much of this as well as too little, for our snares and our tendencies differ. Even though we wait for what we may suppose only adequate strength and clearness on the occasion, this may stand in the way of our having that degree of it which was led for us, had we used more self-renunciation, or been more disinterested in our service. Plain we are not to expect to have just evidence would please or satisfy our feelings, which may have become somewhat morbid by dwelling on things too much. The simplicity of a true babe in Christ is what we want most, far more than that kind assurance we covet thus greatly; a little this goes a great way: it is the faith which sees God and removes the mountains; and which we are to walk, rather than by sight; it leads to look not to self with anxiety, we shall be provided either with discernment, courage, or what else is needed; but to in the Lord, and cast our burden on Him, knowing He is ready to sustain such, so that we shall lack nothing; nor are they much troubled by what arises to perplex, discourage or prove them, trusting over all in never-ending goodness.

Hope if what is now handed should feel free to be as a word in season, and in any coming from the right source, thou wilt hesitate to accept it through the fear of hurting on man. I consider that when instruments are rightly engaged for the help of others, they act not in their own name: such are ordained and needful in the church; and our eye be single to the Great Head, the giver of every good and perfect gift, and to inward appearing and sense as to what comes through others, we shall not be in danger of hurt.

Nature's Preparation for Winter.

Plant and Animal Life are preserved and perpetuated. By Paul A. Chadbourne, President of Massachusetts Agricultural College.

The golden-rod and aster, the crimson leaf-mosses and maple and the increase of autumn music all indicate that the season for plant-growth at least, is coming to a close, and that plant and animal life must soon do battle again with the frost and ice of winter months. Nature has provided for us in the abundant fruits of the earth that are to disappear that men and the higher animals may not starve this winter battle successfully; but in facing these, she has not forgotten that she has work to do in years to come. She made provision for taking up the work again with as vigorous a hand as ever, when spring months return. The abundance and variety of her methods for tiding life over dreariness of winter and beginning successfully her work at the earliest moment, arevellous. If a species of plant or insect is killed by the frost, the seed of the one and egg of the other have been prepared for a new generation the coming year. If the plant is to live, its buds are already prepared to expand into leaves and flowers; or bulbs and root-stocks having the potency of buds, are hidden beneath the earth, and in tree and shrub, in bulb and root-stock are garnered stores of food for the quick development of leaf and flower when the warmth of spring awakes the buds to their new life. If the insect is to live, it has instinctively prepared its store of food, or it will sleep unmindful of any storm and wake at the appointed time to welcome visitor or a pest, as its race have done before. The higher animals are provided with thicker coats, with gathered stores of fat, or with some sure provision for their life. Even the wide-leaved trees, that might be broken by wind and loads of snow, will soon drop their wealth of leaves, and like vessels well commanded, will present only bare poles to the storm.

In the most cheerless winter day, there is to one who knows the secrets of nature, promise of abundance of life in the garnered stores of the forest trees and in the humble grass and flower-roots in the frozen soil—a store of nutriment often unsuspected but revealed in all its wealth in the sudden expanding of leaves and the abundance of flowers that cover the banks and vales in early spring. The beautiful plants of the springtime could not give us such early and vigorous growth were it not for their accumulated stores of food; in fact without those stores prudently laid up the year before, the trees could not put forth their leaves and blossoms at all.

But in the animal kingdom, there are three remarkable provisions already alluded to, for the preservation of those whose supplies of food are likely to fail. The first is the instinct to store food as best seen among insects in the honey bee, among birds in the noisy jay and among our mammals in the striped squirrel or chipmunk. The bee-keeper knows his bees must have so many pounds of honey to be able to winter without his help, and the blue-jay, apparently the most reckless bird that flies, stuffs acorns and corn into every crack and cranny he can find, as though he intended not only to have enough for himself, but expected to be robbed of his scattered hoard, as he himself has lived, by robbery or worse. But the little chipmunk is a model provider. Acorns, beech-nuts, corn or pumpkin seeds—anything that will feed a squirrel in winter,—are equally welcome to him. And when he is on his way to his hole, if ever a fellow had “cheek” he has! How he gets such loads into one small mouth is a marvel that no one would credit who had not seen him at his harvest work. But such a bright, cheerful, social fellow is certainly welcome to his home in the old stone-wall, or stump, and welcome also to the few grains of corn and wheat he may chance to glean from our fields. His cousin, the little brown striped squirrel of the Rocky Mountains, is not so harmless a neighbor, as many a miner would testify who has lost rice and bread by the plundering of these adroit little thieves.

The second of nature's methods of preserving animal life is by hibernation. The lower animals, as insects and some reptiles, become to all appearances entirely dormant, live without essential change during the cold of winter and wake to active life only when food is again ready for them. Others like the woodchuck after growing fat on the abundant food of autumn, roll themselves up in nests and sleep. Vital action is lowered, they consume but little oxygen and live upon the stores of fat with which they went into winter quarters. The black bear generally hibernates in caves and under old tree-tops, but he is never so sleepy that he is not ready for a battle if disturbed; and farther south he does not hibernate at all. In New England, he grows fat on green corn, roots and nuts in the fall, and so has had the credit of growing fat by “sucking his paws.” This old notion is only another illustration of theories in mechanic life that something can come from nothing. The truth about the bear is that he grows thin every day he lies in his den.

The third general method of preserving the species through winter is by migration, as best seen among birds, but practised also by some of the higher mammals. As the autumn advances, many of the smaller birds from our midst and from the far North, quietly make their way South to find warm weather and new stores of food for the winter months. Others assemble in flocks and seem to have grave consultations over the projected journey. The metallic note of the wild goose comes to us from among the clouds as night and day the flocks wend their way in long lines to the South. Long before they appear with us, they collect their broods in the lakes and bays near their breeding places and seem to be organizing for the long flight which most of them are to take for the first time to a land that most of them have never seen; for of every flock that starts from those northern resting-places, the larger part are young and have never flown but a few miles before they commence their long flight to an unknown land. They follow their leader, it is said. When did the first leader learn the way? We have seen them in the bays of Newfoundland gathering like a great army, practising for days; and then one flock after another separates itself from the great host and follows its chosen leader to the South. They return in spring even while snow and ice abound, to be ready for the opening of the short northern summer. In the long days of the North, and by the unmolested lakes and bays of Newfoundland and Labrador, they find the best condition for rearing their young.

Thus it is that the grass and flowers and trees are provided for and preserved by the physiological laws of their own growth, and the animal kingdom has added the power of instinct, supplementing the physiological function of organs; structure, function and instinct all working together in effective concert, prepare the endangered species for the winter frost and storms, and for the work of another spring when the round of life is once more to begin. The old story ever new,—newer and better as we learn more of it at every repetition.—Springfield Republican.

For “The Friend.”

Ancient Testimonies and Advices.

THE TEACHINGS AND LEADINGS OF DIVINE GRACE.

“By following the leadings of this heavenly principle of Divine grace, our worthy ancestors were brought to an inward fellowship and holy communion in the one Lord, one faith, and one baptism; by which they became sensible not only of their own inward state, but had also a sympathy and concern raised in them for the welfare of others: watching over one another for good, and in Christian freedom and in plainness of speech exhorting the remiss, reproving offenders, encouraging the weak, and bringing forward the hindmost of the flock: which brotherly concern conduced to the gathering of many, and to their strength and confirmation in the blessed Truth. A practice, which we fear, is too much neglected, though worthy of our imitation, and which we earnestly recommend to all who have the truth at heart.”—Epistle of London Yearly Meeting, 1747.

“Dear Friends, as our forefathers and predecessors were led and directed by the Spirit of truth publicly to proclaim the sufficiency of the grace of God inwardly manifested in the hearts of all the children of men; we earnestly desire, that above all things the directions of this heavenly monitor in ourselves may be carefully observed, which will give us the clearest view of our several and respective duties, and guide us into all truth. From a disregard of this heavenly and universal principle of Divine light, and disobedience to its holy guidance, proceed that ignorance and depravity which have overspread too many of the professors of Christianity. Let us, therefore, who are in an especial manner favored with the knowledge of the truth inwardly revealed, and in some degree made experimental witnesses of its power and efficacy, beware, lest any of us also fall away and lose sight of that inward and inerring guide, which alone is able to keep us steadfast and unmovable in the practice of pure and undefiled religion, preserve us from the spots and pollutions of the world, make us wise unto salvation, and enable us to perform that which is good and acceptable in the sight of God. To whom for the comfortable influences of his Holy Spirit, and all other his manifold blessings, both spiritual and temporal, be glory, dominion, and praise ascribed, through Jesus Christ, our Lord and Saviour, now, and forever. Amen.—Ibid. 1749.

"Dear Friends, we recommend you, in great earnestness of spirit, to the one unerring guide, the grace of our Lord Jesus Christ, which is able to preserve us all from falling. And the not being obedient thereto, is the great and universal cause of evil and disorder, and giveth occasion for repeating advice upon particular cases from this meeting, which is matter of sorrow to all the sincere hearted; wherefore we again beseech all Friends to keep to the Lord's power, and the work thereof in themselves. This at first made us a people, who were not a people; and as herein we keep our meetings, they will be to God's glory, and our everlasting peace and salvation."—Ibid. 1727.

"Dear Friends, we earnestly and principally recommend you in an especial manner to have a continued regard to the perpetual guide and director, which our Lord Jesus Christ, the great Shepherd of the sheep, hath sent in his name, even the Spirit of truth. To this the primitive church, in the earliest time, was gathered; by this both Jews and Gentiles were baptized into one body; through this one Spirit the believers had access to God; this gave them a right understanding of the things of God; and it was this that supported them in their testimony against the corruptions of the world, and gave them prevalence over death and darkness. But, alas! too soon did a disregard to this heavenly guide and director creep in amongst those who profess the Christian name, and gradually introduced a grievous and almost universal apostacy from the primitive glory and life of the first professors of that holy and spiritual religion. Nevertheless it pleased God, after a long and dark night, to cause the light of the gospel day again to dawn; to restore paths to walk in; to revive the long-exploded doctrine of the guidance of the Holy Spirit; and to lead the observers thereof into the practice of the like purity, plainness and simplicity of the gospel, by which the early Christians were distinguished from the men of this world. By closely attending to the conduct of this Holy Spirit in yourselves, you shall experience not only wisdom to know, but power to perform, that which is agreeable to the mind and will of God. This will lead you out of the pride and vanities of the world, and enable you to become followers of Jesus Christ, and subject to his yoke, who was himself an example to mankind of the greatest meekness and humility."—Ibid. 1741.

"It behoveth us, in the depth of humility and reverence, to consider and remind one another of the merciful dealings of the Lord our God, who, in the aboundings of his grace, hath called us out of this present evil world, to bear among the children of men a public profession of our faith in, and subjection to, the light and Spirit of his son, our Saviour, inwardly revealed. An holy and honorable calling! Let us, we beseech you, brethren, walk worthy of the vocation wherewith we are called: 'As obedient children, not fashioning ourselves according to the former lusts in our ignorance; but, as He that hath called us is holy, so let us be holy in all manner of conversation.'"—Ibid. 1753.

For "The Friend."

The following lines I came across while young, and memorized them, but lost sight of the copy. And now, while in Kansas, I have found a little book of the writings of Bernard Barton which contains the piece. And admiring the beauty of sentiment, and the poetry too, I have copied it and send it for insertion in "The Friend." D. H.

SPIRITUAL WORSHIP.

Though glorious, O God! must thy temple have been,
On the day of its first dedication,
When the cherubim's wings widely waving were seen
On high, o'er the ark's holy station;

When even the chosen of Levi, though skilled
To minister, standing before thee,
Retired from the cloud which the temple then filled,
And thy glory made Israel adore thee:

Though awfully grand was thy majesty then;
Yet the worship thy gospel discloses,
Less splendid in pomp to the vision of men,
Far surpasses the ritual of Moses.

And by whom was that ritual forever repealed?
But by Him unto whom it was given
To enter the oracle, where is revealed,
Not the cloud, but the brightness of heaven?

Who, having once entered, hath shown us the way,
O Lord! how to worship before thee;
Not with shadowy forms of that earlier day,
But in spirit and truth to adore thee!

This, this is the worship the Saviour made known,
When she of Samaria found Him;
By the patriarch's well, sitting weary alone,
With the stillness of noontide around Him.

How sublime, yet how simple the homage He taught
To her who inquired by that fountain,
If Jehovah at Solyma's shrine should be sought?
Or adored on Samaria's mountain?

"Woman! believe me, the hour is near,
When He, if ye rightly would hail Him,
Will neither be worshipped exclusively here,
Nor yet at the altar of Salem.

For God is a Spirit! and they, who aright
Would perform that pure worship He loveth,
In the heart's holy temple will seek with delight,
That worship the Father approveth."

And many that prophecy's truth can declare,
Whose bosoms have livingly known it;
Whom God hath instructed to worship Him there,
And convinced, that his mercy will own it.

The temple that Solomon built to his name,
Now lives hut in history's story;
Extinguished long since is its altar's bright flame,
And vanished each glimpse of its glory.

But the Christian, made wise by a wisdom divine,
Though all human fabrics may falter,
Still finds in his heart a far holier shrine,
Where the fire burns unquenched on the altar!

Select

TAKE CARE.

BY ALICE CARY.

Little children, you must seek
Rather to be good than wise,
For the thoughts you do not speak
Shine out in your cheeks and eyes.

If you think that you can be
Cross and cruel and look fair,
Let me tell you how to see
You are quite mistaken there.

Go and stand before the glass
And some ngly thought contrive,
And my word will come to pass
Just as sure as you're alive.

What you have and what you lack,
All the same as what you wear,
You will see reflected back;
So my little folks, take care!

And not only in the glass
Will your secrets come to view;
All beholders, as they pass,
Will perceive and know them too.

Goodness shows in blushes bright,
Or in eyelids drooping down
Like a violet from the light;
Badness in a sneer or frown.

Cherish what is good, and drive
Evil thoughts and feelings far;
For as sure as you're alive,
You will show for what you are.

Materialism.—What might be called a fi materialism, like periodic insanity, se every now and then to take possession men. Just at present the fit is on. The ing idea seems to be to get as near to earth as possible. Science leads the w blowing the ancient pipes of Pan; and ph sophy, religion, literature, civil and social follow, dancing their way toward the "c of the earth" whence they came. I have fears but that this temporary insanity pass. The world will come to itself. A perhaps to atone for its folly and madn will rush to the other extreme of mystic and sentimentalism.

For one look into the history of hun thought and morals is enough to convi one that the earthly craze is, and m be, of short duration. We have a spirit constitution. It always has asserted, it ways will assert itself in the end. My c fear is that during this materialistic lunai some of us may lose our bearings. And w it is certain that the great world will in t swing back to its ancient and true order, the unfortunate individuals, may never co to ourselves.

Or, to change the figure, the battle mus fought out. The victory is assured. I unless we are properly armed and instrue we may be left dead on the field or b away wounds for life. It is said that in treatment of insane and idiotic children, great aim is to get them to look up. T put their playthings on the stairs, above tl reach. As soon as one of them begins to l up they have hope of him. So, when i have lost their spiritual sanity, and go groveling on the earth, saying to a st "Thou art my Father," and to a stone, "T hast brought me forth," the only hope is endeavor to get them to lift up their hea to engage their thought heavenward. Th er was a greater demand than just at present for lifting up the thought of men to the spiritualities that hold their eternal residences of beauty and order above the world. American Rural Home.

Letter of Oliver Sansom to Friends.

Let every one of you be diligent to follow your own business in the fear of God, and meddle not with that wherein you are not concerned; and although your hands are employed in your labor, let your hearts be after the Lord, meditating continually on his goodness and his large loving kindness and his tender mercies, wherewith He visits us morning after morning, and evening after evening, also at noon day; He hath never been wanting to us to do us good.

Oh! that the sense of the rich love of our Father might always remain upon our spirits, as his tender mercies are daily renewed to us, so our thanksgiving and sincere reliance might be returned unto Him from the bottom of our hearts, which is his due forevermore. Oh let us never forget the Lord God, who hath been so good to us, but let Him be always the first in our thoughts on our uprising, and the last at our lying down, and let our meditation be of Him all day; for from the rising of the sun to the going down of the same the Lord's name is to be praised. He alone is worthy of all praise, is over all, King of kings and Lord of lords, who is able to do for us far more abundantly than we can ask or think; to whom be the praise and honor ascribed, for his everlasting kingdom, the power and the glory forevermore. Amen.

Reading Gaol, 7th of Ninth mo. 1670."

Source of the Influence of the Catholic Priest. Every religion which is worthy the name, should provide some method of consoling men in the first agonies of bereavement, some support in the extremes of pain and sickness, and all, some stay in the hour of death. It operates, not merely or mainly upon the intellect and healthy reason, but also in the twilight of the understanding, in the half-lucid intervals that precede death, when the imagination is enfeebled and discolored by disease, and all the faculties are confused and disordered, when all the buoyancy and hopefulness of nature are crushed. At such a time it is sufficient for most men to rest upon the recollection of a well-spent life. Such a retrospect of our life is too full of saddening and humiliating memories. It is an effort too great for a faded mind. It can at best afford but a languid satisfaction amid the bitterness of death. It is at this moment that the Catholic influence is most felt. The Catholic priest, asserting with emphatic confidence a divine power of absolving the sinner, arresting and over-awing the wandering imagination by imposing rites, demanding only complete submission at a time when beyond all resistance the mind is least disposed to resist, and pressing on the condition of that submission, to conduct the dying man into an eternity of bliss, can provide a stay upon which ailing nature can rest in that gloomy hour. Immense consolation which has thus been effected into innumerable minds at the time when consolation is most needed, can be easily overstated. To secure the efficacy of this absolution upon the imagination of the dying, has been a main end of all the teaching, and of all the ceremonies of the Church. For the sake of this, men have endured all the calamities which priestcraft has brought upon the world, have bartered the independence of their minds, and shut their eyes to the light of Truth. By connecting this absolution indissolubly with complete submission to their sacerdotal claims, the Catholic priests framed the most formidable engine of religious tyranny that has ever been employed to disturb or subjugate the world. —Lecky.

Common Sense Economies.

Every community furnishes what some are pleased to term mysterious cases of persons who, with no better advantages than others, "get forward in the world." A close acquaintance with such successful people will reveal the fact that much of their success comes of the persevering practice of small economies. The cumulative power of little savings in the course of years will surprise any one who has not looked into the subject with care. Take an example: A visiting clergyman asks a brother in the latter's study, whether he would object to his smoking. No objection is made. While the head of the smoker is wreathed in the cloud so dear to the user of the narcotic, he casts his eye over his brother's book-cases, whose shelves are weighed down with valuable and inviting volumes. Said the smoker: "Bro. B. how came it about that you obtained so large a library? Your father was a clergyman and had a numerous family. Of course you got but little means from him. You are a younger man than I by ten years, and yet you have ten times as many books, and your household is as large as mine. Please explain." The non-user of the weed replied, "My good friend, you have burnt up a library like mine just three inches from your nose, while I have saved my library just three inches from my nose."

"Ah," replied the smoker, "you exaggerate; you are too hard on me!"

"I think not," was the response. "But to the figures. Here (opening a drawer) are tables showing the various totals which the regular sums of money contributed annually, with all rates of interest will amount to, during various terms of years. Will you give me the average you have spent annually for tobacco and the length of time you have indulged? I will take the reckoning at six per cent. I value my library at two thousand dollars and there are over one thousand volumes."

The smoker taking the cigar out of his mouth, reflected for a moment and made what he called a fair statement. To his great surprise the sum did not vary two hundred dollars from the cost of the fine library which he so much admired.

Here was a case where the indulgence of a man, at only middle age, was moderate; and yet at six per cent. interest, amounted to two thousand dollars or over.

In this sum, you find a modest house for one's old age; there is a possible western farm lost by the want of a little saving, and that too, where the expenditure was not only not necessary but injurious.

On another occasion, a practical man, standing before a half dozen working people who were roundly abusing their employers for being "so hard on them," declaiming against low wages and the tyranny of capital, replied in the following fashion; "Now men, suppose you take an honest look at home. How many of you use tobacco?" They all confessed to the indulgence. "How many of you go into saloons, oftener than now and then, and lift your hand holding a glass of beer or something stronger?" They all confessed again. "Now men, let's be fair; you, my friend (pointing to one) are hardly short of sixty; how comes it, that at three-score you are still carrying the hod and getting a hod-carrier's wages, and complaining of your poverty? Let us take an honest look at ourselves. Had you never burnt or chewed any tobacco, and had you never gone into a saloon to lift your hand, you might have been an employer and a boss ere you reached fifty, and you might have been an independent man to-day. You have all wondered how I reached my position. My father died while I was in my teens. I worked hard as any of you; but I saved my money, never spent a penny for tobacco or strong drink, and I believe my getting forward had much to do with the early adoption of that course. Men, what think you of looking at the other, that is, our side now and then?" The three-score man, as he turned on his heel was heard to mutter out at the side of his pipe, "too much truth in that! pity we hadn't had that preaching when we were lads." But would they have followed the preaching?—Selected.

Buying Water in the Desert.

BY EDWARD L. WILSON.

What a great blessing was water to people of the olden time! How much stress is laid by the Bible upon its value and importance; and how much trouble was taken by the patriarchs to secure a supply of this essential element, for their flocks and their folks!

We all know what a well-builder Jacob was; and I have had occasion to bless him more than once for this propensity of his; for his wells are still open, where he digged them. We see by our Bibles, too, that wells were considered a valuable property, and were promised to Israel among the good things which they should inherit in the promised land. In Deuteronomy 6: 11, we find the promise to Israel of "houses full of good things which thou filledst not, and wells digged which thou diggedst not, vineyards and olive trees which thou plantedst not."

The value and scarcity of water in the olden time is shown by Israel's request to Sihon, king of the Amorites: "And Israel sent messengers unto Sihon, king of the Amorites, saying, Let me pass through thy land; we will not turn into the fields, or into the vineyards; we will not drink of the waters of the wells; but we will go along by the king's highway, until we be passed thy borders" (Num. 21: 22).

All this is mentioned, in order to account for and justify the present inhabitants of the desert in following a custom which would seem hard in our country, but which (as is the case with their customs generally) is practised by them, because the same thing was done in the olden time,—I allude to the exaction of money from travellers for water supply. The first experience that we had of this kind was at Wady Feiran, near the foot of Mount Serbal, once the home of the Amalekites, and near the place where Israel fought for the possession of the very fountains from which we made our first purchase in the desert, at the time when Aaron and Hur stayed the arms of Moses, who overlooked the battle from an adjoining hill. Here the water is of excellent quality, and is in great plenty, and we were glad to replenish our supply from such a splendid source.

From there until we arrived at Akabah, near the site of the ancient Elath and Ezion-geber, we depended upon the small oases which were found along the way; but at the last-named place we were compelled to pay five dollars per barrel for water which we obtained from the fortress close by. Here, too, the water was of excellent quality. And after a custom of the Israelites, "when we passed by from our brethren, the children of Esau, which dwelt in Seir, through the way of the plain from Elath, and from Ezion-geber, we turned and passed by way of the wilderness of Moab," toward Petra, in the land of Edom. Within a half-day's journey of that city we came to the fountain of Ain Gazalah, where we halted for lunch. Here quite an incident occurred, which, although it seemed troublesome at the time, proved to be justified by the old-time custom, according to Scripture. Some of the Bedawin of the neighborhood met the party of travellers, and demanded that they should empty the water from their vessels and take of the waters of Ain Gazalah. The attendant dragoman objected, saying that the vessels were filled with water of good quality, and that they did not wish for any other. But the Petra fellahin demanded that the water should be poured out, and the vessels filled with the water from their well. Against this the dragoman remonstrated, when he was told that he would be charged five dollars per barrel whether he took it or not, and he could do as he pleased about taking it. The sum was, therefore, paid without taking any water, and a sheep and a goat were purchased for the supply of the table. Thus the command of Deuteronomy 2:6 was fully obeyed: "Ye shall buy meat of them with money, that ye may eat; and ye shall also buy water of them for money, that ye may drink." This ceremony ended, the travellers were allowed to proceed on their journey.

Although it seemed hard to be compelled to pay so largely for water, yet when the matter is fairly considered, it appears but just that it should be so, for the supply is not always ample. It is sometimes quite a risk to allow any one to draw two or three barrels of water from a well, especially when it may be six or eight months before the heavens will visit the land with anything like a cloud-break, or hardly the semblance of a cloud. For in all our desert journey of forty days we experienced but two showers, the longest of which was only seventy-five seconds in duration, giving scarcely enough water to be recognized as such. So it will be seen that this old-time custom, though instituted in a different dispensation, is still properly followed, and the desert traveller of the future must submit to it without grumbling.—S. S. Times.

To inherit a fortune, is sometimes a misfortune to a young man. To have no necessity of struggling for a living, may keep a man from living a life worth living. A well-known American is reported to have been asked, recently, for a sketch of his biography, and to have answered frankly, that he had been nothing, and had done nothing, worth telling the world about; and this because enough of a "competency" had been left him to practically destroy his competency. The estate left him by his father, was, he says, "ample enough to allow me to decently defray all my expenses. I have followed no calling, and given no cause for a biography." If an heir to a fortune comes to be a useful and an efficient man, it will be in spite of the drawback of his inheritance, not because of it. If you are an heir-expectant, beware. If you expect nothing by inheritance be thankful. In either case your hope is in God, and in his blessing on what you are, and on what you do; not on what you have.—Selected.

For "The Friend."

Religious Items, &c.

Methodist Episcopal Appropriations, for the year 1883, amount to $777,849; of this sum the amount assigned to Foreign Missions is $362,379; to Missions in United States, not in Annual Conferences, to be administered as Foreign Missions (principally in the western Territories), $57,100; Domestic Missions, $248,370; miscellaneous expenses, $78,000, and liquidation of debts, $32,000.

Chinamen as Scholars.—Six hundred scholars are enrolled on the lists of the First-day schools for Chinamen in New York City. It is said that one of the principal inducements to them is the opportunity of learning the English language, but some of them become attached to the denominations whose schools they attend.

Alcoholism.—At the Sanitary Congress held at Geneva, Switzerland, it was stated that the consumption of alcohol per head was greatest in Denmark, and then followed in descending order, Russia, Sweden and Germany, Belgium, the United States of America, England, Austria and France. Coffee was declared to be the natural antidote to alcohol.

Alabama Baptists.—At a meeting of the Pine Grove Association, of Alabama Baptists, the breath of one of the brethren showed that he had been drinking whisky. He was excluded from the Association.

Free Italian Church.—Signor Catalano, Professor of Physical Science in the University at Rome, has left the Roman Catholic Society, and connected himself with the Free Italian Church.

For "The Friend."

Natural History, Science, &c.

Cast Iron and Steel.—R. S. Marsden, in the Proceedings of the Edinburgh Royal Society, advances the theory that carbon in iron and steel should be considered as simply dissolved in the iron, and not as chemically combined with it. He accounts for the hardness of steel and chilled cast iron, by supposing that in the process of making, the carbon is crystallized in diamond form, so that there is an innumerable quantity of excessively minute points of diamond disseminated over the whole surface of the hardened metal.

Strength of Limestone.—An investigation into the strength of the gray Oolitic limestone of Indiana, shows that a beam of one inch square of sawed stone, resting on points one inch apart, would bear 2,338 lbs. before it broke. A beam of the same stone dressed to the same size by hammering, breaks with a weight of 1,477 lbs., showing the great weakening caused by tool-dressing.

Mastodons in New Jersey.—Prof. Lockwood describes the discovery and uncovering of mastodon remains in a peat meadow in Freehold, N. J. It was inferred from conditions observed, that the mastodon died on the right bank of the stream which then existed; and since there lay over the many fragments of sticks that had been gnawed by beavers, it is concluded that the stream was afterwards dammed by beavers so that the pond they made covered the skeleton.

Strength of Spruce Wood.—From some experiments on the strength of beams of spruce wood, F. E. Kidder finds that loads which they will safely carry for a short time will ultimately cause their breakage if continued. He believes that a permanent load should not be more than one-fifth of the strength of the beam.

Medical Properties of Vegetables.—The sweet onion is very rich in those alkaline elements which counteract the poison of rheumatic gout. Lettuce has a slight cathartic action. Asparagus is a strong diuretic.—Medical Record.

Tree Burial in New Zealand.—The recent fall of an enormous tree in New Zealand showed that the hollow trunk from the ground to forty-five feet in height had been filled with human bodies. A confused heap of human skeletons burst out of the butt when the tree fell. Some are nearly perfect, and others mixed up in a chaotic mass of heads, hands, feet and arms indiscriminately. All the native inhabitants appear to have been ignorant of this natural burying-place, and declare it must have happened long ago before their time.

Trimming Seal-skins.—Curtis Lampson, President of the Hudson Bay Fur Company, and by birth a Vermonter, has invented a method of trimming the fur of seal-skins by the use of electricity. The skin is "fed" on a knife-edge bar, above which is stretched a fine platinum wire, which, raised to a white heat by an electric current, melts the hairs which rise above the under fur, and mows them down.

Impure Water and Typhoid Fever.—An outbreak of typhoid fever at Nahant a year ago led to an investigation of the causes by E. Bowditch, a sanitary engineer, whose report is published in the Boston Medical and Surgical Journal. The summer population of Nahant is about 1500, living in some hundred houses. During the summer between 70 and 80 cases of typhoid fever occurred. As impure drinking water is the usual means of its dissemination, the water from 190 wells and cisterns used by the residents of Nahant was analyzed. Of these 111 were found impure to be safe for use. In one case, a well was dug in a gravel or sandy soil through which percolation was easy, while on the same premises were four old cess pools and a leaky drain.

In the location of wells, convenience of access is often almost the only point regarded, and far too little attention is paid to the precautions which are necessary to preserve the water free from contamination by the organic matters constantly accumulating about dwellings and barn yards.

Rabbits in Australia.—In some parts of Victoria, the rabbits have increased to such an extent as to be very annoying to the stock-growers, consuming the pasture which the owners wish to reserve for their sheep and cattle.

large estate it is said that more than 1000 have been spent in destroying them, many owners pay $5000 a year to keep their numbers.

me have tried fencing in their lands with netting reaching one foot under ground in slanting direction. Shooting, hunting dogs, snaring and poisoning have all resorted to.

Jealousy.—J. G. Wood had a favorite cat resented so strongly the coming of a terrier, that when the dog came into the house, he walked out and never would enter again. So he retired to his own house in the garden and lived there alone. His affection for his master remained unchanged, but when the house was desecrated by a dog, and when hungry, he could not be allured into the door by the offer of food. Not that he had any personal objection to the dog; he contrary the two animals were very friendly with each other, even eating out of the same dish. But the cat considered that the dog had no right to their master, and when he came on the scene, the dog's ears would be boxed, and he driven to the back-yard. Wood says, "So absurdly strong is this jealous feeling, that whenever I called Pret [the cat] to come quickly, I used to call Bosca [the dog]; which ruse always had the effect of bringing Pret along at full speed, in order to anticipate the dog."

The following curious instance of jealousy in a dog, living at Canterbury, England, was related by its mistress.

One of our pet dogs, of a mixed breed, with long white hair, was, in common with other pets, of a very jealous disposition, always showing displeasure if any other living thing shared a share of that attention which he considered exclusively his own.

One wintry morning, a poor little infant-luck, that had been injured, was brought into the house to be nursed and tended. The duck watched all the attentions bestowed upon it, and was evidently annoyed at the intrusion.

After a few days the duck mysteriously disappeared. The dog was suspected, but neither dog nor duck could be found. Just at dark, a more minute search was made of the house and garden, and at last something was visible under a large rose-tree. The dog stood the culprit, shivering with cold, nose and paws all covered with mud, and his feet was a half-filled grave, in which he deposited the body of the murdered duck. His long hair had become entangled in the thorns of the rose-tree while he was employed in burying his victim, and fear of detection and reproof had caused him to remain in his captive for so many hours. His pitiful condition disarmed our censure, for he was only fixed that the gardener had to cut the rose-branch so that it might be more easily disentangled in the house. Before the gardener had not been a favorite with the dog, but ever afterwards it seemed to itself owing a debt of gratitude to its liberator.

have often thought, that Friends render themselves less useful in the neighborhoods where they reside, by neglecting small intimacies of love or duty towards their friends and neighbors, than they otherwise would be, if they were honest and faithful.—Selected.

THE FRIEND.

TWELFTH MONTH 16, 1882.

We have received by mail a copy of the Evening Item, published in Lynn, Mass., on 11th mo. 1st, which contains a printed circular that was issued a few days previous and distributed among Friends at their meeting-house in Lynn, on a First-day. The following is a copy:

"My Friends,—I wish to speak on a subject of vital importance, which concerns the welfare and life of our time-honored Society—that of the necessity of having in one sense of the word a regular pastor for our meeting.

I know that this is wholly antagonistic to the ideas of some of you, but to the younger portion of our Society, I think that my idea meets with their whole and hearty approbation. Who is there among you that does not delight in hearing the blessed portions of the Scriptures delineated upon in a scholarly and intellectual manner? Who is there that does not go away with better feelings after listening to a sermon filled with such deep pathos and meaning as the one we listened to on our last regular Sabbath meeting?

But to have all these advantages can we expect to call a man to preside over our Society, and ask him to live upon nothing; or, in other words, to accept his living from charity? Why not give him a regular salary, which will meet the demands of himself and family, and let him live as becomes a good and honorable man? The Friends' Society is fast waning into obscurity in Lynn, and will entirely lose itself in another generation, if some means are not used to resuscitate the interest which should be felt among the younger portion of our Society, who will soon be called upon to fill the positions of our older and beloved Friends, who, in the course of human events, will be summoned to that long-sought-for home of our Heavenly Father.

I will close by saying, let us think deeply upon this subject, which I have mentioned before, and let common sense and reason, which is given us by our Heavenly Father, to use and have, to work to our mutual advantage, and build up our Society, so that when we are called home we can leave to our posterity the old, and, as I have said before, time-honored religion of the Friends' Society in a good and healthy condition.

Lynn, October 12, 1882."

If the advice contained in this circular were followed, and, by hiring an able and educated preacher, a large congregation were gathered to listen to his "scholarly and intellectual" performances, it would still altogether fail of effecting the object proposed by the writer—of leaving "to posterity the old and time-honored religion of the Friends' Society in a good and healthy condition."

The proposition is utterly at variance with the views of our Society as to ministry and spiritual worship. It has ever regarded worship as an individual act to be performed by each soul to its Creator; and steadily impressed on its members the importance, when met for Divine worship, of every one seeking to draw nigh unto God in spirit, so as to receive from Him the ability to offer that homage of which He is everlastingly worthy. That ministry alone is helpful in the performance of this duty which springs from the operation of the Spirit of God on the heart of the preacher, and tends to draw the hearers to the same blessed Source of spiritual life and light.

Just so far as any come to depend on their own natural abilities, or on the learning and training which results from education, in the exercise of the ministry, so far will they lose the one essential requisite of a true gospel minister, whose preaching like that of the Apostle Paul, ever ought to be, "not with enticing words of man's wisdom, but in the demonstration of the Spirit and with power."

There is a strong tendency in the human mind to shrink from the humiliating operations of the Spirit of grace in the heart, and to weary of the patient waiting in earnest exercise of soul for the arising of spiritual life; and it is easy for the unwary to substitute therefor, a service of reading and singing and listening to the polished efforts of one who is hired to perform the duty of worship for them. Such may forget that the work of the soul's salvation must be wrought out between itself and its God, and that no man can do more than stir up the pure mind by way of remembrance, and encourage his fellow to enter for himself upon the working out of his salvation with fear and trembling before the Lord.

The people who would be drawn together to listen to a man because his delineations of Scripture were "scholarly and intellectual," would almost necessarily come to rest their faith "in the wisdom of man" and not in the "power of God;" because the moving power which drew them to listen would be the wisdom of man, and they would seek for instruction from this source, and not from the operation of the Divine Power on their own hearts. They would depart from the foundation-principles of our profession, and would cease to be Friends, whatever name they might be known by among men.

We sincerely hope, that whenever any body of people adopt the suggestions of the Lynn circular, they will honestly acknowledge that they have ceased to be members of our Society, and will adopt some other appellation, so that the real members of the Society of Friends may not be held responsible for principles and practices against which it has a living testimony to bear.

It is recorded of the early Christians that they were endowed with singleness of heart, and the Apostle Paul exhorts servants to obey their masters in singleness of heart. How fully does this advice apply to all the servants of the Lord! He, who knoweth the secret thoughts of all hearts, requires unreserved submission to his will; He demands of us a single heart, in which his honor and service shall be the ruling motive, and which cannot be swerved from steady perseverance in the path of duty by any secondary or inferior impulses.

To one who becomes established in this condition, the language is applicable, "neither heights nor depths, things present or to come, shall ever be able to separate from the love of God, which is in Christ Jesus, our Lord." How stimulating to the Christian is the example of those, who can truly say with their Blessed Master, "My meat and my drink is to do the will of Him who sent me, and to finish his work!"

We do not doubt that there are many who are pressing towards this mark of their high calling; and who count all earthly things as of small value, so that they may obtain a heavenly inheritance, a crown incorruptible and undefiled and that fadeth not away. Some of these may be little known among men, they may fill no conspicuous place in the world or in the church, their duties may be mostly in the home-circle or in the narrow limits of a restricted acquaintance, but yet their labors and their prayers may be blessed of Him who seeth in secret, and who will assuredly grant the prize of eternal life to all those who seek for glory, honor and immortality by patient continuance in well-doing.

SUMMARY OF EVENTS.

TRANSIT OF VENUS.—This interesting phenomenon was satisfactorily observed on the 6th inst., at the following named places: Chicago, St. Augustine, Florida, New Mexico, and Durban and Cape Town, South Africa. It was favorably observed, but with some flickerings and obstructions from clouds, in New York city, Harvard University, Boston; Princeton College, New Jersey; High School, Philadelphia; Haverford College, Penna., and Washington. The last contacts were satisfactorily observed at Bangor, Maine; Ottawa, Canada, and San Antonio, Texas. The preparations made for observation at Cincinnati and St. Louis in this country, and Madrid and London in Europe, were disappointed by cloudy weather.

UNITED STATES.—A number of resolutions have been introduced into both houses of Congress, among which was one by representative Caswell, of Wisconsin, on the 6th inst., which was adopted, authorizing the Committee on Appropriations to embody in the Post-office appropriation bill a clause reducing the letter postage to two cents.

On the 7th inst., Senator Beck called up his resolution for an inquiry into the political assessment business during the last political campaign. Senator Hale offered a substitute extending the inquiry to the doings of both parties, and instructing the Judiciary Committee to report such legislation as it may deem necessary to prevent future abuses of the kind.

The House Committee on Education and Labor has authorized its chairman, Representative Sherwin, to report favorably his bill appropriating $10,000,000 annually for the next five years to advance the public education. It is proposed that this sum shall be distributed among the several States and Territories by the Secretary of the Treasury, upon the ratio of illiteracy. The House Committee on Agriculture has completed the Agricultural Appropriation bill. It appropriates $414,780, which is $30,000 less than the appropriation of last year. The House Committee on Appropriations has also completed the Post-office Appropriation bill. The total amount appropriated is $43,948,520, or $695,380 less than for the fiscal year 1883. The amount for Star Routes is reduced $2,250,000.

The Commissioner of Pensions, in his annual report, says in relation to the "pension population" of the country that he has been unable to procure accurate data upon the subject. "The best approximation that can be made shows that of the 2,063,391 soldiers who enlisted during the war, pensions have been applied for by or on account of, only 26 per cent." He concludes by saying that, "from the best available information, it appears that there is a surviving soldier population of a little over 1,000,000, out of which claims for pensions in the future may be made by those who incurred pensionable disabilities."

It is reported from the Indian Territory that the authorities are trying to remove from the Creek and Seminole countries two thousand intruders, "who have settled and lived there a long time, and occasionally intermarried."

Red Cloud and an interpreter have been given permission to visit Washington, Red Cloud desiring to lay before the Secretary of the Interior his version of affairs at the Pine Ridge Agency, and to emphasize the charges preferred against Agent McGillycuddy."

The steamship Carmana sailed from New Orleans on the 7th inst. for Liverpool, with 10,361 bales of cotton, 12,000 bushels of wheat, and 2650 staves. The cotton is the largest cargo ever carried in one vessel. The total weight of the cargo is 5,840,000 pounds, and its value $642,000.

Last week the Potomac river was "frozen over solidly" from the foot of Ananston Island to the Little Falls—"a spectacle unprecedented within the memory of the oldest river men."

The temperature in Manitoba, Dakota and Minnesota, during the cold wave of Fifth-day, the 7th inst., ranged from 10 to 37 degrees below zero. Throughout the Canadian Province of Ontario, the temperature ranged from zero to 10 below. The cold wave extended southward to the Gulf States, temperatures below freezing being reported in them at various points.

Shawnee College, near Bedford, Indiana, was burned on the night of the 4th inst., with a museum of Indian curiosities, valued at $10,000. The fire is ascribed to incendiarism.

The Valley of the Yosemite is public property, and the question of prohibiting the sale of liquor therein is agitated in California.

The State debt of Pennsylvania was reduced $915,104 during the fiscal year ended 11th mo. 30th, and its total on that date was $20,225,083. The State Board of Agriculture make the following estimate of the crops of Pennsylvania for 1882: Wheat, 22,425,000 bushels; corn, 39,875,000 bushels; oats, 31,580,000 bushels; rye, 5,805,000 bushels; potatoes, 13,760,000 bushels; tobacco, 28,750,000 pounds.

Two capitalists of Wisconsin have bought 6000 acres of land in Lanzlade county, in that State, for $210,000. It is said that the tract contains about 700,000,000 feet of the best pine timber in the State.

There were 405 deaths in this city last week, an increase of 29 over the previous week, and 49 more than during the same period last year. Of the whole number, 211 were males and 194 females; 55 died of consumption; 46 of pneumonia; 41 of diphtheria; 16 of croup; 13 of paralysis; 12 of marasmus; 12 of typhoid fever, and 9 of scarlet fever.

Markets, &c.—U. S. 3's, 103; 3½'s, 102½; 4½'s, 113½; 4's, registered, 119½; coupon, 120½; currency 6's, 130.

Cotton.—There were no essential change to notice in price or demand. Sales of middlings are reported at 10½ a 11 cts. per lb. for uplands and New Orleans.

Petroleum.—Standard white, 7½ cts. for export, and 8½ cts. per gallon for home use.

Flour.—Flour continues quiet, but prices were about the same as last quoted. Sales of 2700 barrels, including Minnesota extras, clear, at $5.75; small lots do. do. straight, at $6.25; Pennsylvania extra family low grades, at $4.50; do. do. choice, at $4.75; Ohio do. do., at $5.50 a $5.65; do. do. do. new process, at $6.25; Southern Illinois do. do. at $5.50; Wisconsin winter family at $5.50; Ohio patent at $6.40 a $6.75; Minnesota do. at $7.12½ a $7.50, and 650 barrels City Mills on secret terms. Western Pennsylvania super, at $3 a $3.37½; do. do. extras at $3.50 a $4; Pennsylvania extra family at $4.50 a $4.75; Ohio do. do. $5.25 a $5.75; Indiana do. do. at $5.25 a $5.75; St. Louis and Southern Illinois do. do. at $5.37½ a $5.75; Minnesota bakers' clear, at $5.50 a $6; do. do. straight at $6.25 a $6.50; patents, winter wheat, at $6.25 a $7; do. do. spring, at $7 a $7.50. Rye flour sells at $4 a $4.25 per barrel. Feed.—Winter bran sells at $17, a $17.50, and spring at $16.50 per ton.

Grain.—Wheat was a fraction higher. Sales of 3100 bushels red and amber at $1.05 a $1.11; 3100 do. track, at $1.08½; 2200 bushels No. 2 red, in elevator, at $1.08½; 1900 bushels rejected at $1.02 a $1.03, and 2 red wheat at $1.03½ a $1.09. Corn was unsettled. Sales of 8900 bushels sail yellow, in grain depot, at $2 a $4 cts.; sail mixed, at $2 a $3 cts.; steamer, at $0 a $1 cts., and new at $8 a 72 cts., as to condition; and 60,000 bushels sail mixed at 68½ a 69 cts. Oats were higher: about 9000 bushels sold in lots at 48 a 50 cts. for No. 2 white, and 44 a 47 cts. per bushel for rejected and mixed, and 20,000 bushels No. 2 white at 48½ a 49½ cts.

Hay and Straw Market, for week ending 12th mo. 9th, 1882.—Loads of hay, 353; loads of straw, 82. Average price during the week—Prime timothy, $1 to $1.10 per 100 pounds; mixed, 95 cts. to $1.05 per 100 pounds; straw, 70 to 80 cts. per 100 pounds.

Beef cattle were in demand and a fraction higher: 3000 head arrived and sold at the different yards at 3½ a 6½ cts. per lb., the latter rate for extra.

Sheep were in fair demand and closed firm: 11,000 head sold at the different yards, at 3 a 5½ cts., and lambs at 4 a 6½ cts. per pound, as to condition.

Hogs were rather lower: 5500 head sold at the different yards at 8½ a 10 cts. per lb., as to quality.

FOREIGN.—Telegrams from various parts of the United Kingdom on the 7th inst., report a snow storm of unusual severity. Traffic on the railways in many districts has been almost suspended. A train was snowed up all night in Cheshire, and the passengers, numbering twelve, suffered acutely. Telegraphic communication between London and Glasgow is totally interrupted. Elsewhere messages are greatly delayed. Many wrecks around the coast are reported. At Oldham and neighboring parts of Lancashire county, the storm has not been equalled in thirty years. Heavy loss has been caused in many places.

A fire broke out on the night of the 7th inst. in the premises of Foster, Porter & Co., wholesale hosiers, on Wood street. It was the greatest that has occurred in that city (London) since the celebrated Tooley street fire. The loss is estimated at £3,000,000 ($15,000,000). The whole block between London Wall, Philip lane, Addle street and Wood street, except the warehouse on the corners of London Wall, has been destroyed. It is believed that eight persons were injured, some of them seriously. Foster, Porter & Co., it is stated, a stock of silk goods alone estimated to be worth £600,000.

Earl Spencer, Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, has commuted the sentence of death passed upon the five who pleaded guilty to participation in the murder of the Joyce family at Miamtrasna. The Dublin Gazette, a return shows the number of agrarian outrages in Ireland during 11th month was eighty-nine. The number contrasts favorably with previous lists.

The Duke of Argyll has now stocked all his w with wild turkeys.

The Republique Francaise (Gambetta's organ), says the Government of Great Britain continues to pursue its egotistical policy in Egypt to the detriment of French interests, France will protect those interests in a way she may think best.

Paris, 12th mo. 8th.—The water has reached heart of the city. The drains in the low-lying quarters are unable to find an outlet, and the water has risen a level with the roads. In the Rue de l'Universite water is a foot deep in some places. The cellars of Foreign Office building are flooded. The Notre D quarter is swarming with rats, driven out from sewers, and the people are suffering from their deductions.

Paris, 12th mo. 10th.—The Senate has unanimously passed a vote of credit for 1,000,000 francs for the relief of the sufferers by floods in the Seine district, which now subsiding.

The loss by the floods in the Rhenish districts amount to millions of marks. The damage to the town of Duisburg alone amounts to a million marks. Houses near Mayence were ruined and swept away.

The Chambers of Commerce of all the seaports of Germany have protested against the exclusion of American pork. The Government, however, will persevere in their determination to prohibit its importation.

The Novoe Vremya, of St. Petersburg, says the Pro has ordered the police to expel all Jews residing within the municipal boundaries of St. Petersburg without official permission. The Golos says the Senate has decided that Jews are incapable of holding landed property in Russia.

A despatch from Paris to the London Daily Telegraph says: Telegrams from Saigon report that 10,000 Chinese have crossed the Tonquin frontier.

Mahmond Sami, Abdel Pasha, Ali Fehmy Tenba Pasha were arraigned on the morning of the 1st inst., and pleaded guilty to a charge of rebellion. Prisoners were sentenced to death, but their sentence were commuted to exile for life by the Khedive.

Alexandria, 12th mo. 10th.—A peaceful demonstration of several thousand of the poorest members of foreign colony here was made to-day before the Colonates of the Great Powers, to protest against delay in the payment of indemnity for losses sustained during the bombardment of Alexandria. Nearly all the consuls promised to send telegrams to their respective governments, presenting the demands of the people. The French agent warmly sympathized with the applicants. He expressed apprehension that long delay in the payment of the indemnity would cause serious demonstrations among the lower classes.

The Lima Diario Oficial publishes a telegram from General Pierola, announcing his inability to accept unreasonable proposals of Chili, and stating that he deferred his return to Peru until more favorable conditions present themselves.

Owing to the construction of the Mexican National Railway, the trade between Mexico and the United States and Europe, via Monterey, Corpus Christi and Liverpool, has quadrupled in the last three months.

FRIENDS' LIBRARY.

A recent examination of Friends' Library shows a number of volumes are missing from their place on the shelves. Some of them have no doubt been years ago, and cannot be recovered. Others may have been mislaid or forgotten by those who have borrowed them. The committee having charge of the Library respectfully request all who find any of the books included, in their houses, to return them before the day of the coming year.

DIED, 11th month 20th, 1882, at the residence Aquilla Hillman, near Haddonfield, N. J., MAR B. STOKES, aged nearly 83 years, a member of the Haddonfield Particular and Monthly Meeting of Friends.

THE FRIEND.

A RELIGIOUS AND LITERARY JOURNAL.

OL. LVI.

SEVENTH-DAY, TWELFTH MONTH 23, 1882.

NO 20.

PUBLISHED WEEKLY.

if paid in advance, $2.00 per annum; if not paid in advance $2.50; 10 cents extra is charged for Postage on those sent by mail.

Articles designed for insertion to be addressed to
JOSEPH WALTON,
MOORESTOWN, BURLINGTON CO., N. J.

Options, payments and business communications, received by
JOHN S. STOKES,
NO. 116 NORTH FOURTH STREET, UP STAIRS,
PHILADELPHIA.

For "The Friend."

"He Leadeth Me."

It was but a stray slip of paper and on it were words, "He leadeth me." It did seem strange that they had never so impressed me before. I thought I had believed them all my life—thought I had especially believed them the last five and-a-half years of my life; sitting there in the stillness of that upper room, in the soft, warm spring-time, sitting there, busy with inward communings, they came to me with all the freshness of words spoken; and while they brought balm, I saw in them a depth of meaning never realized before. Trials sore and many were mine, and sometimes the words of "The Ungodly Cross" had well nigh been my own:

It was a time of sadness; and my heart,
Although it knew and loved the better part,
Felt weary with the conflict and the strife,
And all the needful discipline of life."

But now, as my eye fell on these words, a soft, gentle peace stole into my heart. The bitterness was gone, and I was at rest. Every part of my being seemed met just then in my realization of the purport of those three words. It seemed such a chance breeze that had lifted the little torn scrap of paper on which were the words, down from where it had lodged in the slats of the half-open shutter, and dropped it in my lap. I was not thinking just then, "He rideth on the wings of the wind;" but surely the breeze was the chariot that brought his message to me on that occasion. As I read the words I grasped the bit of paper which had been the instrument of bringing to me fresh comfort and hope, and as they resounded through my being, every thing about me seemed to take up the refrain and echo back the words, "He leadeth me." I looked out at the window before me, and across through the one opposite. On either hand rose the mountains, clothed in soft, spring verdure, and they were to me types of God's sheltering, protecting love. I recalled that, "As the mountains are round about Jerusalem, so the Lord is round about his people from henceforth, even for evermore." And of this Lord the sweet singer of Israel in the 23rd Psalm had said, "He leadeth me;" while to all who were willing to follow the same tender Shepherd might come the same precious assurance, "He leadeth me." On my ear fell the sound of the running water in the brook near by, and I thought of the "streams that break out in the desert," and the fountains in a "dry and thirsty land where no water is," and the streamlet seemed to echo, "He leadeth me." And as it wound its way along, most surely to reach the ocean in the end, what more fitting type of the devotions path through which, in the providence of God, most of us are led ere we reach the broad, deep ocean of Infinite love, there to be lost in its bosom? Across the stream came the bleating of a tender, helpless little lamb, and I thought of "the sheep of his pasture," and his promise that He would "carry the lambs in his arms." And I remembered how He shielded them from snares and the enemy, and led them into the abundance of his fold; how He was a "covert from the storm," a "hiding place from the wind," a "rock of defence," a "fountain of living water;" and in the shadow of this great Rock all, who would, might rest from the heat and strife of the world; and at this Fountain all who chose might drink and be refreshed; and down the ages came echoing the words of the beautiful Psalm, "The Lord is my shepherd, I shall not want. He maketh me to lie down in green pastures, He leadeth me beside the still waters, He restoreth my soul."

Several years have slipped away into the past since that day, but its lesson has remained. And now, many miles away from the scenes where it was learned, and again sitting alone in the quiet of an upper room, it has all come back to me with a freshness; and the hope, that perhaps I might help others more fully to realize the rich freight of meaning in the words, has induced me to pen this incident from my own experience. Surely the chief reason why we do not in life and soul more fully realize this leading, is that we do not put ourselves in the way of being led. We are so busy mapping out plans of our own, and seeking our own paths, that we forget to let our Shepherd lead us. Alas, that we so often wander away into barren places where no water is!

One cannot be led, only so far as his will is surrendered. To be urged on against his will is to be forced, not led. There is a sense in which we can truly say as we look back over a path blindly followed, "the Lord was leading me on to this or that end," or to "bring about this or that result in my life;" for surely "He bringeth the blind by a way they know not;" but the blind, even, must be willing to be led, and He who leads will surely anoint their eyes with the eye-salve of truth, and bring them out into a large place, and cause the Sun of Righteousness to illumine their dark souls so that, with the inner eye, they behold the Day-Spring from on high. And then as they behold the broad pastures of his bounty, the rich plains of his love, and drink at the deep fountain of still waters, with hearts made glad by his presence, they may say, "He leadeth me." And O, the companionship of such a tender Shepherd!

First of all, then, to put ourselves in the way of being led, we must make a full, complete and final surrender of our will—must "leave all" and follow Him. Having done this, we must then see that the habits of the old life do not lap over into the new, and cause us again to fall into ways of our own devising. We have such a proneness within us to "run before we are sent," that, in consequence of this eagerness, we are apt to find ourselves involved in perplexity or trial, and when these come we begin to wonder how we are to know which way the Lord would lead us on, if, indeed, He is leading us at all. In his tenderness, He is sure to help us when we cry to him, (for He hears the faintest wail of weakest lamb, even though it may have wandered, and He runs to its relief, bearing it back on his shoulder rejoicing), but how much better to have had Him so direct our steps that the perplexity need not have occurred. Surely busy self is our worst enemy, and the greatest hindrance to our spiritual progress. And what a hydra-headed creature it is! putting out so frequently and in such various ways, a fresh appearance of life, when we had thought it slain.

To be led implies constant companionship, and not an occasional or even frequent asking of the Lord to show us his will. To have constant companionship we must have an abiding presence, and this is promised in the indwelling of the Holy Spirit, which, we are assured, will guide us into all truth, bringing all things to our remembrance. To put ourselves in the way of being led, then, we must so surrender our wills and so be emptied of self as that the Holy Spirit may come in and abide in us, to be our Guide and Comforter. Then will our eyes be opened to see the right, our hearts inclined to do the right, and then will wisdom and strength be given to perform what we see and desire to do. This is the leading of our Shepherd, and it is a rich pasture into which, by this leading, we are brought—a place where we are assured we "shall not want."

A. L. WASHBURN.

Philada., 12th mo. 10th, 1882.

For "The Friend."

Westtown Boarding School.

From the report of 1854 we learn, "That the building heretofore used as a milk-house being in a dilapidated condition, and the spring from which the water was conveyed having failed to give a sufficient supply, and the water not being cold enough to answer the intended purpose, it has been deemed necessary to erect a new building over it"—with accommodations on the second floor for a family to have charge of the dairy.

"The new barn was put up in time to admit of storing last year's crop of grain and hay; and its ample size and convenient arrangements greatly facilitate the operations of the farmer. The cost of the improvements, including the removal of the grain-house to the north-west side of the barn-yard and fitting it up, taking down the old barn, cleaning up and levelling the ground, &c., is $3953.58, which, added to the cost of the farm-house and improvements around it, makes a total of $12,428.56, all of which, excepting $217, has been paid by the voluntary subscriptions of Friends."

"A large portion of the corn crop was cut off by a severe storm of hail during the summer, and considerable increased expenditure has been incurred in consequence, as well as for the removal of fences, draining the meadow and for manures, which will absorb much of the apparent profit; yet it is believed that the advantages derived from these expenditures will more than compensate for the outlay."

"At the close of nearly every session, it is necessary to make some repairs to the building, often requiring considerable time to complete them; and the present period of vacation is found to be too short for the purpose, and for the necessary cleaning of the house. The Superintendent and Matron are generally so closely confined during this period, as to have little or no time for relaxation from their arduous charge, and it is believed that while a longer time of recreation would benefit the health of the teachers and other caretakers, it would also be of advantage to the pupils, giving them more time to be with their parents and families, especially such as reside at a considerable distance, and for preparing the necessary clothing for the succeeding session, &c.; it is therefore agreed to propose for the approval of the Yearly Meeting, that the vacations shall be extended to four weeks each, to commence at the close of the ensuing summer session."

At a meeting of the committee held 10th mo. 6th, the following extract from the will of Margaret Sheppard was produced: "To my executors in trust for the committee having charge of Westtown Boarding School, $2000, to be paid to the treasurer for the time being for the use of that institution."

Signed, BENJ. H. WARDER,
Acting Executor.

Information was given that the residue of Henry Pemberton's estate, received by the treasurer, amounted to $11,039.

4th mo. 6th, 1855. "The treasurer informs that he has received $3752.38, being the proceeds of a legacy of $4000 bequeathed by our late friend Ann E. Jenks." This legacy was directed to be paid to the treasurer for the time being of the Yearly Meeting's Committee appointed to the charge and oversight of Friends' Boarding School at Westtown, "for the benefit of that institution in such way as the committee having charge thereof for the time being may deem expedient to appoint."

6th mo. 6th, 1855. The following minute was adopted: "The annual wear and tear of the school buildings for more than half a century, as well as the decay of other portions of the property being such, as at an early period to render extensive repairs indispensable, and the necessary funds for effecting such repairs having been offered by some friends of the Institution, they were accepted, and the following Friends were appointed, in conjunction with our Superintendent, to have the repairs effected in a substantial and suitable manner, viz: Jos. Scattergood, Henry Cope, Thos. Evans, and others."

The report made to the Yearly Meeting in 1855, states that "upon examining the barn* near the school buildings, it was found to require a new roof and other repairs, the expense of which, with the cost of a new wagon-house, which is needed, was estimated to be a considerable part of the amount that would be required to build a new barn in a more convenient location, and on a plan which would serve both purposes. The funds for building such an one having also been offered, it was concluded to authorize its erection."

"Since the last report new cases with glazed doors have been put up in the room adjoining the office for the accommodation of the library; which has been enlarged by the addition of about one thousand volumes, some of which are valuable books of reference. Many of the old books have been rebound, and the whole collection has been newly arranged, and a catalogue prepared and printed. The cost of the new books, fitting up the room, and printing the catalogue, amounting to $1268.62, has been defrayed by voluntary contributions for the purpose."

"For the last two years about as many pupils have participated in the advantages afforded by this seminary as could comfortably be accommodated; and at times during that period there were more applicants than could be admitted.

"This evidence of the confidence of Friends in the school has been gratifying and encouraging to the committee.

"They hope it will continue to receive the support of our members generally, believing that as there is a united concern on the part of those who have charge of it, to conduct it in the fear of the Lord and in conformity to our religious principles and testimonies, it will continue to promote the moral and religious, as well as literary improvement of many of the rising generation."

The interest manifested by many Friends towards Westtown in leaving legacies to it, is encouraging and commendable; lest however the enumeration of them should give the impression, that a large and accumulating sum of money was at the disposal of the committee, it may not be out of place to allude to the fact, that many of the legacies were for specified objects. It is well also to bear in mind, that every child educated there receives directly his or her share of the benefit of the income arising from these funds. From the report made in 1881, we learn "that the average cost per pupil for the year was $202.25," being $72.25 more than was charged. It is believed that the institution is conducted with as much economy as can well be observed.

It is a great satisfaction to be able to furnish members of the Society with so thorough an education, surrounded as they are by so many physical comforts at so low a price, which could not be done were there no endowment funds to support it. Were these funds increased, it would be very pleasant to reduce still more the amount charged per annum for board and tuition.

Home love is a prize so costly it should not be neglected.

* The old barn stood a short distance south or south-east of the present green-house; had the eastern end plastered smooth on the outside, against which hand-ball was played: an exercise now generally superseded by base ball, &c.

From "Our Ancesto

Some Old Papers.

Contributed by R. A. Brock, Secretary of the Historical Society of Virginia.

"PHILAD'A, y^e 14th 3^d mon., 1769

Loving Friend, Robert Pleasants:

I herewith send thee some Pamphlets y^e Negro Trade, lately published here. heartily wish those amongst you who concerned with this suffering People may prevailed upon to read them with seriousness if for adventure they may see their Day and apply to the Common Father for instruction how to act therein. I shall be glad to know thy Sentiments upon the Content y^e Pamphlets, and if thou thinks y^e send thee more would be of any service amongst you; as we are about reprinting it with addition, having met with some strong corroborating Testimony from some Person Note, viz: Foster, Hutchison & Co. V affectionate love and hopes to see thee amongst us, I remain thy friend,

ANTHONY BENEZE

[FOLIO:—SUPERSCRIBED "FOR | ROBERT PLEASANTS, | MERCH'T. IN VA."]

"To the Governor and Counsel of Virginia The Memorial of Robert Pleasants, Shewith,

That your memorialist from a full persuasion that all mankind are by nature just entitled to freedom, a desire of rewarding fullness, and of doing to others as he would be done by, did about year 1777, place diverse of his Negroes lands of his own, at a small distance from habitation. And for their encouragement in industry, and to remove every inducement to theft and dishonesty supported them for term of one year, and allowed them the benefit of their labour. This he hoped; believed was not inconsistent with the letter or spirit, and intention of any law then in force, and he was confirmed in that belief by the opinion of Patrick Henry, Esq., then Governor, (who he consulted on the occasion as well as the attorney who acted for him) State in the County of Henrico, on the 1st of the presentment now complained of. With concern he observes, after a war of several years, and the expense of much blood and treasure, for the ostensible purpose of establishing the Civil and Religious Rights of America, he finds prejudices are going forward among many people against Negroes being any wise relieved from a state of absolute slavery; by means whereof as he supposes, was presented by the Grand Jury, for suffering, as they say, his negroes to go at large, and moreover has been fined the sum of ten pounds on an Act past November 7th, 1769, manifestly made to prevent owners of Negroes suffering them to go at large on stipulated wages and to prevent thefts incident to such contracts, which he declares (common as it has been done by others with impunity) he never did do. And he conceives that so far from the encouragement given his negroes, as aforesaid, having had any such tendency, they have conducted in an orderly inoffensive manner. And instead of going at large, as has been suggested, they have all settled habitations, and under his own care and notice Nor hath one single complaint been made him of dishonest or impertinent conduct either of them since they have been so sett although several evil disposed people (mere prejudice he believes) have at different times in an unlawful manner, beat them without cause, and killed and destroyed their persons and other property. It cannot reasonably be supposed he could have any other motive in his conduct towards his Negroes, than an approbation of duty and a desire of doing justly; because it was giving up what the law had made his property. And seeing the sword of the Magistrate is intended for punishment of evil doers, and the friend those who do well, he wishes to continue, and hath always carefully done, to avoid being under the denomination of an Evil-doer. And as he conceives a voluntary payment of the said fine, would be a tacit acknowledgment of Evil, he cannot comply with it, yet thinks it his duty, (as he hath on similar occasions heretofore done) patiently to submit to the penalty of laws, he could not from motives of conscience actively comply with; at the same time considering the said fine to be awarded against him from prejudice, or a mistaken intention of the law, he hopes and trusts your protection from unreasonable claims, and that you will take the matter into consideration, and appoint such relief as you may appear just and reasonable, which is the desire of one who wishes the welfare and happiness of all mankind."

ROBERT PLEASANTS.

Robert Pleasants was the great-grandson of John Pleasants, who emigrated from England in 1665, and settled in Henrico County, Virginia. There have been many prominent representatives of this family in the annals of the State.

Robert Pleasants was a man of indomitable energy and vigorous intellect. He engaged in planting as well as mercantile pursuits, acquired considerable wealth in land and slaves. He owned and resided upon the "Pleasant" Plantation, memorable as having been long possessed by the distinguished Randolph family. He was a public spirited citizen as well as philanthropist, and entered heartily into all possible schemes of agricultural progress and of manufacture. In behalf of the emancipation of the African race he corresponded with the early advocates of the measure in this country and in Europe. The highest esteem existed between him and the eminent philanthropists of Pennsylvania, Anthony Benezet, James Pemberton, John Barlow and others.

EMANCIPATION OF A SLAVE IN VIRGINIA, BY A MEMBER OF THE SOCIETY OF FRIENDS, IN 1780.

I, George Bell, of Louisa County, Virginia, after mature deliberate consideration and the reflections of my own mind, being fully persuaded that freedom is the Natural Right of mankind and that no Law, Moral or Divine, has given me a right to or property in the Person of my fellow creatures and being anxious to fulfil the injunction of our Lord Saviour, Jesus Christ, by doing to others what would be done by, DO therefore Declare Having under my Care a Negro woman named Agg, I do for my Self, my Heirs, Executors, Adms. and Assigns, Hereby Release the said Agg, all my Rights, Titles or Claims, or pretention of Claim whatsoever to or to any Estate she may Acquire from Date of these presents. In witness whereof, I have hereunto set my Hand and Seal this Eleventh Day of the Fifth Month, One Thousand Seven Hundred and Eighty.

"GEORGE BELL." [SEAL.]
"Sign'd, Sealed & Deliver'd in the presence of
Wm. Davis,
Micajah Davis."

[George Bell owned quite a number of slaves all of whom he severally emancipated. His descendants have intermarried with some of the most worthy families in our midst—among which may be mentioned the following: Lamb, Austin, Sydnor, Starke, Watt, Oliver, Pleasants, Shelton, Crew.]

Religious Views and Tenets.

For "The Friend."

"As many as are led by the Spirit of God, they are the sons of God." But the Spirit of God may lead his obedient servants into diversified fields of labor. And He may, in gathering different churches together, permit them to work in his cause, under different shades of light and belief. But if they are led by his Spirit, He will prosper their work. As their faith is, so He will suffer it to be unto them; provided they are all led by the same Spirit. If the manner of work should differ in some unimportant points from that in which our faith has led us, let us remember that the tree of life bears twelve manner of fruits. And if each separate kind of fruit should seem to be palatable to the taste, and refreshing or strengthening to the nerve of some weary Christian traveller, we need not try to imitate it, but submissively say, the Lord's will be done. But "let every man abide in the same calling wherein he was called." And not think that because a certain kind of work seems to be blest under the leadership of other churches, that we must forsake the more high and spiritual calling of Him who has called us out of darkness into the marvellous light of the gospel day, and follow their ways. But let us patiently dwell under our own vine and fig-tree, and prayerfully hope that the leaves of the tree of life may ultimately spread over all, and tend to the healing of the nations. For God has promised that he would pour out of his Spirit upon all flesh; and that sons and daughters should prophesy from that spirit, and not from the spirit of man; that no flesh should glory in his presence. "For no man knoweth the things of man except by the spirit of man that is in him. Even so the things of God knoweth no man but by the Spirit of God. And the Spirit searcheth all things, yea, the deep things of God. The Scriptures teach us that the eternal Word of God, for the restoration of man from the fall, was made flesh and dwelt among men. And though He were a Son of God, yet He through the flesh "learnt obedience by the things which he suffered; and being made perfect, He became the author of eternal salvation unto all that obey Him." So our salvation seems to depend on our obedience to the inspeaking Word, which is nigh to all that receive Him. While He was outwardly among men, He spake outwardly to men. But it was "expedient" that He should not remain outwardly on earth, but that He should go to the Father, and as He promised, come in spirit and guide his disciples into all truth. So now such as are inwardly led by the Spirit of God, they are the sons of God. He comes to his own now, spiritually, as He did outwardly in the days of his flesh, and to as many as thus receive Him, to them He gives power to become his sons. But we have to use the power which he gives us, and believe in it, and be led by it, in the new and living way, until that new birth is brought forth, which is "not of blood, nor of the will of the flesh, nor of the will of man, but of God." And to bring about this new birth—this change from a state of nature to a state of grace, the Lord has promised that He would "pour out of his Spirit upon all flesh." So if the word all means what it says, then no one is left out, of any nation, kindred, tongue or people, that has not had a saving portion of God's grace or Holy Spirit poured out upon him at some time of life, to profit by, if he would accept it, and be led by it. For a "manifestation of the Spirit is given to every man to profit withal." "And upon whom doth not his light shine?" Christ the light of the world was given after the divine light and life was lost in the fall, to enlighten even the Gentiles; and designed to be "God's salvation unto the uttermost parts of the earth;" to open the eyes of all; as we are all spiritually blind by nature, "and to turn them from darkness to light, and from the power of Satan unto God; that they might receive forgiveness of sins, and have an inheritance among them which are sanctified, through faith that is in Him." But in order for this great change, we may have to go down again and again as to the very bottom of Jordan, the river of God's judgment, that we may be cleansed from every defilement, and be prepared to join the general assembly and church of the first-born, who have come up out of great tribulations, and washed their robes in the blood of the Lamb of God, which taketh away the sin of the world out of every heart that abides the day of coming as a purifier. If the tendering love of Him who dwelt in that bush which was not consumed, is present with us, as we pass through the deeps, and through the fiery baptisms of this probationary world, it richly compensates for all. Where our Redeemer reigns, self is laid low. We must be emptied of self before we are filled with the Spirit. We must not only sit at His feet in humility, and learn of Him in silence; but after learning, obey. It is the willing and the obedient that eat the good of the heavenly land. We must have the holy qualifying Spirit resting on us, enduing us with power from on high, before we can go forth in his service, and convert sinners unto God. And unless we have this endowment, and the heavenly anointing ourselves, our labor and our preaching will be in vain. We may exalt self by our efforts; but not the cause of Him who is meek and lowly in heart.

We may have a melody of the heart as well as a melody of words. The one is deep and heavenly; the other superficial, emotional and earthly.

Though the singing of the present day may appear to be largely mixed with that which is devotional; yet if it is not from the Spirit, and with the understanding that the Spirit gives, it cannot reach higher than the house in which it is uttered, because a stream cannot rise higher than its fountain. All utterances in the way of worship should be under the promptings of the Holy Spirit. Then, as they emanate from the Spirit of Christ, they would have a tendency to lead the hearers to Him. And as these keep low and learn of Him, great will be their peace. My heart's desire and prayer to God is, that now, even in old age, I may be preserved so near the fountain of life, as to bring forth if but only a little fruit to the glory of Him who has called me out of the darkness which so hangs over us, into his marvellous light. But I remember that the most fruitful branches have to bow the most towards the root of the tree from whence they receive their support. And now, as my mortal body, may have to bow under the weight of years, more than it yet has done, I humbly crave that if my merciful Preserver should see that the inner man needs to be more purged in order that it may bring forth more than it has yet done, I may submissively say, "thy will, O Lord! and not mine be done;" and that I may more spiritually bow towards the root of the tree of life, from which alone the spiritual man receives all of his spiritual support—even that tree whose leaves are for the healing of the nations. For thus saith the Lord; "To this man will I look, even to him that is poor, and of a contrite spirit, and that trembleth at my word." D. H.

Dublin, Ind., 12th mo. 11th, 1882.

For "The Friend."

I have read with pleasure articles in "The Friend," warning against unprofitable reading. While it is right to bear a testimony against such waste of our precious time, are we endeavoring by every means in our power to circulate good reading. I have often desired that Friends who have been blessed with plenty of this world's goods, might be inclined to more largely circulate "The Friend." It is a paper that almost any one will read—many not members with us enjoy its pages. I have felt it right to pen these few lines, hoping that by them some one might be induced to weigh the matter and see if their Father has not some work of this kind for them.

New York State, 12th mo. 13th, 1882.

A singular treatment of the ruins of Babylon, and one which might readily be overlooked in its bearing upon the predictions of Scripture in minute detail respecting this city, has not escaped the observation of H. Rassam, a thorough explorer of the site.

"There is one fact connected with the destruction of Babylon and the marvellous fulfilment of prophecy which struck me more than anything else, which fact seems never to have been noticed by any traveller, and that is the non-existence in the several modern buildings in the neighborhood of Babylon of any signs of stone which had been dug up from its ancient ruins, because it seems that, in digging for old materials, the Arabs used the bricks for building purposes, but always burnt the stone thus discovered for lime, which fact wonderfully fulfils the divine words of Jeremiah—namely: "And they shall not take of thee a stone for a corner, nor a stone for a foundation; but thou shalt be desolate forever, saith the Lord." (Jeremiah, li. 26.)—Independent.

To experience the change from nature unto grace, is more to be desired than kingdoms; and is worth enduring conflicts and distresses, to know realized in ourselves; and, if so might be, to prepare us, to strengthen, help and encourage other burdened souls.—M. Capper.

MIRAGE.

BY SUSAN COOLIDGE.

[The words of hope and cheer contained in the last stanza of this beautiful poem are applicable to those who have a well-grounded hope that, through the mercy of God in Christ Jesus, their sins have been forgiven and they prepared for admittance into that kingdom where nothing that is impure can ever enter. To these, death, the "hovering shape which" "stains and blots the sunniest skies," need bring no terror. But there is no solid ground for comfort and hope for those who will not repent of their sins, or submit themselves to be governed and guided by the Divine will.—Ed.]

Beyond the plain sirocco-fanned,
The heat and hush of desert sand,
A belt of feathery palms arise,
Traced like a vision on the skies.
Cool waters ripple at their feet,
O dream divine, be real as sweet!
We near, the mocking shadows flee;
But could we mount as eagles do,
High and yet higher, we should see Where far, far off the real palms be—
Behind the false there hides the true.

Beyond the fog-wraths curling gray
Lies the bright stretch of clear noonday.
These seas are blue and glad, and hands
Of white waves leap on yellow sands,
The merry fisher trims his sail
With never thought of cloud or gale:
We sadly sit—but could we rise
Above these vapors hovering dun,
Which are of joy the thin disguise,
We too should laugh 'neath laughing skies—
Behind the shadow hides the sun.

Ah, coward heart! be not so blind,
Be not so shaken valiant mind,
As the grim shadow all men fear
Draws nearer with each urging year,
A hovering shape which flits and flies,
And stains and blots the sunniest skies.
Did we but dare to rise above
As angels do, emparadised,
Our eyes should see the cloud remove;
Behind the dread, the Eternal Love;
Behind the death, the welcoming Christ!
—S. S. Times.

Selected.

ANISE AND CUMMIN.

BY MARGARET J. PRESTON.

Wearily with homely duties done,
Tired through treading day by day
Over and over from sun to sun,
One and the same small round alway,
Under her breath I heard her say:

"Oh! for the sweep of the keen-edged scythe,
Oh! for the swaths, when the reaping's o'er Proof of the toil's success. I tithe Anise and cummin—such petty store!
Cummin and anise—nothing more!

"Only a meagre garden-space,
Out of the world so rich and broad—
Only a strip of standing-place!
Only a patch of herb-strown sod
Given, in which to work for God!

"Yet is my hand as full of care
Under the shine and frost and rain,
Tending and weeding and watching there,
Even as though I deemed a wain
Were to be piled with sheaves of grain.

"Then when the work is done, what cheer
Have I to greet me, great or small?
What that shall show how year by year,
Patient I've wrought at duty's call?
Anise and cummin—that is all!"

Turning, I raised the drooping head,
Just as I heard a sob arise:
"Anise and cummin and mint," I said
(Kissing her over her aching eyes),
"Even our Lord doth not despise.

"Think you He looks for headed wheat
Out of your plot of garden-ground?
Think you He counts as incomplete
Service that from such scanty bound Yields Him the tithing He has found?"

"What are to Him the world's wide plains?
Him who hath never a need to fill
Even one garner with our small grains?
Yet, if the plot is yours to till,
Tithe Him the anise and cummin still!
—Independent.

Selected.

MY LITTLE LABORER.

A tiny man, with fingers soft and tender
As any lady fair;
Sweet eyes of blue, a form both frail and slender
And curls of sunny hair
A household toy, a fragile thing of beauty—
Yet with each rising sun
Begins his round of toil—a solemn duty,
That must be daily done.

To-day he's building castle, house, and tower,
With wondrous art and skill;
Or labors with his hammer by the hour,
With strong, determined will.
Anon, with loaded little cart, he's plying
A brisk and driving trade;
Again, with thoughtful, earnest brow, is trying
Some book's dark lore to read.

Now, laden like some little beast of burden,
He drags himself along;
And now his lordly little voice is heard in Boisterous shout and song—
Another hour is spent in busy toiling
With hoop and top and ball—
And with a patience that is never failing,
He tries and conquers all.

But sleep at last o'ertakes my little rover,
And on his mother's breast,
Joys thrown aside, the day's hard labor over,
He sinks to quiet rest;
And as I fold him to my bosom, sleeping,
I think, 'mid gathering tears,
Of what the distant future may be keeping
As work for manhood's years.

Must he with toil his daily bread be earning,
In the world's busy mart,
Life's bitter lessons every day be learning,
With patient, struggling heart?
Or shall my little architect he building
Some monument of fame,
On which, in letters bright with glory's gilding
The world may read his name?

Perhaps some humble, lowly occupation,
But shared with sweet content;
Perhaps a life in loftier, prouder station,
In selfish pleasure spent;
Perchance these little feet may cross the portals
Of learning's lofty fane,
His life work to scatter truths immortal
Among the sons of men!

Selected for "The Friend."

The Character of William Penn.

An extract from an Address by Judge F. on "Religious Liberty."

"The last of the great English historians whose skill in praising what he admired depreciating what he disliked was unsurpassed—turned his powerful magnifying glass William Penn, and he announced that he served on that 'bright particular star' spots never before seen. It is said that famous astronomer once upon a time, prised the scientific world by declaring he had discovered an elephant in the moon, but upon close examination it was ascertained that the elephant supposed to be in moon, was only a fly upon the philosopher's telescope. It may be there was a fly in instrument through which Mr. Macaulay looked at the character of Penn, and shrewdly suspected that some such i that have crept in there about the time the Quakers voted against him at the Edinburgh Convention. Be that as it may, this assault upon his fame comes too late in the day. The judgment of the world has been pronounced on him long ago. No man of his time was better known. From his early youth to his old age he was a man of mark and lived constantly in the eye of the public, surrounded by enemies ever ready to put the worst construction upon his conduct. He went through the furnace without the smell of fire upon his garments, and left behind him a character of moral virtue, on which malice itself could find no stain. In the bloom of his youth, with all the freshness of health and hope on his heart, when worldly ambition was leading its most seductive allurements toward him, he gave up rank, fortune, friends, and became an outcast from the house of his father, for the sake of communion with a despised and persecuted sect. In obedience to his conscience, and without other possible motives, he suffered insult, and scorn, and imprisonment, with a fortitude that would be honored a Christian martyr in any age. That he was a man of consummate ability is proved by all his public acts, speeches and writings. Even the words that are reported to have fallen from him in private conversation were so fitly spoken, that they are 'like vessels of gold set in pictures of silver.' With one consent the wise and the learned of all nations have agreed, that as a lawyer he was the greatest that ever founded a state, in ancient or modern times. He was not the foremost, but he was among the foremost to disclaim all power of coercion over the conscience. This alone, if he had nothing else, would have marked the greatness of his intellectual stature; for when the light of a new truth is dawning upon the world, its earliest rays are always shed upon the loftiest minds. He not only received the truth in his own heart, but he devoted himself with tireless energy to the propagation of it."

Education.

"Many children among us" (the Society of Friends), says the celebrated Dr. Fothergill, suffer great loss, by not being early and properly made acquainted with the principles we profess. For want of this instruction, they become too easy a prey to the customs of the world and its habits, and that which would be a hedge about them, and preserve them from many temptations, is laid waste, and all the restraints of vice and folly suffered to sear their affections to their ruin. For when they cease to be distinguished from others by their garb and deportment, they too often cease to be distinguished from the world by their morals, and the rectitude of their conduct.

"Too few are the parents, who can honestly say, that they train up their children in godly conversation, in plainness of speech, in behavior and apparel; and the frequent reading of the holy Scriptures. And as it is of great importance to habituate children from their infancy to silence and attention, not only as a preparation to their advancement in a religious life, but as the groundwork of a well-cultivated understanding, it ought to be particularly regarded. We are almost the only professors of Christianity, who acknowledge the use of this absolutely necessary introduction to Christian knowledge and Christian practice. To have the active minds of children early put under this kind of restraint, to be accustomed to turn their attention from external objects, and early habituated to a degree of abstracted quiet, is a matter of great consequence, and may be a lasting benefit to them. To this, if properly trained, they are inured in our public assemblies, and to sit in silence with decency and composure." "Perhaps no means would be so well calculated to give children this habit, as the adoption of family worship, where parents, children, and domestics, might daily offer unto the holy One of Israel, the sweet incense of hearts united in his name. I am far from recommending any thing which would be inconsistent with our religious principles and practices, or with our belief, that we cannot approach the Almighty acceptably without a preparation from Him. But to assemble together in the morning and evening to read the sacred Scriptures, and to sit in reverent silence before Him in whom we live and move and have our being, surely must be as reasonable a duty as public worship, which is so strictly enjoined; and is not the command given to the Jews equally binding upon us? 'Hear, O Israel, the Lord our God is one Lord.' 'And thou shalt love the Lord thy God with all thine heart, and with all thy soul, and with all thy might. And these words which I command thee this day, shall be in thine heart. And thou shalt teach them diligently unto thy children.' As we have no reason to suppose that under the gospel dispensation any peculiar change passed upon the nature of man, that renders him more susceptible of good, or less liable to the temptations and sins of his natural propensities, or the inroad of the fell destroyer of our innocence, surely our children need as great care and stand as much in need of religious instruction, as those under the old dispensation. Observation and experience teach us that piety is not the spontaneous growth of the human heart; that, on the contrary, the seed of sin prevails there, until supplanted by that seed of the woman which is 'Christ within, the hope of glory.' We daily see the sorrowful inroads which the enemy has made and is making in this portion of the Lord's vineyard, and where shall we look for the remedy? Where shall we find a counteracting influence, if not in the domestic education of our children? There can be nothing which will exercise so powerful, so universal an effect on our Society as family religion; and how can this be established so well, as by having stated periods, in which heads of families may daily read the blessed volume of inspiration in the circle of home, and seek, in humble reverential silence, for a qualification rightly to minister to the wants of those who are looking unto them as to 'Saviours on Mount Zion?' If this were the uniform practice amongst us, a practice which is so excellent that it is no marvel Satan has marshalled his forces against it, and tried to persuade us that it is form without substance, we should soon see a different state of things prevailing; for in such opportunities, the stubborn heart has been melted, the dry eye moistened, and the tongue has been loosed to speak a word in season, of exhortation or reproof, of tenderness or encouragement; and sometimes the spirit of supplication has rested on the little gathering, and the blessing of the Most High vocally entreated. But not less precious nor less instructive, are some of these seasons, when true silence covers the assembly, and every heart is made to feel that there is a God who, though he dwelleth in the high and holy place, is also with him that is of a contrite and humble spirit. I am aware that many, very many times, we may sit in these domestic meetings, without any sense of good, and do we not frequently experience the same trial in public? But shall we thence infer that we need not go to meeting? Yet one is as reasonable an inference as the other. Daily observation convinces us of the necessity of laboring on the farm and in the garden, if we expect to receive ample fruits from the seeds we have sown; we do not expect that our children will learn to read, or write, or attain any other literary accomplishment without instruction, without daily, persevering diligence; but in religion, in the culture of the heart and the soul, too many seem to have embraced the chimerical idea, that they may grow up as plants of the Lord's own right hand planting, without care on our part, or labor on their own. If this were so, whence the earnest exhortation: 'Bring up your children in the nurture and admonition of the Lord.' Does not this call for daily care, not only to be baptized for them, but to labor diligently in word and in doctrine, to instil into their minds the most excellent precepts of the gospel? Not only to point them to the meek and lowly Jesus, but to lead them by holy restraint under His cross, and inure them by parental tenderness and authority, which should be inseparable, to bear it in childhood and youth; so would they find in riper years that it would bear them; and parents, and children, and servants, all who form the domestic circle, would feel its hallowed influence, and would be one another's joy in the Lord.

"Though it cannot be supposed the young and active minds of children are always engaged as they ought to be, yet to be accustomed thus to stillness, and brought to curb and restrain the sallies of their youthful dispositions, is no small point gained, towards fixing a habit of patient recollection, and a regard to decorum, which seldom forsakes those, who have been accustomed to it, and properly instructed in this entrance to the school of wisdom, during the residue of their days."

For "The Friend."

A Growth in the Truth.

Has there been any growth in the Truth among you? is said to have been one of the queries, or a part of a query in the early days of this religious Society. And would it not be well in these days for each one of our members seriously to inquire, in the cool of the day, and in the sight of the Omniscient, whether there has been any growth in the Truth as it is in Jesus? Whether there has been any deepening in the root of Divine life? Whether there is any greater hunger and thirst after righteousness? Whether there is any more love of the Saviour inciting to the obedience which is of faith in his Holy Spirit? Whether there is an increased desire felt after a faithful maintenance of the cross of Christ, despising the shame, and herein seeking to serve our generation according to His holy will? The Apostle enjoins, "Examine yourselves whether ye be in the faith; prove your own selves." Such examination is the more obligatory, because of the value of a never dying soul, and of the shortness of the time, as well as uncertainty of the lease, in which we have to "occupy till He come" with the talents so responsibly committed by the Great Giver.

Salvation is nowhere promised in Holy Scripture to the indolent or lukewarm Christian professor. The Apostle enjoins: "Be ye not slothful, but followers of them who through faith and patience inherit the promises." There must be faithful patient labor in order to obtain the bread, he that eateth of which shall live forever. There must be a continuous warfare to overcome our spiritual enemies—the old inhabitants of the land. There must be a diligent waiting upon the Lord, if we are ever permitted to experience our spiritual strength renewed. There must be a watching unto prayer with all perseverance, if we are ever enabled to be strong in the Lord, and in the power of his might. There must be an assiduous striving maintained if we ever enter the strait gate and walk in the narrow way which alone leadeth to the realms of peace and unspeakable joy. There must be a selling all for the pearl of great price; and a parting with things as near and dear as the right hand or the right eye, when any of these come in competition with our soul's growth and welfare, or with a crown of never-fading glory. On this point, how strong and suggestive is the example of the Apostle Paul, who evinced the sincerity of his eternal hopes by constantly preparing himself for their fruition. He says: "I count all things but loss for the excellency of the knowledge of Christ Jesus my Lord: for whom I have suffered the loss of all things, and do count them but dung, that I may win Christ, and be found in Him," &c. Now, if these, or similar fruits of growth in the unchangeable Truth have not been known or felt by us, what is the "root of bitterness springing up?" What the hindrance or obstruction to a progress in grace and piety, and in the saving knowledge of our Lord Jesus Christ unto life eternal?

The effort to modulate or qualify the Truth as it is in the Redeemer, so as to seem to grow in it, without yielding our hearts to be leavened by Him and his grace, a whole burnt offering and sacrifice, will ever remain a light-weighted and futile attempt. Every effort to dilute the religion of our forefathers, so as to make it more palatable, will prove but like to climbing up some other way to the kingdom than by Him, who yesterday, to-day, and forever, must remain the way, the truth, and the life.

As an antecedent to a right growth in the Truth, there must be an humbling of ourselves under the discipline of the cross of Christ. The Scriptures enjoin, to "be clothed with humility." And again, "Humble yourselves under the mighty hand of God, that He may exalt you in due time: casting all your care upon Him, for He careth for you." Perhaps one great reason why there is not more lively growth apparent, is because too many stumble at the simplicity of this cross. Nevertheless, it was Paul's glory: and, as says William Penn, "Christ's cross is Christ's way to Christ's crown." What an example, moreover, in this, as well as in humility and self-denial for our sakes, is that of the dear Saviour! who, "for the joy that was set before Him endured the cross, despising the shame," &c. Who made Himself of no reputation; pleased not Himself; had not where to lay his head; though in a world He made, and which He came, suffered, and bled, to redeem. Of Him we must learn meekness and lowliness, even to sit at his feet to hear his words as the "one thing needful"—"that good part," never to be taken away. In which privileged place, no divination or enchantment can prevail against, and where growth, and strength, and life are meted to the filial dependent children and lowly followers of a crucified, but risen and glorified Lord.

But, praise be to the Father of mercies and God of all comfort, whose grace is ever sufficient, it is believed there is a growth in the ever blessed Truth amongst us; that there is an increasing love of the Truth,—a more earnest, deep-seated, longing desire in one here and another there, cost what it may, to be found in its ways—in the footsteps of the flock of Christ's companions. Yea, the language of divers hearts, we doubt not, at times is, "Oh! for a closer walk with God." "Tell me, O thou whom my soul loveth, where thou feedest, where thou makest thy flock to rest at noon?" May these put on strength in the name of the Lord; and, looking not back, press forward in the heavenly race. The Saviour's love is especially to these. Their feeble, broken, contrite petitions are sweetly audible to his omnipresent, compassionate ear. May their aspirations more and more be, Oh Lord! lead me, and I will follow thee. These, the tender Shepherd will bring into green pastures, beside the still waters. In these, He will open fresh seals in their religious experience. He will enlarge the coast of these, and bless them with spiritual blessings to the glory of his grace. The bruised reed He will not break, neither the smoking flax quench, as these abide steadfast in Him, till judgment be brought forth unto victory. May the number of such as these be increased within our borders; that thus the grace and Truth which come by Jesus Christ, and by which, said Paul, "I am what I am," may be more and more magnified unto the received ability to proclaim by a consistent, godly life and conversation, if not by words, the wonders of redeeming love and mercy; holding out the inviting language, Come and have fellowship with us, for "our fellowship is with the Father, and with his Son Jesus Christ."

Religion, above all things else, is truly ennobling. And the writer has observed that where young persons yield themselves wholly to its heavenly, heart-changing, all-correcting discipline, that it not only promotes a lively growth in Christ the living Vine unto becoming, as represented of the king's daughter, "all glorious within;" but, also, through its thoroughly leavening, transforming power, exemplifies the jewel of consistency, without—all being leavened. So that such truly become like unto plants grown up in their youth, or corner-stones polished after the similitude of a palace.

But where, on the other hand, this precious season of youth is wasted amid the glittering attractions of earth, or in the too absorbing pursuit of even its lawful engagements and pleasures—"the cares of this life, the deceitfulness of riches, or the love of other things," which choke the Word—how deplorable is the result! Would that such, with supp grace, might ask before it be too late,

"From each terrestrial bondage set me free;
Still every wish that centres not in thee;
Bid my fond hopes, my vain disquiet cease
And point my path to everlasting peace."
12th mo. 11th, 1882.

For "The Friend"

Religious Items, &c.

Deaconesses.—The Presbyterians at 1 Albany, Ind., have elected eight deacones. The Christian at Work says, "The lost of deaconesses is an apostolic office which apostolic Presbyterians ought to restore. The special duties assigned to them we do not know."

The Pope and Civil Power.—The tenant a certain estate refused to pay some extraordinary taxes that had been levied, whereupon execution was issued against the party, with due notice to the owner, happened to be the Pope! The notice, which was in the usual legal form, read: "To Izen Joachim Pecci; by trade or profession, Pope; conducting business (also residing) the Vatican Palace, Rome." The taxes were promptly paid, and a receipt given to "Izen Joachim Pecci."

The Clerical Prisoner Released.—S. F. Green, incumbent of St. John's Church, Miles Platting, Manchester, is the most resolute Ritualist. He has posed as a martyr conscience sake, his martyrdom consisting imprisonment for contempt of court. He dared to observe the ritual which the Judicial Committee of Her Majesty's Privy Council had declared to be prescribed by law, he defied the authority of the State at defiance, refused to serve as commanded or to leave the prison. Thereupon, he was committed to the custody of the Governor of Lancaster Castle till he should purge himself of the contempt of which he had been convicted. For considerably more than a year, he was in prison. Among the provisions of the Public Worship Regulation Act is this, that, if an offending cleric does not submit himself to the judgment of the court before three years have expired from the date of the judgment, incumbency shall be declared vacant. It is much more than three years ago since Lord Penzance first admonished Mr. Green. At last, the Bishop of Manchester has declared the incumbency of St. John's Church, Miles Platting, vacant; has appointed both a receiver of all fees and moneys due to the incumbent and a clergyman to perform duties. On this, Lord Penzance ordered the release of Mr. Green, who, doubtless, was not so disposed to come forth and enjoy liberty again.—Correspondent of Nat. Baptist.

For "The Friend"

Natural History, Science, &c.

Latent Vitality of Seeds.—The Garden Chronicle reports some experiments on pea and bean seeds. Several packets were, in the first month, 1880, divided into three equal parts; one portion exposed to the free air, screened from dust; another in closed being tightly corked up in a bottle; the third placed in pure carbonic acid gas. At the end of two years the seeds were taken out, weighed and sown. The seeds exposed to free air had gained in weight; those in the confined space had gained very little; and those in the carbonic acid gas remained about the same.

the seeds kept in free air, nearly all germinated; of those in closed air, nearly one of the peas and only one in fifty of the seeds; while of those in carbonic acid gas, of either kind, germinated.

Professor Gray remarks: "If the full course of experiments gives such results, it will (we would say) be made clear, 1st, that the vegetable embryo in the seed is not strictly speaking latent, but is doing some work however slight, in keeping up a respiration, which is vital to its continued life. 2d, that the life of seeds cannot be indefinitely prolonged. 3d, old seeds exposed to the air must be dead by exhaustion, and those deeply buried, by suffocation; and the numerous recorded cases of germination of ancient seeds are more to be distrusted."

Water Supply of Towns.—The water supply to the town of Lille often presents a fishy color, bad taste, and unpleasant odor. Springing this infection became so bad, that water was for a time unusable. A microscopic examination showed that it was caused by the presence of minute organic beings, whose putrefaction gave a disagreeable flavor to the water.

The soil from which the springs were fed had been charged with materials from districts, and other sources of contamination, which favored the development of the low life of organic life.

An Intelligent Horse.—It is well known that horses in some parts of South America are annoyed by a kind of tick, which sucks their blood till it swells out to the size of a pea. A charger named Joe, belonging to the Colonial cavalry stationed at Maseru during the Basuto War, if attacked whilst riding would canter to the fort, seek out a rider, and express by signs what was the matter. The trooper would seek out the tick, catch it, and throw it on the ground. The horse has then on more than one occasion, kicked the remains of its enemy, and given it a blow with his fore-hoof."—Journal of the Cape.

Locomotives and their Influence on Malaria.—Dr. William S. King, Surgeon U. S. Army, has written a letter in which he claims that the arrival and departure of locomotives, with their attendant trains, in the vicinity of our towns and cities, may account for the non-prevalence of malarial effects in localities where all the necessary conditions for their development seem to be furnished. While visiting a place of residence for his family, Dr. King's attention was called to West Philadelphia, a portion of it adjacent to the Schuylkill river. On inquiry he ascertained that, notwithstanding the nearness of the low-lands, the residents enjoyed immunity from malarial affections. The theory he advances in support of the fact is as follows: the heated locomotives, by continually passing through the crowded districts, rarefy the air, and create a constant atmospheric disturbance by inducing warm upward currents; such currents, mingling with the pure air which rushes in from the open country, as agents in the dispersion or dilution of the miasmatic influence. The frequent motion of the small steamboats on the Schuylkill river, above Fairmount Dam, has been thought to have a similar effect—reducing the amount of malarial disease among the population dwelling near the river.

Use of Responsibility in Animals.—A poor man, who lived in an unprotected part of Scotland, became unexpectedly possessed of a large sum of money, with which property she was much troubled. She would have taken it to the bank, but could not leave the house. At last she asked the advice of a butcher of her acquaintance, telling him that she was afraid to live alone in the house with such a sum of money.

"Never fear," said the butcher, "I will leave my dog with you, and I'll warrant you that no one will dare to enter your house." So, towards evening, the dog was brought, and chained up close to the place where the money was kept.

In the course of the night a robber made his way into the house, and was proceeding to carry off the money, when he was seized by the dog, who held him a prisoner until assistance came. The thief was the butcher himself, who thought he had made sure of the money. He had not considered that his dog was a better moralist than himself.

A retriever belonging to a Scotch lawyer was a very conscientious animal in his way; that is as far as his intellect would carry him. For example, no matter how hungry he might be, the dog might be safely left in a room where the dainties which he best loved were left unguarded; not a morsel of food would he touch. But he did not offer any objection to the cat when she stole the food from the table; neither did he display any scruples in sharing with her the product of her theft.

A story is related of a Newfoundland dog named "Help," which shows that his sense of responsibility overcame that of friendship. His master owned a wood-yard, from which there had been a constant series of mysterious thefts. At last the dog was put into the yard for the night, in hopes he might scare away the thief. Next morning, Help was found guarding one of the men belonging to the premises, who had a bundle of wood upon him. The man was aware that the dog knew him perfectly well, and had presumed on the animal's forbearance. Help, however, assumed so fierce an aspect that even the certainty of detection did not give him courage to oppose the faithful creature, not even to get rid of his compromising load.

THE FRIEND.

TWELFTH MONTH 23, 1882.

We have received a printed copy of the Minutes of Kansas Yearly Meeting (the Larger Body) held at Lawrence, and commencing on the 6th of 10th mo. last.

An Address on the proper observance of the First-day of the week was agreed upon, and 2000 copies directed to be printed and distributed.

A new Quarterly Meeting in Arkansas, called Siloam, had been opened on 26th of 8th month.

The statistical table gives the whole number of members 4996; the number of births, 141; and of deaths, 60. In many of the older settled sections of the country, owing to the difference in social habits, the number of deaths exceeds that of births.

The Minute on the state of society exhorts the members to greater diligence in the reading of the Holy Scriptures in their families; and says it behooves heads of families to offer prayer and praise in the presence of their children. It would have made the minute more in accordance with the advices of our Church in earlier days, if this last injunction had been qualified by a reference to the necessity of first experiencing the arising of that Divine life and command, without which such performances in the way of worship are not only useless but positively injurious. For, as I. Penington says, "Prayer is not in the time, will or power of the creature; for, it is a gift of God, and the ability lodges in his Spirit; it is not ours, but as given of his Spirit, which therefore is to be waited upon." "The praying of the fleshly birth, or in the will and according to the wisdom of the flesh, is not the means or way to obtain the everlasting kingdom." "The Lord hath shown me, that prayer is his gift to the child which He begets, and that it stands not in the will or time or understanding or affectionate part of the creature, but in his own begetting." Of the formal services of the professors of that day, he says, "Their prayers and reading of the Scriptures, and preaching, and duties and ordinances, are as loathsome to the soul of the Lord, as ever the Jews' incense and sacrifices were." We believe this is equally true at the present time of those services which are performed in the same formal manner and unaccompanied with a living sense of the Divine requiring.

The Minute further cautions against unscrupulous business transactions and speculative enterprises; exhorts to the maintenance of our testimonies in reference to oaths and war; and recommends avoiding extravagance in dress.

In the report of the Missionary Board, which is hereafter to be called the Committee on Evangelical and Pastoral work, mention is made, among other things, of frequent "prayer meetings" having been held. In what way they were held is not stated; but if in them encouragement is held out to persons to utter vocal prayers, except as truly led and guided by the Spirit of Christ, it would be well for all concerned therein to reflect on the language of William Penn: "True silence before the Lord is better abundantly than forward prayers, and self-willed offers, or any traditional and formal performances. For consider, that it is life eternal to know God. Now no man can know Him, who has not heard his voice; and no man can hear his voice, who is not silent in himself, and waits not patiently for Him, that he may hear what God will speak to his soul, through Christ Jesus."

We observe with satisfaction that a number of prominent citizens of Philadelphia have associated themselves into an organization, called the "Indian Rights Association," whose object is "to secure to the Indians of the United States the political and civil rights already guaranteed to them by treaty and statutes of the United States, and such as their civilization and circumstances may justify." This it proposes to effect by influencing public opinion and Congressional legislation, and by assisting the executive officers of the government in the improvement of the laws passed for the protection and education of the Indians.

We hope the Association may prove an efficient helper in accomplishing these desirable results.

We have received No. 2 of Our Ancestors, published at 311½ Walnut St., Philadelphia.

Among the articles of a Genealogical and Biographical character which it contains, we find some interesting documents relating to the testimony of Friends in Virginia against slavery, and showing some of the difficulties into which they were brought in upholding that testimony. They will be found in another part of our columns, under the heading, "Some Old Papers."

We have received a number of the Sidereal Messenger, a monthly review of Astronomy, published at Northfield, Minn., at $2 per annum. Among the articles of popular interest, are notes from different sources, and discussions respecting the great comet of 1882.

SUMMARY OF EVENTS.

UNITED STATES.—Both Houses of Congress have passed an act repealing discriminating duties on goods produced east of the Cape of Good Hope. The House of Representatives has passed the Agricultural and French Spoliation bills.

The total exports of petroleum and petroleum products from the United States for the ten months ended 10th mo. 31st, 1882, were $33,361,990, and for the ten months ended 10th month 31st, 1881, $40,015,685.

The total exports of breadstuffs from the United States during the eleven months which ended 11th mo. 30th, 1882, amounted in value to $165,606,693 against $210,318,432 for the corresponding period of 1881.

The Secretary of the Treasury decides that, under the Chinese Restriction act, a Chinaman now residing in this country cannot bring here a wife whom he intended to marry in China, "though if he was already married and his wife was in China she could come."

Great suffering is reported among the Cherokees in the Indian Territory, owing to the ravages of small-pox. One family of five has been entirely swept away by the disease. To check its ravages and secure attendance for the sick, the Territorial Government has appropriated $2000.

There have been very heavy rains in Oregon and Washington Territory, and much damage has been done to the railroads by floods. Houses, mills, bridges and other property have been swept away, but no loss of life is reported.

The grain receipts at Chicago during the year have been 25,000,000 bushels less than 1881. The reasons assigned for the decrease are, "the increased ability of farmers to hold stocks, the low prices since the new crop was harvested, and the rapid increase of milling capacity."

It is estimated that the liquor saloons of Chicago sell $10,000,000 worth of liquors per year. Of this amount $6,000,000 is net profit.

The cut of logs at the mills at Minneapolis during the sawing season just past, included 296,000,000 feet of lumber, 29,000,000 shingles and 56,000,000 laths. In 1881 the cut was 234,000,000 feet of lumber, 87,000,000 shingles and 49,000,000 laths.

It is said that many cornfields in Kansas have yielded from ninety to one hundred bushels per acre. Farmers are paying off mortgages and making improvements that indicate an unusually prosperous year with them.

At a meeting of the rubber manufacturers in New York, on the 15th inst., it was decided "to close all the boot and shoe factories in the country on December 23d, and keep them closed for one week, after which only one-half of the goods formerly made will be manufactured." It is said "this is to be done to reduce the price of rubber, which is so high that there is little profit in working it."

A number of prominent citizens of Philadelphia on the evening of the 15th inst., formed an organization to be known as the "Indian Rights Association," the object of which will be to secure to the Indians political and civil rights and general education.

There were 370 deaths in this city last week, 35 less than the previous week, and 31 more than the corresponding week of last year. Of this number, 188 were males and 182 females: 59 died of consumption; 37 of pneumonia; 35 of diphtheria; 17 of paralysis; 15 of erup; 10 of bronchitis, and 9 of typhoid fever.

Markets, &c.—U. S. 3's, 104; 3½'s, 103½; 4½'s, 113½; 4's, coupon, 121; registered, 120; currency 6's, 128 a 131.

Cotton.—Prices remain about the same as last quoted. Sales of middlings are reported at 10½ a 11 cts. per lb. for uplands and New Orleans.

Petroleum.—Standard white, 7¼ a 7½ cts. for export, and 8½ a 8½ cts. per gallon for home use.

Flour.—There was very little movement, but prices were unchanged. Sales of 2200 barrels, including Minnesota extras, at $5.25 a $5.75; Pennsylvania family at $4.50 a $4.75; western do. at $5 a $5.75, and patents at $6 a $7. Rye flour is steady at $4 a $4.12½.

Grain.—Wheat was quiet and lower. Sales of 3700 bushels red in car lots at $1.04 a $1.11. Rye is nominal at 64 a 68 cts. Corn.—Local lots are quiet, but steady. Sales of 9000 bushels new at 50 a 69 cts. Oats are quiet, Sales of 8500 bushels, in car lots at 46½ a 52 cts.

Hay and Straw Market, for week ending 12th mo. 16th, 1882.—Loads of hay, 382; loads of straw, 78. Average price during the week—Prime timothy, 95 cts. to $1.05 per 100 pounds; mixed, 95 cts. to $1.00 per 100 pounds; straw, 70 to 80 cts. per 100 pounds.

Beef cattle were in demand this week, and prices were a fraction higher: 3000 head arrived and sold at the different yards at 3¾ a 7 cts. per lb., as to quality.

Sheep were in good demand and prices were a fraction higher: 10,000 head sold at the different yards, at 3¾ a 5½ cts., and lambs at 4¼ a 6½ cts. per pound, as to condition.

Hogs were a fraction lower: 4500 head arrived and sold at the different yards at 8 a 9½ cts. per lb., as to condition.

FOREIGN.—London, 12th mo. 10th.—The changes in the Cabinet are now completed, the following named Ministers having taken the oath before the Queen in Council to-day:

Lord Derby as Secretary of State for the Colonies.

Lord Kimberley as Secretary of State for India.

Lord Hartington as Secretary of State for War.

The Hon. Hugh C. Childers as Chancellor of the Exchequer.

It is stated that a famine prevails in Carrick, County Donegal. The people are living on Indian meal. Twenty-five hundred persons, it is said, are in danger of starving. The Government has issued a circular in regard to the distress in the West of Ireland, in which it declares that it is determined to rely solely upon the administration of relief through Boards of Guardians, as it is satisfied that relief works are not only extravagant and demoralizing, but often fail to relieve the most needy. The Government will be prepared to empower Boards of Guardians to borrow money, if necessary to meet the pressure on the resources.

A process for the cheap production of aluminium has been discovered. The invention causes no little excitement in the metal trade in Birmingham and Sheffield.

Lord Derby, in a speech at Manchester on the 13th inst., rejected the idea of a protectorate for Egypt. England, he said, ought not to remain in Egypt longer than was absolutely necessary to restore order. English influence in Egypt must preponderate, but it was not necessary to exercise it in an offensive spirit, nor to exclude free and friendly consultation with France. Referring to the attitude of France toward Madagascar, Lord Derby said: "If amicable mediation could prevent invasion of Madagascar, we ought to offer our services; but if, as appears probable, the dispute is only a pretext for annexation of a part of the island, we must abstain from mediating."

The Paris Temps officially announces the refusal of France to accept the Presidency of the Egyptian Public Debt Commission. The Temps says: "The friendly negotiations between England and France which preceded France's official refusal of the Presidency of the Debt Commission, leave the door open for fresh negotiations. France has formulated no counter-proposal, but has given England a better idea of the political interests which France intends to uphold in Egypt, side by side with the financial interests of her subjects, which she is bound to protect."

In the French Chamber of Deputies, recently, Tirard, Minister of Finance, stated that the amount of the public debt redeemed in 1882, was 104,000,000 francs.

The North German Gazette says it is understood that Great Britain will shortly communicate to the Powers which were represented at the Conference before the Egyptian war proposals for placing the navigation of the Suez Canal under international protection. The Gazette adds: It is said the Netherlands and Spain desire to express their wishes relative to the Canal, which will probably meet with a friendly reception.

Cairo, 12th mo. 13th.—The Government has requested Arabi and the other prisoners sentenced to exile, to be ready to start within ten days. Allowances have been granted the prisoners from their properties, which were confiscated. The property belonging to their wives was not confiscated. The leniency shown the prisoners has produced a great effect on the Arabs.

The London Standard's correspondent at Constantinople says the mental derangement of the Sultan coming more apparent daily.

At the sitting of the Spanish Congress on the instant, Senor Rivas, one of the leading support Marshal Serrano, made the unexpected declaration all the members of the Dynastic Left would accept Constitution of 1876, and, if called to power, would form it in a liberal sense, on the lines of the Constitution of 1869, but without constituent periods. A complete abandonment of Marshal Serrano's programme, of which the Constitution of 1869 is the keystone. The declaration caused the greatest excitement in the Chamber. It is practically the programme defended by Senor Sagasta, Prime Minister, in Senate week before last.

A great fire at Canton, China, on 12th mo. 7th 8th, destroyed 800 houses, and caused a loss of lives, including firemen who were burned to death. There were two fires in Foo Chow, China, on 11th 4th and 5th. Each destroyed about 200 houses five lives were lost.

Advices from Tonquin state that since the end of month the country has been entirely evacuated by Chinese. The Temps urges the Government to this opportunity to take possession of Tonquin. National says that the difference between Pre Grévy and Admiral Joureguiberry, Minister of Marine, does not turn on the question of despatching an expedition to Tonquin. President Grévy wishes to see the expedition to a civil commissioner, while Adm. Joureguiberry objects to the interference of a civil in a military enterprise. The Republique Francaise declares that French democratic opinion does not desire the abandonment of the Tonquin expedition.

Advices from South Africa say that Ceteway signed the Zulu settlement, and will return to Zululand early in 1st month. A British resident and a military escort will accompany him to Zululand, where he will be installed king.

A steamer which arrived at Valparaiso, Chili, 13th, reports that the American Scientific Commission at Santiago made 70 successful observations of the transit of Venus. They also took 204 very satisfactory photographs. The Belgian Commission made 6 observations.

The Chilean Finance Minister, it is said, "re-estimates that there are only 650,000 tons of export guano on the Peruvian coast."

The business section of Kingston, Jamaica, was destroyed by fire on Second-day, the 11th instant. Hundreds of people are homeless and destitute. Loss is estimated at $15,000,000. The fire, which of incendiary origin, started in a lumber yard, burned until Fourth-day, destroying all the warehouses and stores. The number of stores destroyed was about 400. Buildings called "fireproof" burned as well as the rest. Five persons are known to have lost their lives. It is said a law will be passed prohibiting the use of shingles on buildings in the hereafter. Kingston is the capital of Jamaica; founded in 1692, has a population of nearly 40,000 and is the most important commercial town in the West Indies.

The country lying between the western limit of the toba and the eastern boundary of British Columbia has been divided into four territorial sections, namely, siniboia, Saskatchewan, Alberta and Athabaska, a new post-office has been established in each.

A telegram from Montreal reports the organization of a colonization company in London, England, capital of $5,000,000, which has obtained a grant of 1,000,000 acres near Prince Albert settlement in Northwest.

During the week which ended on the 13th, the temperature at Winnipeg, Manitoba, averaged 17.5° below zero, the range being from 3 above to 17 below.

DIED, on the 21st of Eleventh month, 1882, residence in Woodbury, New Jersey, MARY, daughter of the late Stephen and Rebecca Pike, aged 60 years, member of Woodbury Monthly Meeting of Friends. For the past ten years, in consequence of serious illness, she was confined to the house. Though afflicted with discouragements were at times her portion, and bodily suffering, she was enabled to endure all with patience and cheerful resignation to the Divine will, illustrating the truth of the declaration, "The Lord keep him in perfect peace whose mind is stayed on thee because he trusteth in thee." Shortly before her death she expressed herself in the following language: "I feel I can trust to the unmerited mercy of my Saviour, and long to flee away and be at rest."

THE FRIEND.

A RELIGIOUS AND LITERARY JOURNAL.

OL. LVI.

SEVENTH-DAY, TWELFTH MONTH 30, 1882.

NO. 21.

PUBLISHED WEEKLY.

if paid in advance, $2.00 per annum; if not paid in advance $2.50; 10 cents extra is charged for Postage on those sent by mail.

Articles designed for insertion to be addressed to

JOSEPH WALTON,

MOORESTOWN, BURLINGTON CO., N. J.

Contributions, payments and business communications, received by

JOHN S. STOKES,

NO. 116 NORTH FOURTH STREET, UP STAIRS,

PHILADELPHIA.

For "The Friend."

Selections and Reflections.

has often been a subject of reflection with the writer, whether there is a due consideration given place to, for the influence that one exerts, either for good or evil, over those around him, as a talent committed of great magnitude and responsibility! Perhaps this is more especially active and powerful in the case of elder over younger minds! There is no doubt that the subjects of conversation, the manner and form of treating them, most especially the example in the life, by the former of these, have, it may be to a conceivable degree, their greatly heaven-affecting upon the susceptible affections and of younger and less experienced persons whom they may be associated. The Lord said to Israel of old, "Thou shalt remember all the way which the Lord thy God has led thee these forty years in the wilderness, humble thee, and to prove thee," &c.; and reference enjoined by the Apostle to the Jews toward them, "who have spoken against you the word of God; whose faith," saith Paul, "considering the end of their conversation: Jesus Christ, the same yesterday, to-day, and for ever;" would seem to point to the nature and the gravity of the influence under consideration: and, added to this, we read from our holy Father's own words the following, is it not conclusive?—"Whosoever shall offend one of these little ones that believe in me, it were better for him that a mill-stone were hanged about his neck, and he were cast into the sea." We do not offend the believer in Jesus, the like nature, the tender contrite spirit of the visited children—humbled under the lowly teachings of the Saviour—by the magnitude and expensiveness of our dwellings, the variety, excess, and extravagance of our furniture; the sumptuousness and elegance of our tables," &c.—Things that the Lord's mind delights in; but which, to tender hearts in the garden of the Lord, bowing under the restraints of his cross, may stumble, and disturb the bias of the purpose, as having them the appearance of trying to serve masters, of sowing to the flesh; of being closely wedded to the cares of this life, of the love of riches, and the love of other things; which choke the little seed of the kingdom, and render it unfruitful.*

On the other hand, our dear young Friends should remember that we are to "call no man master in things pertaining to the conscience." That the admonitory words of our Lord to Peter, when he enquired of Him what another should do, are no less of binding obligation upon us:—"What is that to thee? Follow thou me." While others must account for the right occupancy of the momentous talent of influence entrusted as an important legacy to them, we are all, older and younger, called, in this new covenant of light and life, of which Jesus is the Mediator, and wherein all are to be taught of God, to walk worthy of the vocation wherewith we are called in all lowliness and meekness, without undue dependence upon any fellow-creature. For, as written for our learning, "It pleased the Father that in Him (his beloved Son, the Word made flesh) should all fulness dwell;" "and of His fulness have all we received, and grace for grace." Again, "Ye have an unction from the Holy One, and ye know all things." This is our precious privilege under "the fulness of the blessing of the gospel of Christ." Then is it not clear that all shall be without excuse, whatever others may do, or how much soever they may pander to the spirit of the world, not being faithful to the one Master, in filial obedience to his law written on the heart.

Perhaps there is no one thing that more hinders young persons from taking upon them the cross of their Saviour and following Him in the straight and narrow way unto regeneration and holiness, than the fear of man which, it is declared, "bringeth a snare." Does not this beguile as "a snare" sometimes, and lead to a denial of Christ, it may be almost unconsciously, at least unintentionally, in our daily intercourse with men because of the reproach, derision, or contempt it is feared it will bring forth from those with whom such mingle? But can any one, or dare any one be ashamed of Jesus who has bound us to Him by the closest and most endearing ties? Who has bought us with the price of his own precious blood, "not that we should live to ourselves, but unto Him who died for us and rose again?" Ashamed of Him unto whom every knee must bow and every tongue confess, in the day of mercy or in that of judgment? Ashamed of Him who is our Shepherd, our ever-present helper and friend, our Prophet, Priest, and King?

"Ashamed of Jesus, that dear friend
On whom my hopes of heaven depend!
No: when I blush, be this my shame,
That I no more revere his name."

* It was a noteworthy testimony of the late Samuel Bettie, Senior, which he not only preached but lived, that an increase of means was no excuse for superfluities in our manner of living. And it is recorded of Dr. Johnson, that upon a visit to David Garrick, when the latter showed him his new house, and costly, fashionable furniture, he exclaimed, "Ah, David, David, these are what make death-beds terrible."

But it is believed, nevertheless, that there is more in this than many are aware! Are we not sometimes ashamed of the simplicity of the cross in language, in dress, and in manners, which Jesus calls for from us? it may be by the immediate manifestation of his will, for "the reproofs of instruction are the way of life," or it may be by obedience to that "written for our learning" in Holy Scripture; such as, "Be not conformed to this world," &c. "Let not your adorning be the outward adorning," &c. Prohibitions as obligatory as, "Swear not at all." "Render not evil for evil." Amid it all, it is well to keep the pure mind stirred by the truly forcible exhortation of the dear Son of God: "Whosoever shall be ashamed of me, and of my words, in this adulterous and sinful generation; of him also shall the Son of man be ashamed, when He cometh in the glory of his Father, with the holy angels."

The following selection is from an ancient epistle: "We beseech you, brethren, be watchful. Keep in the holy enclosure of the preserving fear of God; and call to mind the perfect security of Israel, encamped of old under his never-failing protection; when the intended curses of an enemy were converted into blessings. He with whom we have to do, is the same yesterday, to-day, and for ever. Why, then, are we not kept in his fear, and made perfect in his love? Is it not because the visible things of this fading state, are in various ways and proportions, drawing away our attention? But, Friends, enter from time to time into the closet: shut to the door. Pray to your Father who seeth in secret, for daily supplies of strength, to suppress that immoderate love of earthly things which prevents you from giving to Him due pre-eminence.

Dear Friends, we believe there are many of you, and especially of the youth, who, in a good degree, have given up, and are giving up your hearts to serve the Lord. May you submit with patience to all the repeated baptisms necessary for your refinement. The gospel hath its tribulations, but they are not like the sorrow of the world, which worketh death. They are intended to disturb the polluted rest in mere worldly enjoyments; and to unite you to the living members of Christ's body, in whom the same things have been accomplished; and, if they be accepted as tokens of his love, abode under the allotted time without repining, and diligently improved to his glory, they will unite you to our Holy Head in a covenant never to be broken.

Wherefore, ye dearly beloved youth, in whom we sometimes dare to delight, and to hope that you will one day succeed to the places of faithful laborers, who have passed, and are passing from works to rewards; we entreat you—with tender solicitude we press it upon you—to flee from every thing which tends to rob you of your peace; and to render your minds less receptive of that holy influence, which your enlightened judgment demonstrates to be Truth.

And ye, parents, be ye solicitous to discharge your important and awful duty, with scrupulous attention. It is often too late to warn the youthful mind of danger, when your own negligence or indulgence hath suffered your offspring to deviate from that path of simplicity in which you have thought yourselves bound to walk, and in which you have found peace. If you fail to suppress the early beginnings of undue liberty, or your own example fails to be consistent with the truth as it is in Jesus, how can you expect a blessing on your endeavors when further deviations at length arouse your attention! and how, having failed to rule your own house well, can you expect duly to take care of the Church of God? There were of old those who brought children to Christ, in the days of his flesh; and now the religious parent can breathe no warmer aspiration for them, than when he prayerfully commends his tender offspring to the care and protection of his Lord. But see, Friends, that you encourage no propensities in them which prevent a union with Him. Restrain them, we beseech you, from associating with those whose influence and example lead away from his law written on the heart; and be especially careful that you introduce not among them, neither allow publications which are either wholly, or in part, repugnant to the faith, as it is in Jesus. Let it be your own daily care to endeavor after closer communion with Him, and to walk in meek submission to his commands: so may you gain over the minds of the youth providentially placed under your care, that ascendancy which arises from the united effects of sound judgment, truest love, and a good example.

Finally, Friends of every age, of every rank, we commend you to the protection of Him who died for us, and who ever liveth to make intercession for us; and 'who is able to save them to the uttermost that come unto God by Him.'

The subjoined selection, is from the pen of the worthy man whose name is thereto affixed. It is written, "The words of the wise are as goads, and as nails fastened by the master of assemblies, which are given from one shepherd." Why can we not more emulate the practical virtues of one, who could thus so feelingly and filially declare of the Lord's tender mercies to him in youth and through life?

"The Lord who was the guide of my youth, hath in tender mercy helped me hitherto. He hath healed me of wounds. He hath helped me out of grievous entanglements. He remains to be the strength of my life; to whom I desire to devote myself in time and in eternity.—John Woolman."

12th mo. 14th, 1882.

What does that man do, who repeats the Lord's Prayer, saying "Forgive us our trespasses as we forgive them who trespass against us," while his heart is full of wrath against his neighbor because of some real or imaginary offence? He prays, but for what? Not for pardon, but "for a curse on his own head." His request is equivalent to asking Heaven not to forgive him. What a shocking prayer!—Zion's Herald.

The following remarkable and instructive dream has often been published, and may be familiar to some of our readers. It has been sent to us by a friend for insertion in our columns. In the hope that it may prove useful, we give it place.—Ed.

A Dream of Heaven.

AS REPORTED BY T. SHARP, A. M.

In A. D., 1814, the late Mr. and Mrs. F—, who were lost in August, 1831, on the steamer Rothsay Castle, were acquainted with three sisters residing in London, and belonging to the higher class of society. Two of these sisters were decidedly pious, but the third was volatile, and just the contrary. They were all elderly, which rendered the gaiety of the third the less becoming, and also inclined her the more easily to take offence at any remarks made upon it.

She hated the piety of her sisters, and opposed it in a very petty and spiteful way, though they endeavored most earnestly to accommodate themselves to her, and to render the differences between them as little disagreeable as possible.

One night, towards the close of 1814, she had been out to an assembly very late, and the next morning at breakfast was so remarkably different from her usual manner, that her sisters feared she was very ill, or had met with some misfortune which deeply affected her. Instead of her incessant chat about every person she had met, and every thing she had seen, and all that was said and done, she sat silent, sullen, and absorbed. The gloom of her brow was a mixture of temper and distress, indicating a fixed and dogged resolution to pursue her own course, and have her own way and will, utterly regardless of the distress and trouble which might follow, rather than be induced to submit to the advice and entreaties of others.

As she ate nothing, her sisters asked if she was unwell? She answered, "No." "What, then, is the matter?" "Nothing." They were afraid something had distressed her. She said, "I have no idea of people prying into matters which do not concern them." She passed the whole of the morning alone in her own room; and at dinner the same conduct recurred as in the morning. She scarcely ate anything; and spoke only in an uncivil way, in reply to questions asked, and all with an appearance of depression, obstinacy and melancholy that spread its influence very painfully over the cheerfulness of her companions. She retired late to rest, and with the air of one who expects neither alleviation nor refreshment from sleep. The next morning she scarcely touched her breakfast, and seemed to be in the same oppressed and uncomfortable state as on the preceding day. One of her affectionate sisters said to her, "Anna, you are not well; is it your head that pains you?" She answered, "I am well, and nothing pains me." "Then you must have something on your mind, and will you not tell us? Do we not love you? Have we not a deep interest in what concerns you? And can we seek any thing but your good in an anxious desire to share your sorrows?" "Oh you have superstitions enough of your own without more being added. I shall not tell you what ails me, so you need not ask me further, nor press your curiosity any further. I dare say you would be delighted to know it, for you would think it some spiritual triumph.

But I laugh at these things; I am not quite enough yet to become the victim of dreams and visions." "Anna," we do not believe dreams and visions." She answered sharply, "No, and I do not mean that you shall!" The sisters looked at each other, and relapsed into silence. Thus the second day passed as first: Anna was gloomy and moody, and sisters from pity and anxiety, were unhappy for her sake.

The third morning she again began day as one who loathed the light, who had no interest in being, and to whom the loss of time and the prospects of eternity brought neither peace nor hope. As her sisters looked at her, one of them said suddenly, "Anna, what was your dream?" She started, laughed wildly, "Ah! ah! what was it indeed? I would give the world to know, but I shall not tell you. I thought you did not believe in dreams and visions." The sisters replied, "Neither do we in general, as you know, we are usually the offspring of a disordered mind or body—confused images and fancies without reason is dormant, and the memory of what usually passes away the moment we are fast engaged in our usual occupations. But there are, no doubt, dreams which are as much from God as are our other afflictions, or other warnings. There is a scripture in which God is mentioned as speaking to us in dreams in the visions of the night, when deep sleep falleth upon man." She laughed again, and said, "You have verses in the Bible for everything that suits your purpose, but I do not choose to be warned by you in such a way, and I have no doubt but I shall get it out of my head in a day or two." "Anna, we beseech you to tell us; if you have really a dream from heaven, you surely would wish to forget it." And if not, we will let you to laugh it off." She answered in a sulky mood, "Well if you must know it, you may no doubt it was very extraordinary: I should have considered it the effect of the ball, but that I never anywhere saw any thing at all resembling it, and you must not suppose that you can understand the meaning of what I am going to say, for you never saw, nor can you imagine any thing at all like it."

THE DREAM.

"I thought that I was walking in a wide street of a great city, many people were walking there besides myself, but there was something in the air that immediately struck me; they all seemed thoughtful, yet cheerful, neither occupied with business nor with gaiety, but having about them such dignity of pose, such high settled purpose, such perfect purity, as are never stamped upon mortal brows. The light of the city was also strange; it was not the sun, for there was nothing dazzling; it was not the moon, for all was lovely and changeless. As I looked at the buildings they all seemed like palaces, but not like palaces of earth. The pavement that I walked on, and the houses that I saw, were all all of gold—bright, shining, and clear as glass. The large and glittering windows seemed like divided rainbows, and were made to receive and remit nothing but the light of gladness. It was indeed a place where hope might dwell, where love might dwell! and I could not but be crying as I went along, "Surely these are the habitations of righteousness and truth and peace." All was perfect, bright and beautiful. I could not tell what was wanting to make me wish for eternity in such a place, and every purity oppressed me. I saw nothing genial, though looks of love and kindness met me in every face of that happy throng. Nothing responsive, but walked on all alone in the midst of the crowd, oppressed and sad. I saw that they all went one way, I followed on wondering at the reason, at length I saw them all cross over to a building larger and finer than the rest; I saw it ascend its massive steps and enter beneath its ample porch. I felt no desire to go to them, but out of curiosity I approached as to the steps. I saw persons enter who were dressed in every varied color, and in all the costumes of all nations; but they disappeared within the porch, and then I saw them all in the hall all in white. Oh! that I could have told you that Hall,—it was not crystal, it was not marble, it was not gold—but light! The light consolidated into form. It was the light without her coldness, it was the sun without his dazzling rays. And within was a fair ease mounting upwards, all of light; I saw it touched by the moving feet, and white and spotless garments of those who entered it; it was indeed passing fair; but it made me shudder and turn away. As I turned away one on the lower step looking at me with an interest so intense, and a manner so pious, that I stopped to hear what he had to say; he spoke like liquid music, and asked, "Why do you turn away? Is there a pleasure elsewhere? Is there pleasure in the land of darkness?" I stood in silence, he urged me to enter, but I neither answered nor moved, and suddenly he disappeared, and another took his place with the same look and manner; I wished to avoid him, but stood riveted to the spot. "Art thou come so late, and wilt thou lose thy labor? Put off thy own garments and take the white robe." He continued to press me until I became weary and angry, and said, "I will not enter; I do not like your livery, and I am oppressed with your whiteness." He sighed and was gone. Many passers-by looked at me with mingled pity and kindness, and pressed to follow them, and offered me a hand up the steps; but I rejected them all, and stood melancholy and dejected. At length one bright angel stationed on the steps came up to me and entreated me to enter, with a voice in a manner which I could not resist. "Do not turn," he said, "where else canst thou find? Do not linger, for why shouldst thou grieve thyself for naught? Enter here and find happiness. Do not all tribes and all nations pass into that Hall? and are they all washed and clothed and comforted?" He gave me his hand and I entered the hall along with my happy guide. Oh what a light burst upon my sight as I reached the summit! But mortal language cannot describe it, nor mortal fancy in any conceive it. These are the living sapphires? Where are the glittering stars that are like the bright light in which I stood? Where are the forms and the looks of love that breathed in the numerous company which moved around me? I sank down overpowered and wretched, I crept into a corner and tried to hide myself, I saw and felt that I had nothing in unison with the blessed existence of such a place. I moved in a dance to music—to songs that never fall upon mortal ears. My guide departed with rapture, and I was left alone. I saw the tall forms, all fair, all bright in their ineffable felicity; their songs and looks of gratitude forming the countenances and the differences of each. At length I saw one taller than the rest, and in every way more fair, far more dignified, more awfully—surpassingly fair, to a degree surpassing thought, and to him each eye was turned, and in his face, each face was brightened; the songs and the dance were in his honor, and all seemed to derive from him their life and joy.

As I gazed in trembling and speechless amazement, one who saw me, left the company, came to where I sat, and said, "Why art thou so silent? Come quickly, unite in the dance and join in the song." I felt a sudden anger in my heart and I answered with sharpness, "I will not join in your song for I know not the tune, and I cannot join in the dance for I know not the measure." He sighed, and with a look of most humiliating pity, he resumed his place. A moment after another came and addressed me as the other had done, and with the same temper I answered in the same way, and he looked as if he could have resigned his own dazzling glory to have changed me; and if heaven can know anguish he seemed to feel it. But he left me and returned to his place. What could it be that put such a temper in my heart?

At length the Lord of that glorious company, of all those living, breathing, glittering forms of life, light and beauty, of those sounds of harmony, and those songs of triumph, saw me, and came himself to speak to me. I thrilled in every part with awe, I felt my blood chill, and my flesh tremble, and yet my heart grew harder, and my voice grew bolder. He spoke! and deep-toned music issued from his lips: "Why sittest thou so still, and all around thee are so glad? Come, join in the dance, for I have triumphed. Come, join in the song, for my people reign!" Love unspeakable he seemed to beam upon me, as though it would have melted the heart of a stone. I felt it, but melted not. I gazed an instant, and then said, "I will not join in the song, for I know not the tune; and I will not join in the dance, for I know not the measure." Creation would have fled at the change of his countenance. His glance was lightning, and his voice louder than ten thousand thunders. He said to me, "Then what dost thou here?" The floor beneath me opened, and I sank into flames and torments, and, with a dreadful fright, I awoke.

There was a momentary silence, for the sisters were shocked and surprised at the dream, and they neither of them thought the substance of it, nor the deep impression it had made on Anna's volatile mind, to be the effects of any natural cause. "Anna," they said, "we cannot help you to forget such a dream as this: we surely believe it came from God, and it may be greatly blessed to your soul if you seek to make it so. Your description of the Holy City might have been from impressions of the Bible account, being much the same as that described in Revelations, 'The city has no need of the sun, nor of the moon, for the temple of God is there, and the Lamb is the light thereof.' All who enter must put off their own garments and their own righteousness, and must be clothed in linen, clean and white, for the righteousness of the saints is of me, saith the Lord. And those who walk in the heavenly temple are they who have come through great tribulation, and have washed their robes and made them white in the blood of the Lamb, and they cease not day nor night praising God and singing the new song, such as none know but the redeemed. It is the song of Moses and the Lamb, and wisdom waits daily upon the steps to call the sons of men into her temple, and the people of God aim to persuade them to tread in her paths; and ministers of Christ are set to watch for souls, and by every means possible to save some. O Anna! you do know something of the way; do give up your own will and listen to this fearful warning. Join us, and learn the steps which lead to heaven, and how to sing the songs of Zion."

Anna's brow again darkened, and she answered, "I do not want you to preach to me. I shall do as I please!"

She continued in this melancholy state to the end of the week, when she was found in her room a corpse. No one knew the cause of her death. She died without bodily disease,—and without any apparent change of mind.

Political Influence of Mechanical Inventions.—The closing years of the eighteenth century witnessed the beginning of a series of great mechanical inventions, which changed with unexampled rapidity the whole course of English industry, and in little more than a generation created manufacturing centres unequalled in the world. Scarcely any event in modern history has exercised a wider social and political influence than this sudden growth of the manufacturing towns, and it brought with it some political and moral dangers of the gravest kind. It was in many respects a movement of disintegration, breaking the ties of sympathy between class and class, and destroying the habits of discipline and subordination that once extended through the whole community. Forms of industry which had hitherto been carried on in the domestic circle, or in small establishments, under the constant supervision of the master, were transferred to the crowded manufactory. Labor became more nomadic. All the ties of habit and tradition were relaxed. Working men, drawn from the most distant quarters, were agglomerated by thousands in great towns, bound to their employers by no other tie than that of interest, exposed to the fever of an immensely stimulated competition, and to the trying ordeal of sudden, rapid and unforeseen fluctuations in their wages and their employments.

Wealth was immensely increased, but the inequalities of its distribution were aggravated. The contrast between extravagant luxury and abject poverty became much more frequent and much more glaring than before. The wealthy employer ceased to live among his people; the quarters of the rich and the poor became more distant, and every great city soon presented those sharp divisions of classes and districts in which the political observer discovers one of the most dangerous symptoms of revolution.

Every change of condition which widens the chasm and impairs the sympathy between rich and poor, cannot fail, however beneficial it may be in its other effects, to bring with it grave dangers to the State. It is incontestable, that the immense increase of manufacturing industry has had this tendency.—Lecky.

The way to be truly great is to be truly humble.

For "The Friend."

RETROSPECT.

"And thou shalt remember all the way which the Lord thy God led thee."—Deut. viii. 2.

The year is almost gone; and can we say,
As we look back upon its devious way,
And see how thorns among the roses grew,
And number joys and trials in the view—
The backward view, of all this twelve-month gone,
In which, in some sort, we have journeyed on,— Ah, can we say, in measuring every rood,
We've made some upward progress toward the Good?
We better see, in retrospect, the scope
Of landscape over which we've passed, in hope
To reach some point—some eminence to gain.
If, happily, we reach it, not the pain
Of toil or effort we account, as back
Our vision wanders o'er the rugged track,
Or steep ascent. Enough, the point is gained;
The object after which we reached, attained.
It may be, Alps on Alps above still rise
To rouse our effort, and attract our eyes;
Yet, looking down, we see we've left below,
Some distance, though we still have far to go
Ere we attain the summit lost in cloud,
From range of our short vision; misty cloud
Enwrapping from the sense the utmost bound,
That may by human aspirant be found.
So now, with setting sun of the old year,
As this, its hour of twilight draweth near,
Back let us turn our vision o'er the past.
With hues, flame-colored, is it overcast?
Are e'en its clouds resplendent with the light
Truth sheds? Are they bespangled in colors bright,
Which form a bow of promise from the hand
That paints in tints eternal? Comprehend?
And as we backward view its early morn,
When, from the dying year 'twas newly born,
And see the point from which we started then,
Do we behold, our path has upward been?
And is our altitude a higher one
Than when this closing year was first begun?
E'en then, no doubt, we are amazed to see How devious an upward path may be;
And wonder at the patience of our Guide,
Who, ever gentle, led us by the side
Of cooling streams, and into pastures rare;
And plucked the vintage and the blossoms fair,
Whene'er our wilfulness would let Him choose
The good, our wayward hearts so oft refuse.

And when our view descends some cavern passed,
In his hand do we see our own hand clasped?
And do we see the lamp his goodness gave
To guide our feet, and from a misstep save?
And do we hear the cadence of his voice,
Persuading toward the right our erring choice?
Now here, now there, perhaps our eye may see,
Along the path, dew of our tears. (To me,
To you, tears needs must come. Our Saviour wept;
And through, not from our sorrow are we kept).
But, do we see this shimmering dew alight,
As diamonds flash before the admiring sight?
And do we see that in them was a ray
Caught from the Orb that makes eternal day?
Disguised are blessings, many times, in sighs;
For through them holy orisons may rise.

Perhaps we see a trace of bleeding feet,
Where, from the way, we followed some deceit,
Lured by the glare of ignes fatui;
False, fickle colors, which, pursued, do fly;
Eluding thus the hand that fain would clasp
The promised pleasure in its eager grasp;
Eluding, yet alluring still, till soon,
Instead of seizing the expected boon,
We find our feet ensnared in tangled mesh,
Or treading thorns, or rocks which cut afresh
Wounds that had healed, did not our wilful bent Pursue false pleasure with such keen intent.
And now, as thorns, and rocks, and bleeding feet,
And stains, in looking back, our vision meet,
Do we see too some lesson by them learned—
Some wisdom gained, e'en though 'twas dearly earned?

The year is almost gone. When first 'twas born,
Perhaps it brought to us a glowing morn,
As, through the brazen gates of day its light
Loomed golden up to our expectant sight.
Now, looking back, do we find woven through
The golden thread of love? And did we strew
Seed that will bear to us eternal fruit?
To suppliant need did we kind action suit?
And through our sorrow, waywardness and tears,
Have we lived better than in other years?

Near summer's close, there comes the after-math;
Which, for the feet of death, spreads verdant path
Ere warm breath of this season turns to chill,
And all its pulsing life is hushed and still.

At eventide there comes the afterglow,
In soft, rich tints of light, as if to show
Earth beautiful ere yet it sinks to rest;
All lulled to quiet on its ample breast.

So now, as dies to us the closing year,
Ere leaf and bloom of life are growing sear,
Does it reveal to us the verdure rare,
Warmed by heaven's sun, fed by celestial air,
And watered by the dews that Hermon shed,
With gentle grace upon its lowly bed,
Where erst the sickle may have reaped before,
First-fruits to garner in eternal store?
And now, at evening, do we see the glow
Caught from the rays the setting orb doth throw—
The setting sun of this another year,
Whose parting knell will soon fall on the ear?
And does the purple twilight promise give
Of good and truth that shall eternal live?
If these things be, then we need not to stop
And on its bier the tear of sorrow drop;
But, where the old year and the new year meet,
Lay down the old year,—peace its winding sheet;—
And, from the errors of the year just gone,
Learn lessons that shall help us journey on
In path less devious; keeping close beside
The right hand of our ever-present Guide,
Till He shall lead us where the field doth grow
More green and ample; where celestial glow
Is caught from warming, radiant, central Sun,
Who warms to life all else,—th' Eternal One.

A. L. WASHBURN.

Philada., 12th mo. 13th, 1882.

Testimony of Plainfield Monthly Meeting of Friends, Indiana, Concerning our Late well esteemed Friend, Robert W. Hodson.

It is from consideration of duty that we are led to preserve a tribute to the memory of those whose daily walk through life has been devoted to the cause of truth and righteousness, and whose example has adorned their profession, as also an incentive to their successors to walk in the same path in which they have walked through the varied trials and vicissitudes of time to the crown of all, a peaceful close in a well-grounded hope of a happy immortality.

The subject of this memorial was born in Guilford county, North Carolina, the 7th day of 1st mo. 1797. He was the son of Jesse and Mary Hodson, members of the Society of Friends.

In 1831, he removed with his family to Hendricks county, Indiana, and continued to reside in the same county the remainder of his life.

We have but little account of his early life, except that it was characterized by piety and self-denial, and a commendable solicitude for the best welfare of his associates, often warning them of the great loss they sustained in mis-spending their time in games and sports, especially on the first day of the week. About the eighteenth year of his age he became so deeply concerned on this account that he invited his young friends to join him on First-day afternoons in reading the Holy Scriptures. These opportunities were continued for about two years, and, he believed, with beneficial results.

He labored earnestly for the promotion of schools under the protection of our Society, and that the teaching and influence of these schools might besuch as would lead to a course of life and conduct consistent with our profession.

Being early brought into active service in the Society, he became a useful and efficient member in the setting up and establishment of many meetings in the early settlement of this country in Indiana and Western Yearly Meetings.

The depth of his discernment and Christian experience, combined with his tenderness, humility of spirit, eminently fitted him for service in the severe test for the maintenance of the doctrines and good order to which Society has of late been subjected.

He frequently felt it to be his duty to travel with ministers engaged in the cause of Truth. In this way, and at other times with the probation of his friends at home, he attended all the Yearly Meetings on the American continent, and most of the meetings belonging to them—many of them more than once.

Often in meetings he was tenderly engaged in exhortation that all might give strict heed to the manifestations of the Grace of God.

He was a faithful attender of meeting; and the weight and solidity of his deportment, a good example both in silent retirement and in exhortation; and we believe he was favored to draw near the Fountain from whence all good comes, and by faithfulness to the light of Christ in his own heart, he was eminently fitted and prepared to usefully occupy the station of an elder for many years to the satisfaction of friends; and he watched faithfully over the members of the meeting to which he belonged for their preservation in the right way.

He was concerned to support the discipline in the authority of Truth, and to encourage the humble Christian traveller in the way of his duty, he being an example of true Christian humility.

His exemplary walk among men not only secured him the love and esteem of his friends, but was pleasingly testified by others by whom he was esteemed for his moral and social virtues.

He was a good example in plainness of mode; moderation; plain in speech, deportment; apparel, fulfilling the requisitions of the discipline; moderate in the furniture of his home, and in the manner of living; possessing good things of the world as using, and not abusing them.

His faith was firm in the Christian religion, and in the efficacy of the one offering made by our blessed Saviour for the salvation of men; and his belief was firm, not only in the divine and spiritual appearance in the hearts of men, but also in that outward sacrifice which He made for the sins of the world.

The last few months of his life were spent in the State of Kansas, his time being very much occupied in visiting the meetings of families of Friends. Of this last service Friends there have given testimony of his consistent example and edifying counsel and labor.

Thus our dear friend was blessed with a green old age, and peacefully passed away the eighty-sixth year of his age, on the 1st day of the Second month, 1882, whilst grieved about his Father's business, and gathered as a shock of corn fully ripe, fit for the heavenly garner.

Commit thy Ways to God.—"Fret not thyself because of evil doers" is God's command; but man is apt to think that it is necessary for him, under some circumstances, to do the very opposite. "That unscrupulous man," says he, "is secretly plotting to carry his point, and using every means in his power, honorably or dishonorably; and I must meet him with counter-plots." It would be quite to rest a matter with the Lord, if every else would do the same; but to allow ourselves to take no doubtful step in meeting those who are dishonorable—to simply do that which is right and manly and Christian, and then commit the case to the Lord, and not fret about it, that is one of the hard things to do, unless we really trust in God. With God's word to support us we can afford to leave every such case with him, after we have done our duty in his fear. We then leave his word for it that He will make the light to triumph.

For "The Friend."

842. 12th mo. The time called Christmas is near at hand, and many are making preparation to celebrate that day with festivity and rejoicing, and are endeavoring to teach other in the decoration of their places of worship, their dwellings, and business surroundings, professedly in honor of the birth of our Redeemer. That distant period of time, doubtless was felt to be joyous to many, who in faith looked for, and waited for, his appearance personally amongst men; and only we have yet cause to rejoice in the goodness of our Heavenly Father in sending his well-beloved Son upon earth, to promulgate and more fully establish the new covenant, with its manifold blessings, and to leave behind the rich legacy of divine precepts and promises of saving grace. And although we are abundant cause to be thankful for these precious dispensations of a bountiful Providence; yet there are those who are not able to see wherein there is greater cause for rejoicing on one day than upon another, or that the outward show of rejoicing is any substantial evidence of inward and secret thanksgivings of grateful hearts; and even where perilous demonstrations are thought allowable, it is to be feared that many who profess to testify their thankfulness by the suspension of labor, by decoration, rejoicing and festivity, are but gratifying their sensual propensities by revelling in luxurious indulgence, with scarce a thought of the great end they profess to celebrate; and that the favor which should rather be remembered with thankful humility, as unmerited of our part and granted only in mercy, too often proves an occasion, resulting in excesses from commendable. There are those who desire to retain a thankful remembrance of that love which constrained our Saviour to leave the bosom of his Father, and for our sakes visit the earth, clothed in the form of manhood, touched with a feeling of our infirmities, and pointing out the way which leads to everlasting life; who desire to remember this condescension and love to mankind with grateful hearts, whenever it is presented to the mind, let it be upon what day, or what occasion it may; but who do not think it required of them to give evidence that they have not forgotten his mission upon earth by festivity or any vain show; and who are apprehensive that quiet thanksgiving in the secret of the soul, is more precious in the divine sight than any worldly demonstration. It is to be feared that numbers look forward to the indulgence of self-gratification at this season, more than to any other special object, and that their thoughts are led away from the event they profess to celebrate by the very means they employ to keep it in remembrance.

B.

The Language of Christ.

BY PHILIP SCHAFF.

What language did our Saviour speak? Greek? or Hebrew? or both? and in what proportion? As the Son of man and Saviour of the world, he was above the limitations of race, nationality and language. He was absolutely perfect, the model for universal imitation. Nevertheless he was a historical person, and as such, had a well-defined individuality. He was born and raised in Palestine, was a Jew, dressed, ate, spake, and lived like his countrymen. How could he have been understood by them if he had not addressed them in their own tongue? What then was this tongue?

He wrote nothing. He is himself the Book of Life to be read by all men. He stamped his image upon the world's history and upon every human heart and life that yields itself to his transforming and sanctifying influence. But some of his disciples wrote books,—the New Testament. And they all wrote Greek. Only one of them, Matthew, is said to have written his Gospel first in Hebrew, and afterwards in Greek. Even James, the brother of the Lord, who spent all his public life in Jerusalem, as far as we know, addressed his Epistle to the twelve tribes of Israel in the Greek language.

The Greek was the language of civilization, and of international intercourse. Since the conquests of Alexander the Great, who carried the Greek into the Orient, and still more since the conquests of Rome, which united all the nations from the banks of the Euphrates and the Nile to the banks of the Rhine and the shores of the Atlantic, the Greek had become the cosmopolitan language, as the French was on the Continent in the last century, and as the English is now in the British colonies and in North America. This was one of the providential preparations for the introduction and spread of Christianity.

The Greek penetrated into Palestine two or three hundred years before Christ. This is evident from the numerous Greek names of Jews, and of places of Palestine, from coins and inscriptions, from the Greek version of the Old Testament which was used by the Apostles and Evangelists, from the large number of Greek-speaking Jews, called "Hellenists," from the writings of Philo and Josephus, who wrote in Greek, and from the New Testament itself. For it need not be supposed that the sacred writers learned the Greek language miraculously on the day of Pentecost. They had abundant opportunity to learn it naturally in their youth, on the street and in common intercourse with their fellow-men, especially in Galilee, their native province, which was full of Greek-speaking Gentiles.

We have no doubt that our Lord used the Greek language when speaking with strangers, and with heathens, with such persons as the Syrophenician woman, the heathen centurion, the "Greeks" who called on him shortly before the passion, King Herod, and Pontius Pilate. For a Roman governor appointed for a short time would hardly learn Hebrew, and no interpreter is mentioned.

But we cannot agree with those scholars who maintain that Christ used the Greek language exclusively or even chiefly. We must distinguish between the common everyday language of the people, and the occasional language of the higher classes, and of business men. Palestine was at the time of Christ a bilingual country, like the frontier countries on the continent (Alsace, Lorraine, Posen, some cantons of Switzerland), or like Wales in England, or Eastern Canada, or the German counties of Pennsylvania. The popular language was the Hebrew, or rather the Aramaic, a cognate dialect which supplanted the Hebrew after the Babylonian exile. In this their native tongue our Saviour would address the people.

We have the positive proof of that in several words which have been preserved to us in the Gospel of Mark, which is the faithful echo of the original impressions of St. Peter. When our Saviour was to call the daughter of Jairus back to life, he addressed her in the Aramaic words Talitha cumi; that is, "Damsel, arise." When he opened the ear of the deaf and dumb man in Decapolis, he said to him Ephphatha; that is, "Be opened." And when he reached the height of his vicarious suffering on the cross, he exclaimed, again in Aramaic, Eloi, Eloi (the Hebrew would be Eli, Eli), lama sabachthani? that is, "My God, my God, why hast thou forsaken me?" —S. S. Times.

The total product of bituminous coal in the United States for the census year closing June, 1880, amounted to 40,311,459 tons, of 2,000 pounds to the ton, divided among the States as follows: Alabama 322,934 tons, Arkansas 14,778, Georgia 154,644, Illinois 6,089,514, Indiana, 1,449,496, Iowa 1,422,333, Kansas 763,297, Kentucky 935,857, Maryland 2,227,844, Michigan 100,800, Missouri 543,900, Nebraska 200, North Carolina 700, Ohio 3,932,853, Pennsylvania 18,000,988, Tennessee 494,891, Virginia 40,520, West Virginia 1,792,570. The number of laborers engaged in mining this vast amount of coal was 96,475, and the wages paid them were $30,707,059. There are only two States that produce anthracite coal, Pennsylvania and Rhode Island. The former produced 28,640,819 tons and the latter 6,175 tons during the census year. The grand total of coal produced was 71,067,567 tons, and the grand total of hands employed was 170,505. The census bulletin makes comparison with the English production. The population of England is 25,000,000. The production of coal in that country in 1855 was 64,661,401 tons; in 1877, 136,179,968 tons, and in 1880, 146,818,122 tons. The number of collieries in England in 1880 was 3380, and in the United States 3,264. The production of coal in England, in an area about the size of Ohio and with half the population of the United States, is double that of this country. England is supposed to be about up to its maximum, while this country is in the infancy of its coal development.

In the 10th mo. 1778, I saw a person confined to a sick bed, who appeared to be in great distress of mind. He confessed that he had been tenderly visited in order for his reformation, but, said he, "I did not keep close to it." He manifested much concern that others might be warned of their danger, and excited to look about themselves and see where they stand; saying, in some agony of mind, "If I had kept up in all things, O Lord, how blessed, how happy, should I now be!" —J. Scott.

For "The Friend."

Several interesting anecdotes of dogs that have appeared in "The Friend," under the heading of "Natural History and Science," brought to my mind an incident that was related to me some years since. A Friend living in the country, had been taking a ramble with his dog, and on his return home, after walking through a field, and finally crossing over a fence into a lane, he found he had lost his pocket-handkerchief. When on handing another to his dog to see, and to smell, and pointing to the fence they had just crossed, the dog appeared fully to understand him; and immediately went over into the field, and trotted about back and forth, but soon returned to his master, wagging his tail, and with a bright face seemed to be telling him it was not there. He was however directed to go and try again. Over he went, and after running about lither and thither, and again failing to find it, he slowly returned with tail between his legs and ears disconsolately turned back, and an expression which seemed to say, it was all in vain, the handkerchief was not there. But his master sent him a third time. After crossing the fence and going a short distance into the field, he stopped and stood still, with eyes cast down, as if pondering what he could do. Ere long, he walked to one side of the field, and began trotting round near enough to the fence—his face being turned towards it—to have seen the handkerchief, had it been between the fence and his circuit. On returning from this trip to his starting point, he set off again at about the same distance from his first circuit, as that had been from the fence, so that had the lost article been there, he could not have failed seeing it, his face being persistently turned in that direction. And thus he trotted round and round in the same scientific manner, until he found the handkerchief. How near this dog's course approaches to the reasoning power of the human brain, we leave the reader to judge.

How a Statesman Controlled his Temper.—When M. de Persigny was French Minister of the Interior he received a visit one day from a friend, who, on sending up his name, was shown into the great man's sanctum. A warm discussion arose between them. Suddenly an usher entered and handed the Minister a note. On opening it he at once changed his tone of voice, and assumed a quiet and urbane manner. Puzzled as to the contents of the note, and by the marked effect it had so produced upon the Minister, his friend cast a furtive glance at it, when, to his astonishment, he perceived that it was simply a plain sheet of paper, without a scratch upon it! More puzzled than ever, the gentleman, after a few minutes, took his leave, and proceeded to interrogate the usher, to whom he was well-known, for he himself had been Minister of the Interior.

"You have," said he, "Just handed to the Minister a note, folded up, which had a most extraordinary effect upon him. Now, it was a plain sheet of paper, with nothing written upon it. What did it mean?"

"Sir," replied the usher, "here is the explanation, which I must beg you to keep secret, for I do not wish to compromise myself. My master is very liable to lose his temper. As he himself is aware of his weakness, he has ordered me, each time that his voice is raised sufficiently to be audible in the ante-room, without delay to place a sheet of paper in an envelope and take it to him. That reminds him that his temper is getting the better of him, and he at once calms himself. Just now I heard his voice rising, and immediately carried out my instructions."

Shrines in Baluchistan.—"We crossed the Pazgr River, and then passed a shrine consisting simply of a heap of stones to which every passer-by contributed something. Men mounted on camels will throw their sticks on to it, and men on foot will pick up a stone and throw it on, and should their grass sandals be worn out, they will keep them till they come to a shrine and drop them there.

The origin of this puzzled me at first, but afterwards, while journeying along the pilgrims' road to Kerbela, I found shrines exactly similar, and received both from pilgrims and natives of the country, what I have no doubt to be the true explanation.

On the stony parts of the Kerbela road through Kurdistan these stone heaps are especially frequent, and immediately suggest the idea that they are crude attempts at road-clearing; and the natives all say that the mullas have given out that it behoves all true believers passing along the road, to cast at least one stone on each heap, to make the road easier to the holy pilgrims, thereby becoming part-sharers in the latter's sanctity. The custom has been introduced into Baluchistan, where it is certainly particularly wanted, while the reason for it is not realized by such splendid hill walkers as the Baluchis, who always aver that each heap marks the burial place of some saint."—Floyer's Baluchistan.

Returning Good for Evil.—It has been said of Archbishop Leighton, that if any man did him an injury he was ever afterwards most anxious to do that man a good turn. The same has been remarked of Cotton Mather and other eminent Christians. Barkitt beautifully observes in his journal, that some persons would never have had a share in his prayers but for the injuries they had done him. When some of the courtiers of Philip the Good would have persuaded him to punish a person who had used him ill, he declined, saying, "It is a fine thing to have revenge in one's power, but it is a finer thing not to use it."

There is a way, however, of revenging ourselves, which is always in our power, and which we should avail ourselves of: "Love your enemies, bless them that curse you, do good to them that hate you, and pray for them which despitefully use you and persecute you." A missionary once preached upon these words of our Saviour, and a Hindoo gentleman who was present was so impressed by them that he said to some of his friends, "What a beautiful doctrine! Love your enemies. Certainly there is nothing in our shasters like that."

The following is a touching illustration of the spirit which Christianity begets, contrasted with that which heathenism inspires: Two men living in the southern part of Africa had a quarrel, and became bitter enemies to each other. Soon after, one of them found a little girl belonging to his enemy in the woods, at some distance from her father's house. He seized her and cut off two of her fingers; and as he sent her home screaming with her bleeding hands, he cried, "I have had revenge."

Years passed away. The little girl grown up to be almost a woman. One day there came to her father's door a poor, worn-out, grey-headed old man, who asked something to eat. She knew him at once; the cruel man who had cut off her fingers. She went into the hut, and ordered the servant to take him bread and meat as much as he could eat, and sat down and watched him eat it.

When he had finished, she dropped the covering that hid her hands from view, and holding them up before him, she said, "I have had my revenge!" The man was overwhelmed with surprise. The secret of the girl's conduct was, that in the meantime she had become a Christian, and had learned the meaning of the verse, "If thine enemy hungry, give him bread to eat; if he be thirsty give him water to drink; for in so doing thou shalt heap coals of fire upon his head."

How beautiful the conduct of this injured Christian girl appears in contrast with that of her heathen enemy! Let us imitate such conduct, and endeavor by God's grace to follow closely the teaching and example of Him who is the bright pattern of the Christian life. Jesus conquers by kindness and love. When we were enemies, He died for us; and in proportion as we have his spirit shall we manifest love and kindness towards any who have injured us or are unfriendly towards us.—Christian Banner.

For "The Friend."

Religious Items, &c.

A Unitarian Confession.—At a meeting of Unitarians in Boston, held in last month, George Ellis, a clergyman of that denomination, made the following statement. "Fifty years of study, thought, and reading, given largely to the Bible, and to the literature which peculiarly relates to it, have brought me to this conclusion, that the Book—taken with the especial Divine quality and character claimed for it, and so extensively assigned to it as inspired and infallible, as a whole, and all its contents—is an orthodox book. It yields what is called the orthodox creed. The vast majority of its readers, following its letter, its obvious sense, its natural meaning, and, yielding to the impression which some of its emphatic texts make upon them, find in it orthodoxy. Only that kind of ingenious, special, discriminative, and—in candor, I must add—forced treatment which receives from us Liberals, can make the book teach any thing but orthodoxy. The Evangelical sects, so-called, are clearly right in maintaining that their view of Scripture and of its doctrines draws a deep and wide division of creed between them and ourselves."

Intolerance in Russia.—According to the existing Russian law, apostacy from the State religion entails severer penalties than the murder. A Russian subject who abandons the orthodox faith for any other whatever, deprived of his children, his estate is handed over to guardians appointed by the State, and he himself is liable to prosecution by the Holy Synod until he abjures. The Golos remarks that this severity defeats its own object, and advises that this antiquated legislation should be abolished in favor of full religious tolerance and liberty of conscience after the example of Western Europe.

For "The Friend."

Natural History, Science, &c.

North American Floras.—The first description of North American plants published as a completed work, was that of Michaux, which was issued in 1803. Michaux was a Frenchman, and his explorations, made between the year 1785 and 1796 extended from Hudson's Bay to Florida. He crossed the Alleghany Mountains in Tennessee, and reached the Mississippi river in Illinois. His flora of flowering plants and ferns contained 30 species.

Pursh's Flora was published in 1814. He is a native of Siberia, who came to this country when a young man, and during much of his life was laboring in the botanical field. He died at Montreal in 1820, at the age of 40.

Michaux's descriptions were confined to the plants east of the Mississippi River, but Pursh included in his work, plants from the Great Plains, the Rocky Mountains, and the Pacific Coast—localities at that time only very partially investigated. He described 3,076 species—just about double the number contained in the flora of Michaux.

The Flora of North America commenced by Gray & Gray in 1835, has never been completed—but the volumes published show a great increase in the number of species over the corresponding orders described in the flora of Pursh. Professor Gray and his assistants are now laboring at this great work, and rapid has been the accumulation of species, owing to the activity of botanical research, that it is estimated that when finished it will embrace from ten to twelve thousand flowering plants and ferns—inhabiting all parts of North America lying north of the Mexican border.

Confidence Returned.—A little girl about five years old, wandered from her nurse and was lost. At last the child was found asleep in the kennel of a peculiarly savage bloodhound, named "Rob." The dog was jealously guarding his little charge, and would not allow one to approach, until the mother came. She called the child, who came to her, followed by Rob. She took the child home, but insisted on accompanying them; and as she went, the little girl held her mother with one hand and Rob's ear with the other—the dog being so small and Rob so large that he had to walk all the way with his head bent down.

We have read an account of a boy who went to a stable inhabited by a notoriously savage horse. He did not know the character of the animal, gave him bread and other delicacies, and the horror of the groom may be imagined when one day he found the boy lying on the floor of the stable—the boy not having the slightest knowledge of the character of the horse, and therefore not having the least intention of hurting the boy, but cherishing him as a valued companion.—J. G. Wood.

Nests.—About 15 years ago, on a journey to the graveyard of the church at Ebenezer, Georgia, we were struck with the appearance of several very large nests near the tops of some tall evergreen oaks (Quercus aquatica); on disturbing the nests, we discovered them to be inhabited by a number of Florida parrots, of all sizes, some of which descended readily to the ground, whilst others escaped to the highest branches, where they were concealed among the leaves. These nests in certain situations, are of enormous size. We have observed some of them on trees, at a height of from 10 to 20 feet from the ground, where wild vines had made a tangled mass overhead, which appeared to be larger than a cart-wheel, and contained a mass of leaves and sticks that would have more than filled a barrel.—Audubon & Bachman.

Prevention and Restriction of Diphtheria.—The Board of Health, Phila., recommend the observance of the following rules:

"Recent investigations having proved that the poison of diphtheria is portable, communicable by infection, and capable of reproducing itself outside of the human body, diphtheria must now be ranked as both a contagious and infectious disease. The following rules are therefore more imperative than ever before:

"Every person known to be sick with diphtheria should be promptly and effectually isolated from the public. Children residing in a house where there is a case of diphtheria should not be permitted to attend school.

"When a case of diphtheria is fully developed, the same precautions in regard to free ventilation, disposal and disinfection of discharges, bed or body linen, and so forth, isolation during convalescence (or management of the corpse should death unfortunately occur), &c., &c., ought to be enforced, which have already been recommended in regard to small-pox.

"It is particularly important that persons whose throats are tender or sore from any cause should avoid possible exposure to the contagion of diphtheria. Children under ten years of age are in much greater danger of taking the disease, and after they do take it of dying from it, than are grown persons. But adults are not exempt, and mild cases in them may cause whole series of fatal attacks among children.

"Numerous instances are recorded where the contagion of diphtheria has retained its virulence for weeks or months, in cesspools, heaps of decaying vegetable matter, damp walls, &c., and been carried for long distances in clothing, in sewers, in waste pipes from stationary washstands and in other conduits. Hence all sewer connections and other carriers of filth should be well ventilated and disinfected, and children particularly should not be allowed to breathe the air of any water-closet, cesspool or sewer into which discharges from patients sick with diphtheria have entered, nor to drink water or milk which has been exposed to such air.

"Beware of any person who has a sore throat; do not kiss such a person or take his or her breath; do not drink from the same cup, blow the same whistle, nor put his pencil or pen into your mouth.

"Do not wear nor handle clothing which has been worn by a person during sickness or convalescence from diphtheria."

THE FRIEND.

TWELFTH MONTH 30, 1882.

The near approach of the close of the year suggests to the mind the wisdom shown in that arrangement of the Creator and Ruler of all things, by which the lapse of time is marked by the constant recurrence of day and night, of the monthly revolutions of the moon and the annual course of the earth around the sun, with its attendant change of seasons.

These mutations are frequent reminders to us of the corresponding changes to which we ourselves are subject. The coming of the night, when the day is ended, so naturally suggests to the mind the physical death which inevitably follows the active scenes of life, that it is a constantly recurring simile of poets and moralists.

By general consent, the close of one year and the commencement of another is the time most commonly selected by men of business for reviewing the operations of the past, and making arrangements for the future. This wise and prudent course is specially advised by our Discipline, which recommends that Friends carefully inspect the state of their affairs at least once in the year, and make their wills and settle their outward estates while in health.

How many persons have been brought into great and unexpected trials, even to bringing reproach on the religion they profess, through want of care in this respect? A thorough and timely investigation of their business operations, and family expenses would have showed them, that their estates were gradually diminishing; and they would thus have been awakened to a sense of the need of more exertion or more economy, or both; and induced to make the necessary changes to prevent the financial embarrassments in which they were gradually becoming entangled. But for want of this prudent care, some have gone on with their eyes blinded, until their capital has wasted away, and it has been out of their power to discharge their obligations.

Is not this point of time, one well suited for the still more important inquiries: "What progress am I making in my heavenward journey? Am I increasingly desirous above all other things, to know and do the will of the Lord? Do I daily feel his power operating on my mind, giving me strength to resist temptation, and bringing me into communion with Him, the Father of Spirits?"

We have received a copy of Vick's Floral Guide for 1883, a beautifully illustrated catalogue of seeds and plants, published by the successors of the late James Vick, at Rochester, N. Y.

SUMMARY OF EVENTS.

UNITED STATES.—In the U. S. Senate, the Agricultural Appropriation bill was passed; also the Indian Appropriation bill was considered, amended, and finally passed. In the House a joint resolution was reported from the Committee on Foreign Affairs and passed, reciting that "the Government of France proposes to establish at Tunis a judicial system common among Christian nations, so that the Courts in that country shall be fully opened for the protection of citizens of the United States in their person, property and rights," and authorizing the President "to declare by proclamation that the right on the part of the United States and its citizens to claim extra-territorial jurisdiction within said territory of Tunis has ceased, and will no longer be claimed or exercised." The total amount recommended in the Army Appropriation bill, which has been reported in the House, is $24,681,700. This is $1,733,754 less than the appropriation for the current year.

There is about $76,000,000 capital invested in the manufacturing of rubber goods in the United States, and about 15,000 persons are employed in 120 establishments, annually producing goods valued at $250,000,000, as shown by the late census. The amount of raw rubber consumed is about 30,000 tons per annum, which, with other ingredients used in the manufacturing, equals 300,000 tons. Raw rubber has lately been advanced in price to $1.25 per pound, while six years ago it could have been purchased at 48 cents. This industry has no rival in foreign countries.

A report has reached Leavenworth that the head chiefs of the Cheyennes, in the Indian Territory, have called a council to consider the organization of a government, Territorial in its features, the election of a Governor, Council and Legislature, and the levying of taxes, pro rata upon cattle raisers and herders.

Bradstreet's Journal estimates this year's cotton crop at 6,488,000 bales.

Vermont is said to produce more marble than any other State in the Union or than any country except this. The business has expanded with marvellous rapidity since 1870, when comparatively little Vermont marble was to be found in the market. The aggregate amount of the State's production the present year is 1,000,000 cubic feet, valued at over $2,000,000. The number of men employed in the quarries and mills exceeds 2,800, and it required 10,000 cars to carry the marble away. Nearly 1,000,000 was paid for the labor of workmen by the quarry owners.

The dredge of the Okeechobee Drainage Company, working up the Caloosahatchie river, in Florida, entered Lake Okeechobee on the 20th instant. This, it is said, "opens a navigable channel from the heart of the Everglades to the Gulf of Mexico."

A telegram from Concord, New Hampshire, says, that "one of the largest and most brilliant meteors ever observed" there, was seen on the 20th inst., in the afternoon, between four and five o'clock. It passed from west to east, and "was as plainly visible as meteors usually are after dark."

There were 413 deaths in this city last week, being 43 more than the previous week. Of this number, 206 were males and 207 females; 56 died of consumption; 41 of pneumonia; 29 of diphtheria; 20 of typhoid fever; 17 of marasmus, and 9 of scarlet fever.

Markets, &c.—U. S. 3's, 103 $\frac{1}{2}$; 3 $\frac{1}{2}$'s, 103 $\frac{1}{2}$; 4 $\frac{1}{2}$'s, 113 $\frac{3}{4}$; 4's, registered, 119 $\frac{1}{2}$; coupon, 120 $\frac{1}{2}$; currency 6's, 129 a 132.

Cotton.—Prices remain about the same as last quoted. Sales of middlings are reported at 10 $\frac{3}{4}$ a 10 $\frac{1}{2}$ cts. per lb. for uplands and New Orleans.

Petroleum.—Standard white, 7 a 7 $\frac{1}{2}$ cts. for export, and 8 a 8 $\frac{1}{2}$ cts. per gallon for home use.

Flour is quiet at former rates. Sales of 2800 barrels, including Minnesota extras, at $5 a $5.75; Pennsylvania family at $4.50 a $4.75; western do. at $4.80 a $5.60, and patents at $6 a $7. Rye flour is dull at $3.75 a $4 per barrel.

Grain.—Wheat continues dull, but prices were firmer. Sales of 4200 bushels red in ear lots at \$1.04 a \$1.10. Rye is nominal at 64 a 67 cts. Corn is dull and prices favor buyers. Sales of 8000 bushels in ear lots, at 52 a 67 $\frac{1}{2}$ cts. as to quality and location. Oats are dull and easier. Sales of 9000 bushels, in ear lots at 46 a 50 cts.

Hay and Straw Market, for week ending 12th mo. 23d, 1882.—Loads of hay, 208; loads of straw, 42. Average price during the week—Prime timothy, 95 cts. to $1.05 per 100 pounds; mixed, 95 cts. to $1.00 per 100 pounds; straw, 70 to 80 cts. per 100 pounds.

FOREIGN.—The correspondent of the Times, at Dublin, says the signs of distress among small farmers and laborers are becoming more visible in some districts. The Government is being pressed to establish relief works.

A largely attended meeting was held in London on the evening of the 24th inst., for the purpose of organizing a fund to relieve the distress in Ireland. Many telegrams and letters received from clergymen in Ireland, including Archbishop Croke, were read at the meeting, describing the outlook as gloomy and appalling, and stating that the people are on the verge of a famine. A resolution was passed urging the Government to take steps to prevent the people in Ireland from perishing from want of the necessities of life.

The Government has ordered the prosecution of Harrington, Secretary of the Organizing Committee of the Irish National League, for the speech delivered by him at Mullingar last Monday, for the purpose of forming a branch of the League, in which he said the more prosperous farmers must be told that, if they did not throw themselves into the new movement, they would have the whole force of the laborers' agitation directed against them. Prosecutions are pending against the proprietors of various provincial journals, for articles published by them inciting to crime.

Chamberlain, President of the Board of Trade, speaking at a meeting of the National Federation at Ashton-under-Lyne, on the night of the 19th inst., energetically condemned the doctrines of "non-intervention and peace at any price," as ignoble and unworthy of a great nation. England, he said, had great legitimate interests in Egypt, which should be guarded by the establishment of stable institutions, leading towards self-government; but a protectorate or annexation would be disastrous.

De Lesseps, presiding at a banquet given by the contractors on public works, in Paris, announced that the scheme for the creation of an inland sea in Africa will be resumed by private enterprise.

Prince Krapotkine was arrested in Lyons, in consequence of the discovery of important papers, during a recent domiciliary visit to his house. It is stated that the papers prove his complicity in various anarchist movements in French territory. A relative of the Czar is said to be implicated.

Paris, 12th mo. 23.—Prince Krapotkine, under arrest at Lyons, was examined for three hours by a Judge of Instruction. He answered "No," simply to all the questions put to him. The Prince is kept in solitary confinement, not even the police in charge being allowed to speak to him.

Madrid, 12th mo. 24th.—In the Chamber of Deputies to-day, the Ministerial motion, declaring against any change in the Constitution of 1876, was adopted by a vote of 221 to 18. The Cortes then adjourned to 1st mo. 8th. The victory of the Ministry is much commented upon in political circles. Only the Republicans voted against the motion, while the Conservative members of the Dynastic Left abstained from voting, being unwilling to show their small numerical strength. The opinion prevails that, although the new party obtained greater success in the political debates in the Chamber of Deputies than in the Senate, the Government has not been materially weakened, and, therefore, no Cabinet changes are expected for the present.

The great trial of 50 Socialists, which was begun at Prague on the 4th of 12th month, has ended. One of the prisoners, a disciple of Herr Most, was sentenced to two years' imprisonment. Forty-four of them were sentenced to prison for terms varying from six months to a fortnight. The remaining five were acquitted.

Alexandria, 12th mo. 19th.—All the political prisoners at Damietta have been released.

Arrangements for holding an International Exhibition at Calcutta, in 1883, have been concluded.

One thousand Mennonites in Manitoba, 600 in Emerson, and 400 in Winnipeg, have just been made British subjects by naturalization, and will begin patents for homesteads.

Lima, Peru, 12th mo. 21st.—El Comercio of to-day states that at the closing of Congress President Campero alluded to the fact of the country's enjoying constitutional freedom, even during the war, and besought Chili not to seek her own aggrandizement alone, but also that of the other republics of the Pacific Coast, which are destined at some time to form the South American Confederation.

The losses by the great fire at Kingston, Jamaica, are now estimated at $10,000,000.

WESTTOWN BOARDING SCHOOL.

The Committee in charge of this Institution will meet in Philadelphia on the 5th day of the First month, 1883, at 11 A. M.

The Committee on Instruction and the Committee on Admissions meet the same day, at 9 A. M.

WM. EVANS, Clerk.

FRIENDS' ASYLUM FOR THE INSANE,

Near Frankford, (Twenty third Ward,) Philadelphia.
Physician and Superintendent—JOHN C. HALL, M.D.
Applications for the Admission of Patients may be made to the Superintendent, or to any of the Board of Managers.

DIED, at her residence, near Media, Pennsylvania, 4th mo. 15th, 1882, ABIGAIL VELOITE, in the 79th year of her age; a member of Media Particular, and Chester Monthly Meeting.

—, at her residence, Damascus, Columbiana county, Ohio, the 11th of 10th mo. 1882, HANNAH B., wife of Edward Williams, and daughter of James B. and Sarah Bruff, (the former deceased) in the 60th year of her age. From early in life she was attached to the religious principles of the Society of Friends, of which she was a member by birth-right. Some time before her death, having become dissatisfied with the departures, as she believed, from the doctrines and practices of Friends of the branch of Society with which she had associated since the separation in Ohio Yearly Meeting in 1854, she believed it her duty, together with her husband, to change her religious connections by becoming united in membership with those Friends of Ohio Yearly Meeting who maintain the original doctrines of the Society; and died firm in the faith of early Friends. The who mourn her loss are comforted with the belief she is numbered with those who "washed their robes and made them white in the blood of the Lamb."

—, on the 30th of 10th mo. 1882, ELIZABETH DeCout, daughter of Sarah B., and the late Sam'l DeCout, of Trenton, N. J., in the 24th year of her age, a member of Chesterfield Monthly Meeting of Friends. In a long illness, this was her testimony: "Living, dying I am the Lord's." In severe suffering, it tempers the wind to the shorn lamb." In her dying hours, "He that believeth on me shall never die." "So He giveth his beloved sleep."

—, at Winona, Columbiana Co., Ohio, at the residence of her son-in-law, Uriah Price, 2nd of 11th 1882, HANNAH GILBERT, widow of the late Geo. Gilbert, in the 78th year of her age, a member of Garden Monthly and Particular Meeting, Ohio.

—, in Westerly, R. I., on the 1st of 12th mo. 1882, at the residence of her son, John W. Foster, PHILIP FOSTER, widow of Thomas Foster, and daughter John Wilbur, aged 82 years and 6 months, a member and minister of South Kingstown Monthly Meeting of Friends. From early life this dear Friend's chief desire was to seek first the Kingdom of Heaven and righteousness thereof. Often has her faith and patience been put to the test, and through holy help she enabled calmly to rely upon the promises of Him who will perform. She had acceptably filled the station of minister for more than thirty years, yet had not traveled much in the service of Truth, beyond the bounds her own Yearly Meeting; but had more than once visited the meetings, and most of the families within its limits to the peace of her own mind and to the satisfaction of her friends. Phebe Foster was always firmly attached to the doctrines and testimonies of the Society of Friends. She labored early and faithfully with children that they might bear the yoke in their young endeavors to impress upon their minds the paramount importance of living more with reference to their latter end than for any worldly consideration; her labors to this end, in connection with those of her husband, were greatly blessed to them. She was always diligent in the attendance of our meetings, pressing through great difficulties for this purpose—sometimes going a long distance when her health seemed poor to endure it—and at home she would attend to quite ill, saying "I want to set a good example." It was clear in her judgment respecting the principles of Friends; and was prepared to uphold the hands of afflicted father when he was engaged many years since in pleading for the ancient land-marks, and in bearing testimony against the introduction of these new doctrines and practices which have borne such sad fruit in latter years. The manifest and growing departure from our ancient principles, and from a self-denying life and conversation, at times bowed her soul in lamentation and mourning. She entertained no harshness against any, often saying, I love every body, even the wicked, but not their deeds. Her earnest prayer was that all might be saved with an everlasting salvation. Her husband and six children had been test before her, which she had keenly felt, but bowed cheerful resignation, and often felt to bless and praise the Lord that a sweet assurance was given them, as well as herself, that all were prepared through the mercy of God in Christ Jesus our Lord to enter the mansions prepared for the righteous. For more than seven years she had suffered much from weakness and inflammation of the eyes, and in other respects her health declined for the last thirteen months she had been mostly confined to the house, and for five months to her bed. These trials were borne with great patience and resignation, faith and calm reliance upon God. She repeated at different times many, very many beautiful passages of Holy Scripture, and as the time of her release drew near, she was more and more engaged to dwell in everlasting patience; often praying for it; yet asking if consistent with the Divine will that the Lord would take her unto Himself; often saying, "I feel nothing my way and long to go home." She was more than once heard to say, "Though I walk through the valley of the shadow of death, I will fear no evil, for thou art with me." And again, "Oh death! where is thy sting, oh grave! where is thy victory?" "The sting of death is sin, and that is all taken away from me." Her view of her self-denying and humble life, and her triumphant death, her friends can adopt the language which she again and again repeated, "Blessed are pure in heart for they shall see God."

—, 12th month 4th, 1882, at her residence, Whiteland Chester Co., Penna., MARY B. ASHBRIDGE, wife of Richard Ashbridge, in the 64th year of her age, a member of Uwehlan Monthly Meeting of Friends.

THE FRIEND.

A RELIGIOUS AND LITERARY JOURNAL.

VOL. LVI.

SEVENTH-DAY, FIRST MONTH 6, 1883.

NO. 22.

PUBLISHED WEEKLY.

if paid in advance, $2.00 per annum; if not paid in advance $2.50; 10 cents extra is charged for Postage on those sent by mail.

Articles designed for insertion to be addressed to

JOSEPH WALTON,

MOORESTOWN, BURLINGTON CO., N. J.

Subscriptions, payments and business communications, received by

JOHN S. STOKES,

NO. 116 NORTH FOURTH STREET, UP STAIRS,
PHILADELPHIA.

For "The Friend."

An Experience of Jury Trials.

Jury service is a public duty which many persons, whose time is already pretty fully occupied, usually show a disposition to avoid. The writer of this, previous to the present year, had been only once so much as called on to serve the community in the capacity required to, and upon that occasion had been excused on the plea of dulness of hearing. In the present instance, however, the summons for service on the Grand Jury; and inasmuch as the business of that body is mainly transacted in a room very much smaller than the court-room, the bar as to dull hearing did so far operate as to make it worth while to claim exemption.

I may be well briefly to state, for the information of some not acquainted with the details of, and the manner of procedure before, the Grand Jury, that that body consists of more than 23, and usually not less than 25 citizens; that a transcript of any case of misdemeanor or felony which has had a preliminary hearing before a magistrate, is to be forwarded to the District Attorney, who, as the public prosecutor for the Commonwealth, prepares a bill of indictment and sends it to the Grand Jury; and that that body, having heard evidence for the plaintiff only, decides—usually less than twelve of the jurors so concluded—that it is a "true bill;" otherwise, it is not. Generally, at the end of each day's session, the bills of indictment so acted upon are handed by the Grand Jury to the judge of the open court, and the cases which they represent are then ready for determinate hearing before the judge and (petit) jury. In addition to their regular work of acting upon bills of indictment, the Grand Jury is empowered to inquire into the condition of the prison, poor-house, and other public buildings of the city, and to present to the court any matter coming to their notice which they believe to be prejudicial to the health, comfort, or moral well-being of the community.

One who, like the writer, has no love for tobacco and who is also an abstainer from intoxicating drinks, the prospect of being seven hours each day, for a term of five weeks, in the company of those who, with possibly few exceptions, were users of both tobacco and spirits, was naturally not entirely pleasant. For drinking, however, was apparently not indulged in by any of the jury until after adjournment for the day, though there were several occasions, I regret to say, when two of the jurors entered the room in such a condition as to make plain the fact that they were not of the class of "sober, healthy, and discreet citizens" which the letter of the law required.

Desirous of being kept in a watchful state, I believed that the evidence of my being in the place of duty would not be withheld. This appeared on the second day of the term, when a case was before us touching some disorder which occurred in a house of bad character. A young man had given his evidence, which some of the jurors, in questioning him, had treated in a jocular way, besides giving expression to remarks of an indelicate nature. Feeling oppressed thereat the remainder of the day, I found that faithfulness to apprehended duty could only be met by saying something upon the subject to my fellow-jurors. This was accordingly done at the opening of business the following morning, when they were reminded that, no less truthful now than when they were uttered, were those words of Solomon, "Her house is the way to hell, leading down to the chambers of death;" and that I could not but greatly regret the light manner in which the evidence of the young man was received the day before, because he was plainly on the downward course to destruction, whilst the remarks he had heard from the jurors were calculated to confirm him in his way. This brief protest was, I believe, not without its use, as a somewhat similar case to the foregoing being heard a little later, it was proceeded with in a more seemly manner.

In the administration of the oath preparatory to hearing the evidence of witnesses, I did not perceive that anything was gained which was not seemingly as well secured by affirmation—as taken by the very few who preferred the latter method. On the other hand, in the case of several who were in the habit of frequently "taking the oath" (notably so with respect to a certain under-officer of the court), it was painful to see how lightly the act could be gone through with. As a remark of value upon this subject more authoritative than anything I could offer, is the following from a late article in that influential journal, the London Spectator:

"We are convinced that the effect of the administration of oaths in Parliament and elsewhere has been to depress the general level of truthfulness throughout the land. For every man oaths restrain from perjury, they tempt hundreds to make light of truth for its own sake. Whatever little good they may do, therefore, is much more than counterbalanced by the evil. * * The experience of courts of justice goes to show that an oath does not operate to any appreciable extent as a safeguard for truth-telling. An eminent advocate of large experience declares that 'in forty years of practice he only met with two instances where the parties, in the case of an oath offered after evidence, have been prevented by a sense of religion from persisting in their testimonies.' And the only reason why an oath is ever able in any case to operate as a deterrent against falsehood, is that the value of oaths is artificially enhanced at the expense of truthfulness in general."

It is needless to say that a very large majority of the offences brought to our notice were caused, either directly or indirectly, by the use of intoxicating liquors. Pitiful it was to have a father appear as accuser of his own son, whose threatenings and beatings, when in liquor, he felt he could no longer endure; or, a wife and daughter tearfully testifying for the same reason against the unnatural husband and father. Not a few of these cases, indeed, were ignored, at the solicitation of wives who either could not endure, at the last, to appear in open court against their husbands, or who said that amendment for the future had been faithfully promised.

In cases of indictment for malicious mischief, where the plaintiff was a liquor seller, and the defendant was drunk when the act was committed, it was not easy for the writer to concur in a "true bill;" yet, as the law requires the juror to decide according to the facts, and not as things ought to be, there were some instances where—the charges not being actually frivolous—there did not seem to be, properly, any escape from joining in an affirmative finding. How often justice failed to reach those who were really the most guilty parties, appeared from the fact that in many cases of malicious mischief or other disorder, notwithstanding that the offence happened, and the liquor was obtained, on the first day of the week, no prosecution of the saloon-keeper for violating the law followed therefrom.

A little matter touching a form of speech, which may seem of small moment and yet which I may be excused for mentioning here, was the common use of the words "gentleman" and "lady," applied even to pickpockets, fighters, and disorderly characters generally. By contrast, the more simple, if less elegant, terms, "man" and "woman," seemed to acquire an added dignity.

In one of the cells of the County Prison, visited by the Grand Jury, was noticed a fair-haired lad of about nineteen—some "mother's boy," he seemed, who surely ought not to have been there—who said he had come to that fate through getting intoxicated, and reading low-class papers. Those two matters—the crimes arising from the sale of intoxicating drinks and from the unrestricted dissemination of pernicious publications—were much before me as subjects which ought to be specially presented to the Court. Although the way seemed closed to relieving my mind upon those matters, I had a tender and quieting sense that "the righteous Lord loveth righteousness," and that if there was any thing for me to do in the direction indicated, it would be made apparent. Accordingly, late in our term of service, the foreman of the jury who had already stated that the secretary would attend to the final presentment, now privately made the request that I should prepare it,—thus affording the opportunity to give written expression to my views in a way which would favor their acceptance. The paper was received without a dissenting voice and with thanks,—a result greatly relieving to the writer, who felt that all the praise was due to Him who graciously permits us, as we seek his glory, to aid in the accomplishment of his purposes of righteousness, mercy, and truth.

J. W. L.

For "The Friend."

Gleanings from Quaker Annals.

"It remains with me," writes a faithful hand-maiden of her Lord to a persecutor of that day, "to tell thee, what was the occasion of my joining with Friends. It was that thing, ye school-men call immediate, objective revelation, (with which, it is my desire ye were more particularly and feelingly acquainted,) whereby the Lord raised in my soul his feeling life; so that I could not sit down satisfied with hearing of what the Son of God had done outwardly, (though I believe, thereby He purchased all that grace and mercy, which is inwardly wrought in the hearts of his children,) until I should be a partaker of the virtue and efficacy of it, and thereby possess 'the substance of things hoped for.' I saw, an historical faith would neither cleanse me nor save me: if that could save any, the devils were not without a door of hope: I felt that I needed the revelation of the Son of God in me. All that I ever read or heard, without this, could not give me the saving knowledge of God. 'None knoweth the Father, save the Son, and he to whomsoever the Son will reveal Him?' Through the virtue of this, were my eyes by degrees more and more opened. For the tender-hearted Samaritan had pity upon my wounded soul, when both priest and Levite passed by; and when there was no eye to pity, nor hand to help, He drew near, and poured in wine and oil as He saw needful, fulfilling in measure the promise, on which He had long caused me to hope, 'He that followeth me, shall not walk in darkness, but shall have the light of life.' And again, that sweet saying, so confirming and comforting to me, 'If a son shall ask bread of any of you that is a father, will he give him a stone? &c. If ye then, being evil, know how to give good gifts unto your children, how much more shall your heavenly Father give the Holy Spirit to them that ask Him?' These precious Scriptures, and many similar to them, being powerfully and seasonably opened up and applied by the Spirit of truth, times above number, both before and since, in effect speaking forth this language, 'Be not faithless, but believing,'—have made me set to my seal those words of Christ, 'It is the Spirit that quickeneth; the flesh profiteth nothing: the words that I speak unto you, they are spirit, and they are life.' And as I walk with Him, and abide in Him, watching at the posts of Wisdom's gate, travelling onward in spirit more and more to bring forth fruit unto Him, endeavoring to walk worthy of Him, 'unto well-pleasing,' as also daily to die unto self, that Christ may live in me,—thus I become a passive creature, and He an active Christ, in the increase of whose government, I feel the increase of my peace."

"The following admission has recently appeared from the pen of the biographer of Baxter; and forms no unimportant attestation in favor of that special service to which the Society of Friends were eminently called. 'Considering,' says Orme, 'the abuses of divine ordinances, which had so long and so extensively prevailed, it is not surprising that such a system as Quakerism should have arisen; and,' continues he, 'it may perhaps have answered a useful purpose, in calling the attention of men professing Christianity, to the great design of all its ordinances, and to which they ought ever to be regarded as subservient—the promotion of spirituality of mind, and the enjoyment of communion with God.' Vol. ii. p. 349. It is remarkable, too, that Baxter himself, whose controversy lay for many years against the doctrine of the Spirit, as it was so prominently held forth by our honorable predecessors, should later in life, have been brought thus far to acknowledge: 'I am now,' he says, 'much more apprehensive than heretofore, of the necessity of well-grounding men in their religion, especially of the witness of the indwelling Spirit,—for I more sensibly perceive, that the Spirit is THE GREAT WITNESS of Christ and Christianity to the world. And though I was tempted long to overlook the strength of this testimony of the Spirit, yet now I see that the Holy Ghost is the witness of Christ, and his agent in the world.'"

"In connexion with the important ground which the early Friends took on the doctrine of the Spirit, the following may be quoted from a valuable pamphlet: "The professors of Christianity in the time of George Fox, had generally forsaken the spirituality of religion, but were not in the least wanting as to a belief in the outward coming, the divinity, and sacrifice of Christ. Hence there was not that necessity of insisting upon faith in this last mentioned part of the covenant, respecting which there was no defect of faith, as upon that part in which there was a deficiency. I believe, that the more of true, spiritual Christianity a man has, the better he will be qualified, rightly to see and to estimate the doctrines of truth, as contained in the Holy Scriptures, relative to the outward coming and offices of Jesus Christ. And, for this very reason, I believe, and am abundantly convinced, that our predecessors had much more of the true faith, and had much clearer views of the meaning and standing of the Scriptures; as well as of the true divinity of our Lord and Saviour, and the purposes of his sufferings, than other professors of that day, who were making a high profession of their faith in them, but many of whom were wanting in spiritual and vital religion."

"The situation and prospects, in every age, of the true disciples of our Lord and Saviour, must prove to the Christian mind a subject of vast importance; and it deeply concerns every one of us to know for ourselves, how far we are promoting, by individual reception of the heaven of his gospel, that universal diffusion of unmixed 'glory,' which, we are assured, 'shall cover the earth, as the waters cover the sea.' The government and dominion of 'the Prince of Life,' 'the Prince of Peace,' which is ultimately to subdue and reduce all things unto itself, the Society of Friends have pre-eminently held, to be wholly of a spiritual character: it is to be set up within man, and

'cometh not by observation,' neither stand in any mere outward observances, but 'righteousness, peace, and joy in the Holy Ghost.' They have all along considered standing, lasting, and indispensable ordinance of the gospel to be, the manifestation of the Saviour by his Spirit, as the Guide into truth; according to the whole tenor of 14th chapter of John, and likewise that language of the Apostle to the Hebrews: 'Christ was once offered to bear the sins of man and unto them that look for Him, shall He appear the second time, without sin, unto salvation.' This Society has therefore deemed it essential to know the reality of the presence of Christ dwelling in their hearts by faith; and has judged it in the highest degree needful, to love, wait for his appearing and counsel, to bow neck to his yoke, and to commit themselves all things most unreservedly to his leadings. This way they believe it was, that our blessed Redeemer engaged to manifest himself unto those, and make his abode with them, who should keep his commandments; and that also it is, that such who do his will, are given to know of his doctrine. For, of the Spirit of Truth, which 'teacheth' the believers things, our Lord himself declared, 'He shall testify of Me'—He shall glorify Me.' This mainly to be a chief test or proof of discipleship; inasmuch that, if we have not the Spirit of Christ, we are none of his. This also is only channel, whereby we may savingly believe or confess Him; for—'Whosoever believeth that Jesus is the Christ, is born of God and hath the Witness in himself; and agreeing, 'no man can say that Jesus is the Lord, but by the Holy Ghost,' whosoever shall confess that Jesus is the Son of God, God dwelleth in him; and he in God.'"

A little girl came in her night clothes very early to her mother one morning, saying,

"Which is worst, mamma, to tell a lie or steal?"

The mother, taken by surprise, replied that both were so bad she couldn't tell which was the worst.

"Well," said the little one, "I have been thinking a good deal about it, and I've concluded it's worse to lie than to steal. If I steal a thing you can take it back, 'less you've eaten it; and if you've eaten it you can't get it back. But"—and there was a look of triumph in the little face—"a lie is forever."

During the raging of a terrible thunder storm, a mother stepped softly to the nursery door to learn whether her two little daughters who had retired for the night, were alarmed or not, and then, as she stood listening, heard the following conversation:

"O May, May," said the younger, "are you not afraid?"

"O no, no, Jennie," said the older; "Mamma says God made the lightning and thunder, and that they cannot hurt us without permission."

"But they kill people sometimes!" anxiously said the little one.

"Yes," said May, "but only when God permits it; and you know mamma says God cares for us more than she and papa can, and we must always trust Him."

"I will, Jennie," was the sweet response, and the mother heard her two darlings lay each other "good-night" as they quieted down into a peaceful sleep.

For "The Friend."

A Trip Through St. Gotthard.

Even years have passed, with their recurring autumns, since I enjoyed the passage through the tunnel by which the Col de Fréjus pierced, and known as that of Mt. Cenis. As at that time formed the easiest entrance into Italy by rail, which was thus bound to France. During the past week we were borne through the steam through the great St. Gotthard tunnel, and found our journey shortened from Switzerland and Germany short of 120 miles thereby.

When approaching and when leaving Mt. Cenis, we were not oppressed by any sense of the sublime in nature, though the transient character of the engineering ability displayed, and its triumphant completion of difficulties hitherto unsurmounted, did fail to make an impression that was vivid and extreme. Passing through lands in which have been enacted deeds of heroic endurance through years of bloody rapine by the whole Italy and the Papedom, which spare neither age nor sex, through all which the dense, those adherents to the primitive Christian faith, kept their allegiance sure and steadfast, "when all our fathers worshipped rocks and stones," there was awakened in a sense of the morally sublime that eclipsed what I beheld in nature or could perceive of it.

The great Mt. Cenis tunnel is $7\frac{3}{4}$ miles in length, and rises in the centre to the height of 245 feet above the sea and is 4093 feet above the surface of the mountain. It was begun in 1st month of 1861, and completed in the 12th month of 1870: ten years having been occupied in its construction, at a total cost of about \$15,000,000. From 1500 to 2000 workmen were constantly employed on each side. It is 26 feet wide and 19 feet high, and is almost entirely lined with masonry. Our progress was made in 26 minutes without any perceptible change in feeling arising from the pressure of the atmosphere or increase in temperature, if such exist. The name, Mt. Cenis, is a misnomer, since the culminating point of that mountain lies 17 miles to the westward of the tunnel.

The diligence road over Mt. Cenis, which is now deserted, was constructed in 1802-5, during the reign of Napoleon; a railroad was laid over the mountain by the mode now used to ascend the Rhigi, and known as the method, from its American inventor. It was constructed as are ordinary roads, with two rails, but midway between another set of rails, but midway between another set of rails laid more elevated, and so planned that the pressure of either side the pressure of two horizontal wheels which were attached to the locomotive and formed the clamping system by which the train was retained in successive positions as it ascended the incline of the road. This was a wonder in itself, but has also been thrown aside to make way for the road through the mountain on which heavier and longer trains can be conveyed at less expense for transit, and less risk of danger to life. The passage of the Cenis and its tunnel pales before the city St. Gotthard as does the mountain before its giant fellow.

The St. Gotthard tunnel is rightly named, for it pierces that mountain, driving through its massive border and granite core, to emerge through its talcose and chlorite slates, which are conspicuous in lofty precipices on its southern flanks. This tunnel is rather larger than that of Mt. Cenis, being 26 feet 3 inches wide and 19 feet 8 inches high, and is $9\frac{1}{4}$ miles in length—thus exceeding its great rival by about $1\frac{1}{2}$ miles. It is lined throughout with substantial masonry, and well it is that it is thus buttressed against the pressure of a mass of rock which rises from 5000 to 6000 feet above the keystone of its arches. Its elevation is not as great as that of Mt. Cenis, since it rises to but 3785 feet almost exactly midway, or 460 feet lower than the earlier work with which we are making such frequent comparisons. A double track of rails extends through the tunnel and danger of collision is thus avoided.

Its construction cost about $12,500,000, and required 7 years and 9 months for its completion. It was begun at opposite ends, and the headings met and fitted with wonderful exactness as to height and bearing, attesting the extraordinary skill of the engineers, and the perfection to which the construction of instruments of precision has attained. The greatest number of workmen employed at any time was 3400. Both the Mt. Cenis and St. Gotthard tunnels were bored by means of machines driven by compressed air, and the power was derived, I believe from falling water. "A constant dropping will wear away a rock," and the power of persistent application of small efforts has thus been illustrated on a gigantic scale.

This mighty tunnel is but one of 56 tunnels on the great St. Gotthard railway, which form an aggregate length of 25 miles! Besides these it boasts its 32 bridges, several of which are of vast size and great elevation, and ten massive viaducts. The elevation has generally been attained by the very remarkable expedient of large spiral tunnels of which there are at least three on the north and four on the south side of the mountain. The total cost of the railway and tunnels and rolling stock, &c., was about $46,000,000: for which sum Italy, Switzerland and Germany granted subsidies in the proportion of about one-half by the first named, and one-fourth by each of the others. The railway was inaugurated on 5th mo. 22nd, 1882, and opened for traffic on the 1st of 6th month. It extends from Lucerne, in the heart of Switzerland, to Lugano on its Italian border, on the lake of that name, and is therefore 128 miles in length.

Leaving Lucerne at 10 on the morning of the 7th of 11th month, and bidding a regretful farewell, as I have several times before done, to its beautiful scenes, we passed through Rothkreuz (Red Cross) and Arth-Goldan, and over the remains of a disastrous landslide of 1806, and reached the station Schwyz, near the base of the two remarkable conical mountains conspicuous from the lake, and known as the Mythes (mitres), each about 6000 feet in height. These interesting cones were covered by snow pure and glistening in the sunshine, and like mighty icicles seemed to pierce the blue heavens.

We have thus skirted the Rhigi (royal mountain) on its northern flank, and passing several small lakes, and through a fruitful country, emerge from the mountains and reach the lake Lucerne at Briennen (the fountain). Several small tunnels have already been threaded, for they have been industriously strewn along our pathway, and now the Axenstrasse, familiar to lake voyagers is penetrated, and we are upon the border of the Urner see, or bay of Uri, and a noble view is before us. On the opposite bank are the meadows of Rutli where, as story tells, the first Swiss league between Uri, Schwyz and Unterwalden was concluded on the night of the 7th of 11th mo. 1307—575 years ago, this day! Further on rises the Uri-Rothstock, with its glacier nearly 10,000 feet, and tunnel after tunnel receives us—one a mile and another a mile and a quarter in length—and obstruct our view of the chapel of Tell, built where he is said to have leaped from the boat of Gesler. Soon Fluellen is reached, at the head of Lake Lucerne, and we are 36 miles on our way; and Alldorf follows soon, where Tell is said to have aimed the arrow at the apple upon his son's head. Tunnels again and lofty bridges which cross the foaming Reuss,—one a lattice girder bridge, 255 feet high,—and again tunnels and tunnels through every projecting nose of mountain slope that bars our passage, and we reach Gurnellen, 50 miles on our journey, and 2625 feet above the sea. Here or beyond we ascend the hill of Göschenen by means of three curved tunnels, and an immense double bend. The upper end of one of these tunnels, 1606 yards long, is 115 feet above the lower. Crossing a deep gorge we pass through another tunnel and over the Reuss again to enter a spiral tunnel of 79 feet in ascent. Crossing the Reuss again and again, we find ourselves 2780 feet above the sea; and looking down from our height can see far below us the end of the tunnel through which we have recently passed, and from which is emerging volumes of smoke and steam left by our locomotive, and rolling in billowy clouds into the open day.

(To be concluded.)

For "The Friend."

Thoughts about the Eternal Gospels and the Falling Babylon.

BY CHARLES SHIELDSTREAM.

(Continued from page 130.)

Let us consider the sayings of our Lord Jesus Christ! O! consider his sermon on the mountain—how much more is required from a man, to lead a good and righteous life, than the old law required! And man may be enabled to do it; for he receives power to become a son of God when he walks in the Light of Christ. Then he is made willing to obey the inward law, which takes hold of and judges every inward thought of man. The Grace and Light makes holy and righteous people of the obedient ones, and they have the kingdom of heaven within them.

"In God we live, and move, and have our being." Paul of old was not ashamed to quote that text from the Greek poet Arctas. But how think the outward professors to-day? They think there is no salvation but by the Scripture. For all the outward ones I met and talked with about God, seem to have God as an abstraction. Priestcraft and the revivalists generally picture God as one who has ordained the most part of mankind for destruction; and they teach that the few of men who can reach bliss hereafter must go through the performances which they prescribe. The devil and hell are the agencies by which they work to get the people to embrace their carnal views—but the true gospel of Christ is the power of God for salvation; while those that believe and embrace that gospel will become perfect, for there is no salvation hereafter, if men are not saved in this life from sin and vanity, and have become good, true, and righteous. The Holy Spirit is the power that joins man in reverence and love with his Maker for time and eternity. The true Light, which makes man good, wise and righteous, is as contrary to priestcraft and will-worship in all its anti-christian manifestations as Christ is to Belial.

What has not priestcraft done to destroy man! During the days of inquisitions,—the holy inquisition so called,—then the priests walked in the light of the fiery flames that devoured their victims. The Protestants did not have the power of the Romans, but John Calvin got Servetus burned alive, and if we go through history, we can trace terrible things done by Protestant priestcraft.

God wills that all men shall be saved—and his people want to see men come out from their rebellion and alienations from God, and be joined in happiness and felicity with his will, and walk in his ways, which are ways of delight. O, what can be more important for men and bring more delight, than to do the will of God?

We often see men being like brutes, by following their beastly lusts. But a perverse and false religion, with superstition attending, has made men more ferocious than the brutes. Of this, all the wars and bloodshed about religion furnish us with many examples—such as the Crusades, especially the first, when the Christians, so called, thought that a holy war had to commence with exterminating the Jews! Compare the conquest of Jerusalem by the Crusaders, Tilly's conquest of Magdeburg, and other cruelties committed both by Protestants and Catholics during the 30 years' wars; the Duke of Alba's butchering in the Low Countries, and so forth; and then we must say: O man, what a terrible monster art thou, when the passions of false religion and superstition are let loose.

If we don't walk in the Light, but be drawn out from the Light, we are in danger of being lost in the darkness—and what can we expect but deeds of darkness in the time of temptation from those that say they believe in God and Christ, but deny the Light of Christ within for man's salvation. An outward historical religion, with its doctrine of substitution, will always prove a failure in enabling mankind to make true progress towards spiritual good—teaching as it does that Christ has taken away the sins of what they call a converted man, and that he is righteous, though living in a sinful way, Christ's righteousness being imputed to him; and that through the obedience of Christ, man is perfect in the sight of God, by faith—saying further that a condition of perfection, or freedom from sin, is not attainable in this life, and consequently not worth striving for, being only self-righteousness. Such teachers constantly declare, morality cannot save a man. But though morality don't save a man, true morality, as a fruit of the life and light of Christ in man, signifies, that man is saved from sin and vanity; and the outward conditions of man is a consequence of the inward conditions. As a good tree bringeth forth good fruit and not bad, so a holy man cannot commit any deed of immorality.

It is practical unbelief which quenches the vital flame of virtue.

For "The Friend."

On Silent Worship.

In reading over "The Friend" of 12th mo. 16th last, containing the curious note from a person in Lynn, recommending the appointment of a regular salaried preacher for the Friends' meeting there, these beautiful lines occurred to me as fitting to publish in "The Friend," to show that Friends can worship God in the silence of the flesh as well as in vocal exercises. At the same time a living ministry is undoubtedly a great blessing to the Church, whether it be Friends, or any other body of Christians.

Let deepest silence all around
Its peaceful shelter spread;
So shall that living Word abound,
The Word that wakes the dead.

How sweet to wait upon the Lord
In stillness and in prayer!
What though no preacher speak the word,
A minister is there.

A minister of wondrous skill
True graces to impart;
He teaches all the Father's will,
And preaches to the heart:

He dissipates the coward's fears,
And bids the coldest glow;
He speaks; and lo! the softest tears
Of deep contrition flow;

He knows to bend the heart of steel,
He bows the loftiest soul;
O'er all we think and all we feel,
How matchless his control!

And ah! how precious is his love,
In tenderest touches given:
It whispers of the bliss above,
And stays the soul on heaven.

From mind to mind, in streams of joy,
The holy influence spreads;
'Tis peace, 'tis praise without alloy,
For God that influence sheds.

'Twas thus, where God himself is known
To shine without a cloud,
The angel myriads round his throne,
In solemn silence bowed.

And all were still and silent long,*
Nor dared one note to raise,
'Till burst the vast ecstatic song,
And heaven was filled with praise.

For "The Friend."

"BE STILL AND KNOW THAT I AM GOD."

God spake, "Be still;" at the behest,
The troubled ocean sank to rest;
Each billow ceased its surging roar,
Gently to lave the sandy shore;
The thunder hushed its threatening sound,
While all was silence, deep, profound;
The wind was lulled, no breath arose
To break the mandate of repose;
All nature's elemental strife,
Obedient to the Word of Life,
Sank calmly down. Art thou alone,
My soul, unstilled before the Throne?
Will not thy anxious warfare cease,
Commanded by the Prince of Peace?
Oh! passive yield unto his will,
Obey his mandate, "Be thou still."
Then wilt thou know the crushing tread
Of Him, who wounds the serpent's head,—
That precious Seed, which, at the fall,
Was promised to give life to all,—
The Christ within, the inspeaking Word,
Immanuel, our risen Lord.
Seek thou his counsel; then will He,
Thy Alpha and Omega be.
He'll soothe thy troubled thoughts to rest,
Upon his ever-faithful breast,
If thou wilt heed his high behest.
Then, bow before his sovereign will,
Obey his mandate, Be thou still.

Germantown.

E. S. L.

* "There was silence in Heaven about the space of half an hour."—Rev.

Spider-Showers.

In 1835—if my memory be not at fault there was a remarkably fine annular ecliptic of the sun visible in England, which I, the very small boy, was, among others, watch with some fear and much wonder. When obscuring moon had begun to pass from sun's disc, and the partial darkness was appearing, one of the older spectators marked: "Now, after this there should be a shower of feathers." Why he had such expectation, he did not say; but as "shower of feathers" are as proverbial as shower frogs and fish, and may, when really understood, have as much foundation in fact as best authenticated of these other atmospheric wonders, I propose to describe a shower of feathers which it was once my luck to witness only the shower was not really a shower of feathers—though the falling material closely resembled these light bodies—nor a shower of snow, but a shower of gossamer spiders. I first let me refer to a few notable spider-showers of the past; also to some of the questionable inferences that have been drawn in regard to these spiders.

All who have read White's History of Gossamer will recollect his description of the gossamer-showers which he had observed, on which continued for nearly a whole day, where the gossamer was descending from surprising height; for when one gentleman ascended a hill near at hand, some three hundred feet high, he found that the gossamer were descending from a region in the atmosphere that was still beyond the reach of gaze. These gossamer-showers are great mysteries, and once seen cannot be forgotten for the air on these occasions becomes literally crowded with tiny parachutes, composed of a few threads of almost invisible gossamer, each of the parachutes being occupied by a Lilliputian aeronaut, in the shape of a very small active spider. Whence these aerial creatures come, or whither they go, remains so far to be discovered; but it seems clear that somehow they have learned the navigation of the trackless region overhead which we call atmosphere. Dr. Martin Lister named the aerial spider "the bird," from the facility with which it can traverse the air; and upon one occasion, when he observed a shower of them in York city, he ascended to the top of Minster, and found that even there they were descending from some region above that elevated stand-point. Mr. Darwin, another server of spider-showers, describes one which he saw in 1832, when on board the Beagle, the mouth of the La Plata River, when the vessel was some sixty miles from land; and possibly was the first to notice that each parachute of gossamer carried a spider aeronaut for he noticed them not only arrive on board the ship, but he also saw them reproduce new parachute, and on this frail bark land forth again "on the bosom of the palpitating air."

It is a common notion, when a spider crosses one's face in a summer evening, that it is the web of the gossamer spider; but it wants correction. Some of these threads may be the gossamer spider's work, but most of them are the cables of other species. Almost all spiders leave a cable behind as they travel from point to point, or swing themselves from branch to branch. The common geomet spider (Epeira diadema) generally, I might most say invariably, leaves a thread in its track; and it is more frequently the threads of these and kindred spiders which haunt trees, bushes, &c., and so frequently tickle our noses in shady lanes. The epieira too can shoot out its threads with as much facility as the gossamer spider. One day, when holding an epieira suspended to my finger by its cable, it disappeared as if by magic. To discover its modus operandi, I tried another in bright sunlight, and observed that while it was hanging thus suspended, and perfectly motionless, it was shooting out threads in various directions. These threads floated on, spreading out into one or four radii, and covering about sixty degrees, but all in a common direction. At length one came in contact with a post, and adhered to it. As soon as the spider found that one of the cables had found an anchorage, but the one by which I held it captive, ran this cable of hope, and regained its liberty. The epieira spreads its beautiful spirals from twig to twig on the outside. Beneath these, those of the common house-spider (Aranea domestica) may be found, where possibly this species is taking its summer's outing, and deeper among the branches still, another small spider can be seen in greater numbers than either of these two kinds. I have not been able to identify its species, though it is probably the same as that which Mr. Hunt observed at play, for I have seen it playing with its young ones as a cat plays with her kittens. The peculiarity of this spider is its family of fifty or sixty young ones, which it carefully rears, provides for, and educates. Its house, not unlike that of the "old woman who lived in a shoe," may be called a web, and is roofed generally with a sloping everproof leaf of holly or kindred evergreen. In this mansion are lodged several score of young ones; while from its front an irregular web extends for several inches around. This is not a snare which fastens, but a maze which confuses the prey. When a fly falls in, it is rapidly buzzing its way through it, the spider, directed by the vibrations of the web, rushes upon the confused insect, and paralyses its wings and limbs by smearing them over with a glutinous secretion. As soon as the prey is securely manacled, the wily spider prepares to give it the coup de grace with its front-fangs. While all this is proceeding, the young family come running out of their dominions to watch the contest; and as soon as the spider is powerless to harm them with blow from its legs or limbs, they cluster round its body so closely, seizing upon every point of vantage, that a large blue-bottle becomes completely encased as they swarm over it. When the fly is thus dining, so still and quiet are the spiders, that they give the observer, at first sight, the impression that he is looking upon an unripe raspberry which has dropped into the net, the small globular bodies, packed closely together, so exactly resemble the unripe seeds of this fruit. When there are wandering or wolf-spiders though in our fields to account for the network of webs that a dewy morning reveals. These webs are there, dew or no dew; but when covered with dew or hoar-frost, they are redoubled to every eye. The female wolf-spider (Aranea viatica) may be found about the end of June carrying a spherical bag as big as her head, which is full of young wolf-spider eggs. These are hatched about July; and when we consider that each individual spider begins to travel on its own behalf, and invariably leaves a thread in its track, it is not very remarkable that every dewy morning in autumn should reveal pastures covered with sparkling spider-silk; and it may be these wanderers, and not the gossamer-spider, which give our fields this appearance. I have seen, when looking across a pasture towards the declining sun, a streak of sunlight reflected from these webs, which reminded me of a rainbow, and this prismatic streak moved on as I walked along. This convinced me that our meadows are covered in autumn with a silken sheen which is revealed in prismatic colors by the evening sun, and as frosted silver by the hoar-frost or morning dew.

Since, then, it is unsafe to conclude that the dew-revealed webs of the autumn morning are those of the gossamer spider, let us turn to the latter, which so rarely appears amongst us, in showers at least, to ascertain what is clearly known of its ways, and if any idea of its native haunts is attainable. These gossamer spiders have been seen descending from a considerable altitude in the atmosphere, and shortly afterwards individual spiders have been observed one after another to reascend, as if they were returning to their native place; and may not their peculiar "happy hunting-ground" be in the atmosphere?

So far back as Chaucer, we find "gossamer" amongst the mysteries of natural phenomena; and in the old nursery rhyme—

'Old woman, old woman, old woman,' quoth I,
'O whither, O whither, O whither so high?'
'To sweep the cobwebs out of the sky,'

we may have a fair proof that gossamer-spider showers had been noted long ago, and a possible proof that these tiny waifs were then suspected to be inhabitants of the atmosphere.

The first and densest spider-shower ever observed by me occurred in September 1875, and the second—where I saw them reascending only—in September 1880. (Gilbert White of Selborne observed one of these showers in 1741.) On the morning of the shower in 1875, there had been some electrical disturbance. There had been one loud peal of thunder, but no rain. About ten A. M., I noticed small spiders running over my coat-sleeves, and had to brush off several trails of gossamer-web. Looking round, I found that brick-walls, houses, branches of trees, &c., had these webs dangling from them, and that other gossamer-webs were continually falling from above, and adding to the accumulation. By mid-day, a long fence was festooned from point to point of its triangular rail-tops with a ribbon-like ladder of gossamer; and this was growing broader and broader as the tiny creatures kept running along this ladder, each increasing the breadth by adding its own contribution of another silken thread.

On examining next an iron palisading near, I found it in a similar condition, with the tops of the iron spikes connected by a vibrating silken ladder of gossamer, in some places nearly an inch broad. All along this ladder the little strangers were running in an excited and hurried manner, as if they had lost their way, and had got into a strange country. Some, in travelling over their improvised road, made mistakes, and got into bordering webs of the Garden spider, where they were speedily devoured. About one P. M. the clouds cleared off, the sun shone out, and I noticed that some of the spiders had begun to reascend into the atmosphere. They might have commenced this reascension earlier; but on observing that some were reascending, all my attention was devoted to single spiders; and this is what I saw. Fixing my eyes upon one of them, I observed that as it left the gossamer pathway, it selected a clean spot on the iron railing, and gathering its limbs closely together, it projected from its spinnerets several threads which expanded outwards, and stretched upwards from nine to twelve inches. Then this parachute seemed to show a buoyant tendency, and suddenly the tiny creature left hold of the iron rail, or was lifted off it, and quickly 'vanished into thin air.' One after another I closely watched, with the same general result; though once or twice when the spider left the rail, it floated for a few seconds in an almost horizontal direction, prior to changing it for an approximately vertical one. They, however, disappeared from sight so quickly, that the angle of ascent could only be guessed at.

The second spider-shower I saw was not so interesting, as I did not observe the descent, but only the reascend of some odd ones. This, however, was effected in exactly the same manner as has been already described; and the few I saw were again ascending from an iron palisading, fully a mile away from that on which I observed them in 1875.—Chambers' Journal.

For "The Friend."

Wine Drinking.

It was very satisfactory to read from the New York Letter in the Ledger of to-day, the efforts that were being made in that city to suppress intemperance, in the first social glass, or in its earlier steps and stages, by lifting the warning voice against the truly dangerous practice of handing wine or other intoxicating drinks to those who may call, this New Year's day, on the respective hosts. This, as appears, has been remonstrated against by more than one hundred clergymen of different religious denominations; by "The Young Ladies' Temperance Union;" while, also, the example was to be set in the new Mayor's usual New Year's reception at the City Hall. It is stated as "understood, that on this occasion good wholesome cold water and lemonade (contrary to the practice of former years) will be the rule."

We could devoutly wish that this movement, small as it may at first appear, might prove one of the beginnings of a great and greatly needed reformation in a truly alarming and dreadful evil. It is a significant fact that "Sippington" is represented as the first station-house on "The Black Valley Railroad"—leading down to the chambers of death. While the last station or terminus, "Destruction," is but the final issue of the ticket—the first cheerful glass—taken at the first station.

Oh! that all, and especially the young, might be aroused to a sense of this tremendous evil and engulfing maelstrom, which, perhaps, fascinates at first, while "at the last it biteth like a serpent, and stingeth like an adder." May all beware of the fatal strand, by heeding the safe course: "Touch not; taste not; handle not." This will avoid the deplorable picture the poet has left us—

"The drunkard murders child and wife,
Nor matters it a pin,
Whether he stabs them with his knife,
Or starves them with his gin."

1st mo. 1st, 1883.

For "The Friend."

The Indian School at Tunesassa.

This school is brought to the notice of the members of Philadelphia Yearly Meeting annually, by the Reports of the Committee in charge of the Institution, but there are doubtless many Friends who do not realize the importance of the work that is being done, and the need there is for a more earnest effort to prepare the Indians for the place they must ere long occupy—that of citizenship in common with the other inhabitants of our land. To some of these a brief article showing the present condition and future prospects of the school may not be unacceptable; and it is with a view of enlisting the interest and assistance of more Friends, that these remarks are penned.

The school is located on a farm of about 400 acres, in Cattaraugus county, in the State of New York, adjoining the Allegheny Indian Reservation. It is managed by a Superintendent and Matron, assisted by three woman Friends, one of whom teaches the school for Indian children. The children under care now number 30: 25 girls and 5 boys, which is the full capacity of the present establishment. They are taught the usual English branches of study, in which they become quite proficient, and their conduct and bearing in school, and their ready compliance with the wishes of the teacher, are quite remarkable. Meetings for Divine worship are held twice in the week, and the children are assembled daily, and portions of scripture and books of a religious character read to them. On these occasions the behavior of the children is sober and commendable, and there is evidence that serious impressions are made upon their minds producing fruit in some cases in later years.

In the intervals of school the girls are employed in domestic duties (allowing time for recreation, however,) such as washing, cooking, &c., which they do with much cheerfulness under the direction and with the assistance of the Matron and her helpers.

The boys assist on the farm in taking care of the stock and in various other ways. The farm has lately been much improved by clearing more of the land, and as it is adapted to the keeping of sheep a flock has been introduced with favorable results. Several cows are kept which supply the family with dairy products.

The Institution is partly supported by the income from a fund, and by an appropriation made annually by the Yearly Meeting. The main building has been much improved lately by alterations and additions, making it much more commodious and comfortable, and a new school-house has just been finished—the cost of all being defrayed by private contributions.

The benefits of the school to the Indians is very observable in the greater cleanliness in the dwellings, and the general thrift of those who enjoyed its advantages compared with those who have not; but it is believed that this improvement would be more manifest if a greater number of boys could partake of the good effect of the school influence. Heretofore, owing to the arrangement of the building and some other causes, the boys have been largely excluded.

The Indians are now very anxious to have more of their boys under the care of Friends, and the committee have decided, with the approbation of the Yearly Meeting, to extend the benefits of the Institution to them by employing a man and his wife to board a number of boys in a separate building; the man to have the oversight of them when out of school and train them under direction of the Superintendent, in general farm work. It is believed that they will thus become more interested in agriculture and be induced to clear their land and bring it into cultivation; and by the Christianizing influence of the establishment become better fitted for the heads of families.

The chief difficulty which has presented in the way of carrying out this plan is the finding of suitable persons to place in charge, which it is very desirable to do, and while the service at Tunesassa is neither light nor free from deprivations, yet those who have undertaken it from a sense of religious duty, have generally become much interested in it; and some of these have remarked in after life, in effect, that the presence and watchful care of their Heavenly Father, were as preciously experienced while engaged in this service, as at any other period of their lives.

Political Effect of Persecution.

In the two centuries that followed the Reformation hardly any other single circumstance affected so powerfully the relative industrial position of nations as the degrees in which they conceded religious toleration. Among the less noticed consequences of the Reformation, perhaps the most important was the dispersion of industry produced by the many thousands of skilled artisans who were driven by persecution beyond their national borders, carrying with them trades which had been hitherto strictly or mainly local, and planting them wherever they settled. Nor was this the only result of the migration. Men who are prepared to abandon friends and country rather than forsake a religion which is not that of their nation are usually superior to the average of their fellow countrymen in intelligence, and are almost always greatly superior to them in strength and nobility of character. Religious persecution, by steadily weeding out such men from a community, slowly but surely degrades the national type, while a policy of toleration which attracts refugees, representing the best moral and industrial qualities of other nations, is one of the most efficient of all means of expanding and improving it.

The effect of these influences on the well-being of nations has been very great. The ruin of Spain may be chiefly traced to the expulsion or extirpation of her Moorish, Jewish and heretical subjects; and French industry, and still more French character, have never recovered the injury they received from the banishment of the most energetic and enlightened portion of the nation. By the revocation of the Edict of Nantes, and by the savage persecution which immediately preceded and followed it, France probably lost upwards of a quarter of a million of her most industrious citizens; and, amid the enthusiastic applause of the Catholic party, a blow was struck at her true interests, of which some of the effects may be perceived even to the present day. Many of the arts and manufactures which had been for generations most distinctively French passed forever to Holland, to Germany or to England. Local liberties in France received their deathblow when those who most strenuously supported them were swept out of the country. The destruction of the most solid, the most moderate, the most virtuous, the most generally lightened element in the French nation, paved the way for the degradation of national character, and the last serious work was removed that might have broken the force of that torrent of skepticism vice, which, a century later, laid prostrate in merited ruin, both the altar and the throne.—Lecky's England.

The 31st of the 3rd month, 1780, I went to see my much beloved friend, Moses Farnham at Uxbridge, in his last sickness. His disorder was paralytic. He could not speak so as to communicate much of his mind by word, but the lively sensibility of his mind, and tenderness and brokenness of his spirit, were refreshing to my soul. Divers Friends were present, and nearly all were melted into tears and heart-felt tenderness. He was just about to make us sensible of his great peace of mind in his late religious travels; and that the evidence of Divine approbation there was now impressed on his mind. Light of life appeared to triumph over all in him. J. Scott.

Highest Building in Europe.—Hitherto the hospice of the Great St. Bernard, which stands 8,200 feet above the level of the sea, has enjoyed the distinction of being the most elevated inhabited building in Europe. This honor can no longer claim. During the past year the city authorities of Catania, in Sicily, have caused to be erected, near the summit of the great volcano, Mount Etna, an astronomical observatory, which stands 2,943 metres above the sea-level or fully 1000 feet higher than the hospice of the St. Bernard. The structure is nine metres in height, and covers an area of 200 square metres. It consists of an upper and a lower story, and is built in a circular form. In the lower story there rises a massive pillar, upon which is placed the great refracting telescope. The lower story is divided into a dining room, kitchen and storerooms. In the upper story there are three bed-rooms intended for the accommodation of astronomers and tourists visiting the establishment. The roof consists of a movable cupola or dome. From the balconies of the upper story a prospect of vast extent and grandeur is presented. The spectator is able to see over half the island of Sicily, the island of Malta, the Lipari Isles, and the province of Calabria, on the mainland of Italy. The observatory is erected upon a small cone which will, in the case of eruption, protect completely from the lava-stream which ways flows down on the opposite side of the volcano.—Builder.

A Station-House Episode.—A Boston paper contains the following. Last night while Lieutenant Hammond was on duty at the Third Station, a fine appearing man, well and neatly dressed, entered and asked permission to look into the first cell on the right of the cell-room. The question was a most unusual one, and the Lieutenant inquired whether the request should be granted. The visitor at first declined to answer, but soon frankly admitted that three years ago he had been locked in that particular cell for drunkenness, and now he had an almost uncontrollable desire to look into it once again. Lieutenant Hammond thereupon called a house-wat-and allowed his caller to go down stairs to him. When the man reached the cell he first paused and looked into the forbidden place of confinement, and then entered it, closed the door behind him. He at once sank upon his knees by the side of the hard plank bunk, and for a few minutes quietly ended in prayer. When he arose heshed himself with new life, and ascended to the office station with apparently a lighter heart. Thanking Lieutenant Hammond for his kindness, he said that since that night, three years ago, he had not tasted intoxicating liquor, and had completely reformed his life. He had keenly felt his degradation at the time of his confinement, but the event had changed his entire course. He did not give his name, but left as quietly as he had come.

One View of the Case.—It is a pity to see the best of our lands, the districts most famous for splendid yields of the grains and grasses, and the place of life, continually encroached upon and exhausted by the growth of vile tobacco. Agricultural journals occupy whole columns weekly with this sinister crop, and newspapers report a continual increase in the demand for it. Very rarely do we meet with a counterblast against all this deleterious smoke. But a pungent article in The Christian at Work by A. M. Williams of Syracuse, N. Y., declares that the average of tobacco-smokers are eventual losers, although the first prize is speedy riches. "What they really seek is to starve their farms; and the only sure success is that of making smokers and chewing and fastening a demoralizing and usually conquered habit on the community." Let tobacco rise from the soil, of which we are stewards, something healthful, useful and beautiful, rather than devote it to the vilest weed earth produces. Leave that to the one man which alone eats it. Another writer says tobacco has been cultivated in Onondaga County for over thirty years, and farmers who have made it a specialty are worse off than when they commenced the business. The most deplorable feature attending the general prevalence of its use is that a parent, especially a town resident, can scarcely, by any possible means short of depriving his children of all advantages of school and other society, prevent them from being corrupted by their companions, and taking the first step which makes them slaves for life to an offensive and injurious habit, that morally prepares the way for alcoholic stimulation.—New York Tribune.

For "The Friend."

Religious Items, &c.

Colored Baptists.—It is stated that some of the colored Baptists of Georgia are about entering on their system the Methodist Episcopal polity. The new organization is to be called the "African Baptist Missionary Episcopal Church." They are to have Bishops, Aiding Elders, and the Itinerant system. Ungraceful Ways of Raising Money for Church Purposes.—The Episcopal Recorder refers to a new Methodist Meeting-house of which the corner-stone was recently laid in New York City. An entertainment was held to procure funds to further the erection of the building. The raising of a curtain revealed "up Palmer" (named after the pastor of the congregation), and thirty-two "attractive young ladies" who in theatrical fashion acted out "camp life." The Recorder justly remarks, "This congregation have been worshipping in a very respectable building, and would it not have comported with the cause of the blessed Master to have remained there than to have reflected dishonor upon his name?"

Greek Church.—The services in the Greek chapel, for several years past supported by the Russian Government in New York, are shortly to be discontinued. There are only about 126 Russian-Greeks in the city.

For "The Friend."

Natural History, Science, &c.

Russian Mulberry.—This has been introduced into Nebraska by the Mennonite colonists from Russia, who brought the seed with them. It is a rapid grower and some that were sown about seven years ago, are now 20 feet in height and stout enough for fence posts. The leaves are food for the silk-worm and the timber is very valuable for fence posts and fire wood. The fruit is edible and resembles blackberries in appearance.

The Popular Science Monthly had the following curious note on the use of the microphone. "A wealthy land-owner in the Tyrol has made an application of the microphone to the detection of the subterranean springs. He fixed the microphones at the spots where he thought water might exist, each being connected with its telephone and battery. Then, at night, he put his ear to each of the instruments, and listened for the murmuring of the waters, and in several cases heard it."

The Nesting of the Maleo.—The "Maleo" is the native name of a species of gallinaceous birds found in the island of Celebes. It deposits its eggs in a bed of loose, black sand formed by the decomposition of an ancient lava stream—where they are hatched by the heat of the sand. In the 8th and 9th months, when there is little or no rain, these birds come down in pairs from the interior and scratch holes 3 or 4 feet deep in the sand, just above high-water mark, where the female deposits a single large egg, which she covers over with about a foot of sand, and then returns to the forest. At the end of 10 or 12 days she comes again to the same spot to lay another egg, and each female bird is supposed to lay 6 or 8 eggs during the season. Many birds lay in the same hole, for a dozen eggs are often found together; and these are so large that it is not possible for the body of the bird to contain more than one fully developed egg at the same time.

Every year the natives come for 50 miles round to obtain these eggs, which are esteemed a great delicacy. They are richer than hen's eggs, and of a finer flavor, and each one completely fills an ordinary tea-cup.

After the eggs are deposited in the sand they are no further cared for by the mother. The young birds on breaking the shell, work their way up through the sand and run off at once to the forest. They can fly the very day they are hatched. Some eggs were taken on board a schooner, hatched during the night, and in the morning the little birds flew readily across the cabin.—Wallace's Malay Archipelago.

Conjugal Affection in a Teal.—A writer in Science Gossip had been duck-shooting, and had just shot a mallard, when a couple of teal sprang up, alarmed at the report.

"The duck being the nearest, received the contents of the remaining barrel, and fell dead upon the soft mud at the very edge of the water. While speculating upon our good luck, and putting in two fresh cartridges the cock teal, which had flown up to the other end of the pool when his mate fell, turned back, and, after flying up and down several times with mournful notes, returned to the spot whence he rose, and pitched upon the mud, close to the dead duck. Here he remained for some seconds, nodding his head and curtsying, as if about to take wing, uttering a low note the while, as if to entice away the duck, whom he appeared so loth to leave.

"We were so struck at this manifestation of affection that we could not find it in our hearts to shoot the poor bird, and, as we moved on to pick up his mate, he rose, and was soon out of range again."

THE FRIEND.

FIRST MONTH 6, 1883.

In the 16th number of the present volume of "The Friend," there was a brief reference to the doctrine of the resurrection of the body, containing a caution, that speculations on such mysterious subjects should not divert the thoughts from the more important and practical question of how our spirits may become prepared for the enjoyment of happiness in a future state of existence.

The recent mails have brought us two evidences that this matter has claimed the attention of others in different parts of the land. One of these is a letter from a correspondent in Ohio, who speaks of that regeneration, which our Saviour declares to be essential for all who would enter the kingdom of Heaven; which is a spiritual resurrection from a state of spiritual death into a new and spiritual life, through the power of Christ, who declared himself to be "the resurrection and the life." "Blessed and holy is he who hath a part in the first resurrection, for over such the second death hath no power."

The letter referred to expresses the belief that people are too superficial, too outward—apathetic on one hand; while, on the other, crowds are carried away by excitement and creaturely activity, preaching this, that and the other, which Truth never sanctioned; lured from the narrow path of self-denial and the cross. It regards excitement relative to the resurrection of these mortal frames as calculated to draw the attention from Him who is the resurrection and the life, and to set the mind to work in devising and imagining that which it concerns us not to know.

The other evidence of the interest awakened in the doctrine of resurrection, is a pamphlet on this subject by C. W. Harvey, of Quakerville, Kansas, showing by quotations from several of the early writers in our Society, that they did not hold the outward views which have been adopted by some of their successors in religious profession; and contending, that the resurrection refers primarily to a change from a state of nature to a state of grace, in which the true Christian is born again of the incorruptible Seed and Word of God, receives Christ's heavenly image, and becomes spiritual in the clothing of his Spirit; and, next, to the ascension into glory of the soul after the death of the outward frame. The idea that these outward material bodies shall be again raised from the dead, and that the Scripture passages which speak of the resurrection refer to this, the author, in common with our early Friends, rejects as a gross and carnal belief.

Those who are disposed to perplex themselves with considering "how and with what body are the dead raised?" may profitably reflect on the following advice given by George Whitehead:

"The question is not only unlearned, but impertinent, and unnecessary unto salvation. It is not necessary that men should imagine how they shall be clothed, or accommodated with bodies in heaven; but to inquire the way thither, that they may walk in it, and be solicitous to know that power and inward operation, whereby they may be made sons of God, and attain to the resurrection of the dead, as being children of God, and of the resurrection.

"If men walk in the true light, and so truly serve and please God on earth, they shall not need to doubt or dispute about their future beings in heaven. Their business is to get thither, and God will accommodate them there."

Penn's Treaty, by Charles S. Keyser. This little work contains an account of the great Treaty of amity made in 1682, between William Penn and the Indians, in which they agreed to live together as brethren, "while the creeks and rivers run, and while the sun, moon and stars endure."

It also enumerates the various treaties made with the Indians for the purchase of lands during the Proprietorship of the Penn family and subsequently; and sums up the evidence from written documents, and concurrent traditions which satisfactorily establish the truth of the current opinions respecting the treaty of 1682, and the attendant circumstances.

The book is published by David McKay, No. 23 South Ninth St., Philada.

Kindergarten Homes is the title of a small book by E. Thompson, advocating the policy of gathering up the infants in our great cities, who are without suitable care-takers, and placing them on farms in the rural sections of the country, where they may be properly developed and trained to labor, under healthy influences, both physical and moral.

In reading the work, the practical difficulty that presents in carrying out the scheme, is, to find a body of care-takers imbued with sufficient zeal, patience, skill and love, to meet the demands upon them which the system requires.

SUMMARY OF EVENTS.

UNITED STATES.—In the U. S. Senate, on the 28th ult., the Civil Service bill was passed by a vote of 39 to 5. On the 29th, the bill to prevent political assessments, reported by the Judiciary Committee, was taken up and discussed. It passed finally without amendment.

On and about the 25th of last month, an unusually large number of cases of crime and violence have been reported in the newspapers. A telegram from New Orleans says the Christmas holiday "was probably the most disorderly and disgraceful ever observed" in that city. The authorities made little effort to suppress the disorders. At Atlanta, Georgia, several murders occurred, and many cases of violence, 125 persons being lodged in the station-house in ten hours. These events are matter for much serious thoughtfulness and apprehension to all true lovers of our country.

The receipts of the Patent Office during the year were $1,000,186, against $853,665 during 1881. The net revenue of the office during the year was $325,000.

The Spanish-American Claims Commission, after a session of more than twelve years, ended its labors last week. It decided the seven cases, involving $12,000,000, which were considered by two umpires, and rejected fraudulent certificates involving $20,000,000.

The arrivals at New York from foreign ports, during 1882, numbered 6476, including 1945 steamers.

The total product of the Leadville mines for 1882 is reported at $18,220,893, which is $5,050,317 more than in 1881.

During the eleven months which ended on 11th mo. 30th, the Wabash Railroad system earned $2,280,000 more than that during the corresponding period of 1881.

Snow fell to the depth of five inches at San Francisco last First-day afternoon, a thing unprecedented for thirty years. A number of sleighs, "the first ever seen" in that city, were out in the streets yesterday. Despatches from different points in California indicate a snow fall of one to eight inches.

The United States steamer Enterprise, Commander Barker, sailed on the 27th ult. from Norfolk, Virginia, for Cape Verde Islands and China. She has an outfit apparatus necessary for a scientific cruise, and will take deep sea soundings every 100 miles from the United States to Cape Town.

It is announced that, owing to the high price of oats, the three oat mills of Douglas, Stuart and Forrest, in Cedar Rapids, Chicago and Oregon, Illinois, will be closed until the market becomes better. These mills use 20,000 bushels of oats per day.

The cane crop of Mississippi is this year largely in excess of any heretofore produced, and is yielding a handsome profit.

The Great Dismal Swamp in Virginia is passing away. Much of the area has been reclaimed and converted into good tillage land.

The State Treasurer of Delaware, in his annual report, says that the total debt of the State on First mo. 1st, 1883, will be $864,750, $715,000 of which is in four per cent. bonds. The total State investments foot up $1,168,799, showing a large surplus of assets over liabilities. The receipts of the State for the past year have been $141,238.19, and the disbursements $94,259.24.

The deaths in this city last week numbered 390, which was 23 less than the previous week, and 24 less than for the same week last year. The number of males was 193, of females 197: deaths from consumption 42; from pneumonia 41; from diphtheria 27; from old age 18; from marasmus, 15; from typhoid fever 12; from small pox, 10.

Markets, &c.—U. S. 3's, registered, 103½; 3½'s, registered, 103½; 4½'s, registered and coupon, 113½; 4's registered, 119½; coupon, 120½; currency 6's, 129 a 132.

Cotton.—There was no essential change to notice in price or demand; sales of middlings are reported at 10½ a 10½ cts. per lb. for uplands and New Orleans.

Petroleum.—Standard white, 7 a 7½ cts. for export, and 8 a 8½ cts. per gallon for home use.

Flour is quiet but steady; sales of 1400 barrels, including Minnesota extras, at $5 a $5.75; Pennsylvania family at $4.60 a $4.75; western do. at $4.75 a $5.50, and patents at $6 a $7. Rye flour is dull at $3.75 a $3.87½ per barrel.

Grain.—Wheat is quiet and steady. Small sales of red in car lots at $1.04 a $1.10, and $1 a $1.03 for rejected. Rye is nominal at 64 a 67 cts. per bushel. Corn is quiet and irregular. Sales of 7000 bushels in lots, at 50 a 70 cts. as to quality, 12th month, sold at 76 a 78 cts. Oats are dull and unchanged. Sales of 8000 bushels, in car lots at 45 a 49 cts. for rejected and No. 1.

Hay and Straw Market, for week ending 12th mo. 30th, 1882.—Loads of hay, 355; loads of straw, 70. Average price during the week—Prime timothy, 90 cts. to $1 per 100 pounds; mixed, 85 to 95 cts. per 100 pounds; straw, 70 to 80 cts. per 100 pounds.

FOREIGN.—A recent rainfall has caused floods in the midland counties of England. There is great mortality among the flocks of sheep in Northamptonshire, Nottinghamshire and Leicestershire.

On the morning of the 28th of 12th month, at Bradford, a tall chimney fell upon a building full of operatives. It had been known for some time to have been in an unsafe condition. Thirty-six persons are known to have been killed and fifty others injured, mostly women and children. The total damage is estimated at £60,000. About 3000 persons are thrown out of employment, eight mills having flue connections with the demolished chimney, being brought to a standstill.

Lord MacDonald has withdrawn the application for police aid to serve summonses on the crofters of Isle of Skye, an understanding having been reached.

On an average one hundred persons are seized nightly in Dublin under the Curfew clause of the restriction act.

The acting Governor of Iceland, the Bishop and persons of note, in a communication to the Time, that, notwithstanding the large donations that have been received, there must be great distress from want of food in the island during the present winter.

Her majesty's ship Undine has captured eight dhows off the Comoro Islands on the east coast of Africa.

Leon Gambetta, the great French statesman, died at his residence at Ville de'Avray, on the morning of 1st instant. The physicians state that his death was due to pyemia, the result of suppressed erysipelas, which had suffered from an intestinal abscess, which is believed to have discharged internally. A profound sensation has been made in France by the event.

There has been a renewal of the floods in various parts of France. The Seine rose, and several streets in Lyons were submerged. The Ain overflowed its banks. The city of Besancon has suffered much damage. Liseux was inundated.

The report of the Committee on De Brazza's Mission states that he considers it possible to complete the exploration of the Upper Congo in two years. De Brazza's object is to maintain the position already achieved by founding eight chief and twelve minor stations, linking a chain to Brazzaville from Gaboon and from the sea. In order to mark the pacific character of the mission it goes under the auspices of the Minister of Foreign Affairs and Public Instruction.

A telegram from the Spanish Consul at Suez, states that 21 pilgrims had died of cholera between Mecca and Medina. There are ten deaths daily from the disease at Medina.

On the 28th ultimo, the Rhine and its tributaries from the Lake of Constance to Cologne, rose rapidly. Many bridges and banks of dams have been destroyed. A bridge near Lorrach, in Baden, gave way, and persons were drowned. The river Inn has overflowed its banks at Passau, and the Danube was overflowing Upper Austria. At Worms the Hammel dyke on the Rhine burst, flooding the lower part of the town. A way travel from Frankfurt-on-the-Main to Wiesbaden was interrupted, owing to the inundation of the C. depot. The next day the flood subsided. It is estimated that fully fifty persons perished.

King Milan, of Servia, replying to an address presented to him by the Skuptschina, said that since Servia had passed through a gigantic struggle for progress and freedom, and was now assuming an honorable place among the educated races of Europe. The speech had created a favorable impression.

Serious diplomatic trouble appears likely to arise between Colombia and Ecuador, owing to the former republic having been flogged and imprisoned by the latter. This punishment was inflicted because of the sympathy exhibited by the Colombians with the revolution headed by Eloy Alfaro. The Ecuadorian Dictator has few friends among right-thinking men in the districts where he exercises military potism, he endeavors to suppress any expressions of feeling.

WESTTOWN BOARDING SCHOOL.

The Committee in charge of this Institution will meet in Philadelphia on the 5th day of the First mo. 1883, at 11 A. M.

The Committee on Instruction and the Committee on Admissions meet the same day, at 9 A. M.

WM. EVANS, Clk.

DIED, on the 30th of 11th month, 1882, at the residence of her son-in-law, Isaac Leeds, near Moores N. J., SUSAN POWELL, in the 88th year of her age, a member of West Chester Particular, and Birmingham Monthly Meeting of Friends, Pa.

—, on the 4th of 12th month, 1882, at the residence of her brother, Oliver S. Negus, of Colerain, RACHEL NEGUS, in the 39th year of her age. She was a member of Short Creek Monthly, and Concord Particular Meeting of Friends. Her relatives and friends have a well-grounded hope that, through God's mercy, her end was peace.

—, on the 8th of 12th month, 1882, REBECCA ROBERTS, daughter of the late David and Rachel Roberts, in the 56th year of her age, a beloved member of Chester Monthly Meeting, New Jersey.

WILLIAM H. PILE, PRINTER,
No. 422 Walnut Street.

THE FRIEND.

A RELIGIOUS AND LITERARY JOURNAL.

OL. LVI.

SEVENTH-DAY, FIRST MONTH 13, 1883.

NO. 23.

PUBLISHED WEEKLY.

, if paid in advance, $2.00 per annum; if not paid in advance $2.50; 10 cents extra is charged for Postage on those sent by mail.

Articles designed for insertion to be addressed to

JOSEPH WALTON,
MOORESTOWN, BURLINGTON CO., N. J.

scriptions, payments and business communications, received by

JOHN S. STOKES,

NO. 116 NORTH FOURTH STREET, UP STAIRS,
PHILADELPHIA.

For "The Friend."

A Trip Through St. Gotthard.

(Concluded from page 171.)

ere at Wasen a remarkable appearance ents. We have wound about the hill on h it stands, doubling upon our track, through a spiral tunnel, now at a lofty ht in open day, that we seem to have e no progress but to be perpetually es- around the little church of Wasen as tre, and favored to see it from every t of view. Now we run northward and an imposing bridge 260 feet high, and n through a spiral tunnel 1,200 yards and 82 feet in ascent, and crossing the reuss for the third time with a fine of the gorge below, and 3,250 feet e the sea. The train now runs for some nce along the mountain side and we a command a view of part of the line traversed and lying far, far below. Op- e rises the Rienzee-stock, nearly 10,000 and in a snow-storm we have arrived at henen, 60 miles on our way and are 3,- feet further from the level of the sea, are here brought face to face with the aera mouth of the mightiest gap pre- tions man has dared to make into the ls of mother earth. The great St. Gott- tunnel is before us. The traveller is permitted to forget that he, like the loc- ve that has lifted him aloft, needs a sup- ff fuel, even though he may have become st oblivious of the demands of nature e revelling amid the impressively grand bsorbingly beautiful. Again in motion, made the passage in 30 minutes, and l the temperature rather oppressive, ris- it does, despite the depressing effects e ventilating apparatus, as high as 75° enheit. The infrequent lamps seemed o augment the gloom, and we were glad erge into day at Airolo, in the upper o Valley, on our now descending course. scenery here is still of an Alpine char- , but as we proceed, the influence of the n climate makes itself evident. Monn- are still around us, some rising two n height, and numerous villages hang e the mountain terraces. Down its e the impetuous Ticino plunges in a of cataracts, and many a thread of sil- streaks the lofty mountain side as its er affluents seek by easiest mode, to join his gathering flood. The train is again more cautiously let down by two circular or loop-tunnels, and by lofty bridges and tunnel after tunnel, now to emerge in the midst of the defile of Prato and its imposing scenery, and by another spiral tunnel a mile long and 112 feet in descent, and we look out upon the beautiful Vale of Faido and its luxuriant southern vegetation. We have not escaped from tunnels, which hide many a bit of scenery, but the fine fall of an affluent of the Ticino and the picturesque gorge are open to our view, and we are let down to the lower valley by the kindly aid of two contiguous spiral tunnels, while there again follow in quick succession other tunnels, one nearly a mile long, and we have reached the lower zone of Valle Leventina and are 90 miles on our winding and wondrous way. Crossing the Ticino again and again, often close to the richly cultivated slope of the mountains, we further on skirt the foot of numerous precipitous walls, that rise in solemn grandeur to unknown heights. These masses of black and greenish chloritic slates are frowning and impressive, and we were glad to bid farewell to mountains that had almost overpowered us by their awful grandeur and sublimity. Never before did we so fully realize the force of the lines

"All that exalts the spirit and appals
Gather around these summits, as to show
How earth may pierce to Heaven,
Yet leave vain man below."

I can truly say that the passage of the Alps by the St. Gotthard railway awakens our sense of the sublime beyond anything that we have elsewhere known in Europe. To describe the scene—a succession of grand and imposing views and properly to set forth the impression made thereby, are utterly beyond the power of my hand. The pass must be made to be comprehended. No pen can sketch, no pencil paint what we saw on that day of days ever to be remembered. We crossed at a most favored season—the early snow had fallen, and each towering summit was brilliant with its crown of white. The lower heights clad in firs, were sprinkled with snowy powdering, while below, the green of the meadows draped their feet. We had passed a week beside the Lake of the Four Forest Cantons—beautiful Lucerne—resting after rapid travel, and had revelled in the loveliness of its charming scenery. Here we had been favored with mild Autumn weather and clear skies, and drank deeply of the beauty and the glory of snow-covered peak and verdant meadow—a contrast unknown to summer visitors—while the colors of the changing foliage, the varied yellows and bright and sombre brown, combine to render the panorama far more attractive than during the popular season of abounding travel. To add to this, we were almost alone—no jostling throng of pleasure seekers—no gathering as to a world's convention was ever around us, to thrust itself between us and the face of dear mother Nature.

Rain at length came and drove us southward, and we sought the shortest and by far the least fatiguing, and we must add, the most charming of roads to Italy. The old road over St. Gotthard was long a favorite diligence route, and bore the traveller over the famous pass upwards of 6,000 feet above the sea. The Hospital near the summit has long been famous, and upwards of 30,000, it is said, have annually dined with the monks who passed their lives in these Alpine retreats, shut out from the world during several months of each year, and letting in the life of the outside world only when the gay throng of pleasure seekers looked in, famished and with keen mountain appetite, and too often partook of their hospitality without a requital. "But we have changed all that," and what has not steam revolutionized? Even the papal power, that sought to bar its States from the outside world, dreading the light, has been assailed by steam, and the strong barriers that ignorance and bigotry had built by means of rigid police regulations, have been swept away never again to be revived. And happily the Popedom has been smitten and driven to the wall, and left a mere wreck of its once proud domination, while it gnashes its teeth against the spread of light and truth through the press, the public schools, and the growing number of Protestant churches, and the rising influence of the Waldenses they sought in vain for centuries to destroy, by every diabolic act so well known to the representatives of anti Christ. The Waldenses, it is said, have fifty schools under their control in Rome alone, and cannot but exert an influence adverse to the debasing and defiling forces of Romanism. But I digress. The fine old diligence road over the St. Gotthard was built by the cantons at vast expense—is macadamized throughout—provided with retreats from storm and avalanche, and winding by many a doubling turn up the acclivities of the mountain, to the lowest pass, more than a mile above the sea, to descend by many an equally labored excavation, looked out upon scenes that have excited the admiration of every traveller endowed with a just perception of the sublime and beautiful. But its day of usefulness is drawing to a close, if not already ended, and it is said that it will be abandoned. But for all that the tourist in search of the picturesque and sublime mountain scenery, has lost by his transfer to the rail, he has been perhaps doubly repaid, not alone by the increased comfort with which the passage is traversed, but by the added pleasure derived from the contemplation of scenery that must far exceed any that the old road could disclose, higher though it ascended. In a few places, such as the Devil's bridge, the traveller looked down into awful gorges or wound along the brink of fearful precipices, or gazed upward to giddy heights, but he who is whirled over this new railway—the most extraordinary of roads, unless that built by Meiggs among the Andes of Peru, be not its superior in romantic and daring grandeur of execution—is treated to a succession of surprises that stagger his comprehension while they bring perpetually recurring delight. More especially is this his good fortune should he make the transit late in the season of travel when the early snow has sent its tribute to crown with added glory the already impressive grandeur, and he is permitted to gaze from the window of his car unmolested by the opposition of boorish and uncompromising German commercial travellers, who prefer to stew in the stifling atmosphere of a crowded apartment rather than permit their freedom-loving and free-breathing fellow-travellers to catch one glimpse of the grandeur of the mountains. But we were favored to out-vote the robust and thickly bewrapped German who was the bête noire of the party, and he was by advice of the English and American ladies present, and aid of the guard, permitted to depart to another quarter, where we might kindly hope he was, for a time at least, hermetically sealed.

J. S. L.

Florence, Italy, 11th mo. 29th, 1882.

For "The Friend,"

Reflections on War.

These memoranda were written many years ago, bearing date the 1st month of 1843.

"The collector seized some of my grain to satisfy a military demand. This proceeding created considerable inconvenience, beside the loss of my grain, all of which I endeavored to bear patiently; for if our property is sacrificed for bearing our testimony against war, we certainly are suffering in a good cause,—no less than the promotion of peace on earth, and good will to men. The sacrificing of our property for military demands seems to be the only lawful remnant of persecution to which Friends are now subjected. Our early predecessors and forefathers in the Truth suffered much for their constant and unflinching opposition to the encouragement of war. By their faithfulness and firmness, much relief has been purchased for us. The office of collector has now become generally burthensome; demands are exacted with reluctance; some of the agents seem ashamed of their employment; rigorous proceedings are extremely rare; and in some sections of our country Friends are entirely exempt from military exactions in time of peace. Thus has toleration been gaining ground; thus has prejudice become diminished, our scruples against wielding carnal weapons are looked upon with allowance, and warlike sentiments seem to be fading before the light of Truth. May the good work go on and prosper, until that peaceable spirit which the gospel breathes shall prevade the bosoms of the whole human family!

The sword of Christian love is more powerful than the sword of violence, and more effectual in composing differences. Peace procured by this effective weapon (which is opposite to carnal) is generally satisfactory and lasting. By the sword of violence apparent peace is sometimes attained, but often the fire of enmity is only smothering, and is easily fanned to flame whenever the prospect of successful opposition looks flattering.

The world bestows its highest praises on successful military chieftains, and hands down their names to posterity as worthy of reverence and imitation; but this honor the world sometimes bestows upon those in whom the Lord has no pleasure,—sometimes upon the very instruments that have been permitted to scourge large portions of the human family with desolation and destruction.

The military system, although by many it is viewed as honorable and glorious, is not only fertile in the production of human misery, and destructive to the welfare of multitudes of the human family, but is manifestly at variance with the letter and the spirit of the gospel. The Christian soldier labors for the good of souls, visits the widow and fatherless in their afflictions, and keeps himself unspotted from the world; and, in the great day of final decision, when all must appear before the judgment seat of Christ, He will be among those to whom it will be said, 'Come ye blessed of my Father, inherit the kingdom prepared for you from the foundation of the world.'

The weapons of the true Christian's warfare are not carnal, nevertheless they are mighty. It may be asked, what would become of our country if all its inhabitants were principled against war? And it may be feared that the enemy would soon overrun us with devastation and plunder. But trusting in carnal weapons rather than in obedience to Divine precepts, certainly betrays a want of confidence in that Almighty power that has unlimited dominion in heaven and in earth, and can control events accordingly. And would our merciful Lord and Saviour have given us a law which it is not right and safe for us to obey? Would He have commanded us to love our neighbor as ourselves, and even to love our enemies, to return good for evil, do good to them that hate us, and pray for them that despitefully use us and persecute us; would He have commanded this, and abundance of other precepts of similar import, did He design that they need not be obeyed?

Armies have sometimes been victorious, and in erring human estimation have achieved much good; but this is no evidence that the system of war, or those that are willing to carry it into active operation in spirit or practice, are approved in the Divine sight. Can a thoughtful man conscientiously take up carnal weapons under the dispensation set forth in the New Testament, professing to live under the influence of gospel light and power, having such a law for his outward rule and guide; and in connection with it acknowledging subjection to the guidance of that spirit which cannot contradict itself, and which moved the inspired penmen to set forth the Divine law with the rewards for faithfulness thereto appended; and also the pains and penalties for disobedience? The Lord can protect us in our defenceless condition, if consistent with his Divine will; and if it is not, no skill, or might, or power of our own will save us; our safety consists in obeying the law of the Lord, and if He permits man to afflict us, it is our duty to endeavor to suffer it patiently.

Wars and fightings are at variance with the Divine law under the new dispensation. They are destructive to brotherly kindness and charity; and, it is said, that we cannot love God and hate our brother at the same time. The emphatic language of our Saviour is not to be disregarded, if we ever expect to inherit the Divine blessing—'If thou bring thy gift to the altar, and there rememberest that thy brother hath aught against thee, leave there thy gift before the altar, and thy way, first be reconciled to thy brother, and then come and offer thy gift.' The spirit of war is not in accordance with the Spirit of the gospel. We cannot be instrumental to the advancement of the Redeemer's kingdom while we are promoting that which his kingdom is against. May the day be hastened when 'swords shall be beat into plowshares, and spears into pruning hooks, and nation shall not rise against nation, neither shall they learn war any more!'

Under the Jewish dispensation, war in some circumstances was permitted; but in many other things that were permitted to the Jews, are annulled or rejected in the gospel dispensation. There is scarcely a precept of the New Testament, set forth in plainer terms, than that which in substance forbids the use of carnal weapons, and misgives approval to the forgiving and obedient.

In the great rebellion of Ireland, the members of the Society of Friends that were victims to the wrath of man, were those who took up arms and trusted in their own might and power for protection. When imminent dangers threatened on every hand, the Society provided a way for the safety of trusting and obedient children, where no violence was seen by the art of man. In Him is only sure place of refuge, and doubtless would preserve mankind generally in tranquillity and peace, did they but keep his law, and trust in his name."

Graffiti or Wall-Scribblings.

Despite his withering touch, Time, the destroying angel, has here and there permitted some of the most fragile and evanescent things to remain, as silent memorials of long generations. Not least among these relics of ancient life and thought, are the graffiti, wall-scribblings, mostly scratched by a pointed instrument, or made with red ochre or charcoal. They are found upon the columns, mausoleums and temples of Egypt, in association with the mysterious inscriptions upon the rocks of Sinai, upon the tombs of Jerusalem, and within and around the chambers of ghostly Pompeii; while others have been brought to light within the area of the Eternal City. Plautus, Pliny, and Appian each refer to the practice of wall-scribbling. Lucian mentions that, in his time, inscriptions covered the western gate of Athens; and Plutarch informs us that Publius Gracchus was chiefly aided in his agrarian scheme by proclamations of this kind upon the monuments, pillars, and houses of the city.

These scrawls, which are of all ages, have no little interest to the antiquary and the student of human nature. Those of Egypt range from an extremely early time to the time of the Khedive; but as the graffiti of Italy are far more worthy of consideration, we propose to bring some of the most curious of them before our readers. Those of Pompeii are the first attention; they are of three classes, Etruscan, Greek, and Roman. Though twenty centuries old, the thoughtless scrawls of a boy's serawls, the love-sick gallant's doggerel, or the caricature of some friend, foe, or particular favorite, are still as clear as though ed by an idler of yesterday. Although any of these inscriptions are not strictly of importance, yet still they are very suggestive of the humors, vulgarities, and vices of old Roman life. Some are memoranda of domestic transactions; one telling us, for instance, how many tunics were sent to the wash; another, in a donkey was born; while a third informs the reader that "on the 25th of July," a hundred pounds of hog's-lard and two hundred bunches of garlic were either bought or sold. On the interior wall of a tavern may be read the words, Sodales, Avete (Welcome, comrades). The coat of whitewash having peeled off in some places, disclosed graffiti of an older date with archaic forms of spelling, mostly in the Oscan tongue. These supplies evidence that Pompeii must have been an Oscan or Samnite city, because this language was certainly in use during the second century before the Christian era, particularly Campania; for not only at that time, but during the Social War (91 B. C.), the coins of allies bore Oscan inscriptions. A few of these writings, moreover, clearly have a date very near to that on which the city was enveloped by the falling ashes. In a few cases, Latin language is used, but written in an archaic form.

The walls of Pompeii bear some inscriptions which are simply names; but sometimes there is an epithet attached, which is either complimentary or the reverse. We select a few: vi Embolari, Fur Furuncule (Oppius, ballet-dancer, thief and pilferer!). One speaks of a deep-faced Lygnus, strutting about like a cock, and giving himself airs on the length of his good looks." Another exclaims: Epaphra, glaber es (O Epaphras, thou bald); Rusticus est Corydon (Corydon is a rustic, or country bumpkin); Epaphra Pilius non es (O Epaphras, thou art no tennis-player). Possibly this last graffito may refer to some person before mentioned; a friendly allusion has, however, drawn a line through the abusive remark; but it is none the less legible.

Others appear to be no more than the alphabetical exercises of school-children, for they are evidently the work of juvenile hands. A large number of the graffiti are of an amorous character. The tender passion, and its protean changes to which it has ever been subject, here stand revealed as vividly as though the idlers who were the subjects of it were in "this breathing world." One is very simple in its simplicity and suggestiveness. Within the conventional outline of a heart, is the word Psyche (my life); while another exclaims: Suavis Amor (Love is sweet); in a third, a disappointed lover thus expresses himself: Vale, mea Sava; fac me ames (Farewell, my Sava; try to love me); while one of the gentler sex is said to love "Casuntius." On the other hand, devout and affectionate devotion, the slave of Cominia, loves Chrestus with all her heart.

The virtues and vices of certain individuals are here and there lightly revealed. The two following may suffice:

*Semper M. Tenentius Eudoxus
Unus sustinet Amicos et tenet Et tutus sustinet omni modo.*

Which is to this effect:

M. Tenentius Eudoxus, even alone, always Upholds his friends and keeps them,
And defends and upholds them in every way.

Another, evidently not wishing the household gods (Lares) to witness his deeds, thus invokes them: Ite, Lares, dormitu (Begone to sleep, Lares!)

The tavern graffiti are also curious, and somewhat amusing. A sufferer from internal drought thus earnestly appeals: Suavis vinaria, silit; valde rogo, silit (Dear landlady, he is thirsty; I earnestly entreat you, he is thirsty). Another asks for more drink: Adde calicem setinum (Give one cup more of wine). On a jar, the words Liquamen optimum (First-rate liquor) have been found. In one case, customers are invited by the following notice affixed to a street corner, somewhat after the manner of modern advertising: Adeas tabernam Liani; ad dexteram (Visit the inn of Lianus; turn to the right). Here also is the advertisement of one Varius:

*Urna vinaria periit de taberna;
Sei cam quis retulerit, dabuntur h.s.
lrv; sei furem qui abduzerit, dabitur Duplum a Vario.*

The rendering of which is: "A wine jar is lost from the inn; if any one bring it back, there shall be given to him sixty-five sesterces; if any one bring the thief who took it, double that sum will be given."

On the wall of a tavern there is a rude sketch of a customer holding out his cup and asking: Da fridam (or frigidum) pusillum (Give a little ice-water.)

Others of a metrical type might here be mentioned, but for the exigencies of space; we pass on, therefore, to a brief review of another type of graffiti—the caricatures. Many of these are cleverly drawn, and, as might be expected, the comic element predominates. In connection with his valuable work, Graffiti di Pompeii, Garrucci admirably reproduces in fac-simile these caricatures, together with the various inscriptions before mentioned. One of these represents an ass engaged in turning a mill, accompanied by the words:

*Labora, aselle, quomodo ego laboravi,
Et proderit tibi.*

That is:

*Labor, O ass, as I have labored,
And it will profit thee.*

Some of these scrawls are, however, of peculiar interest, not only to the general reader, but to the antiquary, as throwing light upon several disputed questions. Those to which we here especially refer represent gladiatorial combats after a rude fashion. They are rather numerous, and are drawn with much spirit. In one case, a figure is represented as about to cast a net over his adversary; while another caricature appears to be a fight between a Mirmillo (a kind of gladiator) and a Samnite. A third is evidently a Samnite with a large helmet and shield; at his side the number of his victories (xxxii.) may be seen inclosed between a palm-branch and a chaplet. Under one of these sketches we learn that Spiculus Neronianus, "a tiro," engaged in mortal combat with the freedman Aptonetus, who had been victor in sixteen such encounters; but tyro as he was, he slew his opponent. Again, the electioneering inscriptions of Pompeii would not unfavorably compare with like placards of modern times. They are very terse (in abbreviated Latin) and to the point; thus, one appeals to the Pilierepi or ball-players to "elect as ædile Aulus Vettius Firmus, a man worthy of the republic;" while another is to this effect: "Philippus beseeches you to create M. Holconius Priscus a decemvir of justice (that is, a justice of the peace). A third runs thus:

"The scribe Issus requests you to support M. Cerrinius Vatia as ædile. He is worthy." Those of domestic character are few. On the wall of a corner-house in the Street of Fortune is a record, seemingly traced by some thrifty housewife, of the spinning tasks assigned to each of the female slaves. The quality and weight of the wool are likewise portioned out. Doris and Heracle prepare thread for the warp, and Januaria and Lalagia (or Lalage) for the woof. The other names are Vitalis, Florentia, Amaryllis, Maria, Cernursa, and Damalis.

In concluding this sketch of the Pompeian graffiti, there are two more which can scarcely be passed over in silence. One who had evidently heard of the fate of the neighboring city, wrote the simple but impressive ejaculation: Herculaneum, Herculaneum! (O Herculaneum! O Herculaneum!). Little thought the scribbler that a like fate was soon to overtake his own city of pleasure. The other expresses a kindly hope for many happy new years: Januarias nobis felices multis annis.

The graffiti of Rome and its vicinity are, with but one exception, not of such interest as the above mentioned. They are found in tombs on the Via Latina, among the remains of Nero's Golden House, and in the substructures of the palace of the Cæsars. But in the Catacombs they are most numerous, especially in those of St. Agnese and St. Callixtus. The words Cave, viator (Beware, traveller) were frequently attached to the epitaphs on the Roman tombs by the wayside; the object being to warn scribblers and those who would pollute or injure these resting-places of the dead. To these cautions was added sometimes an imprecation on any who should injure or dishonor the monument. One silent appeal is thus worded: "Scribbler, I pray you pass by this monument." And another: Scriptor, parce hoc opus (Scribbler, spare this work).

The inscriptions in the Catacombs are of three classes: first, mere names of persons, with the occasional addition of their titles; second, pious wishes, prayers, greetings or acclamations for, or to, friends and relations, living or dead; and lastly, invocations of the martyrs upon whose graves they are written. As may be supposed, these graffiti are of all ages. Those which mostly contain only names, testify to the multitudes of all countries who, as is still the practice, came to visit these shrines of the martyrs; and strangely enough, some of these names are scrawled in rather inaccessible places. The plaster walls of the vestibule of the cemetery of St. Callixtus, one of the chief catacombs, are covered with graffiti of this class.

Work if you Would Rise.—Soon after the great Edmund Burke had been making one of his powerful speeches in Parliament, his brother Richard was found sitting silent in reverie; and when asked by a friend what he was thinking about, he replied: "I have been wondering how Ned has contrived to monopolize all the talents of our family. But then I remember that when we were doing nothing or at play, he was always at work." And the force of the anecdote is increased by the fact that Richard Burke was always considered, by those who knew him best, to be superior in natural talent to his brother; yet the one rose to greatness, while the other lived and died in comparative obscurity. The lesson to all is: If you would succeed in life, be diligent; improve your time; work. "Seest thou a man," says Solomon, "diligent in his business? He shall stand before kings; he shall not stand before," that is, shall not be ranked with, "mean men."

For "The Friend."

Gleanings from Quaker Annals.

The following selection is taken from "The History of the Life of Thomas Ellwood, Written by Himself":—"I was now required by this inward and spiritual law, 'the law of the Spirit of life in Christ Jesus,' to 'put away the evil of my doings,' and to 'cease to do evil.' And what, in particulars, the evil was which I was required to put away, and to cease from, that measure of the divine light, which was now manifested in me discovered to me; and what the light made manifest to be evil, judgment passed upon.

So that here began to be a way cast up before me, for me to walk in—a direct and plain way; so plain, that a way-faring man, how weak and simple soever, though a fool to the wisdom, and in the judgment of the world, could not err, while he continued to walk in it; the error coming in by his going out of it. And this way with respect to me, I saw was that measure of divine light which was manifested in me, by which the evil of my doings, which I was to put away and cease from, was discovered to me.

By this divine light then I saw, that though I had not the evil of the common uncleanness, debauchery, profaneness and pollutions of the world to put away, because I had, through the great goodness of God, and a civil education, been preserved out of those grosser evils; yet I had many other evils to put away, and to cease from; some of which were not, by the world which lies in wickedness, accounted evils; but by the light of Christ were made manifest to me to be evils, and as such condemned in me.

As particularly, those fruits and effects of pride, that discover themselves in the vanity and superfluity of apparel; which I, as far as my ability would extend to, took alas! too much delight in. This evil of my doings, I was required to put away and cease from; and judgment lay upon me till I did so. Wherefore in obedience to the inward law, which agreed with the outward, 1 Tim. ii. 9; Pet. iii. 3; 1 Tim. vi. 8; Jam. i. 21, I took off from my apparel those unnecessary trimmings of lace, ribbons and useless buttons, which had no real service, but were set only for that which was, by mistake, called ornament, and I ceased to wear rings.

Again, the giving of flattering titles to men, between whom and me there was not any relation, to which such titles could be pretended to belong. This was an evil I had been much addicted to, and was accounted a ready artist in it; therefore this also was I required to put away and cease from. So that thenceforward I durst not say sir, master, my lord, madam (or my dame), or say your servant, to any one to whom I did not stand in the real relation of a servant; which I had never done to any.

Again, respect of persons, in uncovering the head, and bowing the knee or body in salutations, was a practice I had been much in the use of. This is one of the vain customs of the world, introduced by the spirit of the world, instead of the true honor, of which this is a false representation, and used in deceit, as a token of respect, by persons one to another, who bear no real respect one to the other. And besides, it is a type and proper emblem of that divine honor which all ought to pay to Almighty God, and which all, of all sorts, who take upon them the Christian name, appear in when they offer their prayers to Him, and therefore should not be given to men. I found this to be one of those evils which I had been too long doing, therefore I was now required to put it away, and cease from it.

Again, the corrupt and unsound form of speaking in the plural number to a single person, you to one, instead of thou, contrary to the pure, plain, and single language of Truth, thou to one, and you to more than one, which had always been used by God to men, and men to God, as well as one to another, from the oldest record of time, till corrupt men, for corrupt ends, in later and corrupt times, to flatter, fawn, and work upon the corrupt nature in men, brought in that false and senseless way of speaking you to one; which hath since corrupted the modern languages, and hath greatly debased the spirits, and depraved the manners of men. This evil custom I had been as forward in as others, and this I was now called out of, and required to cease from.

These, and many more evil customs, which had sprung up in the night of darkness, and general apostacy from the Truth and true religion, were now by the inshining of this pure ray of divine light in my conscience, gradually discovered to me to be what I ought to cease from, shun, and stand a witness against."—Friends' Library, vol. 7. pp. 353-4.

"The example of such as have listened, and heard, and answered the call of the Lord, to give up their hearts to his disposal and direction, that He may work in or by them, altogether according to his own good pleasure,—most certainly, these examples speak forth the inviting language, Follow us, as we have followed Christ: they form one link in that chain of evidence, in mercy continued down, even to us of the present age, through the long line of patriarchs, prophets, and believers of every degree—that God is most favorably inclined, to draw near and to dwell with all who diligently seek Him,—that He will richly reward them, even in this life, with the lifting up of the light of his countenance,—that He will dignify all who trust in and obey Him, with the manifestations of his love and power, and even make them, in one way or another, instruments of his glory for the good of souls."

"The Lord God, as He hath begun a good work, will carry it on, if we be but faithful to Him, over all that the enemy or his instruments can do to hinder it. Oh! that we may think nothing too dear to part with, for Him; but that we give up all freely to Him, if He please to make use of any of us as instruments in his hand;—and that our eye may be unto Him, and so abide faithful unto the end; which will be of more value than all the perishing pleasures and transitory enjoyments of this world."

We keep ourselves long complaining by not fully submitting. Great part of the many bitter pills and potions is greatly owing to want of resignation.—J. Scott.

For "The Friend."

Dear Friends,—I saw a piece in No. of "The Friend," containing a circular written by some Friend from Lynn, Mass. I surprised to hear such language from one professed to be a Friend, advocating, as I did, employing some one to lead in meeting and who should receive a regular salary. This is what our early Friends protested against. We do not call on man to pre-empt us. We want men and women that call—not man. If we depend on education to lead us in Divine worship, and not Spirit of our God, we will be shipwrecked. No wonder our young Friends in Lynn losing ground, when we see our older leaving our testimonies, and long-established rules and land-marks, dress and address mention this because I went out in dress, in language. I was sorely whipped for this when I was about 18 years of age. I know what I am writing. I promised Father in Heaven, if He would forgive me would not do so any more. I have kept promise. I am now 71 years old, and have no inclination to try it any more, though there is a good deal of temptation laid before me. Some say there is nothing in these things. Why, then, was the woman commanded she was, to let her adorn herself the hidden man of the heart.

Dear ones, there is none so blind as they that will not see; none so deaf as those that will not hear what the Father says unto them. I thank the Lord I heeded while young praise his holy name for touching my heart while young, showing me where I was going. I cannot turn back even if I am left alone. Lord help me to stand for thee as a sign-post, if nothing else, to point the way, so others may follow. I will give thee the praise forever.

It is not the plain dress that makes a Christian: it is the Lord's work in the recess of the heart that brings the outward right, if heeded. If it is not heeded, we go on till we will not be known from the world. No wonder our Society has such struggle, and there are so many divisions amongst us.

The Bible should be read by all, old and the dear youth, daily, with the mind turned to the Father while reading, and with prayer to Him, to show us the hidden mysteries of it. The many educated people that do not understand the Scriptures aright, is one reason why our Society is so torn; and not it alone but so it is nearly all the world over.

It has been my desire that all of us Quakers so-called, should get all of the scales from before us, so that we can see eye to eye, as Peter directed we should. Then we would see young people overcoming the world, not diminishing and falling away.

JOHN MOON

Emporia, Kansas, 12th mo. 18th, 1882.

In the work of the ministry, it is a bright thing to begin in the life, to move in it, to end in it, to cast anchor in deep water; in other words, while there is solemnity of the mind and over the meeting. What sweetness there is to be felt, and a secret rejoicing before God; having evidence that have been preserved, not only in standing but also in sitting down! I have known lively testimonies much hurt by over-stand the right time of closing.—Selected.

Selected.

NEVER MIND WHAT "THEY" SAY.

Don't worry nor fret,
About what people think
Of your ways or your means,
Of your food or your drink,
If you know you are doing
Your best every day,
With the right on your side,
Never mind what "they" say.

Lay out in the morning
Your plans for each hour,
And never forget
That old time is a power.
This also remember,
'Mong truths old and new—
The world is too busy
To think much of you.

Then garner the minutes
That make up the hours,
And pluck in your pilgrimage
Honor's bright flowers,
Should grumblers assure you
Your course will not pay,
With conscience at rest
Never mind what "they" say.

Then let us, forgetting
The insensate throng
That jostles us daily
While marching along,
Press onward and upward,
And make no delay—
And though they do talk,
Never mind what "they" say,

Selected.

THY DAY, SO SHALL THY STRENGTH BE.

When adverse winds and waves arise,
And in my heart de-pendence sighs,—
When life her spring of eares reveals,
And weakness o'er my spirit steals,—
Grateful I hear the kind decree,
That as my day my "strength shall be."

When with sad footsteps, memory roves
Mid smitten joys, and buried loves,—
When sleep my tearful pillow flies,
And dewy morning drinks my sighs,—
Still to thy promise, Lord, I flee,
That as my day my "strength shall be."

One trial more must yet be passed,
One pang,—the keenest, and the last:
And when, with brow convulsed and pale,
My feeble, quivering heart-strings fail,
Redeemer, grant my soul to see
That as her day her "strength shall be."

Lydia H. Sigourney.

Selected.

THE UNNOTICED BOUND.

en, passing southward, I may cross the line between the Arctic and Atlantic oceans, ay not tell, by any test of mine,
y any startling signs or strange commotions Across my track.

if the days grow sweeter, one by one,
nd e'en the icebergs melt their hardened faces,
I sailors linger, basking in the sun,
know I must have made the change of places
Some distance back!

en answering timidly the Master's call,
passed the bourne of life in coming to Him;
en in my love for Him I gave up all—be very moment when I thought I knew Him,
I cannot tell.

, as unceasingly I feel His love—s this cold heart is melted to o'erflowing—now so dear the light comes from above, wonder at the change—and move on, knowing That all is well.

ly God, whose tender pity I may claim,
alling thee Father, (sweet endearing name),
he sufferings of this weak and weary frame,
All, all are known to thee."

For "The Friend."

Religious Views and Tenets.

It is said of Christ, that He gave himself for us "that He might redeem us from all iniquity." But are we all fully redeemed? Or is there not a large portion of fallen humanity who are passing smoothly along through life, under a sanctimonious covering, while iniquity still reigns down deep in the heart? And there are still perhaps a far larger portion who make no profession of being redeemed. If so, the full object of the gift of God, through Jesus Christ, to save a fallen world, is not accomplished. If the lust of the world, the lust of the flesh, the lust of the eyes, and the pride of life, which the apostle says is not of the Father, but of the world that lies in wickedness, is still prevailing in the hearts of those who profess redemption, there is something yet for such to do before the victory is fully gained—before the armor is laid off—before we are redeemed from all iniquity.

Or, if "all bitterness, and wrath, and anger, and clamor, and evil speaking" are not put away from the heart, and we are not tender-hearted, forgiving one another, even as God for Christ's sake has forgiven us; then the warfare is not over, the victory is not fully won. We have need to be dipped again into Jordan; and if even seven times be needed, let us submit; saying, the Lord's will be done.

But if, through the assisting grace of God, we "have gotten the victory over the beast," or the beastly nature in all its forms, we can "stand against all the wiles of the devil." And although our standing may, at times, seem in comparison, even as critical as on "a sea of glass mingled with fire," yet such can stand; and not only stand, but have the harps of God. And they can sing not only the song of Moses their outward deliverer and leader from a land of outward bondage and darkness, towards an outward inheritance; but they can sing the song also of the Lamb; our spiritual deliverer from the bondage of sin, and death and darkness. Yes, and our spiritual leader, through the wilderness of this world, to a spiritual inheritance beyond Jordan, "An inheritance incorruptible and undefiled and that fadeth not away; reserved in heaven for" all such as "have come out of great tribulation, and have washed their robes, and made them white in the blood of the Lamb." But the song of those who had gotten the victory over the beast, &c., was not a song fitted up by the art or tune of man; (see Rev. xv. 3, 4,) neither did it belong to the ritual of Moses. It was a new song that "no man could learn" but such as "were redeemed from the earth."

And again it is said, "For this purpose the Son of God was manifested, that He might destroy the works of the devil." And what are the works of the devil, but sin and unrighteousness? And where is the sin and unrighteousness which so troubles the world, but in the heart of men? And how did it enter the heart but by a willing obedience to the suggestions of the Evil one? who was a liar from the beginning. And must not this lying spirit, that caused the separation between man and his Maker, be destroyed before we can be again reunited to Him? And have not sin and unrighteousness, which thus entered the heart of man, by his listening to the tempter instead of to God, passed upon all men? If so, do we not all need to be freed from the bondage of sin? Well, John the Baptist points us to the Lamb of God which taketh away the sin of the world, out of the heart. He well knew that his baptism did not reach the fountain of sin and corruption in the heart. He had not the cleansing fan in his hand to thoroughly purge the floor of the heart. But he left that for Him who was to follow after, and "to finish the transgression, and to make an end of sins, and to make reconciliation for iniquity, and to bring in everlasting righteousness" into our every heart, and to seal up the vision and prophecy concerning Him; and that Christ might be anointed as the Most Holy, ruling and reigning in our individual hearts; instead of him who now rules and reigns in the hearts of the children of disobedience. So what we want, is to be redeemed from all iniquity—to have the works of the devil destroyed—to have an everlasting righteousness brought into the soul. Not a transient righteousness that needs "a revival" meeting every few weeks to fan up the dying flame which has at times been kindled by an intellectual and emotional effort, which reaches no deeper than the baptism of John. And that we know, was a superficial work, designed only to prepare the way of the Lord, and make his paths straight. But what will it avail us to have the way of the Lord prepared and his paths made straight, if we do not walk in them? We must walk in the light, as He is in the light before we can have fellowship one with another, and before we shall witness the blood of Jesus Christ to cleanse us from all sin. John was a burning and shining light, but he was not "the true light which lighteth every man that cometh into the world." The Jews "were willing for a season, to rejoice in his light." And we may rejoice in a light which is only to prepare the way of the Lord; and stop there; and thus fail to come to Him "who is the way, the truth and the life," and finally miss the crown immortal.

I have often craved that I, with others, might, by the assisting grace of Him who said, "learn of me," strive more earnestly than we often do, to close our hearts from all wandering thoughts, especially in our devotional meetings, and let the Spirit of Him come in, who cleansed the temple of old, that He might drive out all the buyers and sellers, and money changers, and merchandise of the world; and thus make them a fit temple for his Holy Spirit to dwell in. So that we might witness the Lord to be in his holy temple, and all that is earthly within us be brought into a holy reverential silence before Him; that the word of the Lord, and not of man, might have free course and be glorified in our religious assemblies,—yes, the living and eternal Word, which is a discernor of the thoughts and intents of the heart; and which was before man was made; or a word from man ever uttered. But it is the Word through which God speaks to man, whether immediately or through his chosen servants to his church or people. "For the kingdom of God is not in word but in power." And this power will remain when the words of men shall be no more. For tongues shall cease, and knowledge shall vanish away, "But the word of our God shall stand forever." And this is the word of faith which the apostles preached. But the word preached, does not profit unless it is mixed with faith in them that hear it.

"Now of the things which we have spoken, this is the sum." We are by nature destitute of the Holy Spirit, and under the influence of the evil one; and the children of wrath—prone to evil—unholy and defiled. So we need the washing of regeneration, and a restoration of the Holy Spirit, by his purifying baptism, which is not elementary nor superficial; nor in word merely, but in power. We have to be refined, but not with silver; we often have to be chosen and purified in the furnace of affliction. "For whom the Lord loveth He chasteneth, and scourgeth every son whom He receiveth." D. H.

Dublin, Ind., 12th mo. 15th, 1882.

The Pathway in the Sky.—A lady travelling through a dense forest in a Southern State, was benighted, and after journeying some time her colored driver found he had lost his way. Dismounting from his vehicle he started to find it, and she noticed to her surprise that he went among the trees looking upward to the sky. She asked him why he was looking upward when he was trying to find the road beneath. He continued gazing up to the heavens, and said:

"If I can find the path in the sky I can find the road on the ground."

He knew in that dense forest the only place where he could see the blue sky above, was where the road had been cut through among the trees; where there was clear sky overhead, there was a plain path under foot. The lady learned a memorable lesson that night; and we may learn the same. We tread a shadowed path; sometimes we find ourselves beset with dangers, and often our course is overhung with gloom, and in the midst of the deepening shadows, we feel that we have lost our way. Sometimes we despond, at others we turn wildly hither and thither to find the path we have lost. Can we not learn to look upward and seek the pathway in the sky? Over the path of divine appointment shines the light of divine blessing; over the way in which God would have us go, beams the calm brightness of his smile. If we will walk in that way, we may walk confidently and walk safely, fearing no evil. If we turn from that path we find ourselves involved in snares and dangers. In the midst of doubts, perplexities and tribulation, let us ever seek to find the pathway in the sky. And that one course, over which beams the light of heaven, and above which gleam the stars of blessing and of hope, is the safe path for us to tread. "The path of the just is as the shining light, that shineth more and more unto the perfect day."—The Wayside.

Beyrout.—A colporteur in a barber's shop in Beyrout, Syria, was reading from the New Testament the passage which says, "Avenge not yourselves." He was speaking in a loud voice, when presently a man entered, took his hand, and kissed it. He was asked why he did so? He replied, "Because you have saved my body from punishment, and my soul from death." "How?" the colporteur asked. "I sent my servant to-day to a man who owes me money, to ask him to pay me my due; the man only reviled me and my servant, and sent him away empty. This made me very angry. I took up a stick in my hand and a knife, and was going to take vengeance on the man for having insulted and wronged me, when I only asked for my right. In passing, I heard the text you quoted, saying we are not to avenge ourselves; it went deep into my heart and conscience. I stood to reflect, and thought it better not to give way to my anger, as the Lord said; and by this I escaped the evil consequences of my bad purpose, and must I not thank you?"

For "The Friend."

"Gather up the Fragments that Nothing be Lost."

Having fallen into the possession of an old family letter, written over half a century ago, I have thought that some of the readers of "The Friend" might be interested, and find instruction therein. It brings to remembrance the Scripture declaration, "That others seeing your good works, may glorify your Father which is in Heaven." So that we must not put our light under a bushel, but on a candlestick, that it may give light to all that are in the house. How appropriate, also, the words of the royal Psalmist, "Lord, thou hast been our dwelling place in all generations. Before the mountains were brought forth, or thou hadst formed the earth and the world, even from everlasting to everlasting, thou art God."

ELIZABETH C. COOPER.

12th mo. 12th, 1882.

Endeared Aunt,—Under a sense of duty, I take my pen at this time; having often had a desire to write to thee, and feeling at this time a good degree of love in my heart, I embrace the present opportunity to communicate my regard for so near and dear a connection. Dear aunt, thou hast had to bear the loss of thy bosom companion, in consequence of which, the sole care of thy family has fallen upon thee; a very important task, indeed, to become sole counsellor and guardian of a tender offspring. Seek to Him for wisdom, who giveth liberally to all, and upbraideth not, and He will support thee under every trial, and thy counsel shall be like the sacred oil that was shed upon the head of Aaron, that descended to the uttermost skirts of the garment, or like the dew of Hermon that descended upon the mountains, where the Lord commanded a blessing, even life forevermore. If we abide in the light, and wait for the babbings up of life, and take no step, but under the influence and guidance of the Spirit, we will assuredly find a blessing to attend our labors. Dear aunt, He has promised to be a husband to the widow, and a father to the fatherless, and that He will be with us in six troubles, and in the seventh He will not forsake us. Seeing that we are only probationers here below, and must shortly go to give an account for the deeds done in the body, let us stand prepared, let us be renewedly engaged to meet the Bishop of souls, to have oil, and our lamps burning, so that we may be ready to go into the marriage supper of the Lamb; and [receive] an admittance into the Heavenly Jerusalem; and a right to the tree of life—where we shall surround the throne of God and the Lamb, with everlasting songs of praise and glory.

I feel an interest in thy eternal welfare, and desire thee to come to a close examination of heart, having before thee a glorious hope of eternal life, that shall last with thee through time, that when the time of departure is at hand thou mayest, like good old Simeon, embrace the Saviour in thy arms, and say, "Lord, now lettest thou thy servant depart in peace, for mine eyes have seen thy salvation." I now conclude, with my love to thee and family, and may the God of Peace be and abide with thee now through time and when done toiling beneath the sun, but as one and all to the throne of God in an endless eternity; to praise Him forever and ever more.—Amen.

Passion, not principle, holds the purse strings; desire not duty, keeps the cash-book. It is seldom, indeed, that conscience counts the exchequer, and when it does, the fact is chronicled as prodigious. . . . More money spent for tobacco than for bread; more spirits than for wine; more for wine than baths, or means of preserving health; increasing vigor by exercise; more for amusement than for instruction; more for theatres than for churches. Actors, singers, and dancers are paid ten times as much as teachers and preachers are. The popular player entertains people, . . . and is not associated with any of the means whereby human welfare is promoted, becomes in a year many times richer than the professor who votes his life to the acquisition and diffusion of knowledge, or the philanthropist who spends his soul for his kind. . . . People will not give dimes in charity give dollars witness a foot-race or see a clown.—Select

For "The Friend"

Natural History, Science, &c.

The Water Spider.—I found a water spider and placed it in a jar containing vallisneria. In the night it spun a thin filmy irregular sphere-shaped chamber, which it had filled with air, placing the chamber near the top of the water. When out and crawling about the fly was placed near the habitation; attracted by its struggles the spider soon seized it, and after some manling carried it into its room pushing it under the bell. The spider is about three eighths of an inch in length without legs; dark-brown, appears black in the water. When in the water the abdomen and corners are always covered with a film of air, giving it a silvery appearance as it scuttles through the water. The operation of enlarging the chamber was very interesting to witness. After adding a ring of almost invisible film to its room by working inside, it proceeded to fill up with air, which it accomplished by mounting to the surface of the water, protruding the abdomen above the surface, and withdrawing it with an extra quantity of adhering to it. Descending with the bubble which appeared to be retained in position by the help of the hindermost legs, it next inserted the body under the bell, released the bubble and mounted for a fresh supply, repeating the process until the bell bubbled over with excess.

Some few weeks afterwards it was observed to be busy lining the upper part of the chamber, with a dense texture of snowy whiteness. Here it remained perfectly quiescent for fortnight, perhaps; when all conjectures were solved by the appearance one morning about twenty small silvery bubbles, each enveloping a minute spider, "the very image of its mother."—H. J. Bacon, in Science-Gossip.

Tame Wasp.—Sir John Lubbock, who has given much attention to the wasps, bees, and ants, thus describes one of the former which he succeeded in taming:—

"I took it with its nest in the Pyrenees. The nest, which was beautifully regular, consisted of about twenty cells, the majority ch contained an egg; but as yet no grub had been hatched out, and, of course, my wasps as yet alone in the world.

I had no difficulty in inducing her to feed my hand; but at first she was shy and cautious: she kept her sting in constant readiness, and once or twice in the train, when the trial came for tickets, and I was compelled to hurry her back into her bottle, she stung slightly,—I think, however, entirely from habit.

Gradually she became quite used to me, when I took her on my hand, evidently contented to be fed. She allowed me to stroke her without any appearance of fear, and for several months I never saw her sting."

When cold weather came on she fell into a torpid state, and died before the return of spring.

Earthquake Waves.—We were going along in a light wind and looking out for the straits of Gilolo, when we heard a dull roaring sound, like a heavy surf behind us. In a short time the roar increased, and we saw a white line of foam coming on, which rapidly passed us without doing any harm, as our boat rode easily over the wave. At short intervals for a dozen others overtook us with great rapidity, and then the sea became perfectly smooth as it was before. I concluded at once that these must be earthquake waves; and on reference to the old voyagers we find that the seas have long been subject to similar phenomena. Dampier encountered them near the coast of New Guinea, and describes them as follows: "We found here very strange waves, that ran in streams, making a great sea, roaring so loud that we could hear them when they came within a mile of us. The ground about them seemed all broken, and the ship so that she would not answer her helm. These rippings commonly lasted for 12 minutes, and then the sea became as smooth and still as a mill-pond."—Wallace's Malay Archipelago.

Destroying Mice.—A plague peculiar to the districts along the Rhine is found in the form of mice, which, in a fine season, swarm in such numbers that whole fields are devastated. In the neighborhood of Iulich, a mode of smothering the mice has been introduced. An iron pan, two feet high, has at bottom a grate supported by a pin. On the grating some coal is laid, and the pan, when filled with sulphur, leather and sulphur, is fastened with an airtight cover, which has a small tube, into which a small hose connected with a bellows is inserted. The night before it is used, the mice are surveyed and all open mouse-holes are closed close. In the morning such as are opened, are supposed to be tenanted, and being selected, the lower part of the pan is pressed against it, and the bellows being put to work, the smoke issues from the orifice of the grating and penetrates into the runways and galleries that connect the holes. A number of assistants are required to tread the mice close, through which the smoke is to escape; and if all due precaution be taken, great numbers of these diminutive enemies may be destroyed.

Delicious Drink.—I shall never forget, on my first journey into Cambambe, the haste in which we pushed forward, on an incredibly hot morning, in order to arrive at the river Mucozo, a small stream running into the Quanza. We had encamped the night before at a place where only a small supply of water was to be had from a filthy and muddy hole, and so thick and ochrey was it that, even after boiling and straining, it was nearly undrinkable. On reaching the high banks of the Mucozo, great was my disappointment to see the bed of the river one long expanse of dry sand shining in the hot sun, and my hope of water, as I thought, gone! Not so the blacks, who raised a loud shout as they caught sight of it, dashed in a race down the banks, and throwing themselves on the sand, quickly scraped out a hole about six inches deep with their hands, and lying flat stuck their faces on it, and seemed never to finish drinking to their hearts' content the inexpressibly refreshing, cool, filtered water. After having only dirty and thick water to drink, not improved by coffee or bad rum, after a long, hot day's journey, tired and exhausted, the ground for a bed, mosquitoes, and a smoky fire on each side to keep them off, fleas and other biting things from the sand, that nip and sting but are not seen or caught, snatches of sleep, feverish awakening in the morning, with parched mouth, the perspiration dried on the face and skin, gritty and crystallized and salt to the feel and taste, no water to drink or wash with, the sun out and shining strong again almost as soon as it is daylight, and hurry, hurry, through dry grass and sand without a breath of air, and with the thermometer at 90° in the shade, for four or five hours before we reached the Mucozo—it was no wonder I was disinclined to move from the place till the afternoon came, and the great heat of the day was passed; or that I thought the water, fresh and cold from its clean sandy bed, the most delicious drink that could be imagined!

The delight of a drink of pure cold water in hot climates has over and over again been described by all travellers, but it is impossible to realize it fully without experiencing the sensations that precede and cause the thirst that only cold water seems to satisfy.—Monteiro's Angola.

THE FRIEND.

FIRST MONTH 13, 1883.

Is there not some cause for those members of Philadelphia Yearly Meeting who are travelling in spirit for the spread of the Redeemer's kingdom in the world, and especially in the hearts of their fellow-members, to feel a degree of encouragement when reflecting on the evidences of Divine favor which have marked many of the meetings which have been held among us of latter time? The testimony of many witnesses will confirm the statement, that several of the general meetings which have been held within the limits of different Quarterly Meetings for their respective members, have been eminently owned by the Head of the Church; and the same may be said of other gatherings in the usual course of our meetings for worship and discipline. There has been experienced on these occasions a precious solemnity when the congregations were sitting in silence, showing that the hearts of those assembled were turned to Christ their Heavenly Teacher and Shepherd, and that they were being enabled by Him to draw near in spirit to the sacred footstool. This holy solemnity is the crown of all assemblies for worship; and the tendency and effect of a truly anointed ministry is to bring the people into that state of mind. How often does that experienced servant of the Most High, George Fox, record in his Journal, that he turned the attention of people to Christ, who alone could feed them with the bread of life and open Divine mysteries to them, and who must be waited upon as He reveals Himself in the secret of the soul to the attentive worshipper! As the minds of the people have been turned inward to the Lord, waiting upon Him in an exercise of spirit, He has been pleased from time to time to commission his ministers to proclaim the doctrine of the gospel; to bear testimony to the mercy of God, who so loved the world, that He sent his only begotten Son that through Him we might obtain salvation; who has exalted Him to be a Prince and a Saviour to give repentance and remission of sins; whose holy Light shines into the hearts of all as a swift witness against evil; and to all who will receive and obey it, He gives power to forsake their sins, and so to become the children of the Most High, being "washed, sanctified and justified in the name of the Lord Jesus and by the Spirit of our God."

Earnest and affectionate have been the pleadings with those who were negligent in regard to their spiritual welfare; or who were delaying that full submission to the visitation of Grace, without which there is neither peace nor safety.

Do not these things indicate that a Divine call is being renewedly extended to many among us, to shake ourselves from the dust of the earth, and to become a more single-hearted, zealous people, seeking heavenly riches and enjoyments in preference to those which belong to this life only? May the solemn responsibilities involved in this extension of Divine mercy affect the hearts of all; and may those, who have had some experience in the work of Grace in themselves, dwell under an exercise of spirit for the welfare of others, so that their whole conduct may tend to draw them into the fold of Christ, and lead them to walk in the footsteps of his flock!

We have received from the Secretary, Benjamin J. Crew, a copy of the Report to be presented at the annual meeting of the Pennsylvania Society to Protect Children from Cruelty, to be held on the evening of the 15th inst. at Association Hall, S. E. corner of 15th and Chestnut Streets.

The Report states, that the investigations of the Managers lead them to believe that at least 700 deserted and friendless children in the City of Philadelphia annually perish for want of care.

"924 complaints of cruelty or neglect of children have been placed on file during the past year, involving the custody or care of 2172 children. In the investigation of these complaints it was found necessary to secure the arrest of 322 persons. We have had committed to our custody in a legal manner during the same time 731 children, who have been humanely provided for, and disposed of according to the tables, which are herewith presented."

"It will be found upon an examination of our records that many of the most interesting cases (where the beneficial results are the most observable) have not been associated with the arrest of any of the parties implicated—on the other hand these have accepted, often gratefully, the terms offered by the officers, and the provisions made for the suffering children. Arrests are never made except when the protection and safety of the little ones urgently demand such a procedure; and the children are never removed from their homes until parental care has given place to shameful neglect or brutality."

We believe this society has exercised a very useful influence, not only in caring directly for suffering cases, but also in preventing cruelty and neglect by fear of exposure and punishment; and by drawing public attention to the needs of the class over which it watches.

The Annual Report of the Managers of the Reading Rooms for Friends, at 1413 Filbert St., Philada., shows an increase in the number of persons frequenting the rooms during the past year—making a daily average is nearly 14 visitors.

SUMMARY OF EVENTS.

UNITED STATES.—The Senate, on the 8th instant, passed the bill to prevent the use of the Capitol for other than legitimate purposes. The House Committee on Civil Service Reform, reported back the Senate bill (the Pendleton bill) "to regulate and improve the civil service of the United States." The bill was read at length, and discussed. It passed finally without amendment, by a vote of 155 to 47.

During the twelve months which ended on 11th mo. 30th, 1882, the exports from the United States exceeded the imports in value by $1,434,835. During the twelve months which ended on 11th mo. 30th, 1881, the excess of exports was $195,130,168.

The public debt statement for 12th month shows a decrease of $15,413,222.

The total coinage of the United States Mints, during the year 1882, comprised 88,805,831 pieces, valued at $94,820,120. The total gold coinage amounted in value to $65,887,685; the total silver coinage to $27,972,035, including 27,574,100 standard dollars; the total minor coinage—one, three and five cent pieces—to $960,400.

Little Thunder and Leading Feather, Chippewa chiefs, are on their way to Washington, accompanied by Ignatius Tomazin, a missionary. They wish to make a trade with the Government, whereby they can obtain for a portion of their reservation at Red Lake, certain agricultural implements, cattle, and utensils necessary for civilized Christian life, such as they are living."

The American Expedition sent to the Cape of Good Hope to take observations of the transit of Venus, have arrived at Plymouth, England. They report that they obtained two good observations of the internal contact, and took 236 photographs, 200 of which can be measured.

Fifty acres of land in Irondale, south of Chicago, were sold on last Seventh-day for $80,000. It is understood the purchase was made for West Virginia capitalists, who intend to build large iron works on the ground at a cost of $750,000 to $1,000,000.

The Pennsylvania State debt was reduced last year to a total of $20,225,083, of which $19,950,000 is interest-bearing debt. The annual debt charge for interest was reduced about $200,000 by refunding the 6s into 4 per cents. During the last four years the debt has been reduced $1,650,537, and, after deducting the sinking fund assets, the net debt is $12,232,099.

The debt of New York city, according to the Comptroller's monthly report, is $96,141,948, a decrease of about $2,000,000 since this time last year.

The extent of gambling upon some commercial exchanges is shown by a report from the New York Cotton Exchange. The cotton crop of the United States averages 6,000,000 bales, of which about one-tenth is sold in New York, yet this Exchange during the past year sold no less than 32,700,000 bales of "future" cotton.

In the recent scaling down of 40 per cent of the debt of Tennessee, by issuing new compromise bonds for the existing bonds, a portion of which had already been scaled down, it was solemnly agreed that the 1st mo. interest on these compromise bonds should be paid. This agreement was repudiated and default made on the coupons on 1st month, notwithstanding it was supposed ample funds were in the Treasury for the purpose. It now turns out that the Treasurer, Marshall F. Polk, of the State, having this dishonest example before him, has stolen all the funds and absconded.

Cerebro-spinal meningitis is reported among the horses at Oskaloosa, Iowa. No remedy has been found for the disease.

There were 409 deaths in this city last week, 10 more than the previous week, and 19 more than for the corresponding week last year. The number of males was 210, females 199: 62 died of consumption; 37 of pneumonia; 32 of diphtheria; 25 of old age; 15 of croup, and 13 of scarlet fever.

Markets, &c.—U. S. 3's, 103½; 3½'s, 102½; 4½'s, 113½; 4's 119½; currency 6's, 129 a 132.

Cotton continues dull. Sales of middlings are reported at 10½ a 10¾ cts. per pound for uplands and New Orleans.

Petroleum.—Standard white, 7¼ a 7¾ cts. for export, and 8¼ a 8¾ cts. per gallon for home use.

Flour is in fair demand and firm. Sales of 3000 barrels, including Minnesota extras, at $5 a $5.75; Pennsylvania family at $4.65 a $4.75; western do. at $4.80 a $5.40, and patents at $6 a $7.50. Rye flour is dull at $3.75 per barrel.

Grain.—Wheat closed dull and rather lower. Sales of 4600 bushels red in car lots at $1.10 a $1.11, as to quality. Rye is nominal at 58 cts. Corn is in fair demand. Sales of 9000 bushels in car lots, at 49 a 64 cts., as to quality and location. At the open board, 63½ cts. was bid for 1st month; 62½ cts. for later months. Oats are in fair demand and firm. Sales of 13,000 bushels, in car lots at 44½ a 50 cts.

Hay and Straw Market, for week ending 1st mo. 6th, 1883. — Loads of hay, 318; loads of straw, 52. Average price during the week—Primetimothy, 90 cts. to $1 per 100 pounds; mixed, 80 to 90 cts. per 100 pounds; straw, 65 to 75 cts. per 100 pounds.

Beef was dull and prices were a fraction lower: 3500 head arrived and sold at the different yards at 4 a 7 cts. per lb., as to quality.

Sheep were in demand at an advance: 12,000 head arrived and sold at the different yards, at 4 a 6½ cts., and lambs at 5 a 7 cts. per pound, as to condition.

Hogs were in demand and firmer: 4400 head arrived and sold at the different yards at 8¼ a 9½ cts. per lb., the latter rate for extra.

FOREIGN.—The Inman line steamer, City of Brussels, Captain Land, from New York 12th mo. 28th, for Liverpool, was run down in the Channel by the Glasgow steamer, Kirby Hall, during a fog, and ten persons were drowned—two of them Italians.

It is officially announced that W. E. Gladstone's medical adviser reports that he is suffering from overwork and needs rest. Gladstone has abandoned his proposed visit to Mid-Lothian.

General Chanzy, the well-known French General and life Senator, died suddenly on the night of the 4th inst., at Chalons, of apoplexy.

It is said that the negotiations between France and England in relation to Egypt have terminated, England making no new proposal on the question of control.

A ministerial crisis has occurred in Spain in consequence of a difference between Camacho, Minister of Finance, and Albareda, Minister of Commerce and Agriculture. At a Cabinet council held recently to discuss the Budget with a view of reducing taxes and at the same time increasing the revenue, Camacho proposed the sale of the State forest lands on the mountains, valued at 40,000,000 pesetas, in order to provide funds to pay during the term of eight years the increased interest on the public debt, commencing in 7th month. Albareda strongly opposed this, and, being unable to agree, both he and Camacho tendered their resignation from the Ministry. On the 7th instant the Ministers met, and, after four hours' deliberation, an agreement being impracticable, resolved to resign in a body. In presenting his resignation to the king, Sagasta, President of the Council, stated that he would return to the palace on the 8th inst. and receive the royal commands.

On the 8th instant the new Ministry was announced, as follows: Sagasta, Premier; Gen. Martinez Campos, Minister of War; Guyon, Minister of the Interior; Armijo, Minister of Foreign Affairs; Giron, Minister of Justice; Cuesta, Minister of Finance; Admiral Arias, Minister of Marine; Arce, Minister for the Colonies, and Gamazo, Minister of Public Works.

Respecting the floods in Europe the following despatches have been received:

Vienna, 1st mo. 2d.—All traces of the quays and banks of the Danube are lost here. Their places are merely marked by eddies in the torrent. A great quantity of water is still expected from the upper reaches of the river.

Robstadt, 1st mo. 3d.—The town, with the exception of the church and houses of the clergy, is deeply merged. The water in many houses nearly reaches roofs. In Friesenheim-on-the-Rhine the scene beggars description.

Berlin, 1st mo. 3d.—Seventy houses have fallen in Badenheim in consequence of the floods. At Rexh Morsch and Oppau, eighty houses have fallen in place from the same cause. At Vienna the danger is serious, and preparations are making to sound the bells directly if the dykes show signs of yielding.

Vienna, 1st mo. 3d.—The Danube is still rising. Race-course here is flooded as far as the Exhibition Building. At Frankenthal, Bavaria, 6000 persons abandoned their homes on account of the floods.

Amsterdam, 1st mo. 3d.—The northeastern point of North Brabant is submerged. Hundreds of people are homeless.

London, 1st mo. 4th.—A despatch from Wiesbaden reports 3000 persons homeless at Ludwigshafen, at Mannheim and 2000 at Worms. They are lodged in the school-houses and churches. More dikes broken at Mayence.

Pesth, 1st mo. 4th.—The Danube has inundated 1 burg, 34 miles from Vienna.

Geneva, 1st mo. 4th.—The Paris and Lyons Rail on the French frontier, is washed away. Direct way service between Switzerland, France and Italy interrupted.

London, 1st mo. 4th.—A Berlin despatch to the Times says: The inundations are taking the form of a general public catastrophe. The distress is increasing hourly. The military and civil authorities are making the greatest exertions to mitigate the misery of the disaster. There are no signs yet that the crisis of the calamity reached. The high temperature and rains continue at Ludwigshafen, opposite Mannheim, where the Rhine dam gave way last night, the lives of hundreds of people are imperilled. A steamer rescued hundreds, including the sick. The deepest distress prevails.

Paris, 1st mo. 4th.—The rivers Seine and Dordogne have inundated several villages. Thirty-two houses have fallen at Longe-Pierre, in the Department of Saone-et-Loire. The river Seine has again reached level of the 12th mo. flood.

London, 1st mo. 5th.—A despatch from Wiesbaden to the Daily News says: "The Rhine is beginning to fall. Thirteen persons were drowned at Friesenheim. In all 60 or 70 lives have been lost by the floods. The water is penetrating the foundations of the fortifications at Mayence. The barometer is rising." The Frankfort Gazette, acknowledging the receipt of 33,000 francs received in Frankfurt from New York for the benefit of Rhineland sufferers by the floods, says: "These furnish a fresh and happy proof that the Germans have found a new home in America are not lost to old Fatherland, but have ever warm and active sympathy in Germany's fortunes and also in her misfortune."

WESTTOWN BOARDING SCHOOL.

The Committee in charge of this Institution will have an adjourned meeting on the 19th inst., at 10 A. M. WM. EVANS, Clerk.

NOTICE.

The Germantown Employment Society has on hand a large stock of serviceable clothing for men, women and children, at low prices. These are well suited for Indians or Freedmen. A discount of ten per cent. be allowed on all sales of twenty dollars and over.

Application may be made to Anna Spencer, Corner St., Germantown; or at the Store, No. 4771 Main Street, Germantown.

DIED, on the 23d of 12th month last, at his residence near Sandyville, Warren Co., Iowa, JOHN T. MOORE, a beloved member of Coal Creek Monthly Meeting, Iowa, in the 73rd year of his age. He went through many trials and provings for the support of the trines and testimonies of Friends. The sufferings and lingering illness were borne with humble submission to the Divine disposal; fervently craving many times patience and ability to endure all his Divine Master saw meet to place upon him, without murmuring, few days before his close he remarked that his went out to faithful Friends everywhere; and he several times said there was not a cloud in his way.

At her residence in Germantown, 12th mo. 1882, SARAH H. MAILLY, widow of Augustine Mallery and daughter of the late Wm. and Mary Hodgson.

THE FRIEND.

A RELIGIOUS AND LITERARY JOURNAL.

VOL. LVI.

SEVENTH-DAY, FIRST MONTH 20, 1883.

NO. 24.

PUBLISHED WEEKLY.

Subscription, if paid in advance, $2.00 per annum; if not paid in advance $2.50; 10 cents extra is charged for Postage on those sent by mail.

Articles designed for insertion to be addressed to
JOSEPH WALTON,
MOORESTOWN, BURLINGTON CO., N. J.

Advertisements, payments and business communications, received by
JOHN S. STOKES,

NO. 116 NORTH FOURTH STREET, UP STAIRS,
PHILADELPHIA.

For "The Friend."

Letter from Florence, Italy.

The following extracts from a letter recently written from Florence, Italy, by a friend, who has at different times furnished columns with instructive articles, we trust will prove interesting to our readers. It contains the judgment of one who is well qualified, by extensive and diversified reading, and long intercourse with men, especially men of science and culture, to form a correct judgment as to the moral influence on the community of the excessive cultivation of those works of art which please the eye and the ear; which, even when they are comparatively innocent in themselves, have no power to lead to a higher source than that from which they originate. All true progress in virtue and ever will be, by advancing in the path of self-denial pointed out by our Holy Rememer as the only way to his Kingdom. This is as true of communities and nations, as of individuals. For it is a principle of universal application, that "Righteousness begetteth a nation, but sin is a reproach to any people."—Ed.]

After speaking of the value of the "moral atmosphere of a virtuous community," and consciousness that their surroundings at Florence were much below the level to which they had been accustomed, the letter proceeds: "We are at times oppressed with sorrow for the benighted condition of the people of this land, and wonder whether they can ever awake and arise to the height to which they ought to attain. But the lessons of history must be read, and here at Florence its lessons are unfolded with abounding illustrations in her well-preserved monuments, evincing to the truth of her story, more strong than can elsewhere be found. And when the past of 500 years comes before us with its lawlessness, its feuds and crimes, the fruit of unbridled passions, its petty tyrannies and follies and fanaticism and priestly domination, and 'spiritual wickedness in high places,' and we consider that no longer are we able to do as much as possible—that a public opinion has been formed that would not permit the revival of the petty schemes of unholy ambition, and the restoration of a spiritual inquisition, we congratulate ourselves that though much remains to be done, a real advance has been made. The demolition of the city walls is proof of real growth,—evidence that the people have confidence in the peace of the future,—a cheering sign of the times. Peaceful tramways occupy the site of the old bulwarks, and we rode in triumph around three walls of the city yesterday upon this modern innovation, passing the ancient gates that stand sad and lone, memorials of six centuries of semi-barbarism.

Many reflections arise as I traverse this old city, so given over to art and beauty. To me, the human soul seems to be a vastly more noble subject for the shaping chisel of reforming art, than are the cold bronze or marble. Florence, in her teachers and revivers of ancient learning and art, has aimed to excel in moulding the insensible stone and painting the unfeeling canvas; but the intellect and spirit of her people she has left in darkness, vainly hoping that the study of and familiarity with forms of beauty and grace would reflect their charms upon the human character. They have by the study of art lost the artlessness of innocence, and their devotion to forms of ideal beauty has done nothing to reform their hearts, or add any grace to hide the native deformity of unregenerate human nature. Savonarola early saw the inherently debasing influence of art as pursued by its devotees generally, because of its sensuous influence, and consistently collected and burned the pictures that contributed to impurity of thought and manners. In harmony with his great purpose, he also suppressed the use of musical instruments, believing them to be engines conducing to mental and moral perversion and degradation.

What a sermon does the new sacristy of San Lorenzo, the mausoleum of the Medici family, preach from the text, 'vanity of vanities, all is vanity.' Here are marbles, agates, jaspers, lapis lazuli, pearl and alabaster, shaped and fitted in forms of wondrous beauty, at a cost of many millions of dollars, and all for what purpose? To preserve and laud the memory of those who debased their fellows and destroyed their liberty, to gratify unholy ambition and greed for power! They have passed away, and the factions they raised, the crimes they committed, the miseries they inflicted upon the innocent, and the degradation they brought have been committed to the page of history, but their influence for good or for evil has not died with them. Had they—the Medici—been as virtuous and philanthropic as they were powerful and ambitious, they might have made their people the advanced guard of enlightened intelligence, and have led them, as Savonarola was permitted to incite some of his adherents, to the zealous illustration of every trait that ennobles a cultivated Christian nation. But the Medicean breed, with all the high talent and culture of some of its members, and the great financial and political abilities of the greatest among them, were base at heart, and their evil passions were unchecked by any Christian graces. Cursed with unlimited sway and boundless wealth, they ran riot in perjuries, murders and every evil. Their influence for evil extended through several generations, and a great grand-daughter of Lorenzo the Magnificent was the instigator of the slaughter of St. Bartholomew's day—an act which stands out in relief as one of the blackest crimes that has dishonored humanity, and the fruits of which still continue to delay the progress of the French nation, while it probably was a predisposing cause of the French revolution, by aiding the continuance of the Jesuits in power, and hence the remote cause of all her later ills.

The early ancestor of the Medici was a doctor, hence the name. Their arms were remarkable for the seven balls therein represented, which are said to have been boluses, great pills.

No more gratifying observation has been afforded me during travels in Europe (after the evident progress in education and consequent elevation of the people through their more ready intercourse by rail) than their growing regard for the teachers of a former generation, of whom their contemporaries were not worthy. 'Your fathers killed the prophets and ye have builded them sepulchres,' may be said of this people, and will perhaps be said of men as long as the world lasts; so prone are they to adhere to the ways and thoughts of their fathers, and to ignore or persecute the teachers of new and unpalatable truths. But 'truth is mighty and shall prevail,' and the evidence of this truth is around us in the erection of honorary monuments and statues to the advanced advocates of truths now accepted.

The extraordinary Denkmal (at Würms) of Luther and the Reformers of his time and antecedent, is a master-piece of monumental art. He stands erect eleven feet high in bronze upon an elevated pedestal, a commanding figure. In his left hand he holds a Bible on which his right is emphatically laid, while his face, on which faith is admirably portrayed, is turned heavenward. The motto upon the panel beneath him contains the concluding words of his defence before the Bishop, &c., at the Diet assembled near by, 'Hier stehe Ich. Ich can nicht andere. So helfe mich Gott. Amen.' [Here I stand. I can do nothing else. So help me, God. Amen.] Savonarola, Wickliffe and others appropriately sit at the four corners of the great pediment that sustains his pedestal.

In the Palazzo vecchio (old palace) in which Savonarola was imprisoned and almost racked to death and before which he was burned, now stands his colossal statue, holding aloft a golden crucifix, emblem of the purer faith to which he would have led his people. The great hall, enlarged by his request for the reception of the Council of 500 of his Christian government, is fitting place for a statue of this great spirit, if the spot whereon he was burned be not still more appropriate. 'Even in the city of Dante no greater figure has its dwelling.' 'Thus,' remarks a recent writer, 'has the great preacher of Florence,—the most powerful politician—the most disinterested reformer of his time—found full vindication in the unbounded admiration of a later age.' Alas, we are compelled to add, though too much in the spirit of Florence of the past, the beauty of form in marble, but where is the evidence that his lessons of purity and piety have snukn into their hearts?

'This was he

Savonarola, who while Peter sank
Ere Luther lived to spill them, said they stank!
With his whole boat-load, called courageously
"Wake Christ! Wake Christ!" Who having tried the tank

Of the Church-waters, used for baptistry
Ere Luther lived to spill them, said they stank!
Who also by a princely death-bed cried,
"Loose Florence, or God will not loose thy soul,"
While the Magnificent fell back and died
Beneath the star-looks shooting from the cowl
Which turned to wormwood bitterness, the wide Deep sea of his ambitions.'

Casa Guidi Window.

We are settled in an apartment in the Casa Guidi (the house of the Guidi family) where E. B. Browning lived, and where she wrote the volume bearing the above title, and where she died. A marble tablet beneath our window records the tribute of Florence to her memory in the sentiment that by 'her learning and the spirit of her poetry and interest in Italian liberty, she united, as with a ring of gold, the people of England and Italy.'

J. S. L."

For "The Friend."

Westtown Boarding School.

At a meeting of the committee, held 6th mo. 4th, 1856, the Trustees under the will of Joseph Ely reported the sale of the house and lot 190 Arch street, left by him to Westtown, for the sum of $12,200.

Although the following legacy was never received by the committee, in consequence of an act of the Legislature of Pennsylvania, passed about one year previous to the decease of the testator, it was thought it might be interesting and perhaps useful to revive it, as the law which prevented Westtown from receiving the legacy is still in existence.

"The following communication from Joseph Scattergood, one of the executors of our late friend Thomas Smith, was received and read, and Joel Evans, Thos. Kimber, S. B. Morris, Alfred Cope and others were appointed to give such attention to the case as may seem needful."

Extract from the will of Thomas Smith, proved 5th mo. 7th, 1856:

"I give devise and bequeath all my estate, real and personal property and effects whatsoever and wheresoever, unto my executors aforesaid, their heirs, executors, administrators and assigns forever, in trust nevertheless in the first place, to pay all my just debts and liabilities of every kind. (Power to sell real estate here given.) And after all my just debts and liabilities shall have been paid and discharged, then as respects all the residue of my estate, both real and personal, in trust for the uses and purposes of Friends' Boarding School at Westtown, and to make, execute and deliver such deeds, conveyances, assignments and assurances of the same, or any part thereof as the Yearly Meeting Committee for the time being charged with the care and management of the said Boarding School, by any minute or minutes of their proceedings, shall order, direct and appoint, and for no other purpose whatsoever. Provided always, and it is my will and direction that the residue of my estate hereby given and devised for the uses and purposes of the said Boarding School at Westtown, to the extent of sixty thousand dollars of the value thereof shall constitute a permanent fund, the yearly income of which shall be applied exclusively to the increase of the salaries of teachers, both male and female, who are and shall be from time to time employed as such at the said Boarding School."

Signed, JOSEPH SCATTERGOOD,

One of the Executors.

"The will, an extract of which is above given, was executed the 10th day of the 4th month last, and Thomas Smith died on the 30th of the same month."

Section 11th of an act entitled, "An Act relating to corporations and estates held for corporate, religious and charitable purposes," is as follows: "That no estate real, or personal, shall hereafter be bequeathed, devised or conveyed to any body politic, or to any person in trust for religious or charitable uses, except the same be done by deed or will, attested by two credible and at the same time disinterested witnesses, at least one calendar month before the decease of the testator or alienor, and all dispositions of property contrary hereto shall be void, and go to the residuary legatee or devisee, next of kin, or heirs according to law: Provided that any disposition of property within said period bona fide made for a fair valuable consideration, shall not be hereby avoided."

The committee appointed on repairs 6th mo. 1855, reports 12th mo. 3rd, 1856, "That soon after their appointment workmen were engaged, who, under the direction of the Superintendent (and one member of the committee who volunteered to assist him) repaired many parts of the wood-work of the school building and relaid some floors. The sashes in many of the windows as well as the sills of them were renewed, and 32 pairs of window shutters were procured and hung in place of a similar number which were not deemed worth repairing."

The report goes on to enumerate various other improvements, such as a new slate roof on the dwelling at the end of the lane, and on the infirmary building—floors renewed in the basement of the latter, and twenty iron pipes substituted for wooden ones at the mill; the erection of a new and commodious barn, near the school buildings; sheds, pig-house, and materials for new fences on both sides of the lane provided, &c., &c. The whole cost being some $10,699.07, which includes a moderate allowance for boarding the workmen—all of whom were provided for at the school—and with the exception of $399.07, had been defrayed through the liberality of Friends, without infringing upon the funds of the Institution.

At a meeting of the committee held 10th mo. 9th, 1857, "a communication was received from Cyrus Mendenhall resigning the situation of book-keeper, which he has faithfully filled for twenty-seven years, was read, and his resignation accepted, to take effect on the closing of the books in the 4th month next. David Roberts was appointed clerk. The committee on the legacy of Thomas Smith, deceased, now informed that by a decision of the Supreme Court of Pennsylvania, the bequest made by him for the use of the committee was decided to be void, under the act of the 25th of 4th mo. 1855, and his estate awarded to his heirs at law."

From the report made to the Yearly Meeting in 1858: "The committee is desirous that this Seminary may continue to be managed in conformity with the religious concern in which it originated, and may ever bear the obvious marks of being a Friends' School. Their efforts for the attainment of these objects will be very much aided by the kind and cheerful co-operation of those who send the children to be educated there, and we would earnestly solicit it. There are difficulties to be met with in conducting it, and a large amount of responsibility at all times to be borne, and it is a strength to the committee when they feel that they have the cordial support of Friends." Which continues very much to be the feeling of the committee at the present time.

For "The Friend."

Gleanings from Quaker Annals.

George Fox, that wise Elder and Reformer thus graphically alludes to the object of his gospel mission, when anointed to proclaim the day of the Lord, and to preach repentance to the people:—

"I was sent to turn people from darkness to light that they might receive Christ Jesus for to as many as should receive Him in his light, I saw he would give power to become the sons of God; which I had obtained by receiving Christ. I was to direct people to the Spirit, that gave forth the scriptures, by which they might be led into all truth, and up to Christ and God, as those had been who gave them forth. I was to turn them to the grace of God, and to the truth in the heart which came by Jesus; that by this grace they might be taught, which would bring their salvation, that their hearts might be established by it, their words might be seasoned, and all might come to know their salvation. I saw Christ died for all men, was propitiation for all, and enlightened all men and women with his divine and saving light, and that none could be true believers, but those who believed therein. I saw that the grace of God, which brings salvation, had appeared to all men, and that the manifestation of the Spirit of God was given to every man, to profit withal. These things I did not see by the help of man, nor by the letter, though they are written in the letter; but I saw them in the light of the Lord Jesus Christ, and by the immediate Spirit and power, as did the holy men of God by whom the holy scriptures were written. Yet I had no slight esteem of the holy scriptures; they were very precious to me; for I was in that Spirit by which they were given forth; and what the Lord opened in me, I afterwards found was agreeable to them. I could speak much of these things and many volumes might be written; but it would prove too short to set forth the infinite love, wisdom, and power of God, in preparing, fitting, and furnishing me for the service I had appointed me to; letting me see the depth of Satan on the one hand, and opening to me on the other hand, the divine mysteries of his own everlasting kingdom.

When the Lord God and his Son Jesus Christ sent me forth into the world to preach

s everlasting gospel and kingdom, I was ad that I was commanded to turn people to at inward light, spirit, and grace, by which it might know their salvation and their way God; even that Divine Spirit which would ad them into all truth, and which I infallly knew, would never deceive any."

The following is Robert Barclay's experience, as described in that part of his Apology for the true Christian Divinity which treats of worship. He says, "that he did not come to receive the Truth, by strength of argument, by a particular disquisition of each doctrine, and convincement of his understanding thereby; but by being secretly reached by the life—for," says he, "when I came into the true assemblies of God's people, I felt a secret *power among them, which touched my heart;
and as I gave way unto it, I found the evil wakening in me, and the good raised up:
and so I became knit and united unto them, engendering more and more after the increase of this power and life, whereby I might feel myself perfectly redeemed. And indeed this the surest way to become a Christian; to whom afterwards the knowledge and understanding of principles will not be wanting, it will grow up so much as is needful, as the natural fruit of this good root; and such knowledge will not be barren nor unfruitful.
After this manner, we desire therefore, all that come among us to be proselyted; knowing that though thousands should be convinced in their understandings, of all the truths we maintain, yet if they were not sensi- ble of this inward life, and their souls not changed from unrighteousness to righteousness, they could add nothing to us."

The subjoined is a part of the Preface of William Penn to his "No Cross, No Crown":
"The great business of man's life is to answer the end for which he lives; and that is, to glorify God, and save his own soul. This is the decree of heaven, as old as the world. But

* This "secret power" in "the silent assemblies of God's people" in the early day, as referred to by R.
Barclay, and which he says "touched my heart," and which, moreover, as he gave way to it, caused the evil to weaken in him and the good to be raised up, is just what is now so needed more prevailingly, to resuscitate and restore us as a people to the Lord's praise. Just it, which as it is permitted to recede because of individual neglect or unfaithfulness, or from efforts to plant in by the substitution of something else, will surely thus far

"Like the hollow roar
Of tides reeding from the insulted shore," Isaiah—"the glory is departed"—to be written teaching us. For, is not this "secret power" or life the Lord Jesus felt in our hearts and, at times, overcoming from vessel to vessel, that which constitutes Christ to be "in the midst" as He has promised to those that love His name? Is not this glorious "power" that which Friends professedly assemble diligently to seek I wait for? to feel and to pant after? Are not our great gatherings designed, in part, that a secret travail soul after the Divine Life of Christ unto communion with Him, may be refreshingly experienced? And is this, in large measure, that which distinguishes us from other professors of the Christian name? "What !" says I. Pennington, "to have a distinct name, or distinct meetings from the world, unless the power of the Lord be felt in your hearts, and his presence in your assemblies?"

Let us see to it, that the ark of our strength be no wrested from us by any of the divinations or en-chantments of the cruel destroyer, neither by the misleading influences of our fellow-members who may say, a confederacy;" but rather let us, as enjoined by the prophet: "Sanctify the Lord of hosts himself, and let Him be your fear, and let Him be your dread." His power is infinite; his grace is invincible; his strength made perfect in weakness.

so it is, that man mindeth nothing less, than what he should most mind; and despiseth to enquire into his own being, its original, duty, and end; choosing rather to dedicate his days,
the steps he should make to blessedness, to gratify the pride, avarice and luxury of his heart; as if he had been born for himself, or rather given himself being, and so not subject to the reckoning and judgment of a superior power. To this lamentable pass hath poor man brought himself, by his disobedience to the law of God in his heart, by doing that which he knows he should not do, and leaving undone what he knows he should do. So long as this disease continueth upon man, he will make God his enemy, and himself incapable of the love and salvation, which He hath manifested by his Son, Jesus Christ, to the world.

If, reader, thou art such an one, my counsel to thee is, to retire into thyself, and take a view of the condition of thy soul; for Christ hath given thee light, with which to do it.
Search carefully and thoroughly; thy life hangs upon it; thy soul is at stake. 'Tis but once to be done; if thou abusest thyself in it, the loss is irreparable; the world is not price enough to ransom thee. Wilt thou then, for such a world, overstay the time of thy salvation, and lose thy soul? Thou hast to do, I grant thee, with great patience; but that also must have an end: therefore provoke not God to reject thee. Dost thou know what it is to be rejected? 'Tis Tophet, 'tis hell, the eternal anguish of the damned. Oh! reader, as one knowing the terrors of the Lord, I persuade thee to be serious, diligent and fervent about thy own salvation! As one knowing the comfort, peace, joy and pleasure of the ways of righteousness, I exhort and invite thee to embrace the reproofs and convictions of Christ's light and spirit in thine own conscience, and bear the judgment of thy sin. The fire burns but the stubble; the wind blows only the chaff. Yield thy body, soul and spirit to Him who maketh all things new; new heavens and new earth, new love, new joy, new peace, new works, a new life and conversation. Men are grown corrupt and drossy by sin, and they must be saved through fire, which purgeth it away; therefore the word of God is compared to a fire, and the day of salvation to an oven; and Christ himself to a refiner of gold, and a purifier of silver."

The annexed is from an essay entitled, "The Way of Life and Death" by Isaac Pennington:—
"The first proper step in religion, is to know how to meet with God's Spirit. There is no true progress to be made in the true religion, till a man comes into the covenant; and there is no coming into the covenant but by the Spirit: therefore the first thing that is absolutely necessary to be known in religion is the Spirit, his writing, or at least his motions or stirrings, in the heart. It may further be evidenced thus: all things in religion, acceptable to God, flow from the Spirit: all knowledge is to come from Him; for He alone hath revealed and can reveal Truth, and is appointed by Christ to lead into all Truth.
All worship is to be offered up in Him: They that worship the Father, must worship Him in the Spirit and in the Truth; for the Father seeketh such to worship Him; but rejecteth all other worshippers and worship, how glorious soever their worship may seem to them:
particularly praying is always to be in the Spirit. Ephes. vi. 18; Jude 20. So singing &c., yea, the whole life and conversation is to be in the Spirit. Gal. v. 25. The mortifying of all corruption is to be done by the Spirit.

Rom. viii. 13. Indeed a Christian is nothing, and can do nothing, without the power and presence of the Spirit of God in him. So then, if nothing in religion can be done (with acceptance to God) without the Spirit, then the Spirit is the first thing to be looked after, by him who would be truly and well-groundedly religious."

A Chinese School in Boston.

By the last census, the Chinese in America numbered 105,463, with an average annual increase for the last ten years of about 4,000.
The largest proportion of these Mongolians remains on the Pacific slope; but they have drifted eastward till Boston now contains 300, mostly laundrymen. Six years ago a woman with a wise head and a kind heart felt that a friendly hand of Christian interest ought to be extended to these strangers. She began by teaching English to a few in her own home.
As the numbers increased, she secured a chapel for her class; and it finally grew into a mission school. The average attendance in 1880 was 35; in 1881 it increased to 51; and a few weeks ago I saw 115 sit down together to read the New Testament.

Each pupil requires a separate teacher, and it is not easy to secure a sufficient number with tact and facility in instructing. At first, a scholar is furnished with a primer, but is taught chiefly by object lessons. There is something pathetic in a Chinaman of forty years plodding patiently over "b-o-y" and
"c-a-t," pointing to the pictures, and showing grave delight when able to identify them.
One day, when teaching a new scholar who could speak English a little, we came to the word "God," and I said, "Do you know what God means?" After a moment's hesitation, he said, "He see Yit Mow; Yit Mow no see He," pointing upward. Slates and pencils are used to teach penmanship and practical arithmetic, such as would be of use in their business. When sufficiently advanced to read the Gospels, an English-Chinese dictionary is necessary,—the teacher finding the troublesome words in English, and the pupil seeing the definitions in his native tongue. This dictionary was compiled by a Chinese professor in Hartford, who sent the manuscript to Hong Kong, no American press being equal to Chinese type. They cost seven dollars apiece, and a Chinaman is always proud when rich enough to possess one. Though every mental process is rather slow, yet they are receptive, and retain well their small stores of knowledge.

The pupil with whom I am most familiar is eighteen years old, and has attended the school during his three years in America.
He is unwilling to leave a sentence till he comprehends it, but, when satisfied, passes promptly to the next. He reads quite readily, but is irritated by long geographical names.
Remembering my own youthful struggles with biblical names, I can sympathize with him. Coming to the word "sin," in the lesson, I asked its meaning. Laying his hand on his breast he replied, "Makes mens bad,—bad here," thus recognizing sin as an inward foe.
Another time after reading about the feeding of the five thousand, he re-read it to himself, thoughtfully going over each line. I think he was calculating how far five loaves and two fishes would go among so many. Shaking his head, he said with emphasis, "Too much people. Too little breads." Farther on in my explanation, I said, "But you remember what a miracle is?" "Yes, yes. God's man makes dead mens go walk." They are impressed with the generous charity that provides books and teachers, and frequently ask, "Why mens give so much things to John?" One who was sick at the hospital where he received kind care, and was often visited by the teachers, said, "Melican mens feel bad, Sim sick. Say, 'How Sim do?' China home, mens no say; 'How Sim do?' Mens no care how Sim do!" When he died, his countrymen buried him, and asked for the Christian service of prayer. It seems strange that they should think they can pray only in English, but they always express surprise when told that God can understand Chinese. One man when told God also knew his thoughts, said, "Me 'fraid!"

Their dress is invariably neat. Some still wear the national blouse made of brocade silk or plain woolen, the pointed soft shoes, and the precious queue wound round the shaven head. Others have assumed the frock-coat only, while a few wear the clothes of American gentlemen, with their queues adroitly concealed under the shirt-collar. Their interest is evident, for many come a half-hour before the appointed time. A few of the more advanced scholars are in a class together, and take turns in acting as interpreters for the lady superintendent. An evening school has been established to increase their educational privileges; and their natural politeness and gentle manners form an agreeable contrast to the rough rowdiness seen in the other evening schools of the city.

Of course, the motive that induces them to attend the school is the desire to acquire English; but the Christian influence they encounter, and the truth they hear, cannot fail. While Congress was debating the Chinese question, a practical demonstration was given week by week of a way to assimilate the Mongolian strangers, and make them worthy citizens of our great republic.—Selected.

New Find at Pompeii.—A beautiful painting has been discovered in the ruins of Pompeii. It represents the Judgment of Solomon, and is said to be the first picture on a sacred subject that has been discovered in the buried cities. A correspondent describing the picture says:

On a dais sits a king holding a scepter and robed in white. On each side of him sits a councillor, and behind them six soldiers under arms. The king is leaning over the front of the dais toward a woman in green robe, who kneels before him with disheveled hair and outstretched hands. In the centre is a three-legged table, like a butcher's block, upon which lies an infant who is held in a recumbent position in spite of his struggles by a woman wearing a turban. A soldier in armor, and wearing a helmet with a long red plume, holds the legs of the infant, and is about to cleave it in two with his falchion. The agony of the kneeling mother, the attention of the listening king, and the triumph of the second woman, who gloats over the division of the child, are all manifest.—Christian Advocate.

If you imitate not the life of Christ, you cannot be saved by his death.—Wm. Penn.

For "The Friend."

OUR MEETING.

A solemn hush is resting o'er the aisles our feet have trod,
As Friend by Friend is seated where we meet to worship God:

The breath of silent prayer seems throbbing on the air,
Arising as sweet incense from burdened hearts of care.

My thoughts, alas, are wandering, like the raven, to and fro,
I seem to see before me the forms of long ago.

From hours of earliest childhood my steps have hither turned,
To sit in living silence, or hearken words that burned:

Along yon gallery's ranges, now almost lone and bare,
I've gazed with earnest reverence on crowns of snow-white hair:

And all adown these benches, so thinly peopled now,
Filed ranks of men and women in solid row on row.

Ah! clear to memory's vision, some cherished ones arise;
Who, oft I love to fancy, are bending from the skies;

Their viewless spirits hovering as guardian angles near,
To shield from harm and danger, to comfort and to cheer.

The shining of their footsteps to us is radiant yet—
Their words of tender counsel we never shall forget.
The lives of good and holy the farthest regions lave,
The circles of their influence extend beyond the grave:

And here these vacant places a language speak to-day—
A call to all to enter the strait and narrow way.
Though but a feeble remnant of better days are we—Unworthy as successors, we feel ourselves to be—

Yet He whose power is mighty, who was our fathers' God,
Who bringeth light from darkness, and breath to soul-less clod,

Can still, as we are willing to yield our hearts to Him,
Revive our ancient glory, now vanishing and dim.

Could we but cast our anchor beyond life's cumbering cares,
Whose many varied interests absorb us unawares,

And with a purer purpose, a holier zeal entwine,
Then, like our predecessors, our faithfulness would shine:

And by our bright example might other feet be led,
The path of self-denial and humbleness to tread.
For e'en the least among us may wield unconscious power,
As on the air is wafted the perfume of a flower,

While he unto whose senses the fragrant breath may come
May scarce discern the blossom in its secluded home.

'Ere weakness only lieth our strength to be and do:
As drops that form the rainbow with sunlight shimmering through,

So heart and life must brighten with beauty not our own,
'Ere beams the bow of promise our Ark of Faith upon.
Then will the walls of Zion be builded as before,
And all her bounds of glory increase forevermore.

P.

For "The Friend."

Thoughts about the Eternal Gospels and the Falling Babylon.

(Continued from page 172.)

LOVE OF MONEY.

We read in the Scriptures about a man in Samaria, by name Simon, who was a sorcerer, and hearing the preaching of the gospel by Philip, he believed, and being baptized in water he continued with Philip. Simon had heard the outward history of Christ, and got a water baptism, which the outward Christendom owns, but he was in reality a sorcerer just as well afterwards as before; as every one is a sinner, and under the condemnation, who is not in the faith of which Christ is author and finisher, and not baptized with the Spirit and with fire, which is the only saving baptism.

"Now when Simon saw that by the laying on of the apostles' hands the Holy Ghost was given, he offered them money, saying: Give me also this power, that on whomsoever I lay my hands, he may receive the Holy Ghost. But Peter said unto him, Thy silver perish by thee, because thou hast thought to obtain the gift of God with money. Thou hast neither part nor lot in this word—for thy heart is not right before God. Repent, therefore, of thy wickedness, and pray the Lord if perhaps thy thoughts of thy heart shall be forgiven—; I see that thou art in the gall of bitterness, and in the bond of iniquity. And Simon answered and said: Pray ye for me to the Lord, that none of the things which ye have spoken come upon me." Now this Simon is a type of a common speculating professor in great Babylon. Simon believed and was baptized in water, and wanted to buy the Holy Ghost to start a trade with. Peter told him that his heart was not right before God, and told him to repent, and after he had repented pray to the Lord, if perhaps the thoughts his heart might be forgiven; but Simon wanted the Lord's apostles to pray for him. Repent seems to have been a hard word for Simon the type of the modern dwellers in Babylon.

Our Redeemer said: "That the birds and heaven have nests, and the foxes have holes, but the Son of man has nothing to lay his head on." O, how far is not his holy and meek Spirit departed from some of those who profess his name, but whose chief striving is to have money and do well in a worldly sense. From the time that popery sold indulgences down to this very day, it is mammon that is loved by the worldly Christians. It seems to be the god of mammon who carries on the whole Babylonian concern, and animates inhabitants almost more than the outside people called profane. The outward profession seems almost crazy to put on style and live in the vanity of life—in the pride and lust of life. What a mockery of our meek and lowly Redeemer, who humbled himself and gave his life for us, setting us an example that we should follow his footsteps. O, how is the Gospel of Christ, which is the power of God unto salvation from sin and vanity, unknown among many of those that say that Christ is their Saviour! But no wonder, when the Light of Christ, which should manifest itself in darkness, is despised, ignored, rebelled against and rejected.

It is often a saying of a young man who is living fast, that he will be all right after having sown his wild oats, and professors of Christ say so. Why shall a young man live fast? It is better to be wise than a fool; at the fear of God is the beginning of wisdom. I don't deny that a fast young man can be reclaimed to wisdom, but it is harder to conquer the farther we go astray; and the deeper wounds, the deeper scars. It sometimes happens that such a young man, who never gave his thoughts to something serious or holy to battle the battles of life, begins to think that he must do something to get along in the world, and when he don't feel himself inclined to do hard work, but is a natural talker he concludes to study for the ministry. Christ! He believes, and is baptized like Simon the sorcerer; he goes on, and he goes into the pulpit, as it is called. He may be successful, be of account in Babylon, and make revivals by his eloquence. O, how much is easier to be an eloquent preacher, than to be brought into reverence and silence before the and hear his voice! But such a preacher, ver good a talker, is only a hireling, and on after all; he never can turn the people to the inward Light and Grace of God by himself—for he never possessed it. He can use holy men's words, stealing them and making a trade of them, and therefore he can bring people to believe and be baptized, himself, and live in pride and vanity of himself. And if the people succeed in making money, they may give some to Jesus, as they who they think wants their money to extend his dominion on the earth; though the kingdom of God, which is in righteousness, peace and joy in the Holy Spirit, is extended only when the people repent of their ways and forsake them and follow Christ, the Light of the world. O, has not Babylon greatly extended itself over the earth; its towers and domes and bastions, seem to hide the Sun of Righteousness. When the sun is fallen the people will walk in the light of the Lamb!

I once attended a camp meeting of Methodists to see how they acted there. I was much surprised to see a minister step forward and make a collection of money. He said that he had taken so much pains to come there, and get up a meeting in good style, and they would not give him money to pay all the expenses. Remembering how my Master speaks to his disciples, how Peter said to Simon, the sorcerer, how Paul worked with his hands, I was shocked, but stopped. One collection was made, but was insufficient. Now the minister began to address the people, and I heard auctioneers with flying tongues, his minister was a match for them. He was in fine, the people, how they were working for Jesus, how they wanted money to do things with, and said what a good sermon the people should get in return if they would give in full. He said they had a young man who handed out the very best sermons, &c., &c. The collection was, after a heap of bawling, taken again, and proved satisfactory. After that the good sermon was ended, which was as vain and airy as the minister himself. The whole transaction at the meeting was abominable: I left, a sad but honest man. I have never been to a camp meeting before or after, though I have met preachers of that persuasion, and other persons too, that were good men.

For money, the Babylonian priest offers his services for sale; but disgrace and sin rest over him that let such babblers captivate and lead them; for, if they did take heed to the Light in themselves, they would see the falsehood of priestcraft. It is the most sad degradation that people can be so thoughtless through all their lifetime, that they hire a man who never has handled the word of Life, a teacher and minister, and hear him, never come to the knowledge of truth.

Views of Non-Smokers.—Neal Dow has discovered that more than one class in the community has rights. Of smokers who indulge in the presence of ladies and other non-smokers, he says: "These are men whose sense is dulled, if not deadened, by the tobacco habit. They do not even consider, do not think of it, that these people have a right to the pure, fresh air so important to comfort and health, and they poison it with tobacco smoke."

Religious Views and Tenets.

If we cannot come to the Father without the assistance of the Holy Spirit, how can we worship Him in spirit and in truth, without the assistance of the Spirit of truth? We cannot of ourselves even think a good thought, nor restrain an evil one.

"Tis not in human wit, nor human might,
To act, or pray, or think one thought aright."

If we are not living unto Christ, He is not living in us. And if He who died for us, and rose again for our justification, is not living in us, then we shall not be raised by Him into newness of spiritual life. And so our prayers, and our labors and solicitudes for the good of others, will be unavailing. In this condition, we may ask and receive not, because we ask amiss; being prompted by some selfish motive. We may hold the truth in the head, while the heart is unrighteous in the sight of God. But "the wrath of God is revealed from heaven against all ungodliness, and unrighteousness of men, who hold the truth in unrighteousness." Belief is good, as far as it goes. But if it originates merely in the head, and stops short of a practical and heart-changing work, of what does it avail?

We may, like some in the days of Christ, think we have eternal life in the Scriptures, and rest satisfied there, without coming to Him of whom they testify. The Scriptures do not save us. But the use of the Bible is to lead us to Him who gave it forth. And all scripture (it being given by inspiration of God,) is for our learning; that the man of God "through patience and comfort of the Scriptures might have hope." And while I do not read, in any part of the Bible, that the Scriptures are able to save us; yet I do read where Paul told Timothy that they were able to make him wise unto salvation through faith that is in Christ Jesus. But it is a heavenly wisdom that they teach to the man of God; or to all who have faith to be taught. Not the wisdom of this world, for that is foolishness with God. And the world, by its wisdom knows not God nor the deep things of God. They are hid from the wise and prudent of this world, and revealed only to the babes, or little ones in Christ. Worldly things are understood by worldly wisdom; and heavenly things by heavenly wisdom. And as the Scriptures are of a heavenly origin, and treat of heavenly things; so the deep things of God contained in them, can only be understood by men of God, or such as are enlightened by a heavenly wisdom. "O the depth of the riches both of the wisdom and knowledge of God!" How futile it is for poor finite man, with his limited capacities, to undertake to find them out! Yet God, in great mercy, has revealed an ample portion of the mysteries of his heavenly kingdom, and of his grace, unto his humble, dedicated, and obedient children "by his Spirit; for the Spirit searcheth all things, yea the deep things of God." And I am abundantly convinced that a restoring portion of gospel grace or the power of God, through the Spirit that searcheth all things, has been inwardly preached to every intelligent individual of every nation under heaven, even where the light of the Bible has never been known. For God, through his prophet, in speaking of Christ, says, (Is. xlix. 6) "It is a light thing that thou shouldst be my servant, to raise up the tribes of Jacob, and to restore the preserved of Israel; I will also give thee for a light to the Gentiles, that thou mayest be my salvation to the end of the earth." And while I believe the Bible to be an inexpressible blessing to mankind, next in value to the Holy Spirit; yet I believe it is not the universal and saving remedy for a fallen and sinful world. But I believe that as the devastating effects and influence of the evil spirit are universal; so the restoring and healing remedy is universal also. Finally I would say to such of us as are blest with the Scriptures, that when we have the Holy Spirit within, and the Bible without, we are thoroughly furnished unto all good works. And have no special need of the preached word only to stir up the pure mind by way of remembrance. But without the Holy Spirit, and an enlightened understanding of the Scriptures, though we may have the tongue of the learned, and speak forth fluently the enticing words of man's wisdom, yet it will amount to nothing more, in promotion of godliness, than sounding brass, or a tinkling cymbal. "For the kingdom of God is not in word but in power." But when we have the Spirit within, and not the Bible, we have a more sure word of prophecy than we can have with the Bible without the Spirit. The unrenewed man may, by a cultivated intellect, and by being "instructed in the way of the Lord; and being fervent in spirit, speak and teach diligently the things of the Lord, knowing only the baptism of John." His speech and his preaching will, by the enticing words of man's wisdom, meet the applause of those who have itching ears, and thus gather in an impulsive multitude to the glory of the natural man, but not to the glory of the Lord. Jesus said, while personally among men, "I am come in my Father's name, and ye received me not: if another shall come in his own name, him ye will receive." But, on the other hand, one may come among us, in the name of the living God, and speak forth the words of truth and soberness in demonstration of the spirit and power, to the great refreshment and comfort of the favored few who are walking in the narrow way, and who have an ear to hear what the Spirit saith unto the churches. So we see that we may have the Bible without the Spirit, and we may have the Spirit without the Bible; and we may have both in mutual harmony, to the great comfort and refreshment of the weary Christian traveller in his journey onward towards his heavenly home. And we may have a ministry without the visible Bible. But if the spirit of it is in the heart, and the light of the living God is there also; the baptizing power of it will be felt. And by it we shall be strengthened, and prompted to "warn the unruly, to comfort the feeble-minded, to support the weak, and to be patient toward all men." Also to exhort one another, and to assist in building up the church in the most holy faith. We may also have a ministry (and we now do have much of it) with the Bible in the hand, and also in the head, which is only superficial, baptizing the surface of the emotional man, without reaching the heart, or changing it, but producing an elementary and noisy work, comparable to the wind, the earthquake and the fire, in Elijah's day. But was the Lord in it? Or is He not far more likely to be in the "still small voice" which instructed Elijah, while in the calm, after the confused noise had past away?

For "The Friend."

It is sorrowful to see so many now in our beloved Society, reading Moses with a veil over their eyes; turning away from our high distinguishing views of the spirituality of true Christian worship; turning again to the weak and beggarly elements of the shadowy dispensation; turning away from that pure worship in spirit and in truth, which our forefathers suffered so much to establish before a gainsaying world. It is a religion and worship which caused them to be abundantly persecuted by the formal professors around them. But what a change has come over us! The remnant now who are still endeavoring to hold fast the profession of our ancient faith without wavering, are persecuted by false brethren—by those who are professing to walk by the same rule, and minding the same thing. For this, the ways of Zion mourn. The harps of many are bung, as it were, upon the willows in the midst of the streams of confusion. Their cries are often put up in secret, to the God of our fathers that He would spare his people, and give not his heritage to reproach, that the heathen should rule over us, and say where is their God? D. H.

Dublin, Ind., 12th mo. 27th, 1882.

For "The Friend."

Another year has rolled over us which has seemed freshly to bring to mind the wonderful works and infinite wisdom and goodness of the great Author of our being and of all created things. Whilst many of my fellow beings for whom Christ died may this day be spending their precious time in gratifying the lusts of the eye, the lusts of the flesh, and the vanity of the unregenerate heart, I have felt a desire that gratitude and thankfulness may prevail for mercies and favors past, and that the ensuing year may be more devoted to the service of our God. "Oh that men would praise the Lord for his goodness and for his wonderful works to the children of men."

I have sometimes been grieved to observe members of our beloved and highly favored society making what is called Christmas day and New Year's day (as I have believed) too much a time of mirth and of improper feasting, instead of feeling an engagement of soul, in all their doings and actions, "to do all to the glory of God." I have often been led greatly to admire the language of the Psalmist where he says, "Thou crownest the year with thy goodness and thy paths drop fatness." And were we as a nation and as a people more concerned daily to live in his favor and his fear, would we not experience more of his Divine blessings poured upon us not only temporally but spiritually, and our hearts often be filled with gratitude and praise to his great and ever worthy name? R.

1st mo. 1st, 1883.

"A quarter of a century lies between that death and this writing, but that dead babe to-day has more power over me than any living man. He walks the streets with me. He goes to all the funerals of infants. Before his death I did not know how to talk at the funeral of a babe. Now I know at least how to sympathize with the parents. When a man comes into my house, and tells me with quivering lips that there is a baby lying dead in his home, I go with him, led by the hand of a little child whose mortal body was buried a quarter of a century ago."—Dr. Deems in Church Union.

Need of Watchfulness.—In our little meeting [at Sydney, New South Wales,] I had to labor to turn the attention of the congregation to the importance of self examination; lest, by any means, after having known reconciliation with the Father, through repentance and faith in his beloved Son, they should have forsaken their first love, and have suffered other things so to have occupied their minds and entangled their affections, as to have taken precedence of the love of God. They were also reminded, that though the deeds of a good man will bear the light of open day, in the sight of his fellow-man, yet as things may look well to the eye of man while the heart is, nevertheless, far from right before God, it is necessary to bring our deeds to that Light which manifests whatever is reprobable, which is spoken of by the apostle Paul in his epistle to the Ephesians, (chap. v. 13, 14,) and which is the same as that treated of by the evangelist John, when, in speaking of Christ, he says, "in Him was life, and the life was the Light of men."—Jas. Backhouse.

For "The Friend."

Religious Items, &c.

Whiskey-drinking.—The Scotch correspondent of the National Baptist speaks of the efforts made to bring some of the most degraded portion of the population under religious influences by free breakfasts, and quotes from one of the daily papers, the following:

"There seems to be nearly equal numbers of men and women, and many of them have boys and girls with them. Some of the people are decent, tidy-looking folks, though wearing a sad, care-worn expression; others bear traces of debauch and villainy; the short-cropped men, betray the 'jail birds'; wretched, scarred faces tell the tales of rowdyism and maliciousness. The hall is seated with forms; and as the guests pour in they proceed, with astonishing quietness and attention to the rules of decorum, to the places allotted to them. A staff of young ladies and gentlemen are in attendance, posted through the hall. They act the part of a sort of moral policemen, and taking all things into account, their duties are astonishingly easy." After breakfast, some simple religious services are held according to their way.

The audiences, this writer states, "consist principally of tramps, and others who belong to the very lowest stratum of society, with men and women who have seen better days—a lawyer, the son of an ex-Mayor, a Ceylon coffee-planter, medical students, a master of arts, schoolmasters, clerks, the daughters of ministers, all of whom can trace their ruin to the infatuated love of strong drink. The writer of this article, when passing through a Scottish city containing about 26,000 inhabitants, saw a man begging bread, who was at one time an apothecary, the victim of strong drink. Passing a few yards down the same street, he saw a man who was once an ordained Presbyterian minister, and had received a regular college education, in rags, also the victim of strong drink. Going on to a bridge over a beautiful river, a few minutes walk from the aforesaid wrecks of what they were, he saw a person lying on his back helplessly drunk, who was once a teacher of elocution, and got a present of silverplate from his admirers; he saw these three melancholy instances of the debasing power of a tyrannical habit during the course of five minutes."

Evening classes for Working Women.—The Monthly Register of the Philadelphia Society for organizing charity, details the operations of a movement started about a year ago, to give evening instruction to working-women. Several classes were formed and the numbers were exceedingly moderate. In the fall, when the winter's work was reviewed, it was found that 226 pupils had paid the half fee and attended the classes regularly. A large number of women heard the lectures, paying five cents for each lecture. The Book-keeping, Cooking and Sewing classes had grown beyond volunteer management and had professional teachers. The reading staff had proved faithful, working with sustained enthusiasm. Several pupils of the book-keeping class had already secured positions, with increased pay. The house was free of charge and the teachers chiefly volunteers, the expenses were nearly all covered by the pupils' fees. After thorough discussion of the work done, the second season was commenced with all the former classes, with an additional room, and certain advanced classes made up of last year's pupils. One additional class has a character of its own. It consisted of five colored women who are learning work of various kinds, including sock and mitten knitting and embroidery. This accomplishment they hope to use while waiting for their little shops.

The Samaritan Society.—This is the name of an organization which is now attracting a good deal of interest in Germany. Prof. Esmarch, of Kiel, the founder and promoter of the movement, proposes to establish branches in the towns and cities of the empire, whose members shall be thoroughly instructed in the art of attending to the immediate needs of all who may meet with sudden accidents but who cannot at once secure medical aid. Prof. Esmarch had seen the beneficial results of the Ambulance Association of London, and commenced by forming a society at Kiel. It was at first intended to limit its membership to thirty persons, but this became so popular that in less than six months over 800 members were enrolled from all ranks and professions. Berlin soon followed Kiel, and Prof. Esmarch to organize a central society for the capital, and the good work is now extending all over the country. The practical knowledge which the Samaritan Society imparts to its members can be applied in many paths of life, preventing death and relieving suffering. Prof. Esmarch's plan makes membership conditional upon passing an examination after hearing a course of lectures; the examination being partly oral, partly in writing, and partly in a practical application of the principles and methods taught by the lectures. Every Samaritan is therefore an efficient member of the organization.—Monthly Register.

Wise Giving.—A munificent philanthropist was recently asked why he gave away so much during his life. He is reported to have answered; "Because I feel that I am a trustee for the right use of the property given me. With the experience that I have, I believe that I am the person best qualified to carry out the provisions and duties of trusteeship. What certainty have I that these provisions and duties would ever be carried out after my death? By making these gifts in my lifetime, I am sure that the precise object I desire is accomplished."

ay I want. And then too, I am more convinced it is more blessed to give to receive." Amongst all the good that have been said or written on giving this utterance is one of the very best.

For "The Friend."

Natural History, Science, &c.

Winnipeg.—Geological investigations to show that the waters of Lake Winnipeg in former ages found their way southward through the Mississippi, instead of flowing as now do into Hudson's Bay.

Cephalopoda.—Two gigantic species of cuttle-fish or squids, have recently been found at New Zealand. In one, the head and sessile arms 7 feet long and one pair of the tentacular arms 10 feet 5 inches, and the total arms 25 feet; the circumference of the body 9 feet. The other species was rather smaller, but more slender.

Gulf Stream.—The investigations of the United States Coast Survey Steamer "Blake," made in 1878, show the Gulf Stream to be between Little Bahama Bank and Florida, with the greatest velocity of the Gulf Stream 3 miles per hour, and an average velocity of 1 mile. The amount of water flowing in it is estimated to be more than 51,000,000,000 gallons per hour. The location of the current is much affected by the wind. The general depth in the centre was about 1000 fathoms, and the bottom there appeared to be washed nearly clear of ooze and other substances. The Arctic current of cold water crosses the Gulf Stream about Cape Hatteras, under it and then follows the outside of the plateau over which it flows, on its way to the Equator. In the middle of the Gulf the surface temperature was 83° Fahr. and the bottom temperature 44°—Amer. Jour. Sci.

Thermed Friends at Sea.—Birds at sea, whether wild in the air or tame on board, are of more value to man than too many care to think. For myself, apart from all feeling of the unnecessary destroying anything that has God's life in it, I have ever arrested my wanton sport at sea. If, however, for the sake of usefulness, the case is different. But the killing for killing's sake, or from thoughtless reckless whim, is to me distasteful. The pleasure of watching birds at sea, whether in the air or skimming the ocean wave's crest, has many minds very keen. And there is something more too to be considered. Many have often told their way by these birds, especially when nearing a coast. I well remember how I used to watch for them on reaching certain coasts, such as parts of the Azores, too low to be seen at the ordinary level of the sea. Once, when coming from Monte Video with a mail and important government despatches on board for the Falkland Islands, I was unable to run on my course in safety owing to a particular bird having joined company with us. On the occasion I refer to, we were approaching the land in thick, misty weather with a strong fair breeze. It had rained over for a day or two, so that the sea observations were somewhat doubtful. I was anxious, for it was drawing toward evening, and I wished to get in to Port Antonio by the mail that night. It was, however, so thick that we could not see ahead. Presently a shrill noise was heard, a flapping of wings made us look round above; and soon we saw what we call a "pilot" bird. I knew my distance now, for these birds never fly beyond so many miles from land. Therefore, we cautiously ran on till I caught a glimpse of a bluff cape, then steered more easterly, till after dark, with a clearer night, I sighted Cape Pembroke Light, and knowing the passages well, worked my vessel up Port-William, then shot through the "Narrows," and anchored in Port Stanley nearly opposite Government House, about one o'clock in the morning. Next day, I was thanked by His Excellency the Governor—himself a high naval officer—for the quick trip made, and the despatches, besides long-wished-for private correspondence, we had brought. But to this day, I thank God's feathered pilots, who had then and often shown me the way.—Captain Parker Snow.

Memory in a Horse.—When I was a boy, my father bought from a neighboring farmer a grey Galloway pony, which was very vicious to all with whom he came in contact, except myself. The way in which I acquired so much power over him was by feeding him with bread, and showing him other acts of kindness.

"Some years afterwards I left home, and when I returned to my father's house, I found that 'Donald' had been sold, and that all trace of him had been lost for about seventeen years. At that period, being resident in a village in a neighboring county, I saw an old white horse in a cart, and thinking it might be the same animal, I went up to him in the same way as I used to do in boyhood, and said, 'Donald.' He immediately turned his head to me, laid it on my shoulder, pawed the ground, rubbed his nose upon my arm, and showed the greatest possible affection.

"The driver of the cart came out of a shop, and warned me to keep away from the horse, or he would bite me. I moved up the street, when 'Donald' became restive, wrenched the reins out of the lad's hands, followed me along the street, and it was not until I entered a house that after much difficulty, he was induced to move away."—J. G. Wood's Man and Beast.

THE FRIEND.

FIRST MONTH 20, 1883.

A printed copy of the Minutes of Kansas Yearly Meeting (the smaller body) held at Quakerville, Kansas, in 10th month last, has been received.

The Discipline of Ohio Yearly Meeting was adopted for the government of the body, with a few changes—except as relates to the subject of marriage, the consideration of which was postponed for a year.

A Committee appointed the year before to consider the propriety of entering into correspondence with the body of Friends residing near Cayuga Lake, New York, reported that a part of the Committee visited that meeting, and that way does not open to enter into correspondence with them at this time. The report was adopted.

It was concluded to replace under the care of Spring River Quarterly Meeting, the Academy at Spring River, of which the Yearly Meeting took charge one year previously.

The following paragraphs are taken from the Minute on the state of Society:

"A very deep sympathy and tender regard was felt and expressed for the youth-of this Yearly meeting; on account of the unsettlement in the Society, it was felt to be a time of peculiar temptation to them; but they were earnestly counselled to take heed to the visitations of the Holy Spirit in their own hearts, as the only certain way to find that establishment that will bring inward peace in these times of trouble. It is always dangerous to slight these divine visitations in our hearts. There is a treasure in them, for they are the gift of our Heavenly Father's love, and if we receive and heed them in meekness and obedience, they will prove a pleasure; for in them is found the peace that passeth understanding.

"Friends were earnestly reminded that it is only by coming to the inward virtue and power of the Spirit, that will ever make us a faithful people. In these days, when the professions of the people are wavering, when their speech and their preaching is all about the outward Christ, the outward blood, and outward professions, it is of the greatest moment that all Friends should seek to know by an experimental knowledge and acquaintance, the virtue of these things, which are inward and spiritual."

"These things are only rightly known as we are born again, as we turn from darkness to light, from the power of Satan unto God; as we, as a people, again return to these appearances of Christ in the heart, there will be found the ancient carefulness that our daily walk and lives may be squared by the Divine standard; made after the pattern showed in this holy mountain. The prayers of such as these will be, 'Search me and try me, oh Lord, and if there be any wicked way in me, do Thou it away.'"

The Yearly Meeting next year is to be held at Emporia.

We have received a circular from an association for furnishing home teaching and the use of a Free Circulating Library in raised type, for the adult blind.

In the city, it is proposed to employ some women visitors to go to the houses of the blind, and encourage them to learn to read. In the committee are several Friends residing in and near Philadelphia.

The Library consists of the Bible in sixty-five parts, and over two hundred and fifty volumes of History, Travels, Biography, Poetry, &c.

The blind living in any portion of the United States, can have the Alphabet and a learner's reading card mailed to them by addressing John P. Rhoads, Bible House, No. 701 Walnut street, Philadelphia, and enclosing ten cents, to pay for their cost and postage.

Those who knew how to read before getting blind, can learn this system in a few weeks' time, and after this is done they can have the free use of the Library by paying postage on the books.

SUMMARY OF EVENTS.

UNITED STATES.—In the Senate, the Presidential succession bill has passed by a vote of 40 to 13. It provides: That in case of removal, death, resignation or inability of both President and Vice President of the United States, the Secretary of State shall be eligible to the office. In case of the latter being ineligible through "death, resignation or inability," the Secretary of the Treasury. Ineligibility of the latter gives precedence to the Secretary of War. Then the Attorney General, Postmaster General, Secretary of Navy and Secretary of the Interior, come in succession to act until the vacancy is lawfully filled. Provided, that each of these is eligible to the Presidency under the Constitution, and not under articles of impeachment.

